II The fabulous colonies of Egyptians and Trojans, of Scandinavians and Spaniards, which flattered the pride and amused the credulity of our rude ancestors, have insensibly vanished in the light of science and philosophy [108] The present age is satisfied with the simple and rational opinion that the islands of Great Britain and Ireland were gradually peopled from the adjacent continent of Gaul From the coast of Kent, to the extremity of Caithness and Ulster, the memory of a Celtic origin was distinctly preserved in the perpetual resemblance of language, of religion, and of manners and the peculiar characters of the British tribes might be naturally ascribed to the influence of accidental and local circumstances [109] The Roman province was reduced to the state of civilised and peaceful servitude the rights of savage freedom were contracted to the narrow limits of Caledonia The inhabitants of that northern region were divided, as early as the reign of Constantine, between the two great tribes of the SCOTS and of the PICTS[110] who have since experienced a very different fortune The power, and almost the memory, of the Picts have been extinguished by their successful rivals, and the Scots, after maintaining for ages the dignity of an independent kingdom, have multiplied, by an equal and voluntary union, the honours of the English name The hand of nature had contributed to mark the ancient distinction of the Scots and Picts The former were the men of the hills, and the latter those of the plain The eastern coast of Caledonia may be considered as a level and fertile country, which, even in a rude state of tillage, was capable of producing a considerable quantity of corn, and the epithet of cruitnich, or wheat-eaters, expressed the contempt or envy of the carnivorous highlander The cultivation of the earth might introduce a more accurate separation of property, and the habits of a sedentary life, but the love of arms and rapine was still the ruling passion of the Picts, and their warriors, who stripped themselves for a day of battle, were distinguished, in the eyes of the Romans, by the strange fashion of painting their naked bodies with gaudy colours and fantastic figures The western part of Caledonia irregularly rises into wild and barren hills, which scarcely repay the toil of the husbandman, and are most profitably used for the pasture of cattle The highlanders were condemned to the occupations of shepherds and hunters, and as they seldom were fixed to any permanent habitation, they acquired the expressive name of SCOTS, which, in the Celtic tongue, is said to be

equivalent to that of wanderers or vagrants The inhabitants of a barren land were urged to seek a fresh supply of food in the waters The deep lakes and bays which intersect their country are plentifully stored with fish and they gradually ventured to cast their nets in the waves of the ocean The vicinity of the Hebrides so profusely scattered along the western coast of Scotland tempted their curiosity and improved their skill and they acquired by slow degrees the art or rather the habit of managing their boats in a tempestuous sea and of steering their nocturnal course by the light of the well known stars The two bold headlands of Caledonia almost touch the shores of a spacious island which obtained from its luxuriant vegetation the epithet of Green and has preserved with a slight alteration the name of Erin or Ierne or Ireland It is probable that in some remote period of antiquity the fertile plains of Ulster received a colony of hungry Scots and that the strangers of the North who had dared to encounter the arms of the legions spread their conquests over the savage and unwarlike natives of a solitary island It is certain that in the declining age of the Roman empire Caledonia Ireland and the Isle of Man were inhabited by the Scots and that the kindred tribes who were often associated in military enterprise were deeply affected by the various accidents of their mutual fortunes They long cherished the lively tradition of their common name and origin and the missionaries of the Isle of Saints who diffused the light of Christianity over North Britain established the vain opinion that their Irish countrymen were the natural as well as spiritual fathers of the Scottish race The loose and obscure tradition has been preserved by the venerable Bede who scattered some rays of light over the darkness of the eighth century On this slight foundation a huge superstructure of fable was gradually reared by the bards and the monks two orders of men who equally abused the privilege of fiction The Scottish nation with mistaken pride adopted their Irish genealogy and the annals of a long line of imaginary kings have been adorned by the fancy of Boethius and the classic elegance of Buchanan [111]

Six years after the death of Constantine the destructive inroads of the Scots and Picts required the presence of his youngest son who reigned in the Western empire Constans visited his British dominions but we may form some estimate of the importance of his achievements by the language of panegyric, which celebrates only his triumph over the elements or in other words the good fortune of a safe and easy passage from the port of Boulogne to the harbour of Sandwich [112] The calamities which the afflicted provincials continued to experience from foreign war and domestic tyranny were aggravated by the feeble and corrupt administration of the eunuchs of Constantius and the transient relief which they might obtain from the virtues of Julian was soon lost by the absence and death of their benefactor The sums of gold and silver which had been painfully collected or liberally transmitted for the payment of the troops were intercepted by the avarice of the commanders discharges or at least exemptions from the military service were publicly sold the distress of the soldiers, who were injuriously deprived of their legal and scanty subsistence provoked them to frequent desertion the nerves of discipline were relaxed, and the highways were infested with robbers [113] The oppression of the good and the impunity of the wicked equally contributed to diffuse through the island a spirit of discontent and revolt and every ambitious subject every desperate exile might entertain a reasonable hope of subverting the weak and distracted government of Britain The hostile tribes of the North who detested the pride and power of the King of the World, suspended their domestic feuds and the barbarians of the land and sea the Scots the Picts and the Saxons spread themselves with rapid and irresistible fury from the wall of Antoninus to the shores of Kent Every production of art and nature every object of convenience or luxury which they were incapable of creating by labour or procuring by trade was accumulated in the rich and fruitful province of Britain [114] A philosopher may deplore the eternal discord of the human race but he will confess that the desire of spoil is a more rational provocation than the vanity of conquest From the age of Constantine to that of the Plantagenets this rapacious spirit continued to instigate the poor and hardy Caledonians but the same people whose generous humanity seems to inspire the songs of Ossian was disgraced by a savage ignorance of the virtues of peace and of the laws of war Their southern neighbours have felt and perhaps exaggerated the cruel depredations of the Scots and Picts [115] and a valiant tribe of Caledonia, the Attacotti [116] the enemies and afterwards the soldiers of Valentinian are accused by an eye-witness of delighting in the taste of human flesh When they hunted the woods for prey it is said that they attacked the shepherd rather than his flock and that they curiously selected the most delicate and brawny parts both of males and females, which they prepared for their horrid repasts.[117] If in the neighbourhood of the commercial and literary town of Glasgow a race of cannibals has really existed, we may contemplate in the period of the Scottish history the opposite extremes of savage and civilised life. Such reflections tend to enlarge the circle of our ideas, and to encourage the pleasing hope that New Zealand may produce in some future age the Hume of the Southern Hemisphere.

Every messenger who escaped across the British channel conveyed the most melancholy and alarming tidings to the ears of Valentinian, and the emperor was soon informed that the two military commanders of the province had been surprised and cut off by the barbarians. Severus, count of the domestics, was hastily despatched, and as suddenly recalled, by the court of Treves. The representations of Jovinus served only to indicate the greatness of the evil, and, after a long and serious consultation, the defence, or rather the recovery, of Britain was intrusted to the abilities of the brave Theodosius. The exploits of that general, the father of a line of emperors, have been celebrated, with peculiar complacency, by the writers of the age, but his real merit deserved their applause, and his nomination was received, by the army and province, as a sure presage of approaching victory. He seized the favourable moment of navigation, and securely landed the numerous and veteran bands of the Heruli and Batavians, the Jovians and the Victors. In his march from Sandwich to London, Theodosius defeated several parties of the barbarians, released a multitude of captives, and, after distributing to his soldiers a small portion of the spoil, established the fame of disinterested justice by the restitution of the remainder to the rightful proprietors. The citizens of London, who had almost despaired of their safety, threw open their gates, and, as soon as Theodosius had obtained from the court of Treves the important aid of a military lieutenant and a civil governor, he executed with wisdom and vigour the laborious task of the deliverance of Britain. The vagrant soldiers were recalled to their standard, an edict of amnesty dispelled the public apprehensions, and his cheerful example alleviated the rigour of martial discipline. The scattered and desultory warfare of the barbarians, who infested the land and sea, deprived him of the glory of a signal victory, but the prudent spirit and consummate art of the Roman general were displayed in the operations of two campaigns, which successively rescued every part of the province from the hands of a cruel and rapacious enemy. The splendour of the cities and the security of the fortifications were diligently restored by the paternal care of Theodosius, who with a strong hand confined the trembling Caledonians to the northern angle of the island, and perpetuated, by the name and settlement of the new province of Valentia, the glories of the reign of Valentinian.[118] The voice of poetry and panegyric may add, perhaps with some degree of truth, that the unknown regions of Thule were stained with the blood of the Picts, that the oars of Theodosius dashed the waves of the Hyperborean ocean, and that the distant Orkneys were the scene of his naval victory over the Saxon pirates.[119] He left the province with a fair as well as splendid reputation, and was immediately promoted to the rank of master-general of the cavalry by a prince who could applaud, without envy, the merit of his servants. In the important station of the Upper Danube, the conqueror of Britain checked and defeated the armies of the Alemanni, before he was chosen to suppress the revolt of Africa.

III. The prince who refuses to be the judge, instructs his people to consider him as the accomplice of his ministers. The military command of Africa had been long exercised by Count Romanus, and his abilities were not inadequate to his station, but as sordid interest was the sole motive of his conduct, he acted on most occasions as if he had been the enemy of the province, and the friend of the barbarians of the desert. The three flourishing cities of Oea, Leptis, and Sabrata, which, under the name of Tripoli, had long constituted a federal union,[120] were obliged, for the first time, to shut their gates against a hostile invasion, several of their most honourable citizens were surprised and massacred, the villages and even the suburbs were pillaged, and the vines and fruit trees of that rich territory were extirpated by the malicious savages of Gætulia. The unhappy provincials implored the protection of Romanus, but they soon found that their military governor was not less cruel and rapacious than the barbarians. As they were incapable of furnishing the four thousand camels and the exorbitant present which he required before he would march to the assistance of Tripoli, his demand was equivalent to a refusal, and he might justly be accused as the author of the public calamity. In the annual assembly of the three cities, they nominated two deputies to lay at the feet of V

lentinian the customary offering of a gold victory and to accompany this tribute of duty rather than of gratitude with their humble complaint that they were ruined by the enemy and betrayed by their governor If the severity of Valentinian had been rightly directed it would have fallen on the guilty head of Romanus But the count long exercised in the arts of corruption had despatched a swift and trusty messenger to secure the venal friendship of Remigius master of the offices The wisdom of the imperial council was deceived by artifice and their honest indignation was cooled by delay At length when the repetition of complaint had been justified by the repetition of public misfortunes the notary Palladius was sent from the court of Trèves to examine the state of Africa and the conduct of Romanus The rigid impartiality of Palladius was easily disarmed he was tempted to reserve for himself a part of the public treasure which he brought with him for the payment of the troops and from the moment that he was conscious of his own guilt he could no longer refuse to attest the innocence and merit of the count The charge of the Tripolitans was declared to be false and frivolous and Palladius himself was sent back from Trèves to Africa with a special commission to discover and prosecute the authors of this impious conspiracy against the representatives of the sovereign His inquiries were managed with so much dexterity and success that he compelled the citizens of Leptis who had sustained a recent siege of eight days to contradict the truth of their own decrees and to censure the behaviour of their own deputies A bloody sentence was pronounced without hesitation by the rash and headstrong cruelty of Valentinian The president of Tripoli who had presumed to pity the distress of the province was publicly executed at Utica four distinguished citizens were put to death as the accomplices of the imaginary fraud and the tongues of two others were cut out by the express order of the emperor Romanus elated by impunity and irritated by resistance was still continued in the military command till the Africans were provoked by his avarice to join the rebellious standard of Firmus the Moor [121]

His father Nabal was one of the richest and most powerful of the Moorish princes who acknowledged the supremacy of Rome But as he left either by his wives or concubines a very numerous posterity the wealthy inheritance was eagerly disputed and Zamma one of his sons was slain in a domestic quarrel by his brother Firmus The implacable zeal with which Romanus prosecuted the legal revenge of this murder could be ascribed only to a motive of avarice or personal hatred but on this occasion his claims were just his influence was weighty and Firmus clearly understood that he must either present his neck to the executioner or appeal from the sentence of the Imperial consistory to his sword and to the people [122] He was received as the deliverer of his country and as soon as it appeared that Romanus was formidable only to a submissive province the tyrant of Africa became the object of universal contempt. The ruin of Cæsarea which was plundered and burnt by the licentious barbarians convinced the refractory cities of the danger of resistance the power of Firmus was established, at least in the provinces of Mauritania and Numidia and it seemed to be his only doubt whether he should assume the diadem of a Moorish king or the purple of a Roman emperor But the imprudent and unhappy Africans soon discovered that in this rash insurrection they had not sufficiently consulted their own strength or the abilities of their leader Before he could procure any certain intelligence that the emperor of the West had fixed the choice of a general or that a fleet of transports was collected at the mouth of the Rhone he was suddenly informed that the great Theodosius with a small band of veterans had landed near Igilgilis or Gigeri on the African coast and the timid usurper sunk under the ascendant of virtue and military genius Though Firmus possessed arms and treasures, his despair of victory immediately reduced him to the use of those arts which in the same country and in a similar situation had formerly been practised by the crafty Jugurtha He attempted to deceive by an apparent submission the vigilance of the Roman general to seduce the fidelity of his troops and to protract the duration of the war by successively engaging the independent tribes of Africa to espouse his quarrel or to protect his flight Theodosius imitated the example and obtained the success of his predecessor Metellus When Firmus in the character of a suppliant accused his own rashness and humbly solicited the clemency of the emperor the lieutenant of Valentinian received and dismissed him with a friendly embrace but he diligently required the useful and substantial pledges of a sincere repentance nor could he be persuaded by the assurances of peace to suspend for an instant the operations of an active war A dark conspiracy was detected by the penetration of Theodosius and he satisfied, without much reluctance the public indigna

tion which he had secretly excited Several of the guilty accomplices of Firmus were abandoned, according to ancient custom, to the tumult of a military execution, many more, by the amputation of both their hands, continued to exhibit an instructive spectacle of horror, the hatred of the rebels was accompanied with fear, and the fear of the Roman soldiers was mingled with respectful admiration Amidst the boundless plains of Gætulia and the innumerable valleys of Mount Atlas, it was impossible to prevent the escape of Firmus, and if the usurper could have tired the patience of his antagonist, he would have secured his person in the depth of some remote solitude, and expected the hopes of a future revolution He was subdued by the perseverance of Theodosius, who had formed an inflexible determination that the war should end only by the death of the tyrant, and that every nation of Africa which presumed to support his cause should be involved in his ruin At the head of a small body of troops, which seldom exceeded three thousand five hundred men, the Roman general advanced with a steady prudence, devoid of rashness or of fear, into the heart of a country where he was sometimes attacked by armies of twenty thousand Moors The boldness of his charge dismayed the irregular barbarians, they were disconcerted by his seasonable and orderly retreats, they were continually baffled by the unknown resources of the military art, and they felt and confessed the just superiority which was assumed by the leader of a civilised nation When Theodosius entered the extensive dominions of Igmazen, king of the Isaflenses, the haughty savage required, in words of defiance, his name and the object of his expedition "I am," replied the stern and disdainful count, "I am the general of Valentinian, the lord of the world, who has sent me hither to pursue and punish a desperate robber Deliver him instantly into my hands, and be assured, that, if thou dost not obey the commands of my invincible sovereign, thou and the people over whom thou reignest shall be utterly extirpated" As soon as Igmazen was satisfied that his enemy had strength and resolution to execute the fatal menace, he consented to purchase a necessary peace by the sacrifice of a guilty fugitive The guards that were placed to secure the person of Firmus deprived him of the hopes of escape, and the Moorish tyrant, after wine had extinguished the sense of danger, disappointed the insulting triumph of the Romans by strangling himself in the night His dead body, the only present which Igmazen could offer to the conqueror, was carelessly thrown upon a camel, and Theodosius, leading back his victorious troops to Sitifi, was saluted by the warmest acclamations of joy and loyalty [123]

Africa had been lost by the vices of Romanus, it was restored by the virtues of Theodosius, and our curiosity may be usefully directed to the inquiry of the respective treatment which the two generals received from the Imperial court The authority of Count Romanus had been suspended by the master-general of the cavalry, and he was committed to safe and honourable custody till the end of the war His crimes were proved by the most authentic evidence, and the public expected, with some impatience, the decree of severe justice But the partial and powerful favour of Mellobaudes encouraged him to challenge his legal judges, to obtain repeated delays for the purpose of procuring a crowd of friendly witnesses, and, finally, to cover his guilty conduct by the additional guilt of fraud and forgery About the same time the restorer of Britain and Africa, on a vague suspicion that his name and services were superior to the rank of a subject, was ignominiously beheaded at Carthage Valentinian no longer reigned, and the death of Theodosius, as well as the impunity of Romanus, may justly be imputed to the arts of the ministers who abused the confidence and deceived the inexperienced youth of his sons [124]

If the geographical accuracy of Ammianus had been fortunately bestowed on the British exploits of Theodosius, we should have traced, with eager curiosity, the distinct and domestic footsteps of his march But the tedious enumeration of the unknown and uninteresting tribes of Africa may be reduced to the general remark, that they were all of the swarthy race of the Moors, that they inhabited the back settlements of the Mauritanian and Numidian provinces, the country, as they have since been termed by the Arabs, of dates and of locusts,[125] and that, as the Roman power declined in Africa, the boundary of civilised manners and cultivated land was insensibly contracted Beyond the utmost limits of the Moors, the vast and inhospitable desert of the South extends above a thousand miles to the banks of the Niger The ancients, who had a very faint and imperfect knowledge of the great peninsula of Africa, were sometimes tempted to believe that the torrid zone must ever remain destitute of inhabitants,[126] and they sometimes amused their fancy by filling the vacant space with headless men, or rather monsters,[127] with horned and cloven-footed satyrs[128] with fabulous centaurs[129] and with human pigmies who waged a bold and doubtful warfare against the cranes[130] Carthage would have trembled at the strange intelligence that the countries on either side of the equator were filled with innumerable nations who differed only in their colour from the ordinary appearance of the human species and the subjects of the Roman empire might have anxiously expected that the swarms of barbarians which issued from the North would soon be encountered from the South by new swarms of barbarians equally fierce and equally formidable These gloomy terrors would indeed have been dispelled by a more intimate acquaintance with the character of their African enemies The inaction of the negroes does not seem to be the effect either of their virtue or of their pusillanimity They indulge like the rest of mankind their passions and appetites and the adjacent tribes are engaged in frequent acts of hostility[131] But their rude ignorance has never invented any effectual weapons of defence or of destruction they appear incapable of forming any extensive plans of government or conquest and the obvious inferiority of their mental faculties has been discovered and abused by the nations of the temperate zone. Sixty thousand blacks are annually embarked from the coas o Guinea, never to return to their native country but they are embarked in chains[132] and this constant emigration which in the space of two centuries might have furnished armies to over run the globe accuses the guilt of Europe and the weakness of Africa

IV The ignominious treaty which saved the army of Jovian had been faithfully executed on the side of the Romans and as they had solemnly renounced the sovereignty and alliance of Armenia and Iberia those tributary Kingdoms were exposed without protection, to the arms of the Persian monarch[133] Sapor entered the Armenian territories at the head of a formidable host of cuirassiers of archers and of mercenary foot but it was the invariable practice of Sapor to mix war and negotiation and to consider falsehood and perjury as the most powerful instruments of regal policy He affected to praise the prudent and moderate conduct of the king of Armenia and the unsuspicious Tiranus was persuaded by the repeated assurances of insidious friendship to deliver his person into the hands of a faithless and cruel enemy In the midst of a splendid entertainment he was bound in chains of silver as an honor due to the blood of the Arsacides and after a short confinement in the Tower of Oblivion at Ecbatana he was released from the miseries of life, either by his own dagger or by that of an assassin The kingdom of Armenia was reduced to the state of a Persian province the administration was shared between a distinguished satrap and a favourite eunuch and Sapor marched without delay to subdue the martial spirit of the Iberians Sauromaces who reigned in that country by the permission of the emperors was expelled by a superior force and as an insult on the majesty of Rome the king of kings placed a diadem on the head of his abject vassal Aspacuras. The city of Artogerassa[134] was the only place of Armenia which presumed to resist the effort of his arms The treasure deposited in that strong fortress tempted the avarice of Sapor but the danger of Olympias the wife or widow of the Armenian king excited the public compassion and animated the desperate valour of her subjects and soldiers The Persians were surprised and repulsed under the walls of Artogerassa by a bold and well-concerted sally of the besieged. But the forces of Sapor were continually renewed and increased the hopeless courage of the garrison was exhausted the strength of the walls yielded to the assault and the proud conqueror after wasting the rebellious city with fire and sword led away captive an unfortunate queen who in a more auspicious hour had been the destined bride of the son of Constantine[135] Yet if Sapor already triumphed in the easy conquest of two dependent kingdoms, he soon felt that a country is unsubdued as long as the minds of the people are actuated by an hostile and contumacious spirit. The satraps whom he was obliged to trust embraced the first opportunity of regaining the affection of their countrymen and of signalising their immortal hatred to the Persian name Since the conversion of the Armenians and Iberians those nations considered the Christians as the favourites and the Magians as the adversaries of the Supreme Being the influence of the clergy over a superstitious people was uniformly exerted in the cause of Rome and as long as the successors of Constantine disputed with those of Artaxerxes the sovereignty of the intermediate provinces the religious connection always threw a decisive advantage into the scale of the empire A numerous and active party acknowledged Para the son of Tiranus as the lawful sovereign of Armenia and his title to the throne was deeply rooted in the hereditary succession of five hundred years By the unanimous consent of the Iberians the country was equally divided between the rival princes, and Aspacuras, who owed his diadem to the choice of Sapor, was obliged to declare that his regard for his children, who were detained as hostages by the tyrant, was the only consideration which prevented him from openly renouncing the alliance of Persia The emperor Valens, who respected the obligations of the treaty, and who was apprehensive of involving the East in a dangerous war, ventured with slow and cautious measures, to support the Roman party in the kingdoms of Iberia and Armenia Twelve legions established the authority of Sauromaces on the banks of the Cyrus The Euphrates was protected by the valour of Arintheus A powerful army, under the command of Count Trajan, and of Vadomair king of the Alemanni, fixed their camp on the confines of Armenia But they were strictly enjoined not to commit the first hostilities, which might be understood as a breach of the treaty, and such was the implicit obedience of the Roman general, that they retreated, with exemplary patience, under a shower of Persian arrows, till they had clearly acquired a just title to an honourable and legitimate victory Yet these appearances of war insensibly subsided in a vain and tedious negotiation The contending parties supported their claims by mutual reproaches of perfidy and ambition, and it should seem that the original treaty was expressed in very obscure terms, since they were reduced to the necessity of making their inconclusive appeal to the partial testimony of the generals of the two nations who had assisted at the negotiations [136] The invasion of the Goths and Huns, which soon afterwards shook the foundations of the Roman empire, exposed the provinces of Asia to the arms of Sapor But the declining age, and perhaps the infirmities of the monarch, suggested new maxims of tranquillity and moderation His death, which happened in the full maturity of a reign of seventy years, changed in a moment the court and councils of Persia, and their attention was most probably engaged by domestic troubles and the distant efforts of a Carmanian war [137] The remembrance of ancient injuries was lost in the enjoyment of peace The kingdoms of Armenia and Iberia were permitted, by the mutual though tacit consent of both empires, to resume their doubtful neutrality In the first years of the reign of Theodosius, a Persian embassy arrived at Constantinople to excuse the unjustifiable measures of the former reign, and to offer, as the tribute of friendship, or even of respect, a splendid present of gems, of silk, and of Indian elephants [138]

In the general picture of the affairs of the East under the reign of Valens, the adventures of Para form one of the most striking and singular objects The noble youth, by the persuasion of his mother Olympias, had escaped through the Persian host that besieged Artogerassa, and implored the protection of the emperor of the East By his timid councils, Para was alternately supported, and recalled, and restored, and betrayed The hopes of the Armenians were sometimes raised by the presence of their natural sovereign, and the ministers of Valens were satisfied that they preserved the integrity of the public faith, if their vassal was not suffered to assume the diadem and title of King But they soon repented of their own rashness They were confounded by the reproaches and threats of the Persian monarch They found reason to distrust the cruel and inconstant temper of Para himself, who sacrificed, to the slightest suspicions, the lives of his most faithful servants, and held a secret and disgraceful correspondence with the assassin of his father and the enemy of his country Under the specious pretence of consulting with the emperor on the subject of their common interest, Para was persuaded to descend from the mountains of Armenia, where his party was in arms, and to trust his independence and safety to the discretion of a perfidious court The king of Armenia, for such he appeared in his own eyes and in those of his nation, was received with due honours by the governors of the provinces through which he passed but when he arrived at Tarsus in Cilicia, his progress was stopped under various pretences, his motions were watched with respectful vigilance, and he gradually discovered that he was a prisoner in the hands of the Romans Para suppressed his indignation, dissembled his fears, and, after secretly preparing his escape, mounted on horseback with three hundred of his faithful followers The officer stationed at the door of his apartment immediately communicated his flight to the consular of Cilicia, who overtook him in the suburbs, and endeavoured, without success, to dissuade him from prosecuting his rash and dangerous design A legion was ordered to pursue the royal fugitive, but the pursuit of infantry could not be very alarming to a body of light cavalry, and upon the first cloud of arrows that was discharged into the air, they retreated with precipitation to the gates of Tarsus After an incessant march of two days and two nights, Para and his Armenians reached the banks of the Euphrates, but the passage of the river, which they were obliged to swim, was attended with some delay and some loss The country was alarmed and the two roads which were only separated by an interval of three miles had been occupied by a thousand archers on horseback under the command of a count and a tribune Para must have yielded to superior force if the accidental arrival of a friendly traveller had not revealed the danger and the means of escape A dark and almost impervious path securely conveyed the Armenian troops through the thicket and Para had left behind him the count and the tribune while they patiently expected his approach along the public highways They returned to the Imperial court to excuse their want of diligence or success and seriously alleged that the king of Armenia who was a skilful magician had transformed himself and his followers and passed before their eyes under a borrowed shape After his return to his native kingdom Para still continued to profess himself the friend and ally of the Romans but the Romans had injured him too deeply ever to forgive and the secret sentence of his death was signed in the council of Valens The execution of the bloody deed was committed to the subtle prudence of Count Trajan and he had the merit of insinuating himself into the confidence of the credulous prince that he might find an opportunity of stabbing him to the heart Para was invited to a Roman banquet which had been prepared with all the pomp and sensuality of the East the hall resounded with cheerful music and the company was already heated with wine when the count retired for an instant drew his sword and gave the signal of the murder A robust and desperate barbarian instantly rushed on the king of Armenia and though he bravely defended his life with the first weapon that chance offered to his hand the table of the Imperial general was stained with the royal blood of a guest and an ally Such were the weak and wicked maxims of the Roman administration that to attain a doubtful object of political interest the laws of nations and the sacred rights of hospitality were inhumanly violated in the face of the world [139]

V During a peaceful interval of thirty years the Romans secured their frontiers and the Goths extended their dominions The victories of the great Hermanric,[140] king of the Ostrogoths and the most noble of the race of the Amali have been compared by the enthusiasm of his countrymen to the exploits of Alexander with this singular and almost incredible difference that the martial spirit of the Gothic hero instead of being supported by the vigour of youth was displayed with glory and success in the extreme period of human life between the age of fourscore and one hundred and ten years. The independent tribes were persuaded or compelled to acknowledge the king of the Ostrogoths as the sovereign of the Gothic nation the chiefs of the Visigoths or Thervingi, renounced the royal title and assumed the more humble appellation of Judges and among those judges Athanaric Fritigern and Alavivus were the most illustrious by their personal merit as well as by their vicinity to the Roman provinces These domestic conquests which increased the military power of Hermanric, enlarged his ambitious designs He invaded the adjacent countries of the North and twelve considerable nations whose names and limits cannot be accurately defined successively yielded to the superiority of the Gothic arms [141] The Heruli who inhabited the marshy lands near the lake Mæotis were renowned for their strength and agility and the assistance of their light infantry was eagerly solicited and highly esteemed in all the wars of the barbarians But the active spirit of the Heruli was subdued by the slow and steady perseverance of the Goths and after a bloody action in which the king was slain the remains of that warlike tribe became an useful accession to the camp of Hermanric He then marched against the Venedi unskilled in the use of arms and formidable only by their numbers which filled the wide extent of the plains of modern Poland The victorious Goths who were not inferior in numbers prevailed in the contest by the decisive advantages of exercise and discipline After the submission of the Venedi the conqueror advanced without resistance as far as the confines of the Æstii [142] an ancient people whose name is still preserved in the province of Esthonia. Those distant inhabitants of the Baltic coast were supported by the labors of agriculture enriched by the trade of amber and consecrated by the peculiar worship of the Mother of the Gods But the scarcity of iron obliged the Æstian warriors to content themselves with wooden clubs and the reduction of that wealthy country is ascribed to the prudence rather than to the arms of Hermanric His dominions, which extended from the Danube to the Baltic included the native seats and the recent acquisitions of the Goths and he reigned over the greatest part of Germany and Scythia with the authority of a conqueror and sometimes with the cruelty of a tyrant But he reigned over a part of the globe incapable of perpetuating and adorning the glory of its heroes The name of Hermanric is almost buried in oblivion, his exploits are imperfectly known and the Romans themselves appeared unconscious of the progress of an aspiring power which threatened the liberty of the North and the peace of the empire [143]

The Goths had contracted an hereditary attachment for the Imperial house of Constantine, of whose power and liberality they had received so many signal proofs They respected the public peace, and if an hostile band sometimes presumed to pass the Roman limit, their irregular conduct was candidly ascribed to the ungovernable spirit of the barbarian youth Their contempt for two new and obscure princes, who had been raised to the throne by a popular election, inspired the Goths with bolder hopes, and, while they agitated some design of marching their confederate force under the national standard, [144] they were easily tempted to embrace the party of Procopius, and to foment, by their dangerous aid, the civil discord of the Romans The public treaty might stipulate no more than ten thousand auxiliaries, but the design was so zealously adopted by the chiefs of the Visigoths, that the army which passed the Danube amounted to the number of thirty thousand men.[145] They marched with the proud confidence that their invincible valour would decide the fate of the Roman empire, and the provinces of Thrace groaned under the weight of the barbarians, who displayed the insolence of masters, and the licentiousness of enemies But the intemperance which gratified their appetites retarded their progress, and before the Goths could receive any certain intelligence of the defeat and death of Procopius, they perceived, by the hostile state of the country, that the civil and military powers were resumed by his successful rival A chain of posts and fortifications, skilfully disposed by Valens, or the generals of Valens, resisted their march, prevented their retreat, and intercepted their subsistence The fierceness of the barbarians was tamed and suspended by hunger, they indignantly threw down their arms at the feet of the conqueror, who offered them food and chains the numerous captives were distributed in all the cities of the East, and the provincials, who were soon familiarised with their savage appearance, ventured, by degrees, to measure their own strength with these formidable adversaries, whose name had so long been the object of their terror The king of Scythia (and Hermanric alone could deserve so lofty a title) was grieved and exasperated by this national calamity His ambassadors loudly complained, at the court of Valens, of the infraction of the ancient and solemn alliance which had so long subsisted between the Romans and the Goths They alleged that they had fulfilled the duty of allies, by assisting the kinsman and successor of the emperor Julian, they required the immediate restitution of the noble captives, and they urged a very singular claim, that the Gothic generals, marching in arms, and in hostile array, were entitled to the sacred character and privileges of ambassadors The decent, but peremptory, refusal of these extravagant demands was signified to the barbarians by Victor, master general of the cavalry, who expressed, with force and dignity, the just complaints of the emperor of the East [146] The negotiation was interrupted, and the manly exhortations of Valentinian encouraged his timid brother to vindicate the insulted majesty of the empire [147]

The splendour and magnitude of this Gothic war are celebrated by a contemporary historian [148] but the events scarcely deserve the attention of posterity, except as the preliminary steps of the approaching decline and fall of the empire Instead of leading the nations of Germany and Scythia to the banks of the Danube, or even to the gates of Constantinople, the aged monarch of the Goths resigned to the brave Athanaric the danger and glory of a defensive war, against an enemy who wielded with a feeble hand the powers of a mighty state A bridge of boats was established upon the Danube, the presence of Valens animated his troops, and his ignorance of the art of war was compensated by personal bravery, and a wise deference to the advice of Victor and Arintheus, his masters-general of the cavalry and infantry The operations of the campaign were conducted by their skill and experience, but they found it impossible to drive the Visigoths from their strong posts in the mountains, and the devastation of the plains obliged the Romans themselves to repass the Danube on the approach of winter The incessant rains, which swelled the waters of the river, produced a tacit suspension of arms, and confined the emperor Valens, during the whole course of the ensuing summer, to his camp of Marcianopolis The third year of the war was more favourable to the Romans, and more pernicious to the Goths The interruption of trade deprived the barbarians of the objects of luxury, which they already confounded with the necessaries of life, and the desolation of a very extensive tract of country threatened them with

horrors of famine Athanaric was provoked or compelled to risk a battle which he lost in the plains and the pursuit was rendered more bloody by the cruel precaution of the victorious generals who had promised a large reward for the head of every Goth that was brought into the Imperial camp The submission of the barbarians appeased the resentment of Valens and his council the emperor listened with satisfaction to the flattering and eloquent remonstrance of the senate of Constantinople which assumed for the first time a share in the public deliberations and the same generals Victor and Arintheus who had successfully directed the conduct of the war were empowered to regulate the conditions of peace The freedom of trade which the Goths had hitherto enjoyed was restricted to two cities on the Danube the rashness of their leaders was severely punished by the suppression of their pensions and subsidies and the exception which was stipulated in favour of Athanaric alone was more advantageous than honourable to the Judge of the Visigoths Athanaric who on this occasion appears to have consulted his private interest without expecting the orders of his sovereign supported his own dignity and that of his tribe in the personal interview which was proposed by the ministers of Valens He persisted in his declaration that it was impossible for him without incurring the guilt of perjury ever to set his foot on the territory of the empire and it is more than probable that his regard for the sanctity of an oath was confirmed by the recent and fatal examples of Roman treachery The Danube which separated the dominions of the two independent nations was chosen for the scene of the conference The emperor of the East and the Judge of the Visigoths accompanied by an equal number of armed followers advanced in their respective barges to the middle of the stream After the ratification of the treaty and the delivery of hostages Valens returned in triumph to Constantinople and the Goths remained in a state of tranquillity about six years till they were violently impelled against the Roman empire by an innumerable host of Scythians who appeared to issue from the frozen regions of the North.[19]

The emperor of the West who had resigned to his brother the command of the Lower Danube reserved for his immediate care the defence of the Rhætian and Illyrian provinces which spread so many hundred miles along the greatest of the European rivers The active policy of Valentinian was continually employed in adding new fortifications to the security of the frontier but the abuse of this policy provoked the just resentment of the barbarians The Quadi complained that the ground for an intended fortress had been marked out on their territories and their complaints were urged with so much reason and moderation that Equitius master general of Illyricum consented to suspend the prosecution of the work till he should be more clearly informed of the will of his sovereign. This fair occasion of injuring a rival and of advancing the fortune of his son was eagerly embraced by the inhuman Maximin the præfect or rather tyrant of Gaul The passions of Valentinian were impatient of control and he credulously listened to the assurances of his favourite that if the government of Valeria and the direction of the work were intrusted to the zeal of his son Marcellinus the emperor should no longer be importuned with the audacious remonstrances of the barbarians The subjects of Rome and the natives of Germany were insulted by the arrogance of a young and worthless minister who considered his rapid elevation as the proof and reward of his superior merit He affected however to receive the modest application of Gabinius king of the Quadi with some attention and regard but this artful civility concealed a dark and bloody design and the credulous prince was persuaded to accept the pressing invitation of Marcellinus I am at a loss how to vary the narrative of similar crimes or how to relate that in the course of the same year but in remote parts of the empire the inhospitable table of two Imperial generals was stained with the royal blood of two guests and allies inhumanly murdered by their order and in their presence The fate of Gabinius and of Para, was the same but the cruel death of their sovereign was resented in a very different manner by the servile temper of the Armenians and the free and daring spirit of the Germans The Quadi were much declined from that formidable power which in the time of Marcus Antoninus had spread terror to the gates of Rome. But they still possessed arms and courage their courage was animated by despair and they obtained the usual reinforcement of the cavalry of their Sarmatian allies So improvident was the assassin Marcellinus that he chose the moment when the bravest veterans had been drawn away to suppress the revolt of Firmus and the whole province was exposed with a very feeble defence to the rage of the exasperated barbarians They invaded Pannonia in the season of harvest, unmercifully destroyed every object of plunder which they could not easily transport, and either disregarded or demolished the empty fortifications The princess Constantia, the daughter of the emperor Constantius, and the granddaughter of the great Constantine, very narrowly escaped That royal maid, who had innocently supported the revolt of Procopius, was now the destined wife of the heir of the Western empire She traversed the peaceful province with a splendid and unarmed train Her person was saved from danger, and the republic from disgrace, by the active zeal of Messalla, governor of the provinces As soon as he was informed that the village where she stopped only to dine was almost encompassed by the barbarians, he hastily placed her in his own chariot, and drove full speed till he reached the gates of Sirmium, which were at the distance of six and twenty miles Even Sirmium might not have been secure if the Quadi and Sarmatians had diligently advanced during the general consternation of the magistrates and people Their delay allowed Probus, the Prætorian præfect, sufficient time to recover his own spirits and to revive the courage of the citizens He skilfully directed their strenuous efforts to repair and strengthen the decayed fortifications, and procured the seasonable and effectual assistance of a company of archers to protect the capital of the Illyrian provinces Disappointed in their attempts against the walls of Sirmium, the indignant barbarians turned their arms against the master-general of the frontier, to whom they unjustly attributed the murder of their king Equitius could bring into the field no more than two legions, but they contained the veteran strength of the Mæsian and Pannonian bands The obstinacy with which they disputed the vain honours of rank and precedency was the cause of their destruction, and, while they acted with separate forces and divided councils, they were surprised and slaughtered by the active vigour of the Sarmatian horse The success of this invasion provoked the emulation of the bordering tribes, and the province of Mæsia would infallibly have been lost if young Theodosius, the duke or military commander of the frontier, had not signalised, in the defeat of the public enemy, an intrepid genius worthy of his illustrious father and of his future greatness [150]

The mind of Valentinian, who then resided at Trèves, was deeply affected by the calamities of Illyricum, but the lateness of the season suspended the execution of his designs till the ensuing spring He marched in person, with a considerable part of the forces of Gaul, from the banks of the Moselle, and to the suppliant ambassadors of the Sarmatians, who met him on the way, he returned a doubtful answer, that as soon as he reached the scene of action he should examine and pronounce When he arrived at Sirmium he gave audience to the deputies of the Illyrian provinces, who loudly congratulated their own felicity under the auspicious government of Probus, his Prætorian præfect [151] Valentinian, who was flattered by these demonstrations of their loyalty and gratitude, imprudently asked the deputy of Epirus, a Cynic philosopher of intrepid sincerity,[15] whether he was freely sent by the wishes of the province? "With tears and groans am I sent (replied Iphicles) by a reluctant people" The emperor paused, but the impunity of his ministers established the pernicious maxim that they might oppress his subjects without injuring his service A strict inquiry into their conduct would have relieved the public discontent The severe condemnation of the murder of Gabinius was the only measure which could restore the confidence of the Germans, and vindicate the honour of the Roman name But the haughty monarch was incapable of the magnanimity which dares to acknowledge a fault He forgot the provocation, remembered only the injury, and advanced into the country of the Quadi with an insatiate thirst of blood and revenge The extreme devastation and promiscuous massacre of a savage war were justified in the eyes of the emperor, and perhaps in those of the world, by the cruel equity of retaliation,[152] and such was the discipline of the Romans, and the consternation of the enemy, that Valentinian repassed the Danube without the loss of a single man As he had resolved to complete the destruction of the Quadi by a second campaign, he fixed his winter-quarters at Bregetio, on the Danube, near the Hungarian city of Presburg While the operations of war were suspended by the severity of the weather, the Quadi made an humble attempt to deprecate the wrath of their conqueror, and, at the earnest persuasion of Equitius, their ambassadors were intoduced into the Imperial council They approached the throne with bended bodies and dejected countenances, and, without daring to complain of the murder of their king, they affirmed, with solemn oaths, that the late invasion was the crime of some irregular robbers, which the public council of the nation condemned and abhorred The answer of the emperor left them but little hope from his clemency or compassion He reviled, in the most intemperate language their baseness their ingratitude their insolence His eyes his voice his colour his gestures expressed the violence of his ungoverned fury and while his whole frame was agitated with convulsive passion a large blood vessel suddenly burst in his body and Valentinian fell speechless into the arms of his attendants Their pious care immediately concealed his situation from the crowd but in a few minutes the emperor of the West expired in an agony of pain retaining his senses till the last, and struggling without success, to declare his intentions to the generals and ministers who surrounded the royal couch Valentinian was about fifty four years of age and he wanted only one hundred days to accomplish the twelve years of his reign [154]

The polygamy of Valentinian is seriously attested by an ecclesiastical historian [155] The empress Severa (I relate the fable) admitted into her familiar society the lovely Justina, the daughter of an Italian governor her admiration of those naked charms, which she had often seen in the bath, was expressed with such lavish and imprudent praise that the emperor was tempted to introduce a second wife into his bed and his public edict extended to all the subjects of the empire the same domestic privilege which he had assumed for himself. But we may be assured from the evidence of reason as well as history that the two marriages of Valentinian with Severa and with Justina were successively contracted and that he used the ancient permission of divorce which was still allowed by the laws though it was condemned by the church. Severa was the mother of Gratian who seemed to unite every claim which could entitle him to the undoubted succession of the Western empire He was the eldest son of a monarch whose glorious reign had confirmed the free and honourable choice of his fellow soldiers Before he had attained the ninth year of his age the royal youth received from the hands of his indulgent father the purple robe and diadem with the title of Augustus the election was solemnly ratified by the consent and applause of the armies of Gaul [156] and the name of Gratian was added to the names of Valentinian and Valens in all the legal transactions of the Roman government By his marriage with the grand daughter of Constantine the son of Valentinian acquired all the hereditary rights of the Flavian family which, in a series of three Imperial generations were sanctified by time religion, and the reverence of the people At the death of his father the royal youth was in the seventeenth year of his age and his virtues already justified the favourable opinion of the army and people. But Gratian resided without apprehension, in the palace of Trèves whilst at the distance of many hundred miles Valentinian suddenly expired in the camp of Bregetio The passions which had been so long suppressed by the presence of a master immediately revived in the Imperial council and the ambitious design of reigning in the name of an infant was artfully executed by Mellobaudes and Equitius who commanded the attachment of the Illyrian and Italian bands They contrived the most honourable pretences to remove the popular leaders and the troops of Gaul who might have asserted the claims of the lawful successor they suggested the necessity of extinguishing the hopes of foreign and domestic enemies by a bold and decisive measure The empress Justina who had been left in a palace about one hundred miles from Bregetio was respectfully invited to appear in the camp with the son of the deceased emperor On the sixth day after the death of Valentinian the infant prince of the same name who was only four years old was shown in the arms of his mother to the legions, and solemnly invested by military acclamation with the titles and ensigns of supreme power The impending dangers of a civil war were seasonably prevented by the wise and moderate conduct of the emperor Gratian He cheerfully accepted the choice of the army declared that he should always consider the son of Justina as a brother not as a rival and advised the empress with her son Valentinian to fix their residence at Milan in the fair and peaceful province of Italy while he assumed the more arduous command of the countries beyond the Alps Gratian dissembled his resentment till he could safely punish or disgrace the authors of the conspiracy and though he uniformly behaved with tenderness and regard to his infant colleague he gradually confounded in the administration of the Western empire the office of a guardian with the authority of a sovereign The government of the Roman world was exercised in the united names of Valens and his two nephews but the feeble emperor of the East who succeeded to the rank of his elder brother never obtained any weight or influence in the councils of the West [157]

CHAPTER XXVI

Manners of the Pastoral Nations Progress of the Huns from China to Europe Flight of the Goths They pass the Danube Gothic War Defeat and Death of Valens Gratian invests Theodosius with the Eastern Empire His Character and Success Peace and Settlement of the Goths

In the second year of the reign of Valentinian and Valens, on the morning of the twenty-first day of July, the greatest part of the Roman world was shaken by a violent and destructive earthquake The impression was communicated to the waters, the shores of the Mediterranean were left dry by the sudden retreat of the sea, great quantities of fish were caught with the hand, large vessels were stranded on the mud, and a curious spectator[1] amused his eye, or rather his fancy, by contemplating the various appearance of valleys and mountains which had never, since the formation of the globe, been exposed to the sun But the tide soon returned with the weight of an immense and irresistible deluge, which was severely felt on the coasts of Sicily, of Dalmatia, of Greece, and of Egypt, large boats were transported and lodged on the roofs of houses, or at the distance of two miles from the shore, the people, with their habitations, were swept away by the waters, and the city of Alexandria annually commemorated the fatal day on which fifty thousand persons had lost their lives in the inundation This calamity, the report of which was magnified from one province to another, astonished and terrified the subjects of Rome, and their affrighted imagination enlarged the real extent of a momentary evil They recollected the preceding earthquakes, which had subverted the cities of Palestine and Bithynia, they considered these alarming strokes as the prelude only of still more dreadful calamities, and their fearful vanity was disposed to confound the symptoms of a declining empire and a sinking world[2] It was the fashion of the times to attribute every remarkable event to the particular will of the Deity, the alterations of nature were connected, by an invisible chain, with the moral and metaphysical opinions of the human mind, and the most sagacious divines could distinguish, according to the colour of their respective prejudices, that the establishment of heresy tended to produce an earthquake, or that a deluge was the inevitable consequence of the progress of sin and error Without presuming to discuss the truth or propriety of these lofty speculations, the historian may content himself with an observation, which seems to be justified by experience, that man has much more to fear from the passions of his fellow-creatures than from the convulsions of the elements[3] The mischievous effects of an earthquake or deluge, a hurricane or the eruption of a volcano, bear a very inconsiderable proportion to the ordinary calamities of war, as they are now moderated by the prudence or humanity of the princes of Europe, who amuse their own leisure and exercise the courage of their subjects in the practice of the military art. But the laws and manners of modern nations protect the safety and freedom of the vanquished soldier, and the peaceful citizen has seldom reason to complain that his life or even his fortune is exposed to the rage of war In the disastrous period of the fall of the Roman empire, which may justly be dated from the reign of Valens, the happiness and security of each individual were personally attacked, and the arts and labours of ages were rudely defaced by the barbarians of Scythia and Germany The invasion of the Huns precipitated on the provinces of the West the Gothic nation, which advanced, in less than forty years, from the Danube to the Atlantic, and opened a way, by the success of their arms, to the inroads of so many hostile tribes more savage than themselves The original principle of motion was concealed in the remote countries of the North, and the curious observation of the pastoral life of the Scythians[4] or Tartars[5] will illustrate the latent cause of these destructive emigrations

The different characters that mark the civilised nations of the globe may be ascribed to the use and the abuse of reason, which so variously shapes and so artificially composes the manners and opinions of an European or a Chinese But the operation of instinct is more sure and simple than that of reason, it is much easier to ascertain the appetites of a quadruped than the speculations of a philosopher, and the savage tribes of mankind, as they approach nearer to the condition of animals, preserve a stronger resemblance to themselves and to each other The uniform stability of their manners is the natural consequence of the imperfection of their faculties Reduced to a similar situation their wants their desires their enjoyments still continue the same and the influence of food or climate which in a more improved state of society is suspended or subdued by so many moral causes most powerfully contributes to form and to maintain the national character of barbarians In every age the immense plains of Scythia or Tartary have been inhabited by vagrant tribes of hunters and shepherds whose indolence refuses to cultivate the earth and whose restless spirit disdains the confinement of a sedentary life In every age the Scythians and Tartars have been renowned for their invincible courage and rapid conquests The thrones of Asia have been repeatedly overturned by the shepherds of the North and their arms have spread terror and devastation over the most fertile and warlike countries of Europe [6] On this occasion as well as on many others the sober historian is forcibly awakened from a pleasing vision and is compelled with some reluctance to confess that the pastoral manners which have been adorned with the fairest attributes of peace and innocence are much better adapted to the fierce and cruel habits of a military life To illustrate this observation I shall now proceed to consider a nation of shepherds and of warriors in the three important articles of I Their diet II Their habitation and III Their exercises The narratives of antiquity are justified by the experience of modern times [7] and the banks of the Borysthenes of the Volga or of the Selinga will indifferently present the same uniform spectacle of similar and native manners [8]

I The corn or even the rice which constitutes the ordinary and wholesome food of a civilised people can be obtained only by the patient toil of the husbandman Some of the happy savages who dwell between the tropics are plentifully nourished by the liberality of nature but in the climates of the North a nation of shepherds is reduced to their flocks and herds The skilful practitioners of the medical art will determine (if they are able to determine) how far the temper of the human mind may be affected by the use of animal or of vegetable food and whether the common association of carnivorous and cruel deserves to be considered in any other light than that of an innocent perhaps a salutary prejudice of humanity [9] Yet if it be true that the sentiment of compassion is imperceptibly weakened by the sight and practice of domestic cruelty we may observe that the horrid objects which are disguised by the arts of European refinement are exhibited in their naked and most disgusting simplicity in the tent of a Tartarian shepherd The ox or the sheep are slaughtered by the same hand from which they were accustomed to receive their daily food and the bleeding limbs are served with very little preparation on the table of their unfeeling murderer In the military profession and especially in the conduct of a numerous army, the exclusive use of animal food appears to be productive of the most solid advantages Corn is a bulky and perishable commodity and the large magazines which are indispensably necessary for the subsistence of our troops must be slowly transported by the labour of men or horses But the flock and herds which accompany the march of the Tartars afford a sure and increasing supply of flesh and milk in the far greater part of the uncultivated waste the vegetation of the grass is quick and luxuriant and there are few places so extremely barren that the hardy cattle of the North cannot find some tolerable pasture The supply is multiplied and prolonged by the undistinguishing appetite and patient abstinence of the Tartars They indifferently feed on the flesh of those animals that have been killed for the table or have died of disease Horseflesh which in every age and country has been proscribed by the civilised nations of Europe and Asia they devour with peculiar greediness, and this singular taste facilitates the success of their military operations The active cavalry of Scythia is always followed in their most distant and rapid incursions by an adequate number of spare horses who may be occasionally used either to redouble the speed or to satisfy the hunger of the barbarians Many are the resources of courage and poverty When the forage round a camp of Tartars is almost consumed they slaughter the greatest part of their cattle and preserve the flesh either smoked or dried in the sun On the sudden emergency of a hasty march they provide themselves with a sufficient quantity of little balls of cheese or rather of hard curd which they occasionally dissolve in water and this unsubstantial diet will support for many days the life and even the spirits of the patient warrior But this extraordinary abstinence which the Stoic would approve and the hermit might envy is commonly succeeded by the most voracious indulgence of appetite The wines of a happier climate are the most grateful present or the most valuable commodity that can be offered to the Tartars and the only ex ample of their industry seems to consist in the art of extracting from mare's milk a fermented liquor which possesses a very strong power of intoxication Like the animals of prey, the savages, both of the old and new world, experience the alternate vicissitudes of famine and plenty, and their stomach is inured to sustain, without much inconvenience, the opposite extremes of hunger and of intemperance

II In the ages of rustic and martial simplicity, a people of soldiers and husbandmen are dispersed over the face of an extensive and cultivated country, and some time must elapse before the warlike youth of Greece or Italy could be assembled under the same standard, either to defend their own confines, or to invade the territories of the adjacent tribes The progress of manufactures and commerce insensibly collects a large multitude within the walls of a city, but these citizens are no longer soldiers, and the arts which adorn and improve the state of civil society corrupt the habits of the military life The pastoral manners of the Scythians seem to unite the different advantages of simplicity and refinement The individuals of the same tribe are constantly assembled, but they are assembled in a camp, and the native spirit of these dauntless shepherds is animated by mutual support and emulation The houses of the Tartars are no more than small tents, of an oval form, which afford a cold and dirty habitation for the promiscuous youth of both sexes The palaces of the rich consist of wooden huts, of such a size that they may be conveniently fixed on large waggons, and drawn by a team perhaps of twenty or thirty oxen The flocks and herds, after grazing all day in the adjacent pastures, retire, on the approach of night, within the protection of the camp The necessity of preventing the most mischievous confusion in such a perpetual concourse of men and animals must gradually introduce, in the distribution, the order, and the guard of the encampment, the rudiments of the military art As soon as the forage of a certain district is consumed, the tribe, or rather army, of shepherds makes a regular march to some fresh pastures, and thus acquires, in the ordinary occupations of the pastoral life, the practical knowledge of one of the most important and difficult operations of war The choice of stations is regulated by the difference of the seasons, in the summer the Tartars advance towards the North, and pitch their tents on the banks of a river, or, at least, in the neighbourhood of a running stream But in the winter they return to the South, and shelter their camp, behind some convenient eminence, against the winds, which are chilled in their passage over the bleak and icy regions of Siberia These manners are admirably adapted to diffuse among the wandering tribes the spirit of emigration and conquest The connection between the people and their territory is of so frail a texture that it may be broken by the slightest accident The camp, and not the soil, is the native country of the genuine Tartar Within the precincts of that camp his family, his companions, his property, are always included, and in the most distant marches he is still surrounded by the objects which are dear or valuable or familiar in his eyes The thirst of rapine, the fear or the resentment of injury, the impatience of servitude, have, in every age, been sufficient causes to urge the tribes of Scythia boldly to advance into some unknown countries, where they might hope to find a more plentiful subsistence or a less formidable enemy The revolutions of the North have frequently determined the fate of the South, and in the conflict of hostile nations the victor and the vanquished have alternately drove, and been driven, from the confines of China to those of Germany[10] These great emigrations, which have been sometimes executed with almost incredible diligence, were rendered more easy by the peculiar nature of the climate It is well known that the cold of Tartary is much more severe than in the midst of the temperate zone might reasonably be expected, this uncommon rigour is attributed to the height of the plains, which rise, especially towards the east, more than half a mile above the level of the sea, and to the quantity of saltpetre with which the soil is deeply impregnated[11] In the winter season, the broad and rapid rivers that discharge their waters into the Euxine, the Caspian, or the Icy Sea, are strongly frozen, the fields are covered with a bed of snow, and the fugitive or victorious tribes may securely traverse, with their families, their waggons, and their cattle, the smooth and hard surface of an immense plain

III The pastoral life, compared with the labours of agriculture and manufactures, is undoubtedly a life of idleness, and as the most honourable shepherds of the Tartar race devolve on their captives the domestic management of the cattle, their own leisure is seldom disturbed by any servile and assiduous cares But this leisure, instead of being devoted to the soft enjoyments of love and harmony, is usefully spent in the violent and sanguinary exercise of the chase The plains of Tartary are filled with a strong and serviceable breed of horses, w

are easily trained for the purposes of war and hunting The Scythians of every age have been celebrated as bold and skilful riders and constant practice had seated them so firmly on horseback that they were supposed by strangers to perform the ordinary duties of civil life, to eat to drink and even to sleep without dismounting from their steeds They excel in the dexterous management of the lance the long Tartar bow is drawn with a nervous arm and the weighty arrow is directed to its object with unerring aim and irresistible force These arrows are often pointed against the harmless animals of the desert which increase and multiply in the absence of their most formidable enemy—the hare the goat the roebuck the fallow deer the stag the elk and the antelope The vigour and patience both of the men and horses are continually exercised by the fatigues of the chase and the plentiful supply of game contributes to the subsistence and even luxury of a Tartar camp But the exploits of the hunters of Scythia are not confined to the destruction of timid or innoxious beasts they boldly encounter the angry wild boar when he turns against his pursuers excite the sluggish courage of the bear and provoke the fury of the tiger as he slumbers in the thicket Where there is danger there may be glory and the mode of hunting which opens the fairest field to the exertions of valour may justly be considered as the image and as the school of war The general hunting matches the pride and delight of the Tartar princes compose an instructive exercise for their numerous cavalry A circle is drawn of many miles in circumference to encompass the game of an extensive district and the troops that form the circle regularly advance towards a common centre, where the captive animals surrounded on every side are abandoned to the darts of the hunters In this march which frequently continues many days the cavalry are obliged to climb the hills to swim the rivers and to wind through the valleys without interrupting the prescribed order of their gradual progress They acquire the habit of directing their eye and their steps to a remote object of preserving their intervals of suspending or accelerating their pace according to the motions of the troops on their right and left and of watching and repeating the signals of their leaders Their leaders study in this practical school the most important lesson of the military art, the prompt and accurate judgment of ground of distance and of time To employ against a human enemy the same patience and valour the same skill and discipline is the only alteration which is required in real war and the amusements of the chase serve as a prelude to the conquest of an empire[11]

The political society of the ancient Germans has the appearance of a voluntary alliance of independent warriors The tribes of Scythia distinguished by the modern appellation of Hords assume the form of a numerous and increasing family which in the course of successive generations has been propagated from the same original stock The meanest and most ignorant of the Tartars preserve with conscious pride the inestimable treasure of their genealogy and, whatever distinctions of rank may have been introduced by the unequal distribution of pastoral wealth they mutually respect themselves and each other as the descendants of the first founder of the tribe The custom which still prevails, of adopting the bravest and most faithful of the captives may countenance the very probable suspicion that this extensive consanguinity is in a great measure legal and fictitious But the useful prejudice which has obtained the sanction of time and opinion produces the effects of truth the haughty barbarians yield a cheerful and voluntary obedience to the head of their blood and their chief or mursa as the representative of their great father exercises the authority of a judge in peace and of a leader in war In the original state of the pastoral world, each of the mursas (if we may continue to use a modern appellation) acted as the independent chief of a large and separate family and the limits of their peculiar territories were gradually fixed by superior force or mutual consent But the constant operation of various and permanent causes contributed to unite the vagrant Hords into national communities under the command of a supreme head The weak were desirous of support and the strong were ambitious of dominion the power which is the result of union oppressed and collected the divided forces of the adjacent tribes and as the vanquished were freely admitted to share the advantages of victory the most valiant chiefs hastened to range themselves and their followers under the formidable standard of a confederate nation The most successful of the Tartar princes assumed the military command to which he was entitled by the superiority either of merit or of power He was raised to the throne by the acclamations of his equals and the title of Khan expresses in the language of the North of Asia the full extent of the regal dignity The right of hereditary succession was long confined to the blood of the founder of the monarchy and at this moment all the Khans who reign from Crimea to the wall of China are the lineal descendants of the renowned Zingis[13] But, as it is the indispensable duty of a Tartar sovereign to lead his warlike subjects into the field, the claims of an infant are often disregarded, and some royal kinsman, distinguished by his age and valour, is intrusted with the sword and sceptre of his predecessor Two distinct and regular taxes are levied on the tribes to support the dignity of their national monarch and of their peculiar chief, and each of those contributions amounts to the tithe both of their property and of their spoil A Tartar sovereign enjoys the tenth part of the wealth of his people, and as his own domestic riches of flocks and herds increase in a much larger proportion, he is able plentifully to maintain the rustic splendour of his court, to reward the most deserving or the most favoured of his followers, and to obtain from the gentle influence of corruption the obedience which might be sometimes refused to the stern mandates of authority The manners of his subjects, accustomed, like himself, to blood and rapine, might excuse in their eyes such partial acts of tyranny as would excite the horror of a civilised people, but the power of a despot has never been acknowledged in the deserts of Scythia The immediate jurisdiction of the Khan is confined within the limits of his own tribe, and the exercise of his royal prerogative has been moderated by the ancient institution of a national council The Coroultai,[14] or Diet, of the Tartars was regularly held in the spring and autumn in the midst of a plain, where the princes of the reigning family and the mursas of the respective tribes may conveniently assemble on horseback with their martial and numerous trains, and the ambitious monarch who reviewed the strength, must consult the inclination, of an armed people The rudiments of a feudal government may be discovered in the constitution of the Scythian or Tartar nations, but the perpetual conflict of those hostile nations has sometimes terminated in the establishment of a powerful and despotic empire The victor, enriched by the tribute and fortified by the arms of dependent kings, has spread his conquests over Europe or Asia, the successful shepherds of the North have submitted to the confinement of arts, of laws, and of cities, and the introduction of luxury, after destroying the freedom of the people, has undermined the foundations of the throne[15]

The memory of past events cannot long be preserved in the frequent and remote emigrations of illiterate barbarians The modern Tartars are ignorant of the conquests of their ancestors,[16] and our knowledge of the history of the Scythians is derived from their intercourse with the learned and civilised nations of the South—the Greeks, the Persians, and the Chinese The Greeks, who navigated the Euxine, and planted their colonies along the sea coast, made the gradual and imperfect discovery of Scythia, from the Danube and the confines of Thrace, as far as the frozen Mæotis, the seat of eternal winter, and Mount Caucasus, which, in the language of poetry, was described as the utmost boundary of the earth They celebrated, with simple credulity, the virtues of the pastoral life[17] they entertained a more rational apprehension of the strength and numbers of the warlike barbarians,[18] who contemptuously baffled the immense armament of Darius, the son of Hystaspes[19] The Persian monarchs had extended their western conquests to the banks of the Danube and the limits of European Scythia The eastern provinces of their empire were exposed to the Scythians of Asia, the wild inhabitants of the plains beyond the Oxus and the Jaxartes, two mighty rivers, which direct their course towards the Caspian Sea The long and memorable quarrel of Iran and Touran is still the theme of history or romance the famous, perhaps the fabulous, valour of the Persian heroes, Rustan and Asfendiar, was signalised, in the defence of their country, against the Afrasiabs of the North,[20] and the invincible spirit of the same barbarians resisted, on the same ground, the victorious arms of Cyrus and Alexander[1] In the eyes of the Greeks and Persians, the real geography of Scythia was bounded, on the east, by the mountains of Imaus or Caf, and their distant prospect of the extreme and inaccessible parts of Asia was clouded by ignorance, or perplexed by fiction But those inaccessible regions are the ancient residence of a powerful and civilised nation,[22] which ascends, by a probable tradition, above forty centuries,[23] and which is able to verify a series of near two thousand years by the perpetual testimony of accurate and contemporary historians[24] The annals of China[5] illustrate the state and revolutions of the pastoral tribes, which may still be distinguished by the vague appellation of Scythians or Tartars—the vassals, the enemies, and sometimes the conquerors of a great empire, whose policy has uniformly opposed the blind and impetuous valour of the barbarians of the North From the mouth of the Danube to the sea of Japan, the whole longitude of Scythia is about one hundred and ten degrees, which, in that parallel, are equal to more than five thousand miles The latitude of these extensive deserts cannot be so easily or so accurately measured but from the fortieth degree which touches the wall of China we may securely advance above a thousand miles to the northward till our progress is stopped by the excessive cold of Siberia In that dreary climate instead of the animated picture of a Tartar camp the smoke which issues from the earth or rather from the snow betrays the subterraneous dwellings of the Tongouses and the Samoiedes the want of horses and oxen is imperfectly supplied by the use of reindeer and of large dogs and the conquerors of the earth insensibly degenerate into a race of deformed and diminutive savages who tremble at the sound of arms [26]

The Huns who under the reign of Valens threatened the empire of Rome had been formidable in a much earlier period to the empire of China [27] Their ancient perhaps their original seat was an extensive though dry and barren tract of country immediately on the north side of the great wall Their place is at present occupied by the forty nine Hordes or Banners of the Mongous a pastoral nation which consists of about two hundred thousand families [28] But the valour of the Huns had extended the narrow limits of their dominions and their rustic chiefs who assumed the appellation of Tanjou gradually became the conquerors and the sovereigns of a formidable empire Towards the east their victorious arms were stopped only by the ocean and the tribes which are thinly scattered between the Amoor and the extreme pe*ninsula of Corea* adhered with reluctance to the standard of the Huns On the west near the head of the Irtish and in the valleys of Imaus they found a more ample space and more nu*merous en mies* One of the lieutenants of the Tanjou subdued in a single expedition twenty six nations the Igours [29] distinguished above the Tartar race by the use of letters were in the number of his vassals and by the strange connection of human events the fight of one of those vagrant tribes recalled the victorious Parthians from the invasion of Syria [30] On the side of the north the ocean was assigned as the limit of the power of the Huns Without enemies to resist their progress or witnesses to contradict their vanity they might securely achieve a real or imaginary conquest of the frozen regions of Siberia The Northern Sea was fixed as the remote boundary of their empire But the name of that sea on whose shores the patriot Sovou embraced the life of a shepherd and an exile [31] may be transferred with much more probability to the Baikal a capacious basin above three hundred miles in length which disdains the modest appellation of a lake [32] and which actually communicates with the seas of the North by the long course of the Angara the Tonguska, and the Yenesei The submission of so many distant nations might flatter the pride of the Tanjou but the valour of the Huns could be rewarded only by the enjoyment of the wealth and luxury of the empire of the South. In the third century before the Christian era a wall of fifteen hundred miles in length was constructed to defend the frontiers of China against the inroads of the Huns [33] but this stupendous work which holds a conspicuous place in the map of the world has never contributed to the safety of an unwarlike people The cavalry of the Tanjou frequently consisted of two or three hundred thousand men formidable by the matchless dexterity with which they managed their bows and their horses by their hardy patience in supporting the inclemency of the weather and by the incredible speed of their march which was seldom checked by torrents or precipices by the deepest rivers or by the most lofty mountains

They spread themselves at once over the face of the country and their rapid impetuosity surprised astonished and disconcerted the grave and elaborate tactics of a Chinese army The emperor Kaoti [34] a soldier of fortune whose personal merit had raised him to the throne marched against the Huns with those veteran troops which had been trained in the civil wars of China But he was soon surrounded by the barbarians and after a siege of seven days the monarch hopeless of relief was reduced to purchase his deliverance by an ignominious capitulation The successors of Kaoti whose lives were dedicated to the arts of peace or the luxury of the palace submitted to a more permanent disgrace They too hastily confessed the insufficiency of arms and fortifications They were too easily convinced that while the blazing signals announced on every side the approach of the Huns the Chinese troops who slept with the helmet on their head and the cuirass on their back were destroyed by the incessant labour of ineffectual marches [35] A regular payment of money and silk was stipulated as the condition of a temporary and precarious peace and the wretched expedient of disguising a real tribute under the names of a gift or subsidy was practised by the emperors of China as well as by those of Rome But there still remained a more disgraceful article of tribute which violated the sacred feelings of humanity and nature The hardships of the savage life, which destroy in their infancy the children who are born with a less healthy and robust constitution, introduce a remarkable disproportion between the numbers of the two sexes The Tartars are an ugly and even deformed race, and while they consider their own women as the instruments of domestic labour, their desires, or rather their appetites, are directed to the enjoyment of more elegant beauty A select band of the fairest maidens of China was annually devoted to the rude embraces of the Huns,[36] and the alliance of the haughty Tanjous was secured by their marriage with the genuine, or adopted, daughters of the Imperial family, which vainly attempted to escape the sacrilegious pollution The situation of these unhappy victims is described in the verses of a Chinese princess, who laments that she had been condemned by her parents to a distant exile, under a barbarian husband, who complains that sour milk was her only drink, raw flesh her only food, a tent her only palace, and who expresses, in a strain of pathetic simplicity, the natural wish that she were transformed into a bird, to fly back to her dear country, the object of her tender and perpetual regret [37]

The conquest of China has been twice achieved by the pastoral tribes of the North the forces of the Huns were not inferior to those of the Moguls, or of the Mantcheoux, and their ambition might entertain the most sanguine hopes of success But their pride was humbled, and their progress was checked, by the arms and policy of Vouti,[38] the fifth emperor of the powerful dynasty of the Han In his long reign of fifty four years, the barbarians of the southern provinces submitted to the laws and manners of China, and the ancient limits of the monarchy were enlarged from the great river of Kiang to the port of Canton Instead of confining himself to the timid operations of a defensive war, his lieutenants penetrated many hundred miles into the country of the Huns In those boundless deserts, where it is impossible to form magazines, and difficult to transport a sufficient supply of provisions, the armies of Vouti were repeatedly exposed to intolerable hardships and, of one hundred and forty thousand soldiers who marched against the barbarians, thirty thousand only returned in safety to the feet of their master These losses, however, were compensated by splendid and decisive success The Chinese generals improved the superiority which they derived from the temper of their arms, their chariots of war, and the service of their Tartar auxiliaries The camp of the Tanjou was surprised in the midst of sleep and intemperance, and, though the monarch of the Huns bravely cut his way through the ranks of the enemy, he left above fifteen thousand of his subjects on the field of battle Yet this signal victory, which was preceded and followed by many bloody engagements, contributed much less to the destruction of the power of the Huns, than the effectual policy which was employed to detach the tributary nations from their obedience Intimidated by the arms, or allured by the promises, of Vouti and his successors, the most considerable tribes, both of the East and of the West, disclaimed the authority of the Tanjou While some acknowledged themselves the allies or vassals of the empire, they all became the implacable enemies of the Huns and the numbers of that haughty people, as soon as they were reduced to their native strength, might perhaps have been contained within the walls of one of the great and populous cities of China [39] The desertion of his subjects, and the perplexity of a civil war, at length compelled the Tanjou himself to renounce the dignity of an independent sovereign, and the freedom of a warlike and high spirited nation He was received at Sigan, the capital of the monarchy, by the troops, the mandarins, and the emperor himself, with all the honours that could adorn and disguise the triumph of Chinese vanity [40] A magnificent palace was prepared for his reception, his place was assigned above all the princes of the royal family, and the patience of the barbarian king was exhausted by the ceremonies of a banquet, which consisted of eight courses of meat, and of nine solemn pieces of music But he performed, on his knees, the duty of a respectful homage to the emperor of China, pronounced, in his own name, and in the name of his successors, a perpetual oath of fidelity, and gratefully accepted a seal, which was bestowed as the emblem of his regal dependence After this humiliating submission, the Tanjous sometimes departed from their allegiance, and seized the favourable moments of war and rapine, but the monarchy of the Huns gradually declined, till it was broken, by civil dissension, into two hostile and separate kingdoms One of the princes of the nation was urged by fear and ambition to retire towards the south with eight hordes, which composed between forty and fifty thousand families He obtained, with the title of Tanjou, a convenient territory on the verge of the Chinese provinces, and his constant attachment to the service of the empire was secured by weakness and the desire of revenge From the time of this fatal schism, the Huns of the north continued to languish about fifty years till they were oppressed on every side by their foreign and domestic enemies The proud inscription[41] of a column erected on a lofty mountain announced to posterity that a Chinese army had marched seven hundred miles into the heart of their country The Sienpi [42] a tribe of Oriental Tartars retaliated the injuries which they had formerly sustained and the power of the Tanjous after a reign of thirteen hundred years was utterly destroyed before the end of the first century of the Christian era [43]

The fate of the vanquished Huns was diversified by the various influence of character and situation [44] Above one hundred thousand persons the poorest indeed and the most pusillanimous of the people were contented to remain in their native country to renounce their peculiar name and origin and to mingle with the victorious nation of the Sienpi Fifty-eight hordes about two hundred thousand men ambitious of a more honourable servitude retired towards the south implored the protection of the emperors of China and were permitted to inhabit and to guard the extreme frontiers of the province of Chansi and the territory of Ortous But the most warlike and powerful tribes of the Huns maintained in their adverse fortune the undaunted spirit of their ancestors The Western world was open to their valour and they resolved under the conduct of their hereditary chieftains to discover and subdue some remote country which was still inaccessible to the arms of the Sienpi and to the laws of China [45] The course of their emigration soon carried them beyond the mountains of Imaus and the limits of the Chinese geography but we are able to distinguish the two great divisions of these formidable exiles which directed their march towards the Oxus and towards the Volga. The first of these colonies established their dominion in the fruitful and extensive plains of the Sogdiana on the eastern side of the Caspian where they preserved the name of Huns with the epithet of Euthalites or Nepthalites Their manners were softened and even their features were insensibly improved by the mildness of the climate and their long residence in a flourishing province [46] which might still retain a faint impression of the arts of Greece [47] The white Huns a name which they derived from the change of their complexions soon abandoned the pastoral life of Scythia Gorgo which, under the appellation of Carizme has since enjoyed a temporary splendour was the residence of the king who exercised a legal authority over an obedient people Their luxury was maintained by the labour of the Sogdians and the only vestige of their ancient barbarism was the custom which obliged all the companions perhaps to the number of twenty who had shared the liberality of a wealthy lord, to be buried alive in the same grave [48] The vicinity of the Huns to the provinces of Persia involved them in frequent and bloody contests with the power of that monarchy But they respected in peace the faith of treaties in war the dictates of humanity and their memorable victory over Peroses or Firuz displayed the moderation as well as the valour of the barbarians The second division of their countrymen the Huns who gradually advanced towards the north west were exercised by the hardships of a colder climate and a more laborious march Necessity compelled them to exchange the silks of China for the furs of Siberia the imperfect rudiments of civilised life were obliterated and the native fierceness of the Huns was exasperated by their intercourse with the savage tribes who were compared with some propriety to the wild beasts of the desert. Their independent spirit soon rejected the hereditary succession of the Tanjous and while each horde was governed by its peculiar mursa, their tumultuary council directed the public measures of the whole nation As late as the thirteenth century their transient residence on the eastern banks of the Volga was attested by the name of Great Hungary [49] In the winter they descended with their flocks and herds towards the mouth of that mighty river and their summer excursions reached as high as the latitude of Saratoff or perhaps the conflux of the Kama Such at least were the recent limits of the black Calmucks [50] who remained about a century under the protection of Russia and who have since returned to their native seats on the frontiers of the Chinese empire The march and the return of those wandering Tartars, whose united camp consists of fifty thousand tents or families illustrate the distant emigrations of the ancient Huns [51]

It is impossible to fill the dark interval of time which elapsed after the Huns of the Volga were lost in the eyes of the Chinese and before they showed themselves to those of the Romans. There is some reason however to apprehend that the same force which had driven them from their native seats still continued to impel their march towards the frontiers of Europe The power of the Sienpi their implacable enemies, which extended above three thousand miles from east to west,[52] must have gradually oppressed them by the weight and terror of a formidable neighbourhood, and the flight of the tribes of Scythia would inevitably tend to increase the strength or to contract the territories of the Huns The harsh and obscure appellations of those tribes would offend the ear, without informing the understanding, of the reader, but I cannot suppress the very natural suspicion that the Huns of the North derived a considerable reinforcement from the ruin of the dynasty of the South, which, in the course of the third century, submitted to the dominion of China, that the bravest warriors marched away in search of their free and adventurous countrymen, and that, as they had been divided by prosperity, they were easily reunited by the common hardships of their adverse fortune [53] The Huns, with their flocks and herds, their wives and children, their dependents and allies, were transported to the west of the Volga, and they boldly advanced to invade the country of the Alani, a pastoral people, who occupied, or wasted, an extensive tract of the deserts of Scythia The plains between the Volga and the Tanais were covered with the tents of the Alani, but their name and manners were diffused over the wide extent of their conquests, and the painted tribes of the Agathyrsi and Geloni were confounded among their vassals Towards the north they penetrated into the frozen regions of Siberia, among the savages who were accustomed, in their rage or hunger, to the taste of human flesh, and their southern inroads were pushed as far as the confines of Persia and India The mixture of Sarmatic and German blood had contributed to improve the features of the Alani, to whiten their swarthy complexions, and to tinge their hair with a yellowish cast, which is seldom found in the Tartar race They were less deformed in their persons, less brutish in their manners, than the Huns, but they did not yield to those formidable barbarians in their martial and independent spirit, in the love of freedom, which rejected even the use of domestic slaves, and in the love of arms, which considered war and rapine as the pleasure and the glory of mankind A naked scimitar, fixed in the ground, was the only object of their religious worship, the scalps of their enemies formed the costly trappings of their horses, and they viewed with pity and contempt the pusillanimous warriors who patiently expected the infirmities of age and the tortures of lingering disease [54] On the banks of the Tanais the military power of the Huns and the Alani encountered each other with equal valour, but with unequal success The Huns prevailed in the bloody contest, the king of the Alani was slain, and the remains of the vanquished nation were dispersed by the ordinary alternative of flight or submission [55] A colony of exiles found a secure refuge in the mountains of Caucasus, between the Euxine and the Caspian, where they still preserve their name and their independence Another colony advanced, with more intrepid courage, towards the shores of the Baltic, associated themselves with the northern tribes of Germany, and shared the spoil of the Roman provinces of Gaul and Spain But the greatest part of the nation of the Alani embraced the offers of an honourable and advantageous union, and the Huns, who esteemed the valour of their less fortunate enemies, proceeded, with an increase of numbers and confidence, to invade the limits of the Gothic empire

The great Hermanric, whose dominions extended from the Baltic to the Euxine, enjoyed, in the full maturity of age and reputation, the fruit of his victories, when he was alarmed by the formidable approach of an host of unknown enemies,[56] on whom his barbarous subjects might, without injustice, bestow the epithet of barbarians The numbers, the strength, the rapid motions, and the implacable cruelty of the Huns were felt, and dreaded, and magnified by the astonished Goths, who beheld their fields and villages consumed with flames and deluged with indiscriminate slaughter To these real terrors they added the surprise and abhorrence which were excited by the shrill voice, the uncouth gestures, and the strange deformity of the Huns These savages of Scythia were compared (and the picture had some resemblance) to the animals who walk very awkwardly on two legs, and to the misshapen figures, the Termini, which were often placed on the bridges of antiquity They were distinguished from the rest of the human species by their broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes, deeply buried in the head, and as they were almost destitute of beards, they never enjoyed either the manly graces of youth or the venerable aspect of age [57] A fabulous origin was assigned worthy of their form and manners—that the witches of Scythia, who, for their foul and deadly practices, had been driven from society, had copulated in the desert with infernal spirits, and that the Huns were the offspring of this execrable conjunction [58] The tale, so full of horror and absurdity, was greedily embraced by the credulous hatred of the Goths, but while it gratified their hatred it increased their fear, since the posterity of and witches might be supposed to inherit some share of the preternatural powers as well as of the malignant temper of their parents Against these enemies Hermanric prepared to exert the united forces of the Gothic state but he soon discovered that his vassal tribes provoked by oppression were much more inclined to second than to repel the invasion of the Huns One of the chiefs of the Roxolani[59] had formerly deserted the standard of Hermanric and the cruel tyrant had condemned the innocent wife of the traitor to be torn asunder by wild horses The brothers of that unfortunate woman seized the favourable moment of revenge The aged king of the Goths languished some time after the dangerous wound which he received from their daggers but the conduct of the war was retarded by his infirmities and the public councils of the nation were distracted by a spirit of jealousy and discord His death which has been imputed to his own despair left the reins of government in the hands of Withimer who with the doubtful aid of some Scythian mercenaries maintained the unequal contest against the arms of the Huns and the Alani till he was defeated and slain in a decisive battle The Ostrogoths submitted to their fate and the royal race of the Amali will hereafter be found among the subjects of the haughty Attila But the person of Witheric the infant king was saved by the diligence of Alatheus and Saphrax two warriors of approved valour and fidelity who by cautious marches conducted the independent remains of the nation of the Ostrogoths towards the Danastus or Dniester a considerable river which now separates the Turkish dominions from the empire of Russia On the banks of the Dniester the prudent Athanaric, more attentive to his own than to the general safety had fixed the camp of the Visigoths with the firm resolution of opposing the victorious barbarians whom he thought it less advisable to provoke The ordinary speed of the Huns was checked by the weight of baggage and the encumbrance of captives but their military skill deceived and almost destroyed the army of Athanaric. While the Judge of the Visigoths defended the banks of the Dniester he was encompassed and attacked by a numerous detachment of cavalry who by the light of the moon had passed the river in a fordable place and it was not without the utmost efforts of courage and conduct that he was able to effect his retreat towards the hilly country The undaunted general had already formed a new and judicious plan of defensive war and the strong lines which he was preparing to construct between the mountains, the Pruth and the Danube would have secured the extensive and fertile territory that bears the modern name of Wallachia from the destructive inroads of the Huns[60] But the hopes and measures of the Judge of the Visigoths were soon disappointed by the trembling impatience of his dismayed countrymen who were persuaded by their fears that the interposition of the Danube was the only barrier that could save them from the rapid pursuit and invincible valour of the barbarians of Scythia Under the command of Fritigern and Alavivus[61] the body of the nation hastily advanced to the banks of the great river and implored the protection of the Roman emperor of the East Athanaric himself still anxious to avoid the guilt of perjury retired with a band of faithful followers into the mountainous country of Caucaland which appears to have been guarded and almost concealed by the impenetrable forests of Transylvania[62]

After Valens had terminated the Gothic war with some appearance of glory and success he made a progress through his dominions of Asia, and at length fixed his residence in the capital of Syria The five years[63] which he spent at Antioch were employed to watch from a secure distance the hostile designs of the Persian monarch to check the depredations of the Saracens and Isaurians[64] to enforce by arguments more prevalent than those of reason and eloquence the belief of the Arian theology and to satisfy his anxious suspicions by the promiscuous execution of the innocent and the guilty But the attention of the emperor was most seriously engaged by the important intelligence which he received from the civil and military officers who were intrusted with the defence of the Danube He was informed that the North was agitated by a furious tempest that the irruption of the Huns an unknown and monstrous race of savages had subverted the power of the Goths and that the suppliant multitudes of that warlike nation whose pride was now humbled in the dust covered a space many miles along the banks of the river With outstretched arms and pathetic lamentations they loudly deplored their past misfortunes and their present danger acknowledged that their only hope of safety was in the clemency of the Roman government and most solemnly protested that if the gracious liberality of the emperor would permit them to cultivate the waste lands of Thrace they should ever hold themselves bound by the strongest obligations of duty and gratitude, to obey the laws and to guard the limits of the republic.

These assurances were confirmed by the ambassadors of the Goths, who impatiently expected from the mouth of Valens an answer that must finally determine the fate of their unhappy countrymen The emperor of the East was no longer guided by the wisdom and authority of his elder brother, whose death happened towards the end of the preceding year, and as the distressful situation of the Goths required an instant and peremptory decision, he was deprived of the favourite resource of feeble and timid minds, who consider the use of the dilatory and ambiguous measures as the most admirable efforts of consummate prudence As long as the same passions and interests subsist among mankind, the questions of war and peace, of justice and policy, which were debated in the councils of antiquity, will frequently present themselves as the subject of modern deliberation But the most experienced statesman of Europe has never been summoned to consider the propriety or the danger of admitting or rejecting an innumerable multitude of barbarians, who are driven by despair and hunger to solicit a settlement on the territories of a civilised nation When that important proposition, so essentially connected with the public safety, was referred to the ministers of Valens, they were perplexed and divided, but they soon acquiesced in the flattering sentiment which seemed the most favourable to the pride, the indolence, and the avarice of their sovereign The slaves, who were decorated with the titles of præfects and generals, dissembled or disregarded the terrors of this national emigration—so extremely different from the partial and accidental colonies which had been received on the extreme limits of the empire But they applauded the liberality of fortune which had conducted, from the most distant countries of the globe, a numerous and invincible army of strangers to defend the throne of Valens, who might now add to the royal treasures the immense sums of gold supplied by the provincials to compensate their annual proportion of recruits The prayers of the Goths were granted, and their service was accepted by the Imperial court, and orders were immediately despatched by the civil and military governors of the Thracian diocese to make the necessary preparations for the passage and subsistence of a great people, till a proper and sufficient territory could be allotted for their future residence The liberality of the emperor was accompanied, however, with two harsh and rigorous conditions, which prudence might justify on the side of the Romans, but which distress alone could extort from the indignant Goths Before they passed the Danube they were required to deliver their arms, and it was insisted that their children should be taken from them and dispersed through the provinces of Asia, where they might be civilised by the arts of education, and serve as hostages to secure the fidelity of their parents

During this suspense of a doubtful and distant negotiation, the impatient Goths made some rash attempts to pass the Danube without the permission of the government whose protection they had implored Their motions were strictly observed by the vigilance of the troops which were stationed along the river, and their foremost detachments were defeated with considerable slaughter, yet such were the timid councils of the reign of Valens, that the brave officers who had served their country in the execution of their duty were punished by the loss of their employments, and narrowly escaped the loss of their heads The Imperial mandate was at length received for transporting over the Danube the whole body of the Gothic nation,[65] but the execution of this order was a task of labour and difficulty The stream of the Danube, which in those parts is above a mile broad,[66] had been swelled by incessant rains, and in this tumultuous passage many were swept away and drowned by the rapid violence of the current A large fleet of vessels, of boats, and of canoes, was provided, many days and nights they passed and repassed with indefatigable toil, and the most strenuous diligence was exerted by the officers of Valens that not a single barbarian, of those who were reserved to subvert the foundations of Rome, should be left on the opposite shore It was thought expedient that an accurate account should be taken of their numbers, but the persons who were employed soon desisted, with amazement and dismay, from the prosecution of the endless and impracticable task,[67] and the principal historian of the age most seriously affirms that the prodigious armies of Darius and Xerxes, which had so long been considered as the fables of vain and credulous antiquity, were now justified, in the eyes of mankind, by the evidence of fact and experience A probable testimony has fixed the number of the Gothic warriors at two hundred thousand men, and if we can venture to add the just proportion of women, of children, and of slaves, the whole mass of people which composed this formidable emigration must have amounted to near a million of persons, of both sexes and of all ages. The children of the Goths, those at least of a distinguished rank, were separated from the

titude They were conducted without delay to the distant seats assigned for their residence and education and as the numerous train of host ages or captives passed through the cities their gay and splendid apparel their robust and mar tial figure excited the surprise and envy of the provincials But the stipulation the most offen sive to the Goths and the most important to the Romans was shamefully eluded The barbari ans who considered their arms as the ensigns of honour and the pledges of safety were disposed to offer a price which the lust or avarice of the Imperial officers was easily tempted to accept To preserve their arms the haughty warriors consented with some reluctance to prostitute their wives or their daughters the charms of a beauteous maid or a comely boy secured the connivance of the inspectors who sometimes cast an eye of covetousness on the fringed car pets and linen garments of their new allies [68] or who sacrificed their duty to the mean considera tion of filling their farms with cattle and their houses with slaves The Goths with arms in their hands were permitted to enter the boats and when their strength was collected on the other side of the river the immense camp which was spread over the plains and the hills of the Lower Mæsia assumed a threatening and even hostile aspect The leaders of the Ostrogoths, Alatheus and Saphrax the guardians of their infant king appeared soon afterwards on the northern banks of the Danube and immediately despatched their ambassadors to the court of Antioch to solicit with the same professions of allegiance and gratitude the same favour which had been granted to the suppliant Visigoths The absolute refusal of Valens suspended their progress and discovered the repentance the suspicions and the fears of the Imperial council

An undisciplined and unsettled nation of bar barians required the firmest temper and the most dexterous management The daily subsis tence of near a million of extraordinary subjects could be supplied only by constant and skilful diligence and might continually be interrupted by mistake or accident The insolence or the in dignation of the Goths if they conceived them selves to be the objects either of fear or of con tempt, might urge them to the most desperate extremities and the fortune of the state seemed to depend on the prudence as well as the integ rity of the generals of Valens At this important crisis the military government of Thrace was exercised by Lupicinus and Maximus in whose venal minds the slightest hope of private emolu ment outweighed every consideration of public advantage and whose guilt was only alleviated by their incapacity of discerning the pernicious effects of their rash and criminal administra tion Instead of obeying the orders of their sov ereign and satisfying with decent liberality the demands of the Goths they levied an ungener ous and oppressive tax on the wants of the hun gry barbarians The vilest food was sold at an extravagant price and in the room of whole some and substantial provisions the markets were filled with the flesh of dogs and of unclean animals who had died of disease To obtain the valuable acquisition of a pound of bread the Goths resigned the possession of an expensive though serviceable slave and a small quantity of meat was greedily purchased with ten pounds of a precious but useless metal [69] When their property was exhausted they continued this necessary traffic by the sale of their sons and daughters and notwithstanding the love of free dom which animated every Gothic breast they submitted to the humiliating maxim that it was better for their children to be maintained in a servile condition than to perish in a state of wretched and helpless independence The most lively resentment is excited by the tyranny of pretended benefactors who sternly exact the debt of gratitude which they have cancelled by subsequent injuries a spirit of discontent insen sibly arose in the camp of the barbarians who pleaded without success the merit of their pa tient and dutiful behaviour and loudly com plained of the inhospitable treatment which they had received from their new allies They beheld around them the wealth and plenty of a fertile province in the midst of which they suf fered the intolerable hardships of artificial fam ine But the means of relief and even of re venge were in their hands since the rapacious ness of their tyrants had left to an injured people the possession and the use of arms The clamours of a multitude untaught to disguise their sentiments announced the first symptoms of resistance and alarmed the timid and guilty minds of Lupicinus and Maximus Those crafty ministers who substituted the cunning of tem porary expedients to the wise and salutary coun sels of general policy attempted to remove the Goths from their dangerous station on the fron tiers of the empire and to disperse them in separate quarters of cantonment through the interior provinces As they were conscious how ill they had deserved the respect or confidence of the barbarians they diligently collected from every side a military force that might urge the tardy and reluctant march of a people who had not yet renounced the title or the duties of Roman subjects But the generals of Valens, while their attention was solely directed to the discontented Visigoths, imprudently disarmed the ships and the fortifications which constituted the defence of the Danube The fatal oversight was observed and improved by Alatheus and Saphrax, who anxiously watched the favourable moment of escaping from the pursuit of the Huns By the help of such rafts and vessels as could be hastily procured, the leaders of the Ostrogoths transported, without opposition, their king and their army, and boldly fixed an hostile and independent camp on the territories of the empire [70]

Under the name of Judges, Alavivus and Fritigern were the leaders of the Visigoths in peace and war, and the authority which they derived from their birth was ratified by the free consent of the nation In a season of tranquillity their power might have been equal as well as their rank, but, as soon as their countrymen were exasperated by hunger and oppression, the superior abilities of Fritigern assumed the military command, which he was qualified to exercise for the public welfare He restrained the impatient spirit of the Visigoths till the injuries and the insults of their tyrants should justify their resistance in the opinion of mankind but he was not disposed to sacrifice any solid advantages for the empty praise of justice and moderation Sensible of the benefits which would result from the union of the Gothic powers under the same standard, he secretly cultivated the friendship of the Ostrogoths, and while he professed an implicit obedience to the orders of the Roman generals, he proceeded by slow marches towards Marcianopolis, the capital of the Lower Mæsia, about seventy miles from the banks of the Danube On that fatal spot the flames of discord and mutual hatred burst forth into a dreadful conflagration Lupicinus had invited the Gothic chiefs to a splendid entertainment, and their martial train remained under arms at the entrance of the palace But the gates of the city were strictly guarded, and the barbarians were sternly excluded from the use of a plentiful market, to which they asserted their equal claim of subjects and allies Their humble prayers were rejected with insolence and derision, and as their patience was now exhausted, the townsmen, the soldiers, and the Goths were soon involved in a conflict of passionate altercation and angry reproaches A blow was imprudently given, a sword was hastily drawn, and the first blood that was spilt in this accidental quarrel became the signal of a long and destructive war In the midst of noise and brutal intemperance Lupicinus was informed by a secret messenger that many of his soldiers were slain and despoiled of their arms, and as he was already inflamed by wine and oppressed by sleep, he issued a rash command, that their death should be revenged by the massacre of the guards of Fritigern and Alavivus The clamorous shouts and dying groans apprised Fritigern of his extreme danger, and, as he possessed the calm and intrepid spirit of a hero, he saw that he was lost if he allowed a moment of deliberation to the man who had so deeply injured him "A trifling dispute," said the Gothic leader, with a firm but gentle tone of voice, "appears to have arisen between the two nations, but it may be productive of the most dangerous consequences, unless the tumult is immediately pacified by the assurance of our safety and the authority of our presence" At these words Fritigern and his companions drew their swords, opened their passage through the unresisting crowd, which filled the palace, the streets, and the gates of Marcianopolis, and, mounting their horses, hastily vanished from the eyes of the astonished Romans The generals of the Goths were saluted by the fierce and joyful acclamations of the camp, war was instantly resolved, and the resolution was executed without delay the banners of the nation were displayed according to the custom of their ancestors, and the air resounded with the harsh and mournful music of the barbarian trumpet [71] The weak and guilty Lupicinus, who had dared to provoke, who had neglected to destroy, and who still presumed to despise his formidable enemy, marched against the Goths, at the head of such a military force as could be collected on this sudden emergency The barbarians expected his approach about nine miles from Marcianopolis, and on this occasion the talents of the general were found to be of more prevailing efficacy than the weapons and discipline of the troops The valour of the Goths was so ably directed by the genius of Fritigern, that they broke, by a close and vigorous attack, the ranks of the Roman legions Lupicinus left his arms and standards, his tribunes and his bravest soldiers, on the field of battle, and their useless courage served only to protect the ignominious flight of their leader "That successful day put an end to the distress of the barbarians and the security of the Romans from that day the Goths, renouncing the precarious condition of strangers and exiles, assumed the character of citizens and masters, claimed an absolute dominion over the possessors of land and held in their own right the northern provinces of the empire which are bounded by the Danube Such are the words of the Gothic historian [72] who celebrates with rude eloquence the glory of his countrymen But the dominion of the barbarians was exercised only for the purposes of rapine and destruction As they had been deprived by the ministers of the emperor of the common benefits of nature and the fair intercourse of social life, they retaliated the injustice on the subjects of the empire and the crimes of Lupicinus were expiated by the ruin of the peaceful husbandmen of Thrace the conflagration of their villages and the massacre or captivity of their innocent families The report of the Gothic victory was soon diffused over the adjacent country and while it filled the minds of the Romans with terror and dismay their own hasty imprudence contributed to increase the forces of Fritigern and the calamities of the province Some time before the great emigration a numerous body of Goths under the command of Suerid and Colias had been received into the protection and service of the empire [73] They were encamped under the walls of Hadrianople but the ministers of Valens were anxious to remove them beyond the Hellespont at a distance from the dangerous temptation which might so easily be communicated by the neighbourhood and the success of their countrymen The respectful submission with which they yielded to the order of their march might be considered as a proof of their fidelity and their moderate request of a sufficient allowance of provisions and of a delay of only two days was expressed in the most dutiful terms But the first magistrate of Hadrianople incensed by some disorders which had been committed at his country house refused this indulgence and arming against them the inhabitants and manufacturers of a populous city he urged with hostile threats their instant departure The barbarians stood silent and amazed, till they were exasperated by the insulting clamours and missile weapons of the populace but when patience or contempt was fatigued they crushed the undisciplined multitude, inflicted many a shameful wound on the backs of their flying enemies and despoiled them of the splendid armour [74] which they were unworthy to bear The resemblance of their sufferings and their actions soon united this victorious detachment to the nation of the Visigoths the troops of Colias and Suerid expected the approach of the great Fritigern, ranged themselves under his standard and signalised their ardour in the siege of Hadrianople But the resistance of the garrison informed the barbarians that in the attack of regular fortifications the efforts of unskilful courage are seldom effectual Their general acknowledged his error raised the siege declared that he was at peace with stone walls [75] and revenged his disappointment on the adjacent country He accepted with pleasure the useful reinforcement of hardy workmen who laboured in the gold mines of Thrace [76] for the emolument and under the lash of an unfeeling master [77] and these new associates conducted the barbarians through the secret paths to the most sequestered places which had been chosen to secure the inhabitants the cattle and the magazines of corn With the assistance of such guides nothing could remain impervious or inaccessible resistance was fatal flight was impracticable and the patient submission of helpless innocence seldom found mercy from the barbarian conqueror In the course of these depredations a great number of the children of the Goths who had been sold into captivity were restored to the embraces of their afflicted parents but these tender interviews which might have revived and cherished in their minds some sentiments of humanity tended only to stimulate their native fierceness by the desire of revenge They listened with eager attention to the complaints of their captive children who had suffered the most cruel indignities from the lustful or angry passions of their masters and the same cruelties the same indignities were severely retaliated on the sons and daughters of the Romans [78]

The imprudence of Valens and his ministers had introduced into the heart of the empire a nation of enemies but the Visigoths might even yet have been reconciled by the manly confession of past errors and the sincere performance of former engagements These healing and temperate measures seemed to concur with the timorous disposition of the sovereign of the East but on this occasion alone Valens was brave and his unseasonable bravery was fatal to himself and to his subjects He declared his intention of marching from Antioch to Constantinople to subdue this dangerous rebellion and as he was not ignorant of the difficulties of the enterprise he solicited the assistance of his nephew the emperor Gratian who commanded all the forces of the West The veteran troops were hastily recalled from the defence of Armenia that important frontier was abandoned to the discretion of Sapor and the immediate conduct of the Gothic war was intrusted, during the absence of Valens, to his lieutenants, Trajan and Profuturus, two generals who indulged themselves in a very false and favourable opin*ion of their own abilities On their arrival in* Thrace they were joined by Richomer, count of the domestics, and the auxiliaries of the West that marched under his banner were composed of the Gallic legions, reduced indeed by a spirit of desertion to the vain appearances of strength and numbers In a council of war, which was influenced by pride rather than by reason, it was resolved to seek and to encounter the barbarians, who lay encamped in the spacious and fertile meadows near the most southern of the six mouths of the Danube [79] Their camp was surrounded by the usual fortification of waggons,[80] and the barbarians, secure within the vast circle of the enclosure, enjoyed the fruits of their valour and the spoils of the province In the midst of riotous intemperance, the watchful Fritigern observed the motions and penetrated the designs of the Romans He perceived that the numbers of the enemy were continually increasing, and, as he understood their intention of attacking his rear as soon as the scarcity of forage should oblige him to remove his camp, he recalled to their standard his predatory detachments, which covered the adjacent country As soon as they descried the flaming beacons[81] they obeyed with incredible speed the signal of their leader, the camp was filled with the martial crowd of barbarians, their impatient clamours demanded the battle, and their tumultuous zeal was approved and animated by the spirit of their chiefs The evening was already far advanced, and the two armies prepared themselves for the approaching combat, which was deferred only till the dawn of day While the trumpets sounded to arms, the undaunted courage of the Goths was confirmed by the mutual obligation of a solemn oath, and, as they advanced to meet the enemy, the rude songs which celebrated the glory of their forefathers were mingled with their fierce and dissonant outcries, and opposed to the artificial harmony of the Roman shout Some military skill was displayed by Fritigern to gain the advantage of a commanding eminence, but the bloody conflict, which began and ended with the light, was maintained on either side by the personal and obstinate efforts of strength, valour, and agility The legions of Armenia supported their fame in arms, but they were oppressed by the irresistible weight of the hostile multitude the left wing of the Romans was thrown into disorder, and the field was strewed with their mangled carcasses This partial defeat was balanced, however, by partial success, and when the two armies, at a late hour of the evening, retreated to their respective camps, neither of them could claim the honours of the effects of a decisive victory The real loss was more severely felt by the Romans, in proportion to the smallness of their numbers, but the Goths were so deeply confounded and dismayed by this vigorous, and perhaps unexpected, resistance, that they remained seven days within the circle of their fortifications Such funeral rites as the circumstances of time and place would admit were piously discharged to some officers of distinguished rank, but the indiscriminate vulgar was left unburied on the plain Their flesh was greedily devoured by the birds of prey, who in that age enjoyed very frequent and delicious feasts, and, several years afterwards, the white and naked bones which covered the wide extent of the fields presented to the eyes of Ammianus a dreadful monument of the battle of Salices [82]

The progress of the Goths had been checked by the doubtful event of that bloody day, and the Imperial generals, whose army would have been consumed by the repetition of such a contest, embraced the more rational plan of destroying the barbarians by the wants and pressure of their own multitudes They prepared to confine the Visigoths in the narrow angle of land between the Danube, the desert of Scythia, and the mountains of Hæmus, till their strength and spirit should be insensibly wasted by the inevitable operation of famine The design was prosecuted with some conduct and success, the barbarians had almost exhausted their own magazines and the harvests of the country, and the diligence of Saturninus, the master general of the cavalry, was employed to improve the strength and to contract the extent of the Roman fortifications His labours were interrupted by the alarming intelligence that new swarms of barbarians had passed the unguarded Danube, either to support the cause or to imitate the example of Fritigern The just apprehension that he himself might be surrounded and overwhelmed by the arms of hostile and unknown nations, compelled Saturninus to relinquish the siege of the Gothic camp, and the indignant Visigoths, breaking from their confinement, satiated their hunger and revenge by the repeated devastation of the fruitful country which extends above three hundred miles from the banks of the Danube to the straits of the Hellespont [83] The sagacious Fritigern had successfully appealed to the passions as well as to the interest of his bar barian allies and the love of rapine and the hatred of Rome seconded or even prevented the eloquence of his ambassadors He cemented a strict and useful alliance with the great body of his countrymen who obeyed Alatheus and Saphrax as the guardians of their infant king the long animosity of rival tribes was suspended by the sense of their common interest the inde pendent part of the nation was associated under one standard and the chiefs of the Ostrogoths appear to have yielded to the superior genius of the general of the Visigoths He obtained the formidable aid of the Taifalæ whose military renown was disgraced and polluted by the public infamy of their domestic manners Every youth on his entrance into the world was united by the ties of honourable friendship and brutal love to some warrior of the tribe nor could he hope to be released from this unnatural connection till he had approved his manhood by slaying in single combat a huge bear or a wild boar of the forest [84] But the most powerful auxiliaries of the Goths were drawn from the camp of those enemies who had expelled them from their native seats The loose subordination and extensive possessions of the Huns and the Alani delayed the conquests and distracted the councils of that victorious people. Several of the hordes were allured by the liberal promises of Fritigern and the rapid cavalry of Scythia added weight and energy to the steady and strenuous efforts of the Gothic infantry The Sarmatians who could never forgive the successor of Valentinian enjoyed and increased the general confusion and a seasonable irruption of the Alemanni into the provinces of Gaul engaged the attention and diverted the forces of the emperor of the West [85]

One of the most dangerous inconveniences of the introduction of the barbarians into the army and the palace was sensibly felt in their correspondence with their hostile countrymen to whom they imprudently or maliciously revealed the weakness of the Roman empire A soldier of the life guards of Gratian was of the nation of the Alemanni, and of the tribe of the Lentienses, who dwelt beyond the lake of Constance Some domestic business obliged him to request a leave of absence In a short visit to his family and friends he was exposed to their curious inquiries and the vanity of the loquacious soldier tempted him to display his intimate acquaintance with the secrets of the state and the designs of his master The intelligence that Gratian was preparing to lead the military force of Gaul and of the West to the assistance of his uncle Valens pointed out to the restless spirit of the Alemanni the moment and the mode of a successful invasion. The enterprise of some light detachments who in the month of February passed the Rhine upon the ice was the prelude of a more important war The boldest hopes of rapine perhaps of conquest outweighed the considerations of timid prudence or national faith. Every forest and every village poured forth a band of hardy adventurers and the great army of the Alemanni which on their approach was estimated at forty thousand men by the fears of the people was afterwards magnified to the number of seventy thousand by the vain and credulous flattery of the Imperial court The legions which had been ordered to march into Pannonia were immediately recalled or detained for the defence of Gaul the military command was divided between Nanienus and Mellobaudes and the youthful emperor though he respected the long experience and sober wisdom of the former was much more inclined to admire and to follow the martial ardour of his colleague who was allowed to unite the incompatible characters of count of the domestics and of king of the Franks His rival Priarius king of the Alemanni was guided, or rather impelled by the same headstrong valour and as their troops were animated by the spirit of their leaders they met they saw they encountered each other near the town of Argentaria or Colmar [86] in the plains of Alsace The glory of the day was justly ascribed to the missile weapons and well practised evolutions of the Roman soldiers the Alemanni who long maintained their ground were slaughtered with unrelenting fury five thousand only of the barbarians escaped to the woods and mountains and the glorious death of their king on the field of battle saved him from the reproaches of the people who are always disposed to accuse the justice or policy of an unsuccessful war After this signal victory which secured the peace of Gaul and asserted the honour of the Roman arms the emperor Gratian appeared to proceed without delay on his Eastern expedition but, as he approached the confines of the Alemanni, he suddenly inclined to the left surprised them by his unexpected passage of the Rhine and boldly advanced into the heart of their country The barbarians opposed to his progress the obstacles of nature and of courage and still continued to retreat from one hill to another till they were satisfied by repeated trials of the power and perseverance of their enemies Their submission was accepted as a proof, not indeed of their sincere repentance, but of their actual distress, and a select number of their brave and robust youth was exacted from the faithless nation, as the most substantial pledge of their future moderation The subjects of the empire, who had so often experienced that the Alemanni could neither be subdued by arms nor restrained by treaties, might not promise themselves any solid or lasting tranquillity, but they discovered, in the virtues of their young sovereign, the prospect of a long and auspicious reign When the legions climbed the mountains and scaled the fortifications of the barbarians, the valour of Gratian was distinguished in the foremost ranks and the gilt and variegated armour of his guards was pierced and shattered by the blows which they had received in their constant attachment to the person of their sovereign At the age of nineteen the son of Valentinian seemed to possess the talents of peace and war, and his personal success against the Alemanni was interpreted as a sure presage of his Gothic triumphs [87]

While Gratian deserved and enjoyed the applause of his subjects, the emperor Valens, who at length had removed his court and army from Antioch, was received by the people of Constantinople as the author of the public calamity Before he had reposed himself ten days in the capital he was urged by the licentious clamours of the Hippodrome to march against the barbarians whom he had invited into his dominions and the citizens, who are always brave at a distance from any real danger, declared, with confidence, that if they were supplied with arms, they alone would undertake to deliver the province from the ravages of an insulting foe [88] The vain reproaches of an ignorant multitude hastened the downfall of the Roman empire, they provoked the desperate rashness of Valens, who did not find, either in his reputation or in his mind, any motives to support with firmness the public contempt He was soon persuaded by the successful achievements of his lieutenants to despise the power of the Goths, who, by the diligence of Fritigern, were now collected in the neighbourhood of Hadrianople The march of the Taifalæ had been intercepted by the valiant Frigerid, the king of those licentious barbarians was slain in battle, and the suppliant captives were sent into distant exile to cultivate the lands of Italy, which were assigned for their settlement in the vacant territories of Modena and Parma [89] The exploits of Sebastian,[90] who was recently engaged in the service of Valens, and promoted to the rank of master-general of the infantry, were still more honourable to himself, and useful to the republic He obtained the permission of selecting three hundred soldiers from each of the legions, and this separate detachment soon acquired the spirit of discipline and the exercise of arms, which were almost forgotten under the reign of Valens By the vigour and conduct of Sebastian, a large body of the Goths was surprised in their camp, and the immense spoil which was recovered from their hands filled the city of Hadrianople and the adjacent plain The splendid narratives which the general transmitted of his own exploits alarmed the Imperial court by the appearance of superior merit, and though he cautiously insisted on the difficulties of the Gothic war, his valour was praised, his advice was rejected, and Valens, who listened with pride and pleasure to the flattering suggestions of the eunuchs of the palace, was impatient to seize the glory of an easy and assured conquest His army was strengthened by a numerous reinforcement of veterans, and his march from Constantinople to Hadrianople was conducted with so much military skill that he prevented the activity of the barbarians, who designed to occupy the intermediate defiles, and to intercept either the troops themselves or their convoys of provisions The camp of Valens, which he pitched under the walls of Hadrianople, was fortified, according to the practice of the Romans, with a ditch and rampart, and a most important council was summoned to decide the fate of the emperor and of the empire The party of reason and of delay was strenuously maintained by Victor, who had corrected, by the lessons of experience, the native fierceness of the Sarmatian character, while Sebastian with the flexible and obsequious eloquence of a courtier, represented every precaution and every measure that implied a doubt of immediate victory as unworthy of the courage and majesty of their invincible monarch The ruin of Valens was precipitated by the deceitful arts of Fritigern and the prudent admonitions of the emperor of the West The advantages of negotiating in the midst of war were perfectly understood by the general of the barbarians, and a Christian ecclesiastic was despatched, as the holy minister of peace, to penetrate and to perplex the councils of the enemy The misfortunes, as well as the provocations, of the Gothic nation were forcibly and truly described by their ambassador, who protested, in the name of Fritigern, that he was still disposed to lay down his arms, or to emr'

them only in the defence of the empire if he could secure for his wandering countrymen a tranquil settlement on the waste lands of Thrace and a sufficient allowance of corn and cattle But he added in a whisper of confidential friendship that the exasperated barbarians were averse to these reasonable conditions and that Fritigern was doubtful whether he could accomplish the conclusion of the treaty unless he found himself supported by the presence and terrors of an Imperial army About the same time Count Richomer returned from the West to announce the defeat and submission of the Alemanni to inform Valens that his nephew advanced by rapid marches at the head of the veteran and victorious legions of Gaul and to request in the name of Gratian and of the republic that every dangerous and decisive measure might be suspended till the junction of the two emperors should ensure the success of the Gothic war But the feeble sovereign of the East was actuated only by the fatal illusions of pride and jealousy He disdained the importunate advice he rejected the humiliating aid he secretly compared the ignominious at least the inglorious period of his own reign with the fame of a beardless youth and Valens rushed into the field to erect his imaginary trophy before the diligence of his colleague could usurp any share of the triumphs of the day

On the 9th of August a day which has deserved to be marked among the most inauspicious of the Roman calendar [n] the emperor Valens leaving under a strong guard his baggage and military treasure marched from Hadrianople to attack the Goths who were encamped about twelve miles from the city [o] By some mistake of the orders or some ignorance of the ground the right wing or column of cavalry arrived in sight of the enemy whilst the left was still at a considerable distance the soldiers were compelled in the sultry heat of summer to precipitate their pace and the line of battle was formed with tedious confusion and irregular delay The Gothic cavalry had been detached to forage in the adjacent country and Fritigern still continued to practise his customary arts He despatched messengers of peace made proposals required hostages and wasted the hours till the Romans exposed without shelter to the burning rays of the sun were exhausted by thirst hunger and intolerable fatigue The emperor was persuaded to send an ambassador to the Gothic camp the zeal of Richomer who alone had courage to accept the dangerous commission was applauded and the count of the domestics adorned with the splendid ensigns of his dignity had proceeded some way in the space between the two armies when he was suddenly recalled by the alarm of battle The hasty and imprudent attack was made by Bacurius the Iberian who commanded a body of archers and targeteers and as they advanced with rashness they retreated with loss and disgrace In the same moment the flying squadrons of Alatheus and Saphrax whose return was anxiously expected by the general of the Goths descended like a whirlwind from the hills swept across the plain and added new terrors to the tumultuous but irresistible charge of the barbarian host The event of the battle of Hadrianople so fatal to Valens and to the empire, may be described in a few words the Roman cavalry fled the infantry was abandoned surrounded, and cut in pieces The most skilful evolutions, the firmest courage are scarcely sufficient to extricate a body of foot encompassed on an open plain by superior numbers of horse but the troops of Valens oppressed by the weight of the enemy and their own fears were crowded into a narrow space where it was impossible for them to extend their ranks or even to use with effect their swords and javelins In the midst of tumult of slaughter and of dismay the emperor deserted by his guards and wounded as it was supposed with an arrow sought protection among the Lanceani and the Mattiarii, who still maintained their ground with some appearance of order and firmness His faithful generals Trajan and Victor who perceived his danger loudly exclaimed that all was lost unless the person of the emperor could be saved Some troops animated by their exhortation advanced to his relief they found only a bloody spot covered with a heap of broken arms and mangled bodies without being able to discover their unfortunate prince either among the living or the dead Their search could not indeed be successful if there is any truth in the circumstances with which some historians have related the death of the emperor By the care of his attendants Valens was removed from the field of battle to a neighbouring cottage where they attempted to dress his wound and to provide for his future safety But this humble retreat was instantly surrounded by the enemy they tried to force the door they were provoked by a discharge of arrows from the roof till at length, impatient of delay they set fire to a pile of dry faggots and consumed the cottage with the Roman emperor and his train Valens perished in the flames and a youth who dropped from the window, alone escaped, to attest the melancholy tale and to inform the Goths of the inestimable prize which they had lost by their own rashness A great number of brave and distinguished officers perished in the battle of Hadrianople, which equalled in the actual loss, and far surpassed in the fatal consequences, the misfortune which Rome had formerly sustained in the fields of Cannæ [93] Two master-generals of the cavalry and infantry, two great officers of the palace, and thirty-five tribunes, were found among the slain, and the death of Sebastian might satisfy the world that he was the victim as well as the author of the public calamity Above two-thirds of the Roman army were destroyed and the darkness of the night was esteemed a very favourable circumstance, as it served to conceal the flight of the multitude, and to protect the more orderly retreat of Victor and Richomer, who alone, amidst the general consternation, maintained the advantage of calm courage and regular discipline [94]

While the impressions of grief and terror were still recent in the minds of men, the most celebrated rhetorician of the age composed the funeral oration of a vanquished army and of an unpopular prince, whose throne was already occupied by a stranger "There are not wanting," says the candid Libanius, "those who arraign the prudence of the emperor, or who impute the public misfortune to the want of courage and discipline in the troops For my own part, I reverence the memory of their former exploits, I reverence the glorious death which they bravely received, standing and fighting in their ranks, I reverence the field of battle, stained with their blood and the blood of the barbarians Those honourable marks have been already washed away by the rains, but the lofty monuments of their bones, the bones of generals of centurions, and of valiant warriors, claim a longer period of duration The king himself fought and fell in the foremost ranks of the battle His attendants presented him with the fleetest horses of the Imperial stable, that would soon have carried him beyond the pursuit of the enemy They vainly pressed him to reserve his important life for the future service of the republic He still declared that he was unworthy to survive so many of the bravest and most faithful of his subjects, and the monarch was nobly buried under a mountain of the slain Let none, therefore, presume to ascribe the victory of the barbarians to fear, the weakness, or the imprudence of the Roman troops The chiefs and the soldiers were animated by the virtue of their ancestors, whom they equalled in discipline and the arts of war Their generous emulation was supported by the love of glory, which prompted them to contend at the same time with heat and thirst, with fire and the sword, and cheerfully to embrace an honourable death as their refuge against flight and infamy The indignation of the gods has been the only cause of the success of our enemies " The truth of history may disclaim some parts of this panegyric, which cannot strictly be reconciled with the character of Valens or the circumstances of the battle, but the fairest commendation is due to the eloquence, and still more to the generosity, of the sophist of Antioch [95]

The pride of the Goths was elated by this memorable victory, but their avarice was disappointed by the mortifying discovery that the richest part of the Imperial spoil had been within the walls of Hadrianople They hastened to possess the reward of their valour, but they were encountered by the remains of a vanquished army with an intrepid resolution, which was the effect of their despair and the only hope of their safety The walls of the city and the ramparts of the adjacent camp were lined with military engines that threw stones of an enormous weight, and astonished the ignorant barbarians by the noise and velocity, still more than by the real effects, of the discharge The soldiers, the citizens, the provincials, the domestics of the palace, were united in the danger and in the defence, the furious assault of the Goths was repulsed, their secret arts of treachery and treason were discovered, and after an obstinate conflict of many hours they retired to their tents, convinced by experience that it would be far more advisable to observe the treaty which their sagacious leader had tacitly stipulated with the fortifications of great and populous cities After the hasty and impolitic massacre of three hundred deserters, an act of justice extremely useful to the discipline of the Roman armies, the Goths indignantly raised the siege of Hadrianople The scene of war and tumult was instantly converted into a silent solitude, the multitude suddenly disappeared, the secret paths of the woods and mountains were marked with the footsteps of the trembling fugitives, who sought a refuge in the distant cities of Illyricum and Macedonia, and the faithful officers of the household and the treasury cautiously proceeded in search of the emperor, of whose death they were still ignorant The tide of the Gothic inundation rolled from the walls of Hadrianople to the suburbs of Constantinople The barbarians were surprised with the splendid appearance of the capital of the East the height and extent of the walls the myriads of wealthy and affrighted citizens who crowded the ramparts and the various prospect of the sea and land While they gazed with hopeless desire on the inaccessible beauties of Constantinople a sally was made from one of the gates by a party of Saracens [96] who had been fortunately engaged in the service of Valens The cavalry of Scythia was forced to yield to the admirable swiftness and spirit of the Arabian horses their riders were skilled in the evolutions of irregular war and the Northern barbarians were astonished and dismayed by the inhuman ferocity of the barbarians of the South A Gothic soldier was slain by the dagger of an Arab and the hairy, naked savage applying his lips to the wound expressed a horrid delight while he sucked the blood of his vanquished enemy [97] The army of the Goths laden with the spoils of the wealthy suburbs and the adjacent territory, slowly moved from the Bosphorus to the mountains which form the western boundary of Thrace The important pass of Succi was betrayed by the fear or the misconduct of Maurus, and the barbarians who no longer had any resistance to apprehend from the scattered and vanquished troops of the East spread themselves over the face of a fertile and cultivated country as far as the confines of Italy and the Hadriatic Sea [98]

The Romans who so coolly and so concisely mention the acts of justice which were exercised by the legions [99] reserved their compassion and their eloquence for their own sufferings when the provinces were invaded and desolated by the arms of the successful barbarians The simple circumstantial narrative (did such a narrative exist) of the ruin of a single town of the misfortunes of a single family [100] might exhibit an interesting and instructive picture of human manners but the tedious repetition of vague and declamatory complaints would fatigue the attention of the most patient reader The same censure may be applied though not perhaps in an equal degree to the profane and the ecclesiastical writers of this unhappy period that their minds were inflamed by popular and religious animosity and that the true size and colour of every object is falsified by the exaggerations of their corrupt eloquence The vehement Jerom [101] might justly deplore the calamities inflicted by the Goths and their barbarous allies on his native country of Pannonia and the wide extent of the provinces from the walls of Constantinople to the foot of the Julian Alps the rapes, the massacres the conflagrations, and above all the profanation of the churches that were turned into stables and the contemptuous treatment of the relics of holy martyrs But the saint is surely transported beyond the limits of nature and history when he affirms that in those desert countries nothing was left except the sky and the earth that after the destruction of the cities and the extirpation of the human race the land was overgrown with thick forests and inextricable brambles and that the universal desolation announced by the prophet Zephaniah, was accomplished in the scarcity of the beasts, the birds and even of the fish These complaints were pronounced about twenty years after the death of Valens and the Illyrian provinces which were constantly exposed to the invasion and passage of the barbarians still continued after a calamitous period of ten centuries to supply new materials for rapine and destruction Could it even be supposed that a large tract of country had been left without cultivation and without inhabitants the consequences might not have been so fatal to the inferior productions of animated nature The useful and feeble animals which are nourished by the hand of man might suffer and perish if they were deprived of his protection but the beasts of the forest his enemies or his victims would multiply in the free and undisturbed possession of their solitary domain The various tribes that peopled the air or the waters are still less connected with the fate of the human species and it is highly probable that the fish of the Danube would have felt more terror and distress from the approach of a voracious pike than from the hostile inroad of a Gothic army

Whatever may have been the just measure of the calamities of Europe there was reason to fear that the same calamities would soon extend to the peaceful countries of Asia The sons of the Goths had been judiciously distributed through the cities of the East and the arts of education were employed to polish and subdue the native fierceness of their temper In the space of about twelve years their numbers had continually increased and the children who in the first emigration were sent over the Hellespont had attained with rapid growth the strength and spirit of perfect manhood [102] It was impossible to conceal from their knowledge the events of the Gothic war and as those daring youths had not studied the language of dissimulation, they betrayed their wish their desire, perhaps their intention, to emulate the glorious example of their fathers The danger of the times seemed to justify the jealous suspicions of the provincials, and these suspicions were admitted as unquestionable evidence that the Goths of Asia had formed a secret and dangerous conspiracy against the public safety The death of Valens had left the East without a sovereign, and Julius, who filled the important station of master-general of the troops, with a high reputation of diligence and ability, thought it his duty to consult the senate of Constantinople, which he considered, during the vacancy of the throne, as the representative council of the nation As soon as he had obtained the discretionary power of acting as he should judge most expedient for the good of the republic, he assembled the principal officers and privately concerted effectual measures for the execution of his bloody design An order was immediately promulgated that, on a stated day, the Gothic youth should assemble in the capital cities of their respective provinces, and, as a report was industriously circulated that they were summoned to receive a liberal gift of lands and money, the pleasing hope allayed the fury of their resentment, and perhaps suspended the motions of the conspiracy On the appointed day the unarmed crowd of the Gothic youth was carefully collected in the square or forum, the streets and avenues were occupied by the Roman troops, and the roofs of the houses were covered with archers and slingers At the same hour, in all the cities of the East, the signal was given of indiscriminate slaughter, and the provinces of Asia were delivered, by the cruel prudence of Julius, from a domestic enemy, who in a few months might have carried fire and sword from the Hellespont to the Euphrates [103] The urgent consideration of the public safety may undoubtedly authorise the violation of every positive law How far that or any other consideration may operate to dissolve the natural obligations of humanity and justice, is a doctrine of which I still desire to remain ignorant

The emperor Gratian was far advanced on his march towards the plains of Hadrianople when he was informed, at first by the confused voice of fame, and afterwards by the more accurate reports of Victor and Richomer, that his impatient colleague had been slain in battle, and that two-thirds of the Roman army were exterminated by the sword of the victorious Goths Whatever resentment the rash and jealous vanity of his uncle might deserve, the resentment of a generous mind is easily subdued by the softer emotions of grief and compassion, and even the sense of pity was soon lost in the serious and alarming consideration of the state of the republic Gratian was too late to assist, he was too weak to revenge, his unfortunate colleague, and the valiant and modest youth felt himself unequal to the support of a sinking world A formidable tempest of the barbarians of Germany seemed ready to burst over the provinces of Gaul, and the mind of Gratian was oppressed and distracted by the administration of the Western empire In this important crisis the government of the East and the conduct of the Gothic war required the undivided attention of a hero and a statesman A subject invested with such ample command would not long have preserved his fidelity to a distant benefactor, and the Imperial council embraced the wise and manly resolution of conferring an obligation rather than of yielding to an insult. It was the wish of Gratian to bestow the purple as the reward of virtue, but at the age of nineteen it is not easy for a prince, educated in the supreme rank, to understand the true characters of his ministers and generals He attempted to weigh, with an impartial hand, their various merits and defects, and whilst he checked the rash confidence of ambition, he distrusted the cautious wisdom which despaired of the republic As each moment of delay diminished something of the power and resources of the future sovereign of the East, the situation of the times would not allow a tedious debate The choice of Gratian was soon declared in favour of an exile, whose father, only three years before, had suffered, under the sanction of his authority, an unjust and ignominious death The great Theodosius, a name celebrated in history and dear to the Catholic church,[104] was summoned to the Imperial court, which had gradually retreated from the confines of Thrace to the more secure station of Sirmium Five months after the death of Valens the emperor Gratian produced before the assembled troops his colleague and their master, who, after a modest, perhaps a sincere resistance, was compelled to accept, amidst the general acclamations, the diadem, the purple, and the equal title of Augustus [105] The provinces of Thrace, Asia, and Egypt, over which Valens had reigned, were resigned to the administration of the new emperor, but as he was specially intrusted with the conduct of the Gothic war, the Illyrian præfecture was dismembered, and the two great dioceses of Dacia and Macedonia were added to the dominions of the Eastern empire [106]

The same province and perhaps the same city [107] which had given to the throne the virtues of Trajan and the talents of Hadrian was the original seat of another family of Spaniards who in a less fortunate age possessed near four score years the declining empire of Rome [108] They emerged from the obscurity of municipal honours by the active spirit of the elder Theodosius a general whose exploits in Britain and Africa have formed one of the most splendid parts of the annals of Valentinian The son of that general who likewise bore the name of Theodosius, was educated by skilful preceptors in the liberal studies of youth but he was instructed in the art of war by the tender care and severe discipline of his father [109] Under the standard of such a leader young Theodosius sought glory and knowledge in the most distant scenes of military action inured his constitution to the difference of seasons and climates distinguished his valour by sea and land and observed the various warfare of the Scots the Saxons and the Moors His own merit and the recommendation of the conqueror of Africa soon raised him to a separate command and in the station of duke of Mæsia he vanquished an army of Sarmatians saved the province deserved the love of the soldiers and provoked the envy of the court [110] His rising fortunes were soon blasted by the disgrace and execution of his illustrious father and Theodosius obtained as a favour the permission of retiring to a private life in his native province of Spain He displayed a firm and temperate character in the ease with which he adapted himself to this new situation His time was almost equally divided between the town and country the spirit which had animated his public conduct was shown in the active and affectionate performance of every social duty and the diligence of the soldier was profitably converted to the improvement of his ample patrimony [111] which lay between Valladolid and Segovia in the midst of a fruitful district still famous for a most exquisite breed of sheep [112] From the innocent, but humble labours of his farm Theodosius was transported in less than four months to the throne of the Eastern empire and the whole period of the history of the world will not perhaps afford a similar example of an elevation at the same time so pure and so honourable The princes who peaceably inherit the sceptre of their fathers claim and enjoy a legal right the more secure as it is absolutely distinct from the merits of their personal characters The subjects who in a monarchy or a popular state acquire the possession of supreme power may have raised themselves by the superiority either of genius or virtue above the heads of their equals but their virtue is seldom exempt from ambition and the cause of the successful candidate is frequently stained by the guilt of conspiracy or civil war Even in those governments which allow the reigning monarch to declare a colleague or a successor his partial choice which may be influenced by the blindest passions is often directed to an unworthy object But the most suspicious malignity cannot ascribe to Theodosius in his obscure solitude of Caucha the arts the desires or even the hopes of an ambitious statesman and the name of the Exile would long since have been forgotten if his genuine and distinguished virtues had not left a deep impression in the Imperial court. During the season of prosperity he had been neglected but in the public distress his superior merit was universally felt and acknowledged What confidence must have been reposed in his integrity since Gratian could trust that a pious son would forgive for the sake of the republic the murder of his father! What expectations must have been formed of his abilities to encourage the hope that a single man could save and restore the empire of the East! Theodosius was invested with the purple in the thirty third year of his age The vulgar gazed with admiration on the manly beauty of his face and the graceful majesty of his person, which they were pleased to compare with the pictures and medals of the emperor Trajan whilst intelligent observers discovered in the qualities of his heart and understanding a more important resemblance to the best and greatest of the Roman princes

It is not without the most sincere regret that I must now take leave of an accurate and faithful guide who has composed the history of his own times without indulging the prejudices and passions which usually affect the mind of a contemporary Ammianus Marcellinus who terminates his useful work with the defeat and death of Valens recommends the more glorious subject of the ensuing reign to the youthful vigour and eloquence of the rising generation.[113] The rising generation was not disposed to accept his advice or to imitate his example [114] and in the study of the reign of Theodosius we are reduced to illustrate the partial narrative of Zosimus by the obscure hints of fragments and chronicles, by the figurative style of poetry or panegyric, and by the precarious assistance of the ecclesiastical writers who in the heat of religious faction, are apt to despise the profane virtues of sincerity and moderation Conscious of these disadvantages, which will continue to involve a considerable portion of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, I shall proceed with doubtful and timorous steps Yet I may boldly pronounce that the battle of Hadrianople was never revenged by any signal or decisive victory of Theodosius over the barbarians, and the expressive silence of his venal orators may be confirmed by the observation of the condition and circumstances of the times The fabric of a mighty state, which has been reared by the labours of successive ages, could not be overturned by the misfortune of a single day, if the fatal power of the imagination did not exaggerate the real measure of the calamity The loss of forty thousand Romans, who fell in the plains of Hadrianople, might have been soon recruited in the populous provinces of the East, which contained so many millions of inhabitants The courage of a soldier is found to be the cheapest and most common quality of human nature, and sufficient skill to encounter an undisciplined foe might have been speedily taught by the care of the surviving centurions If the barbarians were mounted on the horses, and equipped with the armour, of their vanquished enemies, the numerous studs of Cappadocia and Spain would have supplied new squadrons of cavalry, the thirty-four arsenals of the empire were plentifully stored with magazines of offensive and defensive arms, and the wealth of Asia might still have yielded an ample fund for the expenses of the war But the effects which were produced by the battle of Hadrianople on the minds of the barbarians and of the Romans, extended the victory of the former, and the defeat of the latter, far beyond the limits of a single day A Gothic chief was heard to declare, with insolent moderation, that, for his own part, he was fatigued with slaughter, but that he was astonished how a people who fled before him like a flock of sheep could still presume to dispute the possession of their treasures and provinces [115] The same terrors which the name of the Huns had spread among the Gothic tribes were inspired, by the formidable name of the Goths, among the subjects and soldiers of the Roman empire [116] If Theodosius, hastily collecting his scattered forces, had led them into the field to encounter a victorious enemy, his army would have been vanquished by their own fears, and his rashness could not have been excused by the chance of success But the great Theodosius, an epithet which he honourably deserved on this momentous occasion, conducted himself as the firm and faithful guardian of the republic He fixed his headquarters at Thessalonica, the capital of the Macedonian diocese,[117] from whence he could watch the irregular motions of the barbarians, and direct the operations of his lieutenants, from the gates of Constantinople to the shores of the Hadriatic The fortifications and garrisons of the cities were strengthened, and the troops, among whom a sense of order and discipline was revived, were insensibly emboldened by the confidence of their own safety From these secure stations they were encouraged to make frequent sallies on the barbarians, who infested the adjacent country, and, as they were seldom allowed to engage, without some decisive superiority, either of ground or of numbers, their enterprises were, for the most part, successful, and they were soon convinced, by their own experience, of the possibility of vanquishing their invincible enemies The detachments of these separate garrisons were gradually united into small armies, the same cautious measures were pursued, according to an extensive and well-concerted plan of operations, the events of each day added strength and spirit to the Roman arms, and the artful diligence of the emperor, who circulated the most favourable reports of the success of the war, contributed to subdue the pride of the barbarians, and to animate the hopes and courage of his subjects If, instead of this faint and imperfect outline, we could accurately represent the counsels and actions of Theodosius in four successive campaigns, there is reason to believe that his consummate skill would deserve the applause of every military reader The republic had formerly been saved by the delays of Fabius, and, while the splendid trophies of Scipio, in the field of Zama, attract the eyes of posterity, the camps and marches of the dictator among the hills of Campania may claim a juster proportion of the solid and independent fame which the general is not compelled to share either with fortune or with his troops Such was likewise the merit of Theodosius, and the infirmities of his body, which most unseasonably languished under a long and dangerous disease, could not oppress the vigour of his mind, or divert his attention from the public service [118]

The deliverance and peace of the Roman provinces[119] was the work of prudence, rather than of valour the prudence of Theodosius was seconded by fortune, and the emperor never failed to seize, and to improve, every favourable circumstance As long as the superior genius of

Fritigern preserved the union and directed the motions of the barbarians their power was not inadequate to the conquest of a great empire The death of that hero the predecessor and master of the renowned Alaric, relieved an impatient multitude from the intolerable yoke of discipline and discretion The barbarians who had been restrained by his authority abandoned themselves to the dictates of their passions and their passions were seldom uniform or consistent An army of conquerors was broken into many disorderly bands of savage robbers and their blind and irregular fury was not less pernicious to themselves than to their enemies Their mischievous disposition was shown in the destruction of every object which they wanted strength to remove or taste to enjoy and they often consumed with improvident rage the harvests or the granaries which soon afterwards became necessary for their own subsistence A spirit of discord arose among the independent tribes and nations which had been united only by the bands of a loose and voluntary alliance The troops of the Huns and the Alani would naturally upbraid the flight of the Goths who were not disposed to use with moderation the advantages of their fortune the ancient jealousy of the Ostrogoths and the Visigoths could not long be suspended and the haughty chiefs still remembered the insults and injuries which they had reciprocally offered or sustained while the nation was seated in the countries beyond the Danube The progress of domestic faction abated the more diffusive sentiment of national animosity and the officers of Theodosius were instructed to purchase with liberal gifts and promises the retreat or service of the discontented party The acquisition of Modar a prince of the royal blood of the Amali gave a bold and faithful champion to the cause of Rome The illustrious deserter soon obtained the rank of master general with an important command surprised an army of his countrymen who were immersed in wine and sleep and after a cruel slaughter of the astonished Goths returned with an immense spoil and four thousand waggons to the Imperial camp [120] In the hands of a skilful politician the most different means may be successfully applied to the same ends and the peace of the empire which had been forwarded by the divisions was accomplished by the re union of the Gothic nation. Athanaric, who had been a patient spectator of these extraordinary events was at length driven, by the chance of arms from the dark recesses of the woods of Caucaland. He no longer hesitated to pass the Danube and a very considerable part of the subjects of Fritigern, who already felt the inconveniences of anarchy were easily persuaded to acknowledge for their king a Gothic Judge whose birth they respected and whose abilities they had frequently experienced But age had chilled the daring spirit of Athanaric and instead of leading his people to the field of battle and victory he wisely listened to the fair proposal of an honourable and advantageous treaty Theodosius, who was acquainted with the merit and power of his new ally condescended to meet him at the distance of several miles from Constantinople and entertained him in the Imperial city with the confidence of a friend and the magnificence of a monarch The barbarian prince observed, with curious attention the variety of objects which attracted his notice and at last broke out into a sincere and passionate exclamation of wonder I now behold (said he) what I never could believe the glories of this stupendous capital! And as he cast his eyes around he viewed and he admired the commanding situation of the city the strength and beauty of the walls and public edifices the capacious harbour crowded with innumerable vessels the perpetual concourse of distant nations and the arms and discipline of the troops Indeed (continued Athanaric) the emperor of the Romans is a god upon earth and the presumptuous man who dares to lift his hand against him is guilty of his own blood [121] The Gothic king did not long enjoy this splendid and honourable reception and as temperance was not the virtue of his nation it may justly be suspected that his mortal disease was contracted amidst the pleasures of the Imperial banquets But the policy of Theodosius derived more solid benefit from the death than he could have expected from the most faithful services of his ally The funeral of Athanaric was performed with solemn rites in the capital of the East a stately monument was erected to his memory and his whole army won by the liberal courtesy and decent grief of Theodosius enlisted under the standard of the Roman empire [122] The submission of so great a body of the Visigoths was productive of the most salutary consequences and the mixed influence of force of reason and of corruption, became every day more powerful and more extensive Each independent chieftain hastened to obtain a separate treaty from the apprehension that an obstinate delay might expose him, alone and unprotected to the revenge or justice of the conqueror The general or rather the final, capitulation of the Goths, may be dated four years, one month, and twenty five days, after the defeat and death of the emperor Valens[123]

The provinces of the Danube had been already relieved from the oppressive weight of the Gruthungi, or Ostrogoths, by the voluntary retreat of Alatheus and Saphrax, whose restless spirit had prompted them to seek new scenes of rapine and glory Their destructive course was pointed towards the West, but we must be satisfied with a very obscure and imperfect knowledge of their various adventures The Ostrogoths impelled several of the German tribes on the provinces of Gaul, concluded, and soon violated, a treaty with the emperor Gratian, advanced into the unknown countries of the North, and, after an interval of more than four years, returned with accumulated force to the banks of the Lower Danube Their troops were recruited with the fiercest warriors of Germany and Scythia, and the soldiers, or at least the historians, of the empire no longer recognised the name and countenances of their former enemies[124] The general who commanded the military and naval powers of the Thracian frontier soon perceived that his superiority would be disadvantageous to the public service, and that the barbarians, awed by the presence of his fleet and legions, would probably defer the passage of the river till the approaching winter The dexterity of the spies whom he sent into the Gothic camp allured the barbarians into a fatal snare They were persuaded that, by a bold attempt, they might surprise, in the silence and darkness of the night, the sleeping army of the Romans, and the whole multitude was hastily embarked in a fleet of three thousand canoes[125] The bravest of the Ostrogoths led the van, the main body consisted of the remainder of their subjects and soldiers, and the women and children securely followed in the rear One of the nights without a moon had been selected for the execution of their design, and they had almost reached the southern bank of the Danube, in the firm confidence that they should find an easy landing and an unguarded camp But the progress of the barbarians was suddenly stopped by an unexpected obstacle—a triple line of vessels, strongly connected with each other, and which formed an impenetrable chain of two miles and a half along the river While they struggled to force their way in the unequal conflict, their right flank was overwhelmed by the irresistible attack of a fleet of galleys, which were urged down the stream by the united impulse of oars and of the tide The weight and velocity of those ships of war broke, and sunk, and dispersed the rude and feeble canoes of the barbarians their valour was ineffectual, and Alatheus, the king or general of the Ostrogoths, perished, with his bravest troops, either by the sword of the Romans or in the waves of the Danube The last division of this unfortunate fleet might regain the opposite shore, but the distress and disorder of the multitude rendered them alike incapable either of action or counsel, and they soon implored the clemency of the victorious enemy On this occasion, as well as on many others, it is a difficult task to reconcile the passions and prejudices of the writers of the age of Theodosius The partial and malignant historian, who misrepresents every action of his reign, affirms that the emperor did not appear in the field of battle till the barbarians had been vanquished by the valour and conduct of his lieutenant Promotus[126] The flattering poet, who celebrated in the court of Honorius the glory of the father and of the son, ascribes the victory to the personal prowess of Theodosius, and almost insinuates that the king of the Ostrogoths was slain by the hand of the emperor[127] The truth of history might perhaps be found in a just medium between these extreme and contradictory assertions

The original treaty, which fixed the settlement of the Goths, ascertained their privileges, and stipulated their obligations, would illustrate the history of Theodosius and his successors The series of their history has imperfectly preserved the spirit and substance of this singular agreement[128] The ravages of war and tyranny had provided many large tracts of fertile but uncultivated land for the use of those barbarians who might not disdain the practice of agriculture A numerous colony of the Visigoths was seated in Thrace, the remains of the Ostrogoths were planted in Phrygia and Lydia, their immediate wants were supplied by a distribution of corn and cattle, and their future industry was encouraged by an exemption from tribute during a certain term of years The barbarians would have deserved to feel the cruel and perfidious policy of the Imperial court if they had suffered themselves to be dispersed through the provinces They required and they obtained the sole possession of the villages and districts assigned for their residence, they still cherished and propagated their native manners and language, asserted, in the bosom of despotism, the freedom of their domestic government, and acknowledged the sovereignty of the emperor without submitting to the inferior jurisdiction of the laws and magistrates of Rome The hereditary chiefs of the tribes and families were still permitted to command their followers in peace and war but the royal dignity was abolished and the generals of the Goths were appointed and removed at the pleasure of the emperor An army of forty thousand Goths was maintained for the perpetual service of the empire of the East and those haughty troops who assumed the title of Foederati or allies were distinguished by their gold collars liberal pay and licentious privileges Their native courage was improved by the use of arms and the knowledge of discipline and while the republic was guarded or threatened by the doubtful sword of the barbarians the last sparks of the military flame were finally extinguished in the minds of the Romans [129] Theodosius had the address to persuade his allies that the conditions of peace which had been extorted from him by prudence and necessity were the voluntary expressions of his sincere friendship for the Gothic nation [130] A different mode of vindication or apology was opposed to the complaints of the people who loudly censured these shameful and dangerous concessions [131] The calamities of the War were painted in the most lively colours and the first symptoms of the return of order of plenty and security were diligently exaggerated The advocates of Theodosius could affirm with some appearance of truth and reason that it was impossible to extirpate so many warlike tribes who were rendered desperate by the loss of their native country and that the exhausted provinces would be revived by a fresh supply of soldiers and husbandmen The barbarians still wore an angry and hostile aspect but the experience of past times might encourage the hope that they would acquire the habits of industry and obedience that their manners would be polished by time education and the influence of Christianity and that their posterity would insensibly blend with the great body of the Roman people [132]

Notwithstanding these specious arguments and these sanguine expectations it was apparent to every discerning eye that the Goths would long remain the enemies and might soon become the conquerors of the Roman empire Their rude and insolent behaviour expressed their contempt of the citizens and provincials whom they insulted with impunity [133] To the zeal and valour of the barbarians Theodosius was indebted for the success of his arms but their assistance was precarious and they were sometimes seduced by a treacherous and inconstant disposition to abandon his standard at the moment when their service was the most essential During the civil war against Maximus a great number of Gothic deserters retired into the morasses of Macedonia wasted the adjacent provinces and obliged the intrepid monarch to expose his person and exert his power to suppress the rising flame of rebellion [134] The public apprehensions were fortified by the strong suspicion that these tumults were not the effect of accidental passion but the result of deep and premeditated design It was generally believed that the Goths had signed the treaty of peace with an hostile and insidious spirit and that their chiefs had previously bound themselves by a solemn and secret oath never to keep faith with the Romans to maintain the fairest show of loyalty and friendship and to watch the favourable moment of rapine of conquest and of revenge But as the minds of the barbarians were not insensible to the power of gratitude several of the Gothic leaders sincerely devoted themselves to the service of the empire or at least of the emperor the whole nation was insensibly divided into two opposite factions and much sophistry was employed in conversation and dispute to compare the obligations of their first and second engagements The Goths who considered themselves as the friends of peace, of justice and of Rome were directed by the authority of Fravitta a valiant and honourable youth distinguished above the rest of his countrymen by the politeness of his manners the liberality of his sentiments and the mild virtues of social life But the more numerous faction adhered to the fierce and faithless Priulf who inflamed the passions and asserted the independence of his warlike followers On one of the solemn festivals when the chiefs of both parties were invited to the Imperial table they were insensibly heated by wine till they forgot the usual restraints of discretion and respect, and betrayed in the presence of Theodosius the fatal secret of their domestic disputes The emperor who had been the reluctant witness of this extraordinary controversy dissembled his fears and resentment and soon dismissed the tumultuous assembly Fravitta alarmed and exasperated by the insolence of his rival whose departure from the palace might have been the signal of a civil war boldly followed him and drawing his sword laid Priulf dead at his feet. Their companions flew to arms and the faithful champion of Rome would have been oppressed by superior numbers if he had not been protected by the seasonable interposition of the Imperial guards[135] Such were the scenes of barbaric rage which disgraced the palace and table of the Roman emperor, and, as the impatient Goths could only be restrained by the firm and temperate character of Theodosius, the public safety seemed to depend on the life and abilities of a single man[136]

CHAPTER XXVII

Death of Gratian Ruin of Arianism St Ambrose First Civil War, against Maximus Character, Administration, and Penance, of Theodosius Death of Valentinian II Second Civil War, against Eugenius Death of Theodosius

The fame of Gratian, before he had accomplished the twentieth year of his age, was equal to that of the most celebrated princes His gentle and amiable disposition endeared him to his private friends, the graceful affability of his manners engaged the affection of the people, the men of letters, who enjoyed the liberality, acknowledged the taste and eloquence, of their sovereign, his valour and dexterity in arms were equally applauded by the soldiers, and the clergy considered the humble piety of Gratian as the first and most useful of his virtues The victory of Colmar had delivered the West from a formidable invasion, and the grateful provinces of the East ascribed the merits of Theodosius to the author of his greatness and of the public safety Gratian survived those memorable events only four or five years, but he survived his reputation, and, before he fell a victim to rebellion, he had lost, in a great measure, the respect and confidence of the Roman world

The remarkable alteration of his character or conduct may not be imputed to the arts of flattery, which had besieged the son of Valentinian from his infancy, nor to the headstrong passion which that gentle youth appears to have escaped A more attentive view of the life of Gratian may perhaps suggest the true cause of the disappointment of the public hopes His apparent virtues, instead of being the hardy productions of experience and adversity, were the premature and artificial fruits of a royal education The anxious tenderness of his father was continually employed to bestow on him those advantages which he might perhaps esteem the more highly as he himself had been deprived of them, and the most skilful masters of every science and of every art had laboured to form the mind and body of the young prince[1] The knowledge which they painfully communicated was displayed with ostentation and celebrated with lavish praise His soft and tractable disposition received the fair impression of their judicious precepts, and the absence of passion might easily be mistaken for the strength of reason His preceptors gradually rose to the rank and consequence of ministers of state,[2] and, as they wisely dissembled their secret authority, he seemed to act with firmness, with propriety, and with judgment on the most important occasions of his life and reign But the influence of this elaborate instruction did not penetrate beyond the surface, and the skilful preceptors, who so accurately guided the steps of their royal pupil, could not infuse into his feeble and indolent character the vigorous and independent principle of action which renders the laborious pursuit of glory essentially necessary to the happiness and almost to the existence of the hero As soon as time and accident had removed those faithful counsellors from the throne, the emperor of the West insensibly descended to the level of his natural genius, abandoned the reins of government to the ambitious hands which were stretched forwards to grasp them, and amused his leisure with the most frivolous gratifications A public sale of favour and injustice was instituted, both in the court and in the provinces, by the worthless delegates of his power, whose merit it was made sacrilege to question[3] The conscience of the credulous prince was directed by saints and bishops,[4] who procured an Imperial edict to punish, as a capital offence, the violation, the neglect, or even the ignorance of the divine law[5] Among the various arts which had exercised the youth of Gratian, he had applied himself, with singular inclination and success, to manage the horse, to draw the bow, and to dart the javelin, and these qualifications, which might be useful to a soldier, were prostituted to the viler purposes of hunting Large parks were enclosed for the Imperial pleasures, and plentifully stocked with every species of wild beasts, and Gratian neglected the duties and even the dignity of his rank to consume whole days in the vain display of his dexterity and boldness in the chase The pride and wish of the Roman emperor to excel in an art in which he might be surpassed by the meanest of his slaves reminded the numerous spectators of the examples of Nero and Commodus but the chaste and temperate Gratian was a stranger to their monstrous vices and his hands were stained only with the blood of animals [6]

The behaviour of Gratian which degraded his character in the eyes of mankind could not have disturbed the security of his reign if the army had not been provoked to resent their peculiar injuries As long as the young emperor was guided by the instructions of his masters he professed himself the friend and pupil of the soldiers many of his hours were spent in the familiar conversation of the camp and the health the comforts the rewards the honours of his faithful troops appeared to be the object of his attentive concern. But after Gratian more freely indulged his prevailing taste for hunting and shooting he naturally connected himself with the most dexterous ministers of his favourite amusement A body of the Alani was received into the military and domestic service of the palace and the admirable skill which they were accustomed to display in the unbounded plains of Scythia was exercised on a more narrow theatre in the parks and enclosures of Gaul Gratian admired the talents and customs of these favourite guards to whom alone he intrusted the defence of his person and as if he meant to insult the public opinion he frequently showed himself to the soldiers and people with the dress and arms the long bow the sounding quiver and the fur garments of a Scythian warrior The unworthy spectacle of a Roman prince who had renounced the dress and manners of his country filled the minds of the legions with grief and indignation [7] Even the Germans so strong and formidable in the armies of the empire affected to disdain the strange and horrid appearance of the savages of the North who in the space of a few years had wandered from the banks of the Volga to those of the Seine A loud and licentious murmur was echoed through the camps and garrisons of the West and as the mild indolence of Gratian neglected to extinguish the first symptoms of discontent the want of love and respect was not supplied by the influence of fear But the subversion of an established government is always a work of some real and of much apparent difficulty and the throne of Gratian was protected by the sanctions of custom, law religion and the nice balance of the civil and military powers which had been established by the policy of Constantine. It is not very important to inquire from what causes the revolt of Britain was produced Accident is commonly the parent of disorder the seeds of rebellion happened to fall on a soil which was supposed to be more fruitful than any other in tyrants and usurpers [8] the legions of that sequestered island had been long famous for a spirit of presumption and arrogance [9] and the name of Maximus was proclaimed by the tumultuary but unanimous voice both of the soldiers and of the provincials The emperor or the rebel for his title was not yet ascertained by fortune was a native of Spain the countryman the fellow soldier and the rival of Theodosius, whose elevation he had not seen without some emotions of envy and resentment the events of his life had long since fixed him in Britain, and I should not be unwilling to find some evidence for the marriage which he is said to have contracted with the daughter of a wealthy lord of Caernarvonshire [10] But this provincial rank might justly be considered as a state of exile and obscurity and if Maximus had obtained any civil or military office he was not invested with the authority either of governor or general [11] His abilities and even his integrity are acknowledged by the partial writers of the age and the merit must indeed have been conspicuous that could extort such a confession in favour of the vanquished enemy of Theodosius The discontent of Maximus might incline him to censure the conduct of his sovereign and to encourage perhaps without any views of ambition the murmurs of the troops But in the midst of the tumult he artfully or modestly refused to ascend the throne and some credit appears to have been given to his own positive declaration that he was compelled to accept the dangerous present of the Imperial purple [12]

But there was danger likewise in refusing the empire and from the moment that Maximus had violated his allegiance to his lawful sovereign he could not hope to reign or even to live if he confined his moderate ambition within the narrow limits of Britain He boldly and wisely resolved to prevent the designs of Gratian the youth of the island crowded to his standard and he invaded Gaul with a fleet and army which were long afterwards remembered as the emigration of a considerable part of the British nation [13] The emperor, in his peaceful residence of Paris was alarmed by their hostile approach and the darts which he idly wasted on lions and bears might have been employed more honour-

ably against the rebels But his feeble efforts announced his degenerate spirit and desperate situation, and deprived him of the resources which he still might have found in the support of his subjects and allies The armies of Gaul, instead of opposing the march of Maximus received him with joyful and loyal acclamations, and the shame of the desertion was transferred from the people to the prince The troops whose station more immediately attached them to the service of the palace abandoned the standard of Gratian the first time that it was displayed in the neighbourhood of Paris The emperor of the West fled towards Lyons with a train of only three hundred horse, and in the cities along the road, where he hoped to find a refuge, or at least a passage, he was taught by cruel experience that every gate is shut against the unfortunate Yet he might still have reached in safety the dominions of his brother, and soon have returned with the forces of Italy, and the East, if he had not suffered himself to be fatally deceived by the perfidious governor of the Lyonnese province Gratian was amused by protestations of doubtful fidelity, and the hopes of a support which could not be effectual, till the arrival of Andragathius, the general of the cavalry of Maximus, put an end to his suspense That resolute officer executed, without remorse, the orders or the intentions of the usurper Gratian, as he rose from supper, was delivered into the hands of the assassin, and his body was denied to the pious and pressing entreaties of his brother Valentinian [14] The death of the emperor was followed by that of his powerful general Mellobaudes, the king of the Franks, who maintained to the last moment of his life the ambiguous reputation which is the just recompense of obscure and subtle policy [15] These executions might be necessary to the public safety, but the successful usurper, whose power was acknowledged by all the provinces of the West, had the merit and the satisfaction of boasting that, except those who had perished by the chance of war, his triumph was not stained by the blood of the Romans [16]

The events of this revolution had passed in such rapid succession that it would have been impossible for Theodosius to march to the relief of his benefactor before he received the intelligence of his defeat and death During the season of sincere grief or ostentatious mourning the Eastern emperor was interrupted by the arrival of the principal chamberlain of Maximus, and the choice of a venerable old man for an office which was usually exercised by eunuchs announced to the court of Constantinople the gravity and temperance of the British usurper The ambassador condescended to justify or excuse the conduct of his master, and to protest, in specious language, that the murder of Gratian had been perpetrated, without his knowledge or consent, by the precipitate zeal of the soldiers But he proceeded, in a firm and equal tone, to offer Theodosius the alternative of peace or war The speech of the ambassador concluded with a spirited declaration that, although Maximus, as a Roman and as the father of his people, would choose rather to employ his forces in the common defence of the republic, he was armed and prepared, if his friendship should be rejected, to dispute in a field of battle the empire of the world An immediate and peremptory answer was required, but it was extremely difficult for Theodosius to satisfy, on this important occasion, either the feelings of his own mind or the expectations of the public. The imperious voice of honour and gratitude called aloud for revenge. From the liberality of Gratian he had received the Imperial diadem, his patience would encourage the odious suspicion that he was more deeply sensible of former injuries than of recent obligations, and if he accepted the friendship, he must seem to share the guilt, of the assassin Even the principles of justice and the interest of society would receive a fatal blow from the impunity of Maximus, and the example of successful usurpation would tend to dissolve the artificial fabric of government, and once more to replunge the empire in the crimes and calamities of the preceding age But, as the sentiments of gratitude and honour should invariably regulate the conduct of an individual, they may be overbalanced in the mind of a sovereign by the sense of superior duties, and the maxims both of justice and humanity must permit the escape of an atrocious criminal if an innocent people would be involved in the consequences of his punishment The assassin of Gratian had usurped, but he actually possessed, the most warlike provinces of the empire, the East was exhausted by the misfortunes, and even by the success, of the Gothic war, and it was seriously to be apprehended that, after the vital strength of the republic had been wasted in a doubtful and destructive contest, the feeble conqueror would remain an easy prey to the barbarians of the north These weighty considerations engaged Theodosius to dissemble his resentment and to accept the alliance of the tyrant But he stipulated that Maximus should content himself with the possession of the countries beyond the Alps The brother of Gratian was confirmed and secured in the sovereignty of Italy Africa and the Western Illyricum and some honourable conditions were inserted in the treaty to protect the memory and the laws of the deceased emperor [17] According to the custom of the age the images of the three Imperial colleagues were exhibited to the veneration of the people nor should it be lightly supposed that in the moment of a solemn reconciliation Theodosius secretly cherished the intention of perfidy and revenge [18]

The contempt of Gratian for the Roman soldiers had exposed him to the fatal effects of their resentment His profound veneration for the Christian clergy was rewarded by the applause and gratitude of a powerful order which has claimed in every age the privilege of dispensing honours both on earth and in heaven [19] The orthodox bishops bewailed his death and their own irreparable loss but they were soon comforted by the discovery that Gratian had committed the sceptre of the East to the hands of a prince whose humble faith and fervent zeal were supported by the spirit and abilities of a more vigorous character Among the benefactors of the church the fame of Constantine has been rivalled by the glory of Theodosius If Constantine had the advantage of erecting the standard of the cross the emulation of his successor assumed the merit of subduing the Arian heresy and of abolishing the worship of idols in the Roman world Theodosius was the first of the emperors baptised in the true faith of the Trinity Although he was born of a Christian family the maxims or at least the practice of the age encouraged him to delay the ceremony of his initiation till he was admonished of the danger of delay by the serious illness which threatened his life towards the end of the first year of his reign Before he again took the field against the Goths he received the sacrament of baptism[20] from Acholius the orthodox bishop of Thessalonica [21] and as the emperor ascended from the holy font still glowing with the warm feelings of regeneration he dictated a solemn edict which proclaimed his own faith and prescribed the religion of his subjects It is our pleasure (such is the Imperial style) that all the nations which are governed by our clemency and moderation should steadfastly adhere to the religion which was taught by St Peter to the Romans, which faithful tradition has preserved and which is now professed by the pontiff Damasus and by Peter bishop of Alexandria a man of apostolic holiness According to the discipline of the apostles and the doctrine of the Gospel, let us believe the sole deity of the Father the Son and the Holy Ghost under an equal majesty and a pious Trinity We authorise the followers of this doctrine to assume the title of Catholic Christians and as we judge that all others are extravagant madmen we brand them with the infamous name of Heretics and declare that their conventicles shall no longer usurp the respectable appellation of churches Besides the condemnation of Divine justice they must expect to suffer the severe penalties which our authority guided by heavenly wisdom shall think proper to inflict upon them [22] The faith of a soldier is commonly the fruit of instruction, rather than of inquiry but as the emperor always fixed his eyes on the visible landmarks of orthodoxy which he had so prudently constituted his religious opinions were never affected by the specious texts the subtle arguments, and the ambiguous creeds of the Arian doctors. Once indeed he expressed a faint inclination to converse with the eloquent and learned Eunomius who lived in retirement at a small distance from Constantinople But the dangerous interview was prevented by the prayers of the empress Flacilla who trembled for the salvation of her husband and the mind of Theodosius was confirmed by a theological argument adapted to the rudest capacity He had lately bestowed on his eldest son Arcadius the name and honours of Augustus and the two princes were seated on a stately throne to receive the homage of their subjects A bishop Amphilochius of Iconium approached the throne and after saluting with due reverence the person of his sovereign he accosted the royal youth with the same familiar tenderness which he might have used towards a plebeian child Provoked by this insolent behaviour the monarch gave orders that the rustic priest should be instantly driven from his presence But while the guards were forcing him to the door the dexterous polemic had time to execute his design by exclaiming with a loud voice Such is the treatment O emperor! which the King of heaven has prepared for those impious men who affect to worship the Father but refuse to acknowledge the equal majesty of his divine Son. Theodosius immediately embraced the bishop of Iconium, and never forgot the important lesson which he received from this dramatic parable [23]

Constantinople was the principal seat and fortress of Arianism and in a long interval of forty years [24] the faith of the princes and prelates who reigned in the capital of the East was rejected in the purer schools of Rome and Alexandria The archiepiscopal throne of Macedonius, which had been polluted with so much Christian blood, was successively filled by Eudoxus and Damophilus Their diocese enjoyed a free importation of vice and error from every province of the empire, the eager pursuit of religious controversy afforded a new occupation to the busy idleness of the metropolis and we may credit the assertion of an intelligent observer, who describes, with some pleasantry, the effects of their loquacious zeal "This city," says he, "is full of mechanics and slaves, who are all of them profound theologians, and preach in the shops and in the streets If you desire a man to change a piece of silver, he informs you wherein the Son differs from the Father, if you ask the price of a loaf, you are told, by way of reply, that the Son is inferior to the Father, and if you inquire whether the bath is ready, the answer is, that the Son was made out of nothing "[25] The heretics, of various denominations, subsisted in peace under the protection of the Arians of Constantinople, who endeavoured to secure the attachment of those obscure sectaries, while they abused, with unrelenting severity, the victory which they had obtained over the followers of the council of Nice During the partial reigns of Constantius and Valens, the feeble remnant of the Homoousians was deprived of the public and private exercise of their religion, and it has been observed, in pathetic language, that the scattered flock was left without a shepherd to wander on the mountains, or to be devoured by rapacious wolves [26] But as their zeal, instead of being subdued, derived strength and vigour from oppression, they seized the first moments of imperfect freedom, which they acquired by the death of Valens, to form themselves into a regular congregation, under the conduct of an episcopal pastor Two natives of Cappadocia, Basil and Gregory Nazianzen,[27] were distinguished above all their contemporaries[28] by the rare union of profane eloquence and of orthodox piety These orators, who might sometimes be compared, by themselves and by the public, to the most celebrated of the ancient Greeks, were united by the ties of the strictest friendship They had cultivated, with equal ardour, the same liberal studies in the schools of Athens, they had retired, with equal devotion, to the same solitude in the deserts of Pontus, and every spark of emulation or envy appeared to be totally extinguished in the holy and ingenuous breasts of Gregory and Basil But the exaltation of Basil, from a private life to the archiepiscopal throne of Cæsarea, discovered to the world, and perhaps to himself, the pride of his character, and the first favour which he condescended to bestow on his friend was received, and perhaps was intended, as a cruel insult [29] Instead of employing the superior talents of Gregory in some useful and conspicuous station, the haughty prelate selected, among the fifty bishoprics of his extensive province, the wretched village of Sasima,[30] without water, without verdure, without society, situate at the junction of three highways and frequented only by the incessant passage of rude and clamorous waggoners Gregory submitted with reluctance to this humiliating exile he was ordained bishop of Sasima, but he solemnly protests that he never consummated his spiritual marriage with this disgusting bride He afterwards consented to undertake the government of his native church of Nazianzus,[31] of which his father had been bishop above five-and-forty years But as he was still conscious that he deserved another audience and another theatre, he accepted, with no unworthy ambition, the honourable invitation which was addressed to him from the orthodox party of Constantinople On his arrival in the capital, Gregory was entertained in the house of a pious and charitable kinsman, the most spacious room was consecrated to the uses of religious worship, and the name of Anastasia was chosen to express the resurrection of the Nicene faith This private conventicle was afterwards converted into a magnificent church, and the credulity of the succeeding age was prepared to believe the miracles and visions which attested the presence, or at least the protection, of the Mother of God [32] The pulpit of the Anastasia was the scene of the labours and triumphs of Gregory Nazianzen, and in the space of two years he experienced all the spiritual adventures which constitute the prosperous or adverse fortunes of a missionary [33] The Arians, who were provoked by the boldness of his enterprise, represented his doctrine as if he had preached three distinct and equal Deities, and the devout populace was excited to suppress, by violence and tumult, the irregular assemblies of the Athanasian heretics From the cathedral of St Sophia there issued a motley crowd "of common beggars, who had forfeited their claim to pity, of monks, who had the appearance of goats or satyrs, and of women, more terrible than so many Jezebels " The doors of the Anastasia were broke open, much mischief was perpetrated, or attempted, with sticks, stones, and firebrands, and as a man lost his life in the affray Gregory, who was summoned the next morning before the magistrate had the satisfaction of supposing that he publicly confessed the name of Christ After he was delivered from the fear and danger of a foreign enemy his infant church was disgraced and distracted by intestine faction A stranger who assumed the name of Maximus[34] and the cloak of a Cynic philosopher insinuated himself into the confidence of Gregory deceived and abused his favourable opinion, and forming a secret connection with some bishops of Egypt attempted by a clandestine ordination to supplant his patron in the episcopal seat of Constantinople These mortifications might sometimes tempt the Cappadocian missionary to regret his obscure solitude But his fatigues were rewarded by the daily increase of his fame and his congregation and he enjoyed the pleasure of observing that the greater part of his numerous audience retired from his sermons satisfied with the eloquence of the preacher[35] or dissatisfied with the manifold imperfections of their faith and practice[36]

The catholics of Constantinople were animated with joyful confidence by the baptism and edict of Theodosius and they impatiently waited the effects of his gracious promise Their hopes were speedily accomplished and the emperor as soon as he had finished the operations of the campaign made his public entry into the capital at the head of a victorious army The next day after his arrival he summoned Damophilus to his presence and offered that Arian prelate the hard alternative of subscribing the Nicene creed or of instantly resigning to the orthodox believers the use and possession of the episcopal palace the cathedral of St Sophia and all the churches of Constantinople The zeal of Damophilus which in a catholic saint would have been justly applauded embraced without hesitation a life of poverty and exile[37] and his removal was immediately followed by the purification of the Imperial City The Arians might complain with some appearance of justice that an inconsiderable congregation of sectaries should usurp the hundred churches which they were insufficient to fill whilst the far greater part of the people was cruelly excluded from every place of religious worship Theodosius was still inexorable but as the angels who protected the catholic cause were only visible to the eyes of faith, he prudently reinforced those heavenly legions with the more effectual aid of temporal and carnal weapons and the church of St Sophia was occupied by a large body of the Imperial guards If the mind of Gregory was susceptible of pride, he must have felt a very lively satisfaction when the emperor conducted him through the streets in solemn triumph and with his own hand respectfully placed him on the archiepiscopal throne of Constantinople But the saint (who had not subdued the imperfections of human virtue) was deeply affected by the mortifying consideration that his entrance into the fold was that of a wolf rather than of a shepherd that the glittering arms which surrounded his person were necessary for his safety and that he alone was the object of the imprecations of a great party whom as men and citizens it was impossible for him to despise He beheld the innumerable multitude of either sex and of every age, who crowded the streets, the windows and the roofs of the houses he heard the tumultuous voice of rage grief, astonishment and despair and Gregory fairly confesses that on the memorable day of his installation the capital of the East wore the appearance of a city taken by storm, and in the hands of a barbarian conqueror[38] About six weeks afterwards Theodosius declared his resolution of expelling from all the churches of his dominions the bishops and their clergy who should obstinately refuse to believe or at least to profess the doctrine of the council of Nice His lieutenant Sapor was armed with the ample powers of a general law a special commission and a military force[39] and this ecclesiastical revolution was conducted with so much discretion and vigour that the religion of the emperor was established without tumult or bloodshed in all the provinces of the East. The writings of the Arians if they had been permitted to exist,[40] would perhaps contain the lamentable story of the persecution which afflicted the church under the reign of the impious Theodosius and the sufferings of their holy confessors might claim the pity of the disinterested reader Yet there is reason to imagine that the violence of zeal and revenge was in some measure eluded by the want of resistance and that, in their adversity the Arians displayed much less firmness than had been exerted by the orthodox party under the reigns of Constantius and Valens The moral character and conduct of the hostile sects appear to have been governed by the same common principles of nature and religion but a very material circumstance may be discovered which tended to distinguish the degrees of their theological faith. Both parties in the schools as well as in the temples, acknowledged and worshipped the divine majesty of Christ and as we are always prone to im-

pute our own sentiments and passions to the Deity, it would be deemed more prudent and respectful to exaggerate than to circumscribe the adorable perfections of the Son of God The disciple of Athanasius exulted in the proud confidence that he had entitled himself to the divine favour, while the follower of Arius must have been tormented by the secret apprehension that he was guilty perhaps of an unpardonable offence by the scanty praise and parsimonious honours which he bestowed on the Judge of the World The opinions of Arianism might satisfy a cold and speculative mind, but the doctrine of the Nicene Creed, most powerfully recommended by the merits of faith and devotion, was much better adapted to become popular and successful in a believing age

The hope that truth and wisdom would be found in the assemblies of the orthodox clergy induced the emperor to convene, at Constantinople, a synod of one hundred and fifty bishops, who proceeded, without much difficulty or delay, to complete the theological system which had been established in the council of Nice The vehement disputes of the fourth century had been chiefly employed on the nature of the Son of God, and the various opinions which were embraced concerning the Second, were extended and transferred, by a natural analogy, to the Third person of the Trinity [41] Yet it was found, or it was thought, necessary, by the victorious adversaries of Arianism, to explain the ambiguous language of some respectable doctors, to confirm the faith of the catholics, and to condemn an unpopular and inconsistent sect of Macedonians, who freely admitted that the Son was consubstantial to the Father, while they were fearful of seeming to acknowledge the existence of Three Gods A final and unanimous sentence was pronounced to ratify the equal Deity of the Holy Ghost the mysterious doctrine has been received by all the nations, and all the churches, of the Christian world, and their grateful reverence has assigned to the bishops of Theodosius the second rank among the general councils [42] Their knowledge of religious truth may have been preserved by tradition, or it may have been communicated by inspiration, but the sober evidence of history will not allow much weight to the personal authority of the Fathers of Constantinople In an age when the ecclesiastics had scandalously degenerated from the model of apostolical purity, the most worthless and corrupt were always the most eager to frequent and disturb the episcopal assemblies The conflict and fermentation of so many opposite interests and tempers inflamed the passions of the bishops and their ruling passions were, the love of gold and the love of dispute Many of the same prelates who now applauded the orthodox piety of Theodosius had repeatedly changed, with prudent flexibility, their creeds and opinions, and in the various revolutions of the church and state, the religion of their sovereign was the rule of their obsequious faith When the emperor suspended his prevailing influence, the turbulent synod was blindly impelled by the absurd or selfish motives of pride, hatred, and resentment The death of Meletius, which happened at the council of Constantinople, presented the most favourable opportunity of terminating the schism of Antioch, by suffering his aged rival, Paulinus, peaceably to end his days in the episcopal chair The faith and virtues of Paulinus were unblemished But his cause was supported by the Western churches, and the bishops of the synod resolved to perpetuate the mischiefs of discord, by the hasty ordination of a perjured candidate,[43] rather than to betray the imagined dignity of the East, which had been illustrated by the birth and death of the Son of God Such unjust and disorderly proceedings forced the gravest members of the assembly to dissent and to secede, and the clamorous majority, which remained masters of the field of battle, could be compared only to wasps or magpies, to a flight of cranes, or to a flock of geese [44]

A suspicion may possibly arise that so unfavourable a picture of ecclesiastical synods has been drawn by the partial hand of some obstinate heretic or some malicious infidel But the name of the sincere historian who has conveyed this instructive lesson to the knowledge of posterity must silence the impotent murmurs of superstition and bigotry He was one of the most pious and eloquent bishops of the age, a saint, and a doctor of the church, the scourge of Arianism, and the pillar of the orthodox faith, a distinguished member of the council of Constantinople, in which, after the death of Meletius, he exercised the functions of president in a word—Gregory Nazianzen himself The harsh and ungenerous treatment which he experienced,[45] instead of derogating from the truth of his evidence, affords an additional proof of the spirit which actuated the deliberations of the synod Their unanimous suffrage had confirmed the pretensions which the bishop of Constantinople derived from the choice of the people and the approbation of the emperor But Gregory soon became the victim of malice and en

The bishops of the East his strenuous adherents provoked by his moderation in the affairs of Antioch abandoned him without support to the adverse faction of the Egyptians who disputed the validity of his election and rigorously asserted the obsolete canon that prohibited the licentious practice of episcopal translations The pride or the humility of Gregory prompted him to decline a contest which might have been imputed to ambition and avarice and he publicly offered not without some mixture of indignation to renounce the government of a church which had been restored and almost created by his labours His resignation was accepted by the synod and by the emperor with more readiness than he seems to have expected At the time when he might have hoped to enjoy the fruits of his victory his episcopal throne was filled by the senator Nectarius and the new archbishop accidentally recommended by his easy temper and venerable aspect was obliged to delay the ceremony of his consecration till he had previously despatched the rites of his baptism [46] After this remarkable experience of the ingratitude of princes and prelates Gregory retired once more to his obscure solitude of Cappadocia, where he employed the remainder of his life, about eight years in the exercises of poetry and devotion The title of Saint has been added to his name but the tenderness of his heart [47] and the elegance of his genius reflect a more pleasing lustre on the memory of Gregory Nazianzen.

It was not enough that Theodosius had suppressed the insolent reign of Arianism or that he had abundantly revenged the injuries which the catholics sustained from the zeal of Constantius and Valens The orthodox emperor considered every heretic as a rebel against the supreme powers of heaven and of earth and each of these powers might exercise their peculiar jurisdiction over the soul and body of the guilty The decrees of the council of Constantinople had ascertained the true standard of the faith and the ecclesiastics who governed the conscience of Theodosius suggested the most effectual methods of persecution In the space of fifteen years he promulgated at least fifteen severe edicts against the heretics [48] more especially against those who rejected the doctrine of the Trinity and to deprive them of every hope of escape he sternly enacted that if any laws or rescripts should be alleged in their favour the judges should consider them as the illegal productions either of fraud or forgery The penal statutes were directed against the ministers the assemblies and the persons of the heretics and the passions of the legislator were expressed in the language of declamation and invective. I The heretical teachers who usurped the sacred titles of Bishops or Presbyters were not only excluded from the privileges and emoluments so liberally granted to the orthodox clergy but they were exposed to the heavy penalties of exile and confiscation if they presumed to preach the doctrine or to practise the rites, of their accursed sects A fine of ten pounds of gold (above four hundred pounds sterling) was imposed on every person who should dare to confer or receive or promote an heretical ordination and it was reasonably expected that if the race of pastors could be extinguished their helpless flocks would be compelled by ignorance and hunger to return within the pale of the Catholic church II The rigorous prohibition of conventicles was carefully extended to every possible circumstance in which the heretics could assemble with the intention of worshipping God and Christ according to the dictates of their conscience Their religious meetings, whether public or secret by day or by night, in cities or in the country were equally proscribed by the edicts of Theodosius and the building or ground which had been used for that illegal purpose was forfeited to the Imperial domain III It was supposed that the error of the heretics could proceed only from the obstinate temper of their minds and that such a temper was a fit object of censure and punishment. The anathemas of the church were fortified by a sort of civil excommunication which separated them from their fellow-citizens by a peculiar brand of infamy and this declaration of the supreme magistrate tended to justify or at least to excuse the insults of a fanatic populace The sectaries were gradually disqualified for the possession of honourable or lucrative employments and Theodosius was satisfied with his own justice when he decreed that as the Eunomians distinguished the nature of the Son from that of the Father they should be incapable of making their wills or of receiving any advantage from testamentary donations The guilt of the Manichæan heresy was esteemed of such magnitude that it could be expiated only by the death of the offender and the same capital punishment was inflicted on the Audians or Quartodecimans [49] who should dare to perpetrate the atrocious crime of celebrating on an improper day the festival of Easter Every Roman might exercise the right of public accusation but the office of Inquisitors of the Faith a name so deservedly abhorred, was first instituted under the reign of Theodosius Yet we are assured that the execution of his penal edicts was seldom enforced, and that the pious emperor appeared less desirous to punish than to reclaim or terrify his refractory subjects [50]

The theory of persecution was established by Theodosius, whose justice and piety have been applauded by the saints, but the practice of it, in the fullest extent, was reserved for his rival and colleague, Maximus, the first among the Christian princes who shed the blood of his Christian subjects on account of their religious opinions The cause of the Priscillianists,[51] a recent sect of heretics who disturbed the provinces of Spain, was transferred, by appeal, from the synod of Bordeaux to the Imperial consistory of Treves, and by the sentence of the Prætorian præfect, seven persons were tortured, condemned, and executed The first of these was Priscillian[52] himself, bishop of Avila,[53] in Spain, who adorned the advantages of birth and fortune by the accomplishments of eloquence and learning Two presbyters and two deacons accompanied their beloved master in his death, which they esteemed as a glorious martyrdom, and the number of religious victims was completed by the execution of Latronian, a poet, who rivalled the fame of the ancients, and of Euchrocia, a noble matron of Bordeaux, the widow of the orator Delphidius [54] Two bishops, who had embraced the sentiments of Priscillian, were condemned to a distant and dreary exile,[55] and some indulgence was shown to the meaner criminals who assumed the merit of an early repentance If any credit could be allowed to confessions extorted by fear or pain, and to vague reports, the offspring of malice and credulity, the heresy of the Priscillianists would be found to include the various abominations of magic, of impiety, and of lewdness [56] Priscillian, who wandered about the world in the company of his spiritual sisters, was accused of praying stark naked in the midst of the congregation, and it was confidently asserted, that the effects of his criminal intercourse with the daughter of Euchrocia had been suppressed by means still more odious and criminal But an accurate, or rather a candid inquiry, will discover that, if the Priscillianists violated the laws of nature, it was not by the licentiousness, but by the austerity of their lives They absolutely condemned the use of the marriage bed, and the peace of families was often disturbed by indiscreet separations They enjoined, or recommended, a total abstinence from all animal food, and their continual prayers, fasts, and vigils, inculcated a rule of strict and perfect devotion The speculative tenets of the sect, concerning the person of Christ and the nature of the human soul, were derived from the Gnostic and Manichæan system, and this vain philosophy, which had been transported from Egypt to Spain, was ill adapted to the grosser spirits of the West The obscure disciples of Priscillian suffered, languished, and gradually disappeared his tenets were rejected by the clergy and people, but his death was the subject of a long and vehement controversy, while some arraigned, and others applauded, the justice of his sentence It is with pleasure that we can observe the humane inconsistency of the most illustrious saints and bishops, Ambrose of Milan[57] and Martin of Tours,[58] who, on this occasion, asserted the cause of toleration They pitied the unhappy men who had been executed at Trèves, they refused to hold communion with their episcopal murderers, and if Martin deviated from that generous resolution, his motives were laudable, and his repentance was exemplary The bishops of Tours and Milan pronounced, without hesitation, the eternal damnation of heretics, but they were surprised and shocked by the bloody image of their temporal death, and the honest feelings of nature resisted the artificial prejudices of theology The humanity of Ambrose and Martin was confirmed by the scandalous irregularity of the proceedings against Priscillian and his adherents The civil and ecclesiastical ministers had transgressed the limits of their respective provinces The secular judge had presumed to receive an appeal, and to pronounce a definitive sentence, in a matter of faith and episcopal jurisdiction The bishops had disgraced themselves by exercising the functions of accusers in a criminal prosecution The cruelty of Ithacius,[59] who beheld the tortures, and solicited the death of the heretics, provoked the just indignation of mankind, and the vices of that profligate bishop were admitted as a proof that his zeal was instigated by the sordid motives of interest Since the death of Priscillian, the rude attempts of persecution have been refined and methodised in the holy office, which assigns their distinct parts to the ecclesiastical and secular powers The devoted victim is regularly delivered by the priest to the magistrate, and by the magistrate to the executioner, and the inexorable sentence of the church, which declares the spiritual guilt of the offender, is expressed in the mild language of pity and intercession

reign of Theodosius Gregory Nazianzen was distinguished by the talents of an eloquent preacher the reputation of miraculous gifts added weight and dignity to the monastic virtues of Martin of Tours [60] but the palm of episcopal vigour and ability was justly claimed by the intrepid Ambrose [61] He was descended from a noble family of Romans his father had exercised the important office of Prætorian præfect of Gaul and the son after passing through the studies of a liberal education attained in the regular gradation of civil honours the station of consular of Liguria a province which included the Imperial residence of Milan At the age of thirty four and before he had received the sacrament of baptism Ambrose to his own surprise and to that of the world was suddenly transformed from a governor to an archbishop Without the least mixture as it is said of art or intrigue the whole body of the people unanimously saluted him with the episcopal title the concord and perseverance of their acclamations were ascribed to a preternatural impulse and the reluctant magistrate was compelled to undertake a spiritual office for which he was not prepared by the habits and occupations of his former life But the active force of his genius soon qualified him to exercise with zeal and prudence the duties of his ecclesiastical jurisdiction and while he cheerfully renounced the vain and splendid trappings of temporal greatness he condescended for the good of the church to direct the conscience of the emperors and to control the administration of the empire Gratian loved and revered him as a father and the elaborate treatise on the faith of the Trinity was designed for the instruction of the young prince After his tragic death at a time when the empress Justina trembled for her own safety and for that of her son Valentinian the archbishop of Milan was despatched on two different embassies to the court of Trèves He exercised with equal firmness and dexterity the powers of his spiritual and political characters and perhaps contributed by his authority and eloquence to check the ambition of Maximus and to protect the peace of Italy [62] Ambrose had devoted his life and his abilities to the service of the church. Wealth was the object of his contempt he had renounced his private patrimony and he sold without hesitation the consecrated plate for the redemption of captives The clergy and people of Milan were attached to their archbishop and he deserved the esteem, without soliciting the favour or apprehending the displeasure of his feeble sovereigns

The government of Italy and of the young emperor naturally devolved to his mother Justina a woman of beauty and spirit but who in the midst of an orthodox people had the misfortune of professing the Arian heresy which she endeavoured to instil into the mind of her son Justina was persuaded that a Roman emperor might claim in his own dominions, the public exercise of his religion and she proposed to the archbishop as a moderate and reasonable concession that he should resign the use of a single church either in the city or suburbs of Milan But the conduct of Ambrose was governed by very different principles [63] The palaces of the earth might indeed belong to Cæsar but the churches were houses of God and within the limits of his diocese he himself as the lawful successor of the apostles was the only minister of God The privileges of Christianity temporal as well as spiritual were confined to the true believers and the mind of Ambrose was satisfied that his own theological opinions were the standard of truth and orthodoxy The archbishop who refused to hold any conference or negotiation with the instruments of Satan declared with modest firmness his resolution to die a martyr rather than to yield to the impious sacrilege and Justina who resented the refusal as an act of insolence and rebellion hastily determined to exert the Imperial prerogative of her son As she desired to perform her public devotions on the approaching festival of Easter Ambrose was ordered to appear before the council He obeyed the summons with the respect of a faithful subject but he was followed, without his consent by an innumerable people they pressed with impetuous zeal against the gates of the palace and the affrighted ministers of Valentinian instead of pronouncing a sentence of exile on the archbishop of Milan humbly requested that he would interpose his authority to protect the person of the emperor and to restore the tranquillity of the capital But the promises which Ambrose received and communicated were soon violated by a perfidious court and during six of the most solemn days which Christian piety has set apart for the exercise of religion the city was agitated by the irregular convulsions of tumult and fanaticism The officers of the household were directed to prepare first the Portian and afterwards the new Basilica for the immediate reception of the emperor and his mother The splendid canopy and hangings of the royal seat were arranged in the customary manner but it was found necessary to defend them by a strong guard from the insults of the populace The Arian ecclesiastics who ventured to show themselves in the streets were exposed to the most imminent danger of their lives, and Ambrose enjoyed the merit and reputation of rescuing his personal enemies from the hands of the enraged multitude

But while he laboured to restrain the effects of their zeal, the pathetic vehemence of his sermons continually inflamed the angry and seditious temper of the people of Milan The characters of Eve, of the wife of Job, of Jezebel, of Herodias, were indecently applied to the mother of the emperor, and her desire to obtain a church for the Arians was compared to the most cruel persecutions which Christianity had endured under the reign of Paganism The measures of the court served only to expose the magnitude of the evil A fine of two hundred pounds of gold was imposed on the corporate body of merchants and manufacturers an order was signified, in the name of the emperor, to all the officers and inferior servants of the courts of justice, that, during the continuance of the public disorders, they should strictly confine themselves to their houses and the ministers of Valentinian imprudently confessed that the most respectable part of the citizens of Milan was attached to the cause of their archbishop He was again solicited to restore peace to his country, by a timely compliance with the will of his sovereign The reply of Ambrose was couched in the most humble and respectful terms, which might, however, be interpreted as a serious declaration of civil war "His life and fortune were in the hands of the emperor, but he would never betray the church of Christ, or degrade the dignity of the episcopal character In such a cause he was prepared to suffer whatever the malice of the dæman could inflict, and he only wished to die in the presence of his faithful flock, and at the foot of the altar, he had not contributed to excite, but it was in the power of God alone to appease, the rage of the people he deprecated the scenes of blood and confusion which were likely to ensue, and it was his fervent prayer that he might not survive to behold the ruin of a flourishing city, and perhaps the desolation of all Italy "[64] The obstinate bigotry of Justina would have endangered the empire of her son, if, in this contest with the church and people of Milan, she could have depended on the active obedience of the troops of the palace A large body of Goths had marched to occupy the Basilica, which was the object of the dispute and it might be expected from the Arian principles and barbarous manners of these foreign mercenaries, that they would not entertain any scruples in the execution of the most sanguinary orders They were encountered on the sacred threshold by the archbishop, who, thundering against them a sentence of excommunication, asked them, in the tone of a father and a master, Whether it was to invade the house of God that they had implored the hospitable protection of the republic? The suspense of the barbarians allowed some hours for a more effectual negotiation, and the empress was persuaded by the advice of her wisest counsellors to leave the catholics in possession of all the churches of Milan, and to dissemble, till a more convenient season, her intentions of revenge The mother of Valentinian could never forgive the triumph of Ambrose, and the royal youth uttered a passionate exclamation, that his own servants were ready to betray him into the hands of an insolent priest

The laws of the empire, some of which were inscribed with the name of Valentinian, still condemned the Arian heresy, and seemed to excuse the resistance of the catholics By the influence of Justina, an edict of toleration was promulgated in all the provinces which were subject to the court of Milan, the free exercise of their religion was granted to those who professed the faith of Rimini, and the emperor declared that all persons who should infringe this sacred and salutary constitution should be capitally punished, as the enemies of the public peace [65] The character and language of the archbishop of Milan may justify the suspicion that his conduct soon afforded a reasonable ground, or at least a specious pretence, to the Arian ministers, who watched the opportunity of surprising him in some act of disobedience to a law which he strangely represents as a law of blood and tyranny A sentence of easy and honourable banishment was pronounced, which enjoined Ambrose to depart from Milan without delay, whilst it permitted him to choose the place of his exile and the number of his companions But the authority of the saints, who have preached and practised the maxims of passive loyalty, appeared to Ambrose of less moment than the extreme and pressing danger of the church He boldly refused to obey, and his refusal was supported by the unanimous consent of his faithful people [66] They guarded by turns the person of their archbishop, the gates of the cathedral and the episcopal palace were strongly secured, and the Imperial troops, who had formed the blockade, were unwilling to risk the attack of that impregnable fortress The numerous poor who had been relieved by the liberality of Ambrose, embraced the fair occasion of signalising their zeal and gratitude and as the patience of the multitude might have been exhausted by the length and uniformity of nocturnal vigils he prudently introduced into the church of Milan the useful institution of a loud and regular psalmody While he maintained this arduous contest he was instructed by a dream to open the earth in a place where the remains of two martyrs Gervasius and Protasius [67] had been deposited above three hundred years Immediately under the pavement of the church two perfect skeletons were found [68] with the heads separated from their bodies and a plentiful effusion of blood The holy relics were presented in solemn pomp to the veneration of the people and every circumstance of this fortunate discovery was admirably adapted to promote the designs of Ambrose The bones of the martyrs their blood their garments were supposed to contain a healing power and the preternatural influence was communicated to the most distant objects without losing any part of its original virtue The extraordinary cure of a blind man [69] and the reluctant confessions of several dæmoniacs appeared to justify the faith and sanctity of Ambrose and the truth of those miracles is attested by Ambrose himself by his secretary Paulinus and by his proselyte the celebrated Augustin who at that time professed the art of rhetoric in Milan The reason of the present age may possibly approve the incredulity of Justina and her Arian court who derided the theatrical representations which were exhibited by the contrivance and at the expense of the archbishop [70] Their effect however on the minds of the people was rapid and irresistible and the feeble sovereign of Italy found himself unable to contend with the favourite of Heaven The powers likewise of the earth interposed in the defence of Ambrose the disinterested advice of Theodosius was the genuine result of piety and friendship and the mask of religious zeal concealed the hostile and ambitious designs of the tyrant of Gaul [71]

The reign of Maximus might have ended in peace and prosperity could he have contented himself with the possession of three ample countries which now constitute the three most flourishing kingdoms of modern Europe But the aspiring usurper whose sordid ambition was not dignified by the love of glory and of arms considered his actual forces as the instruments only of his future greatness and his success was the immediate cause of his destruction. The wealth which he extorted [72] from the oppressed provinces of Gaul Spain and Britain was employed in levying and maintaining a formidable army of barbarians collected for the most part from the fiercest nations of Germany, The conquest of Italy was the object of his hopes and preparations and he secretly meditated the ruin of an innocent youth, whose government was abhorred and despised by his catholic subjects. But as Maximus wished to occupy without resistance the passes of the Alps he received with perfidious smiles Domninus of Syria, the ambassador of Valentinian and pressed him to accept the aid of a considerable body of troops for the service of a Pannonian war The penetration of Ambrose had discovered the snares of an enemy under the professions of friendship [73] but the Syrian Domninus was corrupted or deceived by the liberal favour of the court of Trèves and the council of Milan obstinately rejected the suspicion of danger with a blind confidence which was the effect not of courage but of fear The march of the auxiliaries was guided by the ambassador and they were admitted without distrust into the fortresses of the Alps. But the crafty tyrant followed with hasty and silent footsteps in the rear and as he diligently intercepted all intelligence of his motions, the gleam of armour and the dust excited by the troops of cavalry first announced the hostile approach of a stranger to the gates of Milan. In this extremity Justina and her son might accuse their own imprudence and the perfidious arts of Maximus but they wanted time and force and resolution to stand against the Gauls and Germans either in the field or within the walls of a large and disaffected city Flight was their only hope Aquileia their only refuge and as Maximus now displayed his genuine character the brother of Gratian might expect the same fate from the hands of the same assassin. Maximus entered Milan in triumph and if the wise archbishop refused a dangerous and criminal connection with the usurper, he might indirectly contribute to the success of his arms by inculcating from the pulpit the duty of resignation rather than that of resistance [74] The unfortunate Justina reached Aquileia in safety but she distrusted the strength of the fortifications she dreaded the event of a siege and she resolved to implore the protection of the great Theodosius, whose power and virtue were celebrated in all the countries of the West A vessel was secretly provided to transport the Imperial family they embarked with precipitation in one of the obscure harbours of Venetia or Istria traversed the whole extent of the Hadriatic and Ionian seas, turned the extreme promontory of Peloponnesus, and, after a long but successful navigation, reposed themselves in the port of Thessalonica. All the subjects of Valentinian deserted the cause of a prince who, by his abdication, had absolved them from the duty of allegiance, and if the little city of Æmona, on the verge of Italy, had not presumed to stop the career of his inglorious victory, Maximus would have obtained without a struggle the sole possession of the Western empire.

Instead of inviting his royal guests to the palace of Constantinople, Theodosius had some unknown reasons to fix their residence at Thessalonica, but these reasons did not proceed from contempt or indifference, as he speedily made a visit to that city, accompanied by the greatest part of his court and senate. After the first tender expressions of friendship and sympathy, the pious emperor of the East gently admonished Justina that the guilt of heresy was sometimes punished in this world as well as in the next, and that the public profession of the Nicene faith would be the most efficacious step to promote the restoration of her son, by the satisfaction which it must occasion both on earth and in heaven. The momentous question of peace or war was referred by Theodosius to the deliberation of his council, and the arguments which might be alleged on the side of honour and justice had acquired, since the death of Gratian, a considerable degree of additional weight. The persecution of the Imperial family, to which Theodosius himself had been indebted for his fortune, was now aggravated by recent and repeated injuries. Neither oaths nor treaties could restrain the boundless ambition of Maximus, and the delay of vigorous and decisive measures, instead of prolonging the blessings of peace, would expose the Eastern empire to the danger of an hostile invasion. The barbarians who had passed the Danube had lately assumed the character of soldiers and subjects, but their native fierceness was yet untamed, and the operations of a war, which would exercise their valour and diminish their numbers, might tend to relieve the provinces from an intolerable oppression. Notwithstanding these specious and solid reasons, which were approved by a majority of the council, Theodosius still hesitated whether he should draw the sword in a contest which could no longer admit any terms of reconciliation, and his magnanimous character was not disgraced by the apprehensions which he felt for the safety of his infant sons, and the welfare of his exhausted people. In this moment of anxious doubt, while the fate of the Roman world depended on the resolution of a single man, the charms of the princess Galla most powerfully pleaded the cause of her brother Valentinian.[75] The heart of Theodosius was softened by the tears of beauty, his affections were insensibly engaged by the graces of youth and innocence, the art of Justina managed and directed the impulse of passion, and the celebration of the royal nuptials was the assurance and signal of the civil war. The unfeeling critics, who consider every amorous weakness as an indelible stain on the memory of a great and orthodox emperor, are inclined on this occasion to dispute the suspicious evidence of the historian Zosimus. For my own part, I shall frankly confess that I am willing to find, or even to seek, in the revolutions of the world some traces of the mild and tender sentiments of domestic life, and amidst the crowd of fierce and ambitious conquerors, I can distinguish, with peculiar complacency, a gentle hero who may be supposed to receive his armour from the hands of love. The alliance of the Persian king was secured by the faith of treaties, the martial barbarians were persuaded to follow the standard or to respect the frontiers of an active and liberal monarch, and the dominions of Theodosius, from the Euphrates to the Hadriatic, resounded with the preparations of war both by land and sea. The skilful disposition of the forces of the East seemed to multiply their numbers, and distracted the attention of Maximus. He had reason to fear that a chosen body of troops, under the command of the intrepid Arbogastes, would direct their march along the banks of the Danube, and boldly penetrate through the Rhætian provinces into the centre of Gaul. A powerful fleet was equipped in the harbours of Greece and Epirus, with an apparent design that, as soon as the passage had been opened by a naval victory, Valentinian and his mother should land in Italy, proceed without delay to Rome, and occupy the majestic seat of religion and empire. In the meanwhile Theodosius himself advanced, at the head of a brave and disciplined army, to encounter his unworthy rival, who, after the siege of Æmona, had fixed his camp in the neighbourhood of Siscia, a city of Pannonia, strongly fortified by the broad and rapid stream of the Save.

The veterans, who still remembered the long resistance, and successive resources, of the tyrant Magnentius, might prepare themselves for the labours of three bloody campaigns. But the contest with his successor who like him had usurped the throne of the West was easily decided in the term of two months [76] and within the space of two hundred miles The superior genius of the emperor of the East might prevail over the feeble Maximus who in this important crisis showed himself destitute of military skill or personal courage but the abilities of Theodosius were seconded by the advantage which he possessed of a numerous and active cavalry The Huns the Alani and after their example, the Goths themselves were formed into squadrons of archers who fought on horseback and confounded the steady valour of the Gauls and Germans by the rapid motions of a Tartar war After the fatigue of a long march in the heat of summer they spurred their foaming horses into the waters of the Save swam the river in the presence of the enemy and instantly charged and routed the troops who guarded the high ground on the opposite side Marcellinus the tyrant s brother advanced to support them with the select cohorts which were considered as the hope and strength of the army The action which had been interrupted by the approach of night was renewed in the morning and after a sharp conflict the surviving remnant of the bravest soldiers of Maximus threw down their arms at the feet of the conqueror Without suspending his march to receive the loyal acclamations of the citizens of Æmona Theodosius pressed forwards to terminate the war by the death or captivity of his rival who fled before him with the diligence of fear From the summit of the Julian Alps he descended with such incredible speed into the plain of Italy that he reached Aquileia on the evening of the first day and Maximus who found himself encompassed on all sides had scarcely time to shut the gates of the city But the gates could not long resist the effort of a victorious enemy and the despair the disaffection the indifference of the soldiers and people hastened the downfall of the wretched Maximus He was dragged from his throne rudely stripped of the Imperial ornaments the robe the diadem, and the purple slippers and conducted like a malefactor to the camp and presence of Theodosius at a place about three miles from Aquileia. The behaviour of the emperor was not intended to insult and he showed some dispos*ition to pity* and forgive the tyrant of the West, who had never been his personal enemy and was now become the object of his contempt Our sympathy is the most forcibly excited by the misfortunes to which we are exposed and the spectacle of a proud competitor now prostrate at his feet could not fail of producing very serious and solemn thoughts in the mind of the victorious emperor But the feeble emotion of involuntary pity was checked by his regard for public justice and the memory of Gratian and he abandoned the victim to the pious zeal of the soldiers who drew him out of the Imperial presence and instantly separated his head from his body The intelligence of his defeat and death was received with sincere or well-dissembled joy his son Victor on whom he had conferred the title of Augustus died by the order perhaps by the hand of the bold Arbogastes and all the military plans of Theodosius were successfully executed When he had thus terminated the civil war with less difficulty and bloodshed than he might naturally expect he employed the winter months of his residence at Milan to restore the state of the afflicted provinces and early in the spring he made, after the example of Constantine and Constantius his triumphal entry into the ancient capital of the Roman empire [77]

The orator who may be silent without danger may praise without difficulty and without reluctance [78] and posterity will confess that the character of Theodosius[79] might furnish the subject of a sincere and ample panegyric. The wisdom of his laws and the success of his arms rendered his administration respectable in the eyes both of his subjects and of his enemies He loved and practised the virtues of domestic life, which seldom hold their residence in the palaces of kings Theodosius was chaste and temperate he enjoyed without excess the sensual and social pleasures of the table and the warmth of his amorous passions was never diverted from their lawful objects The proud titles of Imperial greatness were adorned by the tender names of a faithful husband an indulgent father his uncle was raised by his affectionate esteem to the rank of a second parent Theodosius embraced as his own the children of his brother and sister and the expressions of his regard were extended to the most distant and obscure branches of his numerous kindred His familiar friends were judiciously selected from among those persons who in the equal intercourse of private life had appeared before his eyes without a mask the consciousness of personal and superior merit enabled him to despise the accidental distinction of the purple and he proved by his conduct that he had forgotten all the injuries while he most gratefully remembered all the favours and services which he had received before he ascended the throne of the Roman empire The serious or lively tone of his conversation was adapted to the age, the rank, or the character of his subjects whom he admitted into his society, and the affability of his manners displayed the image of his mind Theodosius respected the simplicity of the good and virtuous every art, every talent, of an useful or even of an innocent nature, was rewarded by his judicious liberality, and, except the heretics, whom he persecuted with implacable hatred, the diffusive circle of his benevolence was circumscribed only by the limits of the human race The government of a mighty empire may assuredly suffice to occupy the time and the abilities of a mortal, yet the diligent prince, without aspiring to the unsuitable reputation of profound learning, always reserved some moments of his leisure for the instructive amusement of reading History, which enlarged his experience, was his favourite study The annals of Rome, in the long period of eleven hundred years, presented him with a various and splendid picture of human life, and it has been particularly observed that, whenever he perused the cruel acts of Cinna, of Marius, or of Sylla, he warmly expressed his generous detestation of those enemies of humanity and freedom His disinterested opinion of past events was usefully applied as the rule of his own actions, and Theodosius has deserved the singular commendation that his virtues always seemed to expand with his fortune, the season of his prosperity was that of his moderation, and his clemency appeared the most conspicuous after the danger and success of the civil war The Moorish guards of the tyrant had been massacred in the first heat of the victory, and a small number of the most obnoxious criminals suffered the punishment of the law But the emperor showed himself much more attentive to relieve the innocent than to chastise the guilty The oppressed subjects of the West, who would have deemed themselves happy in the restoration of their lands, were astonished to receive a sum of money equivalent to their losses, and the liberality of the conqueror supported the aged mother and educated the orphan daughters of Maximus [80] A character thus accomplished might almost excuse the extravagant supposition of the orator Pacatus that, if the elder Brutus could be permitted to revisit the earth, the stern republican would abjure, at the feet of Theodosius, his hatred of kings, and ingenuously confess that such a monarch was the most faithful guardian of the happiness and dignity of the Roman people [81]

Yet the piercing eye of the founder of the republic must have discerned two essential imperfections, which might, perhaps, have abated his recent love of despotism The virtuous mind of Theodosius was often relaxed by indolence,[82] and it was sometimes inflamed by passion [83] In the pursuit of an important object his active courage was capable of the most vigorous exertions, but as soon as the design was accomplished, or the danger was surmounted, the hero sunk into inglorious repose, and, forgetful that the time of a prince is the property of his people, resigned himself to the enjoyment of the innocent but trifling pleasures of a luxurious court The natural disposition of Theodosius was hasty and choleric, and, in a station where none could resist and few would dissuade the fatal consequence of his resentment, the humane monarch was justly alarmed by the consciousness of his infirmity and of his power It was the constant study of his life to suppress or regulate the intemperate sallies of passion, and the success of his efforts enhanced the merit of his clemency But the painful virtue which claims the merit of victory is exposed to the danger of defeat, and the reign of a wise and merciful prince was polluted by an act of cruelty which would stain the annals of Nero or Domitian Within the space of three years the inconsistent historian of Theodosius must relate the generous pardon of the citizens of Antioch, and the inhuman massacre of the people of Thessalonica

The lively impatience of the inhabitants of Antioch was never satisfied with their own situation, or with the character and conduct of their successive sovereigns The Arian subjects of Theodosius deplored the loss of their churches, and, as three rival bishops disputed the throne of Antioch, the sentence which decided their pretensions excited the murmurs of the two unsuccessful congregations The exigencies of the Gothic war, and the inevitable expense that accompanied the conclusion of the peace, had constrained the emperor to aggravate the weight of the public impositions, and the provinces of Asia, as they had not been involved in the distress, were the less inclined to contribute to the relief of Europe The auspicious period now approached of the tenth year of his reign, a festival more grateful to the soldiers, who received a liberal donative, than to the subjects, whose voluntary offerings had been long since converted into an extraordinary and oppressive burden The edicts of taxation interrupted the repose and pleasures of Antioch, and the tribunal of the magistrate was besieged by a suppliant crowd who in pathetic but at first in respectful language solicited the redress of their grievances They were gradually incensed by the pride of their haughty rulers who treated their complaints as a criminal resistance their satirical wit degenerated into sharp and angry invectives and from the subordinate powers of government the invectives of the people insensibly rose to attack the sacred character of the emperor himself Their fury provoked by a feeble opposition discharged itself on the images of the Imperial family which were erected as objects of public veneration in the most conspicuous places of the city The statues of Theodosius of his father of his wife Flaccilla of his two sons Arcadius and Honorius were insolently thrown down from their pedestals broken in pieces or dragged with contempt through the streets and the indignities which were offered to the representations of Imperial majesty sufficiently declared the impious and treasonable wishes of the populace The tumult was almost immediately suppressed by the arrival of a body of archers and Antioch had leisure to reflect on the nature and consequences of her crime [84] According to the duty of his office the governor of the province despatched a faithful narrative of the whole transaction while the trembling citizens intrusted the confession of their crime and the assurances of their repentance to the zeal of Flavian their bishop and to the eloquence of the senator Hilarius the friend and most probably the disciple of Libanius [85] whose genius on this melancholy occasion was not useless to his country But the two capitals Antioch and Constantinople were separated by the distance of eight hundred miles and notwithstanding the diligence of the Imperial posts the guilty city was severely punished by a long and dreadful interval of suspense Every rumour agitated the hopes and fears of the Antiochians and they heard with terror that their sovereign exasperated by the insult which had been offered to his own statues and more especially to those of his beloved wife had resolved to level with the ground the offending city and to massacre without distinction of age or sex the criminal inhabitants [86] many of whom were actually driven by their apprehensions to seek a refuge in the mountains of Syria and the adjacent desert At length twenty four days after the sedition the general Hellebicus and Cæsarius master of the offices declared the will of the emperor and the sentence of Antioch That proud capital was degraded from the rank of a city and the metropolis of the East, stripped of its lands its privileges and its revenues was subjected under the humiliating denomination of a village to the jurisdiction of Laodicea [87] The baths the circus and the theatres were shut and that every source of plenty and pleasure might at the same time be intercepted the distribution of corn was abolished by the severe instructions of Theodosius His commissioners then proceeded to inquire into the guilt of individuals—of those who had perpetrated and of those who had not prevented the destruction of the sacred statues The tribunal of Hellebicus and Cæsarius encompassed with armed soldiers was erected in the midst of the Forum The noblest and most wealthy of the citizens of Antioch appeared before them in chains the examination was assisted by the use of torture and their sentence was pronounced or suspended according to the judgment of these extraordinary magistrates The houses of the criminals were exposed to sale their wives and children were suddenly reduced from affluence and luxury to the most abject distress, and a bloody execution was expected to conclude the horrors of a day [88] which the preacher of Antioch the eloquent Chrysostom has represented as a lively image of the last and universal judgment of the world But the ministers of Theodosius performed with reluctance the cruel task which had been assigned them they dropped a gentle tear over the calamities of the people and they listened with reverence to the pressing solicitations of the monks and hermits, who descended in swarms from the mountains [89] Hellebicus and Cæsarius were persuaded to suspend the execution of their sentence and it was agreed that the former should remain at Antioch, while the latter returned with all possible speed to Constantinople and presumed once more to consult the will of his sovereign The resentment of Theodosius had already subsided the deputies of the people both the bishop and the orator had obtained a favourable audience and the reproaches of the emperor were the complaints of injured friendship rather than the stern menaces of pride and power A free and general pardon was granted to the city and citizens of Antioch the prison-doors were thrown open the senators who despaired of their lives recovered the possession of their houses and estates and the capital of the East was restored to the enjoyment of her ancient dignity and splendour Theodosius condescended to praise the senate of Constantinople who had generously interceded for their distressed brethren he rewarded the eloquence of Hilarius with the government of Palestine, and dismissed the bishop of Antioch with the warmest expressions of respect and gratitude A thousand new statues arose to the clemency of Theodosius, the applause of his subjects was ratified by the approbation of his own heart, and the emperor confessed that, if the exercise of justice is the most important duty, the indulgence of mercy is the most exquisite pleasure of a sovereign [90]

The sedition of Thessalonica is ascribed to a more shameful cause, and was productive of much more dreadful consequences That great city, the metropolis of all the Illyrian provinces, had been protected from the dangers of the Gothic war by strong fortifications and a numerous garrison Botheric, the general of those troops, and, as it should seem from his name, a barbarian, had among his slaves a beautiful boy, who excited the impure desires of one of the charioteers of the circus The insolent and brutal lover was thrown into prison by the order of Botheric, and he sternly rejected the importunate clamours of the multitude, who, on the day of the public games, lamented the absence of their favourite, and considered the skill of a charioteer as an object of more importance than his virtue The resentment of the people was embittered by some previous disputes, and, as the strength of the garrison had been drawn away for the service of the Italian war, the feeble remnant, whose numbers were reduced by desertion, could not save the unhappy general from their licentious fury Botheric and several of his principal officers were inhumanly murdered, their mangled bodies were dragged about the streets, and the emperor, who then resided at Milan, was surprised by the intelligence of the audacious and wanton cruelty of the people of Thessalonica The sentence of a dispassionate judge would have inflicted a severe punishment on the authors of the crime, and the merit of Botheric might contribute to exasperate the grief and indignation of his master The fiery and choleric temper of Theodosius was impatient of the dilatory forms of a judicial inquiry, and he hastily resolved that the blood of his lieutenant should be expiated by the blood of the guilty people Yet his mind still fluctuated between the counsels of clemency and of revenge, the zeal of the bishops had almost extorted from the reluctant emperor the promise of a general pardon, his passion was again inflamed by the flattering suggestions of his minister Rufinus, and, after Theodosius had despatched the messengers of death, he attempted, when it was too late, to prevent the execution of his orders The punishment of a Roman city was blindly committed to the undistinguishing sword of the barbarians, and the hostile preparations were concerted with the dark and perfidious artifice of an illegal conspiracy The people of Thessalonica were treacherously invited, in the name of their sovereign, to the games of the circus, and such was their insatiate avidity for those amusements that every consideration of fear or suspicion was disregarded by the numerous spectators As soon as the assembly was complete, the soldiers, who had secretly been posted round the circus, received the signal, not of the races, but of a general massacre The promiscuous carnage continued three hours, without discrimination of strangers or natives, of age or sex, of innocence or guilt, the most moderate accounts state the number of the slain at seven thousand, and it is affirmed by some writers that more than fifteen thousand victims were sacrificed to the manes of Botheric A foreign merchant, who had probably no concern in his murder, offered his own life and all his wealth to supply the place of one of his two sons, but while the father hesitated with equal tenderness, while he was doubtful to choose, and unwilling to condemn, the soldiers determined his suspense by plunging their daggers at the same moment into the breasts of the defenceless youths The apology of the assassins, that they were obliged to produce the prescribed number of heads, serves only to increase, by an appearance of order and design, the horrors of the massacre, which was executed by the commands of Theodosius The guilt of the emperor is aggravated by his long and frequent residence at Thessalonica The situation of the unfortunate city, the aspect of the streets and buildings, the dress and faces of the inhabitants, were familiar, and even present, to his imagination, and Theodosius possessed a quick and lively sense of the existence of the people whom he destroyed [91]

The respectful attachment of the emperor for the orthodox clergy had disposed him to love and admire the character of Ambrose, who united all the episcopal virtues in the most eminent degree The friends and ministers of Theodosius imitated the example of their sovereign, and he observed, with more surprise than displeasure, that all his secret counsels were immediately communicated to the archbishop, who acted from the laudable persuasion that every measure of civil government may have some connection with the glory of God and the interest of the true religion The monks and

Callinicum, an obscure town on the frontier of Persia, excited by their own fanaticism and by that of their bishop had tumultuously burnt a conventicle of the Valentinians and a synagogue of the Jews The seditious prelate was condemned by the magistrate of the provinces either to rebuild the synagogue or to repay the damage and this moderate sentence was confirmed by the emperor But it was not confirmed by the archbishop of Milan [92] He dictated an epistle of censure and reproach more suitable perhaps if the emperor had received the mark of circumcision and renounced the faith of his baptism Ambrose considers the toleration of the Jewish as the persecution of the Christian religion boldly declares that he himself and every true believer would eagerly dispute with the bishop of Callinicum the merit of the deed and the crown of martyrdom and laments in the most pathetic terms that the execution of the sentence would be fatal to the fame and salvation of Theodosius As this private admonition did not produce an immediate effect, the archbishop from his pulpit[93] publicly addressed the emperor on his throne [94] nor would he consent to offer the oblation of the altar till he had obtained from Theodosius a solemn and positive declaration which secured the impunity of the bishop and monks of Callinicum. The recantation of Theodosius was sincere [95] and during the term of his residence at Milan his affection for Ambrose was continually increase. by the habits of pious and familiar conversation

When Ambrose was informed of the massacre of Thessalonica his mind was filled with horror and anguish He retired into the country to indulge his grief and to avoid the presence of Theodosius But as the archbishop was satisfied that a timid silence would render him the accomplice of his guilt he represented in a private letter the enormity of the crime which could only be effaced by the tears of penitence The episcopal vigour of Ambrose was tempered by prudence and he contented himself with signifying[96] an indirect sort of excommunication, by the assurance that he had been warned in a vision not to offer the oblation in the name or in the presence of Theodosius and by the advice that he would confine himself to the use of prayer without presuming to approach the altar of Christ, or to receive the holy eucharist with those hands that were still polluted with the blood of an innocent people. The emperor was deeply affected by his own reproaches and by those of his spiritual father and after he had bewailed the mischievous and irreparable consequences of his rash fury he proceeded in the accustomed manner to perform his devotions in the great church of Milan He was stopped in the porch by the archbishop who in the tone and language of an ambassador of Heaven declared to his sovereign that private contrition was not sufficient to atone for a public fault or to appease the justice of the offended Deity Theodosius humbly represented that if he had contracted the guilt of homicide David, the man after God s own heart had been guilty not only of murder but of adultery You have imitated David in his crime imitate then his repentance was the reply of the undaunted Ambrose The rigorous conditions of peace and pardon were accepted and the public penance of the emperor Theodosius has been recorded as one of the most honourable events in the annals of the church According to the mildest rules of ecclesiastical discipline which were established in the fourth century the crime of homicide was expiated by the penitence of twenty years [97] and as it was impossible in the period of human life to purge the accumulated guilt of the massacre of Thessalonica the murderer should have been excluded from the holy communion till the hour of his death. But the archbishop consulting the maxims of religious policy granted some indulgence to the rank of his illustrious penitent who humbled in the dust the pride of the diadem and the public edification might be admitted as a weighty reason to abridge the duration of his punishment. It was sufficient that the emperor of the Romans stripped of the ensigns of royalty should appear in a mournful and suppliant posture and that in the midst of the church of Milan he should humbly solicit with sighs and tears, the pardon of his sins [98] In this spiritual cure Ambrose employed the various methods of mildness and severity After a delay of about eight months Theodosius was restored to the communion of the faithful and the edict, which interposes a salutary interval of thirty days between the sentence and the execution may be accepted as the worthy fruits of his repentance [99] Posterity has applauded the virtuous firmness of the archbishop and the example of Theodosius may prove the beneficial influence of those principles which could force a monarch, exalted above the apprehension of human punishment to respect the laws and ministers of an invisible Judge The prince says Montesquieu who is actuated by the hopes and fears of religion may be compared to a lion, docile only to the voice, and tractable to the hand, of his keeper."[100] The motions of the royal animal will therefore depend on the inclination and interest of the man who has acquired such dangerous authority over him, and the priest who holds in his hand the conscience of a king may inflame or moderate his sanguinary passions The cause of humanity and that of persecution have been asserted by the same Ambrose with equal energy and with equal success

After the defeat and death of the tyrant of Gaul, the Roman world was in the possession of Theodosius He derived from the choice of Gratian his honourable title to the provinces of the East, he had acquired the West by the right of conquest, and the three years which he spent in Italy were usefully employed to restore the authority of the laws and to correct the abuses which had prevailed with impunity under the usurpation of Maximus and the minority of Valentinian The name of Valentinian was regularly inserted in the public acts, but the tender age and doubtful faith of the son of Justina appeared to require the prudent care of an orthodox guardian, and his specious ambition might have excluded the unfortunate youth, without a struggle and almost without a murmur, from the administration and even from the inheritance of the empire If Theodosius had consulted the rigid maxims of interest and policy, his conduct would have been justified by his friends, but the generosity of his behaviour on this memorable occasion has extorted the applause of his most inveterate enemies He seated Valentinian on the throne of Milan, and, without stipulating any present or future advantages, restored him to the absolute dominion of all the provinces from which he had been driven by the arms of Maximus To the restitution of his ample patrimony Theodosius added the free and generous gift of the countries beyond the Alps which his successful valour had recovered from the assassin of Gratian[101] Satisfied with the glory which he had acquired by revenging the death of his benefactor and delivering the West from the yoke of tyranny, the emperor returned from Milan to Constantinople, and, in the peaceful possession of the East, insensibly relapsed into his former habits of luxury and indolence Theodosius discharged his obligation to the brother, he indulged his conjugal tenderness to the sister, of Valentinian, and posterity, which admires the pure and singular glory of his elevation, must applaud his unrivalled generosity in the use of victory

The empress Justina did not long survive her return to Italy, and, though she beheld the triumph of Theodosius, she was not allowed to influence the government of her son[102] The pernicious attachment to the Arian sect which Valentinian had imbibed from her example and instructions was soon erased by the lessons of a more orthodox education His growing zeal for the faith of Nice, and his filial reverence for the character and authority of Ambrose, disposed the catholics to entertain the most favourable opinion of the virtues of the young emperor of the West[103] They applauded his chastity and temperance, his contempt of pleasure, his application to business, and his tender affection for his two sisters, which would not, however, seduce his impartial equity to pronounce an unjust sentence against the meanest of his subjects But this amiable youth, before he had accomplished the twentieth year of his age, was oppressed by domestic treason, and the empire was again involved in the horrors of a civil war Arbogastes,[104] a gallant soldier of the nation of the Franks, held the second rank in the service of Gratian On the death of his master he joined the standard of Theodosius, contributed, by his valour and military conduct, to the destruction of the tyrant, and was appointed, after the victory, master-general of the armies of Gaul His real merit and apparent fidelity had gained the confidence both of the prince and people, his boundless liberality corrupted the allegiance of the troops, and, whilst he was universally esteemed as the pillar of the state, the bold and crafty barbarian was secretly determined either to rule or to ruin the empire of the West The important commands of the army were distributed among the Franks, the creatures of Arbogastes were promoted to all the honours and offices of the civil government, the progress of the conspiracy removed every faithful servant from the presence of Valentinian, and the emperor, without power and without intelligence, insensibly sunk into the precarious and dependent condition of a captive[105] The indignation which he expressed, though it might arise only from the rash and impatient temper of youth, may be candidly ascribed to the generous spirit of a prince who felt that he was not unworthy to reign He secretly invited the archbishop of Milan to undertake the office of a mediator, as the pledge of his sincerity and the guardian of his safety He contrived to apprise the emperor of the East of his helpless situation, and he declared that, unless Theodosius could speedily march to his assistance, he must attempt to escape from the palace, or rather prison, of Vienne, in Gaul, where he had imprudently his residence in the midst of the hostile faction But the hopes of relief were distant and doubtful and as every day furnished some new provocation the emperor without strength or counsel too hastily resolved to risk an immediate contest with his powerful general. He received Arbogastes on the throne and as the count approached with some appearance of respect delivered to him a paper which dismissed him from all his employments My authority replied Arbogastes with insulting coolness does not depend on the smile or the frown of a monarch and he contemptuously threw the paper on the ground The indignant monarch snatched at the sword of one of the guards which he struggled to draw from its scabbard and it was not without some degree of violence that he was prevented from using the deadly weapon against his enemy or against himself A few days after this extraordinary quarrel in which he had exposed his resentment and his weakness the unfortunate Valentinian was found strangled in his apartment and some pains were employed to disguise the manifest guilt of Arbogastes and to persuade the world that the death of the young emperor had been the voluntary effect of his own despair [106] His body was conducted with decent pomp to the sepulchre of Milan and the archbishop pronounced a funeral oration to commemorate his virtue and his misfortunes [107] On this occasion the humanity of Ambrose tempted him to make a singular breach in his theological system and to comfort the weeping sisters of Valentinian by the firm assurance that their pious brother though he had not received the sacrament of baptism was introduced without difficulty into the mansions of eternal bliss [108]

The prudence of Arbogastes had prepared the success of his ambitious designs and the provincials in whose breasts every sentiment of patriotism or loyalty was extinguished expected with tame resignation the unknown master whom the choice of a Frank might place on the Imperial throne But some remains of pride and prejudice still opposed the elevation of Arbogastes himself and the judicious barbarians thought it more advisable to reign under the name of some dependent Roman He bestowed the purple on the rhetorician Eugenius [109] whom he had already raised from the place of his domestic secretary to the rank of master of the offices In the course both of his private and public service the count had always approved the attachment and abilities of Eugenius his learning and eloquence supported by the gravity of his manners recommended him to the esteem of the people and the reluctance with which he seemed to ascend the throne may inspire a favourable prejudice of his virtue and moderation The ambassadors of the new emperor were immediately despatched to the court of Theodosius to communicate, with affected grief the unfortunate accident of the death of Valentinian and without mentioning the name of Arbogastes to request that the monarch of the East would embrace as his lawful colleague the respectable citizen who had obtained the unanimous suffrage of the armies and provinces of the West [110] Theodosius was justly provoked that the perfidy of a barbarian should have destroyed in a moment the labours and the fruit of his former victory and he was excited by the tears of his beloved wife[111] to revenge the fate of her unhappy brother and once more to assert by arms the violated majesty of the throne But as the second conquest of the West was a task of difficulty and danger he dismissed, with splendid presents and an ambiguous answer the ambassadors of Eugenius and almost two years were consumed in the preparations of the civil war Before he formed any decisive resolution, the pious emperor was anxious to discover the will of Heaven and as the progress of Christianity had silenced the oracles of Delphi and Dodona he consulted an Egyptian monk who possessed in the opinion of the age the gift of miracles and the knowledge of futurity Eutropius one of the favourite eunuchs of the palace of Constantinople, embarked for Alexandria, from whence he sailed up the Nile as far as the city of Lycopolis or of Wolves in the remote province of Thebais [112] In the neighbourhood of that city and on the summit of a lofty mountain the holy John[113] had constructed with his own hands an humble cell in which he had dwelt above fifty years without opening his door, without seeing the face of a woman and without tasting any food that had been prepared by fire or any human art Five days of the week he spent in prayer and meditation but on Saturdays and Sundays he regularly opened a small window and gave audience to the crowd of suppliants who successively flowed from every part of the Christian world The eunuch of Theodosius approached the window with respectful steps proposed his questions concerning the event of the civil war and soon returned with a favourable oracle which animated the courage of the emperor by the assurance of a bloody but infallible victory [114] The accomplishment of the prediction was forwarded by all the means that human prudence could supply The industry of the two master-generals, Stilicho and Timasius, was directed to recruit the numbers and to revive the discipline of the Roman legions The formidable troops of barbarians marched under the ensigns of their national chieftains The Iberian, the Arab, and the Goth, who gazed on each other with mutual astonishment, were enlisted in the service of the same prince, and the renowned Alaric acquired, in the school of Theodosius, the knowledge of the art of war which he afterwards so fatally exerted for the destruction of Rome [115]

The emperor of the West, or, to speak more properly, his general Arbogastes, was instructed by the misconduct and misfortune of Maximus how dangerous it might prove to extend the line of defence against a skilful antagonist, who was free to press or to suspend, to contract or to multiply, his various methods of attack [116] Arbogastes fixed his station on the confines of Italy, the troops of Theodosius were permitted to occupy, without resistance, the provinces of Pannonia, as far as the foot of the Julian Alps, and even the passes of the mountains were negligently, or perhaps artfully, abandoned to the bold invader He descended from the hills, and beheld, with some astonishment, the formidable camp of the Gauls and Germans that covered with arms and tents the open country which extends to the walls of Aquileia and the banks of the Frigidus,[117] or Cold River [118] This narrow theatre of the war circumscribed by the Alps and the Hadriatic, did not allow much room for the operations of military skill, the spirit of Arbogastes would have disdained a pardon, his guilt extinguished the hope of a negotiation, and Theodosius was impatient to satisfy his glory and revenge by the chastisement of the assassins of Valentinian Without weighing the natural and artificial obstacles that opposed his efforts, the emperor of the East immediately attacked the fortifications of his rivals, assigned the post of honourable danger to the Goths, and cherished a secret wish that the bloody conflict might diminish the pride and numbers of the conquerors Ten thousand of those auxiliaries, and Bacurius, general of the Iberians, died bravely on the field of battle But the victory was not purchased by their blood, the Gauls maintained their advantage, and the approach of night protected the disorderly flight, or retreat, of the troops of Theodosius The emperor retired to the adjacent hills, where he passed a disconsolate night, without sleep, without provisions, and without hopes,[119] except that strong assurance which, under the most desperate circumstances, the independent mind may derive from the contempt of fortune and of life The triumph of Eugenius was celebrated by the insolent and dissolute joy of his camp, whilst the active and vigilant Arbogastes secretly detached a considerable body of troops to occupy the passes of the mountains and to encompass the rear of the Eastern army The dawn of day discovered to the eyes of Theodosius the extent and the extremity of his danger, but his apprehensions were soon dispelled by a friendly message from the leaders of those troops, who expressed their inclination to desert the standard of the tyrant The honourable and lucrative rewards which they stipulated as the price of their perfidy were granted without hesitation, and, as ink and paper could not easily be procured, the emperor subscribed on his own tablets the ratification of the treaty The spirit of his soldiers was revived by this seasonable reinforcement, and they again marched with confidence to surprise the camp of a tyrant whose principal officers appeared to distrust either the justice or the success of his arms In the heat of the battle a violent tempest,[120] such as is often felt among the Alps, suddenly arose from the East The army of Theodosius was sheltered by their position from the impetuosity of the wind, which blew a cloud of dust in the faces of the enemy, disordered their ranks, wrested their weapons from their hands, and diverted or repelled their ineffectual javelins This accidental advantage was skilfully improved the violence of the storm was magnified by the superstitious terrors of the Gauls, and they yielded without shame to the invisible powers of heaven, who seemed to militate on the side of the pious emperor His victory was decisive, and the deaths of his two rivals were distinguished only by the difference of their characters The rhetorician Eugenius, who had almost acquired the dominion of the world, was reduced to implore the mercy of the conqueror, and the unrelenting soldiers separated his head from his body as he lay prostrate at the feet of Theodosius Arbogastes, after the loss of a battle in which he had discharged the duties of a soldier and a general, wandered several days among the mountains But when he was convinced that his cause was desperate, and his escape impracticable, the intrepid barbarian imitated the example of the ancient Romans and turned his sword against his own breast The fate of the empire was determined in a narrow corner of Italy, and the legitimate successor of the house of Valentinian embraced the archbishop of Milan and graciously received the submission of the provinces of the West Those provinces were involved in the guilt of rebellion while the inflexible courage of Ambrose alone had resisted the claims of successful usurpation With a manly freedom, which might have been fatal to any other subject the archbishop rejected the gifts of Eugenius declined his correspondence and withdrew himself from Milan to avoid the odious presence of a tyrant whose downfall he predicted in discreet and ambiguous language The merit of Ambrose was applauded by the conqueror who secured the attachment of the people by his alliance with the church and the clemency of Theodosius is ascribed to the humane intercession of the archbishop of Milan [121]

After the defeat of Eugenius the merit as well as the authority of Theodosius was cheerfully acknowledged by all the inhabitants of the Roman world The experience of his past conduct encouraged the most pleasing expectations of his future reign and the age of the emperor which did not exceed fifty years seemed to extend the prospect of the public felicity His death only four months after his victory, was considered by the people as an unforeseen and fatal event which destroyed in a moment the hopes of the rising generation But the indulgence of ease and luxury had secretly nourished the principles of disease [122] The s rength of Theodosius was unable to support the sudden l violent transition from the palace to the np and the increasing symptoms of a 1 opsy announced the speedy dissolution of the emperor The opinion and perhaps the interest of the public had confirmed the division of the Eastern and Western empires and the two royal youths Arcadius and Honorius who had already obtained from the tenderness of their father the title of Augustus were destined to fill the thrones of Constantinople and of Rome Those princes were not permitted to share the danger and glory of the civil war [123] but as soon as Theodosius had triumphed over his unworthy rivals he called his younger son Honorius, to enjoy the fruits of the victory and to receive the sceptre of the West from the hands of his dying father The arrival of Honorius at Milan was welcomed by a splendid exhibition of the games of the circus and the emperor though he was oppressed by the weight of his disorder contributed by his presence to the public joy But the remains of his strength were exhausted by the painful effort which he made to assist at the spectacles of the morning Honorius supplied during the rest of the day the place of his father and the great Theodosius expired in the ensuing night Notwithstanding the recent animosities of a civil war his death was universally lamented The barbarians whom he had vanquished, and the churchmen by whom he had been subdued, celebrated with loud and sincere applause the qualities of the deceased emperor which appeared the most valuable in their eyes The Romans were terrified by the impending dangers of a feeble and divided administration and every disgraceful moment of the unfortunate reigns of Arcadius and Honorius revived the memory of their irreparable loss

In the faithful picture of the virtues of Theodosius his imperfections have not been dissembled the act of cruelty and the habits of indolence which tarnished the glory of one of the greatest of the Roman princes An historian perpetually adverse to the fame of Theodosius has exaggerated his vices and their pernicious effects he boldly asserts that every rank of subjects imitated the effeminate manners of their sovereign that every species of corruption polluted the course of public and private life and that the feeble restraints of order and decency were insufficient to resist the progress of that degenerate spirit which sacrifices, without a blush the consideration of duty and interest to the base indulgence of sloth and appetite.[124] The complaints of contemporary writers who deplore the increase of luxury and depravation of manners are commonly expressive of their peculiar temper and situation There are few observers who possess a clear and comprehensive view of the revolutions of society, and who are capable of discovering the nice and secret springs of action which impel in the same uniform direction the blind and capricious passions of a multitude of individuals If it can be affirmed with any degree of truth that the luxury of the Romans was more shameless and dissolute in the reign of Theodosius than in the age of Constantine perhaps or of Augustus the alteration cannot be ascribed to any beneficial improvements which had gradually increased the stock of national riches A long period of calamity or decay must have checked the industry and diminished the wealth of the people and their profuse luxury must have been the result of that indolent despair which enjoys the present hour and declines the thoughts of futurity The uncertain condition of their property discouraged the subjects of Theodosius from engaging in those useful and laborious undertakings which require an immediate expense and promise a slow and distant advantage The frequent examples of ruin and desolation tempted them not to spare the remains of a patrimony which might, every hour, become the prey of the rapacious Goth And the mad prodigality which prevails in the confusion of a shipwreck or a siege may serve to explain the progress of luxury amidst the misfortunes and terrors of a sinking nation

The effeminate luxury, which infected the manners of courts and cities, had instilled a secret and destructive poison into the camps of the legions, and their degeneracy has been marked by the pen of a military writer, who had accurately studied the genuine and ancient principles of Roman discipline It is the just and important observation of Vegetius, that the infantry was invariably covered with defensive armour from the foundation of the city to the reign of the emperor Gratian The relaxation of discipline and the disuse of exercise rendered the soldiers less able and less willing to support the fatigues of the service, they complained of the weight of the armour, which they seldom wore, and they successively obtained the permission of laying aside both their cuirasses and their helmets The heavy weapons of their ancestors, the short sword and the formidable pilum, which had subdued the world, insensibly dropped from their feeble hands As the use of the shield is incompatible with that of the bow, they reluctantly marched into the field, condemned to suffer either the pain of wounds or the ignominy of flight, and always disposed to prefer the more shameful alternative The cavalry of the Goths, the Huns, and the Alani, had felt the benefits and adopted the use of defensive armour, and, as they excelled in the management of missile weapons, they easily overwhelmed the naked and trembling legions, whose heads and breasts were exposed, without defence, to the arrows of the barbarians The loss of armies, the destruction of cities, and the dishonour of the Roman name, ineffectually solicited the successors of Gratian to restore the helmets and cuirasses of the infantry The enervated soldiers abandoned their own and the public defence, and their pusillanimous indolence may be considered as the immediate cause of the downfall of the empire [125]

CHAPTER XXVIII

Final Destruction of Paganism Introduction of the Worship of Saints and Relics among the Christians

THE ruin of Paganism, in the age of Theodosius, is perhaps the only example of the total extirpation of any ancient and popular superstition, and may therefore deserve to be considered as a singular event in the history of the human mind The Christians, more especially the clergy, had impatiently supported the prudent delays of Constantine and the equal toleration of the elder Valentinian, nor could they deem their conquest perfect or secure as long as their adversaries were permitted to exist The influence which Ambrose and his brethren had acquired over the youth of Gratian and the piety of Theodosius was employed to infuse the maxims of persecution into the breasts of their Imperial proselytes Two specious principles of religious jurisprudence were established, from whence they deduced a direct and rigorous conclusion against the subjects of the empire who still adhered to the ceremonies of their ancestors that the magistrate is, in some measure, guilty of the crimes which he neglects to prohibit or to punish, and that the idolatrous worship of fabulous deities and real dæmons is the most abominable crime against the supreme majesty of the Creator The laws of Moses and the examples of Jewish history[1] were hastily, perhaps erroneously, applied by the clergy to the mild and universal reign of Christianity [2] The zeal of the emperors was excited to vindicate their own honour and that of the Deity, and the temples of the Roman world were subverted about sixty years after the conversion of Constantine

From the age of Numa to the reign of Gratian, the Romans preserved the regular succession of the several colleges of the sacerdotal order [3] Fifteen PONTIFFS exercised their supreme jurisdiction over all things and persons that were consecrated to the service of the gods, and the various questions which perpetually arose in a loose and traditionary system were submitted to the judgment of their holy tribunal Fifteen grave and learned AUGURS observed the face of the heavens, and prescribed the actions of heroes according to the flight of birds Fifteen keepers of the Sibylline books (their name of QUINDECEMVIRS was derived from their number) occasionally consulted the history of future and as it should seem of contingent events Six VESTALS devoted their virginity to the guard of the sacred fire and of the unknown pledges of the duration of Rome which no mortal had been suffered to behold with impunity [4] Seven EPULOS prepared the table of the gods conducted the solemn procession and regulated the ceremonies of the annual festival The three FLAMENS of Jupiter of Mars and of Quirinus were considered as the peculiar ministers of the three most powerful deities who watched over the fate of Rome and of the universe The KING of the SACRIFICES represented the person of Numa and of his successors in the religious functions which could be performed only by royal hands The confraternities of the SALIANS, the LUPERCALS etc practised such rites as might extort a smile of contempt from every reasonable man with a lively confidence of recommending themselves to the favour of the immortal gods The authority which the Roman priests had formerly obtained in the counsels of the republic was gradually abolished by the establishment of monarchy and the removal of the seat of empire But the dignity of their sacred character was still protected by the laws and manners of their country and they still continued more especially the college of pontiffs to exercise in the capital and sometimes in the provinces the rights of their ecclesiastical and civil jurisdiction Their robes of purple chariots of state and sumptuous entertainments attracted the admiration of the people and they received from the consecrated lands and the public revenue an ample stipend which liberally supported the splendour of the priesthood and all the expenses of the religious worship of the state As the service of the altar was not incompatible with the command of armies the Romans, after their consulships and triumphs aspired to the place of pontiff or of augur the seats of Cicero[5] and Pompey were filled in the fourth century by the most illustrious members of the senate and the dignity of their birth reflected additional splendour on their sacerdotal character The fifteen priests who composed the college of pontiffs enjoyed a more distinguished rank as the companions of their sovereign and the Christian emperors condescended to accept the robe and ensigns which were appropriated to the office of supreme pontiff But when Gratian ascended the throne more scrupulous or more enlightened he sternly rejected those profane symbols [6] applied to the service of the state or of the church the revenues of the priests and vestals abolished their honours and immunities and dissolved the ancient fabric of Roman superstition which was supported by the opinions and habits of eleven hundred years. Paganism was still the constitutional religion of the senate The hall or temple in which they assembled was adorned by the statue and altar of Victory [7] a majestic female standing on a globe with flowing garments expanded wings and a crown of laurel in her outstretched hand.[8] The senators were sworn on the altar of the goddess to observe the laws of the emperor and of the empire and a solemn offering of wine and incense was the ordinary prelude of their public deliberations [9] The removal of this ancient monument was the only injury which Constantius had offered to the superstition of the Romans The altar of Victory was again restored by Julian tolerated by Valentinian and once more banished from the senate by the zeal of Gratian [10] But the emperor yet spared the statues of the gods which were exposed to the public veneration four hundred and twenty four temples or chapels still remained to satisfy the devotion of the people and in every quarter of Rome the delicacy of the Christians was offended by the fumes of idolatrous sacrifice [11]

But the Christians formed the least numerous party in the senate of Rome [12] and it was only by their absence that they could express their dissent from the legal though profane acts of a Pagan majority In that assembly the dying embers of freedom were for a moment revived and inflamed by the breath of fanaticism. Four respectable deputations were successively voted to the Imperial court [13] to represent the grievances of the priesthood and the senate and to solicit the restoration of the altar of Victory The conduct of this important business was intrusted to the eloquent Symmachus [14] a wealthy and noble senator who united the sacred characters of pontiff and augur with the civil dignities of proconsul of Africa and præfect of the city The breast of Symmachus was animated by the warmest zeal for the cause of expiring Paganism and his religious antagonists lamented the abuse of his genius and the inefficacy of his moral virtues [15] The orator whose petition is extant to the emperor Valentinian was conscious of the difficulty and danger of the office which he had assumed He cautiously avoids every topic which might appear to reflect on the religion of his sovereign, humbly declares that prayers and entreaties are his only arms and artfully draws his arguments from the schools of rhetoric rather than from those of philosophy. Symmachus endeavours to seduce the imagination of a young prince, by displaying the attributes of the goddess of Victory, he insinuates that the confiscation of the revenues which were consecrated to the service of the gods was a measure unworthy of his liberal and disinterested character, and maintains that the Roman sacrifices would be deprived of their force and energy, if they were no longer celebrated at the expense as well as in the name of the republic. Even scepticism is made to supply an apology for superstition. The great and incomprehensible secret of the universe eludes the inquiry of man. Where reason cannot instruct, custom may be permitted to guide, and every nation seems to consult the dictates of prudence, by a faithful attachment to those rites and opinions which have received the sanction of ages. If those ages have been crowned with glory and prosperity—if the devout people has frequently obtained the blessings which they have solicited at the altars of the gods—it must appear still more advisable to persist in the same salutary practice, and not to risk the unknown perils that may attend any rash innovations. The test of antiquity and success was applied with singular advantage to the religion of Numa, and ROME herself, the celestial genius that presided over the fates of the city, is introduced by the orator to plead her own cause before the tribunal of the emperors. "Most excellent princes," says the venerable matron, "fathers of your country! pity and respect my age, which has hitherto flowed in an uninterrupted course of piety. Since I do not repent, permit me to continue in the practice of my ancient rites. Since I am born free, allow me to enjoy my domestic institutions. This religion has reduced the world under my laws. These rites have repelled Hannibal from the city, and the Gauls from the Capitol. Were my grey hairs reserved for such intolerable disgrace? I am ignorant of the new system that I am required to adopt, but I am well assured that the correction of old age is always an ungrateful and ignominious office."[16] The fears of the people supplied what the discretion of the orator had suppressed, and the calamities which afflicted or threatened the declining empire were unanimously imputed by the Pagans to the new religion of Christ and of Constantine.

But the hopes of Symmachus were repeatedly baffled by the firm and dexterous opposition of the archbishop of Milan, who fortified the emperors against the fallacious eloquence of the advocate of Rome. In this controversy Ambrose condescends to speak the language of a philosopher, and to ask, with some contempt, why it should be thought necessary to introduce an imaginary and invisible power as the cause of those victories, which were sufficiently explained by the valour and discipline of the legions. He justly derides the absurd reverence for antiquity, which could only tend to discourage the improvements of art and to replunge the human race into their original barbarism. From thence gradually rising to a more lofty and theological tone, he pronounces that Christianity alone is the doctrine of truth and salvation, and that every mode of Polytheism conducts its deluded votaries through the paths of error to the abyss of eternal perdition.[17] Arguments like these, when they were suggested by a favourite bishop, had power to prevent the restoration of the altar of Victory, but the same arguments fell with much more energy and effect from the mouth of a conqueror, and the gods of antiquity were dragged in triumph at the chariot-wheels of Theodosius.[18] In a full meeting of the senate the emperor proposed, according to the forms of the republic, the important question, whether the worship of Jupiter or that of Christ should be the religion of the Romans? The liberty of suffrages, which he affected to allow, was destroyed by the hopes and fears that his presence inspired, and the arbitrary exile of Symmachus was a recent admonition that it might be dangerous to oppose the wishes of the monarch. On a regular division of the senate, Jupiter was condemned and degraded by the sense of a very large majority, and it is rather surprising that any members should be found bold enough to declare, by their speeches and votes, that they were still attached to the interest of an abdicated deity.[19] The hasty conversion of the senate must be attributed either to supernatural or to sordid motives, and many of these reluctant proselytes betrayed, on every favourable occasion, their secret disposition to throw aside the mask of odious dissimulation. But they were gradually fixed in the new religion, as the cause of the ancient became more hopeless, they yielded to the authority of the emperor, to the fashion of the times, and to the entreaties of their wives and children,[20] who were instigated and governed by the clergy of Rome and the monks of the East. The edifying example of the Anician family was soon imitated by the rest of the nobility: the Bassi, the Paullini, the Gracchi, embraced the Christian religion, and "the luminaries of the world, the venerable assembly of Catos (such are the high-flown expressions of Prudentius) were impatient to strip themselves of their pontifical garment—to cast the skin of the old serpent—to assume the snowy robes of baptismal innocence—and to humble the pride of the consular fasces before the tombs of the martyrs [21] The citizens who subsisted by their own industry and the populace who were supported by the public liberality filled the churches of the Lateran and Vatican with an incessant throng of devout proselytes. The decrees of the senate which proscribed the worship of idols were ratified by the general consent of the Romans [22] the splendour of the Capitol was defaced and the solitary temples were abandoned to ruin and contempt [23] Rome submitted to the yoke of the Gospel and the vanquished provinces had not yet lost their reverence for the name and authority of Rome

The filial piety of the emperors themselves engaged them to proceed with some caution and tenderness in the reformation of the eternal city Those absolute monarchs acted with less regard to the prejudices of the provincials The pious labour which had been suspended near twenty years since the death of Constantius [24] was vigorously resumed and finally accomplished by the zeal of Theodosius Whilst that warlike prince yet struggled with the Goths not for the glory but for the safety of the republic he ventured to offend a considerable party of his subjects by some acts which might perhaps secure the protection of Heaven but which must seem rash and unseasonable in the eye of human prudence The success of his first experiments against the Pagans encouraged the pious emperor to reiterate and enforce his edicts of proscription the same laws which had been originally published in the provinces of the East were applied after the defeat of Maximus to the whole extent of the Western empire and every victory of the orthodox Theodosius contributed to the triumph of the Christian and catholic faith [25] He attacked superstition in her most vital part by prohibiting the use of sacrifices which he declared to be criminal as well as infamous and if the terms of his edicts more strictly condemned the impious curiosity which examined the entrails of the victims [26] every subsequent explanation tended to involve in the same guilt the general practice of immolation which essentially constituted the religion of the Pagans As the temples had been erected for the purpose of sacrifice it was the duty of a benevolent prince to remove from his subjects the dangerous temptation of offending against the laws which he had enacted A pecial commission was granted to Cynegius the Prætorian prefect of the East and afterwards to the counts Jovius and Gaudentius two officers of distinguished rank in the West by which they were directed to shut the temples to seize or destroy the instruments of idolatry to abolish the privileges of the priests and to confiscate the consecrated property for the benefit of the emperor of the church or of the army [27] Here the desolation might have stopped and the naked edifices which were no longer employed in the service of idolatry might have been protected from the destructive rage of fanaticism Many of those temples were the most splendid and beautiful monuments of Grecian architecture and the emperor himself was interested not to deface the splendour of his own cities or to diminish the value of his own possessions. Those stately edifices might be suffered to remain, as so many lasting trophies of the victory of Christ. In the decline of the arts, they might be usefully converted into magazines manufactures, or places of public assembly and perhaps, when the walls of the temple had been sufficiently purified by holy rites the worship of the true Deity might be allowed to expiate the ancient guilt of idolatry But as long as they subsisted, the Pagans fondly cherished the secret hope that an auspicious revolution a second Julian, might again restore the altars of the gods and the earnestness with which they addressed their unavailing prayers to the throne[28] increased the zeal of the Christian reformers to extirpate without mercy the root of superstition The laws of the emperors exhibit some symptoms of a milder disposition [29] but their cold and languid efforts were insufficient to stem the torrent of enthusiasm and rapine which was conducted or rather impelled by the spiritual rulers of the church In Gaul the holy Martin, bishop of Tours [30] marched at the head of his faithful monks to destroy the idols the temples and the consecrated trees of his extensive diocese and, in the execution of this arduous task the prudent reader will judge whether Martin was supported by the aid of miraculous powers or of carnal weapons In Syria the divine and excellent Marcellus [31] as he is styled by Theodoret a bishop animated with apostolic fervour resolved to level with the ground the stately temples within the diocese of Apamea His attack was resisted by the skill and solidity with which the temple of Jupiter had been constructed The building was seated on an eminence on each of the four sides the lofty roof was supported by fifteen massy columns, sixteen feet in circumference, and the large stones of which they were composed were firmly cemented with lead and iron The force of the strongest and sharpest tools had been tried without effect It was found necessary to undermine the foundations of the columns, which fell down as soon as the temporary wooden props had been consumed with fire, and the difficulties of the enterprise are described under the allegory of a black dæmon, who retarded, though he could not defeat, the operations of the Christian engineers Elated with victory, Marcellus took the field in person against the powers of darkness, a numerous troop of soldiers and gladiators marched under the episcopal banner, and he successively attacked the villages and country temples of the diocese of Apamea Whenever any resistance or danger was apprehended, the champion of the faith, whose lameness would not allow him either to fight or fly, placed himself at a convenient distance, beyond the reach of darts But this prudence was the occasion of his death, he was surprised and slain by a body of exasperated rustics, and the synod of the province pronounced, without hesitation, that the holy Marcellus had sacrificed his life in the cause of God In the support of this cause, the monks, who rushed with tumultuous fury from the desert, distinguished themselves by their zeal and diligence They deserved the enmity of the Pagans, and some of them might deserve the reproaches of avarice and intemperance, which they indulged at the expense of the people, who foolishly admired their tattered garments, loud psalmody, and artificial paleness [32] A small number of temples was protected by the fears, the venality, the taste, or the prudence of the civil and ecclesiastical governors The temple of the Celestial Venus at Carthage, whose sacred precincts formed a circumference of two miles, was judiciously converted into a Christian church,[33] and a similar consecration had preserved inviolate the majestic dome of the Pantheon at Rome [34] But in almost every province of the Roman world, an army of fanatics, without authority and without discipline, invaded the peaceful inhabitants, and the ruin of the fairest structures of antiquity still displays the ravages of those barbarians who alone had time and inclination to execute such laborious destruction

In this wide and various prospect of devastation, the spectator may distinguish the ruins of the temple of Serapis, at Alexandria [35] Serapis does not appear to have been one of the native gods, or monsters, who sprung from the fruitful soil of superstitious Egypt [36] The first of the Ptolemies had been commanded, by a dream, to import the mysterious stranger from the coast of Pontus, where he had been long adored by the inhabitants of Sinope, but his attributes and his reign were so imperfectly understood, that it became a subject of dispute whether he represented the bright orb of day, or the gloomy monarch of the subterraneous regions [37] The Egyptians, who were obstinately devoted to the religion of their fathers, refused to admit this foreign deity within the walls of their cities [38] But the obsequious priests, who were seduced by the liberality of the Ptolemies, submitted, without resistance, to the power of the god of Pontus an honourable and domestic genealogy was provided, and this fortunate usurper was introduced into the throne and bed of Osiris,[39] the husband of Isis, and the celestial monarch of Egypt Alexandria, which claimed his peculiar protection, gloried in the name of the city of Serapis His temple,[40] which rivalled the pride and magnificence of the Capitol, was erected on the spacious summit of an artificial mount, raised one hundred steps above the level of the adjacent parts of the city, and the interior cavity was strongly supported by arches, and distributed into vaults and subterraneous apartments The consecrated buildings were surrounded by a quadrangular portico, the stately halls and exquisite statues displayed the triumph of the arts, and the treasures of ancient learning were preserved in the famous Alexandrian library, which had arisen with new splendour from its ashes [41] After the edicts of Theodosius had severely prohibited the sacrifices of the Pagans, they were still tolerated in the city and temple of Serapis, and this singular indulgence was imprudently ascribed to the superstitious terrors of the Christians themselves as if they had feared to abolish those ancient rites which could alone secure the inundations of the Nile, the harvests of Egypt, and the subsistence of Constantinople [42]

At that time[43] the archiepiscopal throne of Alexandria was filled by Theophilus,[44] the perpetual enemy of peace and virtue, a bold, bad man, whose hands were alternately polluted with gold and with blood His pious indignation was excited by the honours of Serapis, and the insults which he offered to an ancient chapel of Bacchus convinced the Pagans that he meditated a more important and dangerous enterprise In the tumultuous capital of Egypt, the slightest provocation was sufficient to inflame a civil war The votaries of Serapis, whose strength and numbers were much inferior to those of their antagonists rose in arms at the instigation of the philosopher Olympius [45] who exhorted them to die in the defence of the altars of the gods These Pagan fanatics fortified themselves in the temple or rather fortress of Serapis repelled the besiegers by daring sallies and a resolute defence and by the inhuman cruelties which they exercised on their Christian prisoners obtained the last consolation of despair The efforts of the prudent magistrate were usefully exerted for the establishment of a truce till the answer of Theodosius should determine the fate of Serapis The two parties assembled without arms in the principal square and the Imperial rescript was publicly read But when a sentence of destruction against the idols of Alexandria was pronounced the Christians sent up a shout of joy and exultation whilst the unfortunate Pagans whose fury had given way to consternation retired with hasty and silent steps and eluded by their flight or obscurity the resentment of their enemies Theophilus proceeded to demolish the temple of Serapis without any other difficulties than those which he found in the weight and solidity of the materials but these obstacles proved so insuperable that he was obliged to leave the foundations and to content himself with reducing the edifice itself to a heap of rubbish a part of which was soon afterwards cleared away to make room for a church erected in honour of the Christian martyrs The valuable library of Alexandria was pillaged or destroyed and near twenty years afterwards the appearance of the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every spectator whose mind was not totally darkened by religious prejudice.[46] The compositions of ancient genius so many of which have irretrievably perished might surely have been excepted from the wreck of idolatry for the amusement and instruction of succeeding ages and either the zeal or the avarice of the archbishop[47] might have been satiated with the rich spoils which were the reward of his victory While the images and vases of gold and silver were carefully melted and those of a less valuable metal were contemptuously broken and cast into the streets Theophilus laboured to expose the frauds and vices of the ministers of the idols their dexterity in the management of the loadstone their secret methods of introducing an human actor into a hollow statue and their scandalous abuse of the confidence of devout husbands and unsuspecting females [48] Charges like these may seem to deserve some degree of credit as they are not repugnant to the crafty and interested spirit of superstition. But the same spirit is equally prone to the base practice of insulting and calumniating a fallen enemy and our belief is naturally checked by the reflection that it is much less difficult to invent a fictitious story than to support a practical fraud The colossal statue of Serapis[49] was involved in the ruin of his temple and religion. A great number of plates of different metals, artificially joined together composed the majestic figure of the deity who touched on either side the walls of the sanctuary The aspect of Serapis, his sitting posture and the sceptre which he bore in his left hand were extremely similar to the ordinary representations of Jupiter He was distinguished from Jupiter by the basket, or bushel which was placed on his head and by the emblematic monster which he held in his right hand the head and body of a serpent branching into three tails which were again terminated by the triple heads of a dog a lion, and a wolf It was confidently affirmed that if any impious hand should dare to violate the majesty of the god the heavens and the earth would instantly return to their original chaos. An intrepid soldier, animated by zeal, and armed with a weighty battle axe ascended the ladder and even the Christian multitude expected with some anxiety the event of the combat [50] He aimed a vigorous stroke against the cheek of Serapis the cheek fell to the ground the thunder was still silent and both the heavens and the earth continued to preserve their accustomed order and tranquillity The victorious soldier repeated his blows the huge idol was overthrown and broken in pieces and the limbs of Serapis were ignominiously dragged through the streets of Alexandria His mangled carcase was burnt in the amphitheatre amidst the shouts of the populace and many persons attributed their conversion to this discovery of the impotence of their tutelar deity The popular modes of religion that propose any visible and material objects of worship have the advantage of adapting and familiarising themselves to the senses of mankind but this advantage is counterbalanced by the various and inevitable accidents to which the faith of the idolater is exposed It is scarcely possible that in every disposition of mind he should preserve his implicit reverence for the idols or the relics, which the naked eye and the profane hand are unable to distinguish from the most common productions of art or nature and if in the hour of danger, their secret and miraculous virtue does not operate for their own preservation, he scorns the vain apologies of his priests, and justly derides the object and the folly of his superstitious attachment [51] After the fall of Serapis, some hopes were still entertained by the Pagans that the Nile would refuse his annual supply to the impious masters of Egypt, and the extraordinary delay of the inundation seemed to announce the displeasure of the river-god But this delay was soon compensated by the rapid swell of the waters They suddenly rose to such an unusual height as to comfort the discontented party with the pleasing expectation of a deluge, till the peaceful river again subsided to the well-known and fertilising level of sixteen cubits, or about thirty English feet [52]

The temples of the Roman empire were deserted or destroyed, but the ingenious superstition of the Pagans still attempted to elude the laws of Theodosius, by which all sacrifices had been severely prohibited The inhabitants of the country, whose conduct was less exposed to the eye of malicious curiosity, disguised their religious under the appearance of convivial meetings On the days of solemn festivals they assembled in great numbers under the spreading shade of some consecrated trees, sheep and oxen were slaughtered and roasted, and this rural entertainment was sanctified by the use of incense and by the hymns which were sung in honour of the gods But it was alleged that, as no part of the animal was made a burnt-offering, as no altar was provided to receive the blood, and as the previous oblation of salt cakes and the concluding ceremony of libations were carefully omitted, these festal meetings did not involve the guests in the guilt or penalty of an illegal sacrifice [53] Whatever might be the truth of the facts or the merit of the distinction,[54] these vain pretences were swept away by the last edict of Theodosius, which inflicted a deadly wound on the superstition of the Pagans [55] This prohibitory law is expressed in the most absolute and comprehensive terms "It is our will and pleasure," says the emperor, "that none of our subjects, whether magistrates or private citizens, however exalted or however humble may be their rank and condition, shall presume in any city or in any place to worship an inanimate idol by the sacrifice of a guiltless victim " The act of sacrificing and the practice of divination by the entrails of the victim are declared (without any regard to the object of the inquiry) a crime of high treason against the state, which can be expiated only by the death of the guilty The rites of Pagan superstition which might seem less bloody and atrocious are abolished as highly injurious to the truth and honour of religion, luminaries, garlands, frankincense, and libations of wine are specially enumerated and condemned, and the harmless claims of the domestic genius, of the household gods, are included in this rigorous proscription The use of any of these profane and illegal ceremonies subjects the offender to the forfeiture of the house or estate where they have been performed, and if he has artfully chosen the property of another for the scene of his impiety, he is compelled to discharge, without delay, a heavy fine of twenty-five pounds of gold, or more than one thousand pounds sterling A fine not less considerable is imposed on the connivance of the secret enemies of religion who shall neglect the duty of their respective stations, either to reveal or to punish the guilt of idolatry Such was the persecuting spirit of the laws of Theodosius, which were repeatedly enforced by his sons and grandsons, with the loud and unanimous applause of the Christian world [56]

In the cruel reigns of Decius and Diocletian Christianity had been proscribed, as a revolt from the ancient and hereditary religion of the empire, and the unjust suspicions which were entertained of a dark and dangerous faction were in some measure countenanced by the inseparable union and rapid conquests of the catholic church But the same excuses of fear and ignorance cannot be applied to the Christian emperors, who violated the precepts of humanity and of the Gospel The experience of ages had betrayed the weakness as well as folly of Paganism, the light of reason and of faith had already exposed to the greatest part of mankind the vanity of idols, and the declining sect, which still adhered to their worship, might have been permitted to enjoy in peace and obscurity the religious customs of their ancestors Had the Pagans been animated by the undaunted zeal which possessed the minds of the primitive believers, the triumph of the church must have been stained with blood, and the martyrs of Jupiter and Apollo might have embraced the glorious opportunity of devoting their lives and fortunes at the foot of their altars But such obstinate zeal was not congenial to the loose and careless temper of Polytheism. The violent and repeated strokes of the orthodox princes were broken by the soft and yielding substance against which they were directed, and the ready obedience of the Pagans protected them from the pains and penalties of the Theodosian Code.[57] Instead of asserting that the authority of the gods was superior to that of the emperor they desisted with a plaintive murmur from the use of those sacred rites which their sovereign had condemned If they were sometimes tempted by a sally of passion or by the hopes of concealment to indulge their favourite superstition, their humble repentance disarmed the severity of the Christian magistrate and they seldom refused to atone for their rashness by submitting with some secret reluctance to the yoke of the Gospel The churches were filled with the increasing multitude of these unworthy proselytes who had conformed from temporal motives to the reigning religion and whilst they devoutly imitated the postures and recited the prayers of the faithful they satisfied their conscience by the silent and sincere invocation of the gods of antiquity [58] If the Pagans wanted patience to suffer they wanted spirit to resist and the scattered myriads who deplored the ruin of the temples yielded without a contest to the fortune of their adversaries The disorderly opposition[59] of the peasants of Syria and the populace of Alexandria to the rage of private fanaticism was silenced by the name and authority of the emperor The Pagans of the West without contributing to the elevation of Eugenius disgraced by their partial attachment the cause and character of the usurper The clergy vehemently exclaimed that he aggravated the crime of rebellion by the guilt of apostasy that by his permission the altar of Victory was again restored and that the idolatrous symbols of Jupiter and Hercules were displayed in the field against the invincible standard of the cross But the vain hopes of the Pagans were soon annihilated by the defeat of Eugenius and they were left exposed to the resentment of the conqueror who laboured to deserve the favour of Heaven by the extirpation of idolatry [60]

A nation of slaves is always prepared to applaud the clemency of their master who in the abuse of absolute power does not proceed to the last extremes of injustice and oppression Theodosius might undoubtedly have proposed to his Pagan subjects the alternative of baptism or of death and the eloquent Libanius has praised the moderation of a prince who never enacted by any positive law that all his subjects should immediately embrace and practise the religion of their sovereign [61] The profession of Christianity was not made an essential qualification for the enjoyment of the civil rights of society nor were any peculiar hardships imposed on the sectaries who credulously received the fables of Ovid and obstinately rejected the miracles of the Gospel The palace the schools, the army and the senate were filled with declared and devout Pagans they obtained without distinction the civil and military honours of the empire Theodosius distinguished his liberal regard for virtue and genius by the consular dignity which he bestowed on Symmachus [62] and by the personal friendship which he expressed to Libanius [63] and the two eloquent apologists of Paganism were never required either to change or to dissemble their religious opinions The Pagans were indulged in the most licentious freedom of speech and writing the historical and philosophic remains of Eunapius, Zosimus [64] and the fanatic teachers of the school of Plato betray the most furious animosity and contain the sharpest invectives against the sentiments and conduct of their victorious adversaries If these audacious libels were publicly known we must applaud the good sense of the Christian princes who viewed with a smile of contempt the last struggles of superstition and despair [65] But the Imperial laws which prohibited the sacrifices and ceremonies of Paganism were rigidly executed and every hour contributed to destroy the influence of a religion which was supported by custom rather than by argument The devotion of the poet or the philosopher may be secretly nourished by prayer meditation and study but the exercise of public worship appears to be the only solid foundation of the religious sentiments of the people which derive their force from imitation and habit The interruption of that public exercise may consummate, in the period of a few years the important work of a national revolution The memory of theological opinions cannot long be preserved without the artificial helps of priests of temples and of books [66] The ignorant vulgar whose minds are still agitated by the blind hopes and terrors of superstition will be soon persuaded by their superiors to direct their vows to the reigning deities of the age and will insensibly imbibe an ardent zeal for the support and propagation of the new doctrine which spiritual hunger at first compelled them to accept The generation that arose in the world after the promulgation of the Imperial laws was attracted within the pale of the Catholic church and so rapid yet so gentle was the fall of Paganism, that only twenty-eight years after the death of Theodosius the faint and minute vestiges were no longer visible to the eye of the legislator [67]

stored the ancient dominion of chaos and of [illegible] They relate in solemn and pathetic strains that the temples were converted into sepulchres, and that the holy places, which had been adorned by the statues of the gods, were basely polluted by the relics of Christian martyrs "The monks" (a race of filthy animals, to whom Eunapius is tempted to refuse the name of men) "are the authors of the new worship, which, in the place of those deities who are conceived by the understanding, has substituted the meanest and most contemptible slaves The heads, salted and pickled, of those infamous malefactors, who for the multitude of their crimes have suffered a just and ignominious death, their bodies, still marked by the impression of the lash and the scars of those tortures which were inflicted by the sentence of the magistrate, such" (continues Eunapius) "are the gods which the earth produces in our days, such are the martyrs, the supreme arbitrators of our prayers and petitions to the Deity, whose tombs are now consecrated as the objects of the veneration of the people "[68] Without approving the malice, it is natural enough to share the surprise of the sophist, the spectator of a revolution which raised those obscure victims of the laws of Rome to the rank of celestial and invisible protectors of the Roman empire The grateful respect of the Christians for the martyrs of the faith was exalted, by time and victory, into religious adoration, and the most illustrious of the saints and prophets were deservedly associated to the honours of the martyrs One hundred and fifty years after the glorious deaths of St Peter and St Paul, the Vatican and the Ostian road were distinguished by the tombs, or rather by the trophies, of those spiritual heroes [69] In the age which followed the conversion of Constantine, the emperors, the consuls, and the generals of armies devoutly visited the sepulchres of a tentmaker and a fisherman,[70] and their venerable bones were deposited under the altars of Christ, on which the bishops of the royal city continually offered the unbloody sacrifice [71] The new capital of the Eastern world, unable to produce any ancient and domestic trophies, was enriched by the spoils of dependent provinces The bodies of St Andrew, St Luke, and St Timothy had reposed near three hundred years in the obscure graves from whence they were transported, in solemn pomp, to the church of the apostles, which the magnificence of Constantine had founded on the banks of the Thracian Bosphorus [72] About fifty years afterwards the same banks were honoured by the presence of Samuel, the judge and prophet of the people of Israel His ashes, deposited in a golden vase, and covered with a silken veil, were delivered by the bishops into each other's hands The relics of Samuel were received by the people with the same joy and reverence which they would have shown to the living prophet, the highways, from Palestine to the gates of Constantinople, were filled with an uninterrupted procession, and the emperor Arcadius himself, at the head of the most illustrious members of the clergy and senate, advanced to meet his extraordinary guest, who had always deserved and claimed the homage of kings [73] The example of Rome and Constantinople confirmed the faith and discipline of the catholic world The honours of the saints and martyrs, after a feeble and ineffectual murmur of profane reason,[74] were universally established, and in the age of Ambrose and Jerom something was still deemed wanting to the sanctity of a Christian church, till it had been consecrated by some portion of holy relics, which fixed and inflamed the devotion of the faithful In the long period of twelve hundred years, which elapsed between the reign of Constantine and the reformation of Luther, the worship of saints and relics corrupted the pure and perfect simplicity of the Christian model, and some symptoms of degeneracy may be observed even in the first generations which adopted and cherished this pernicious innovation

I The satisfactory experience that the relics of saints were more valuable than gold or precious stones[75] stimulated the clergy to multiply the treasures of the church Without much regard for truth or probability, they invented names for skeletons, and actions for names The fame of the apostles, and of the holy men who had imitated their virtues, was darkened by religious fiction To the invincible band of genuine and primitive martyrs they added myriads of imaginary heroes, who had never existed, except in the fancy of crafty or credulous legendaries, and there is reason to suspect that Tours might not be the only diocese in which the bones of a malefactor were adored instead of those of a saint [76] A superstitious practice, which tended to increase the temptations of fraud and credulity, insensibly extinguished the light of history and of reason in the Christian world

II But the progress of superstition would have been much less rapid and victorious if the faith of the people had not been assisted by the seasonable aid of visions and miracles to ascertain the authenticity and virtue of the most suspicious relics In the reign of the younger Theo-

dosius Lucian [77] a presbyter of Jerusalem and the ecclesiastical minister of the village of Caphargamala about twenty miles from the city related a very singular dream which to remove his doubts had been repeated on three successive Saturdays A venerable figure stood before him in the silence of the night with a long beard a white robe and a gold rod announced himself by the name of Gamaliel and revealed to the astonished presbyter that his own corpse with the bodies of his son Abibas his friend Nicodemus and the illustrious Stephen the first martyr of the Christian faith were secretly buried in the adjacent field He added with some impatience that it was time to release himself and his companions from their obscure prison that their appearance would be salutary to a distressed world and that they had made choice of Lucian to inform the bishop of Jerusalem of their situation and their wishes The doubts and difficulties which still retarded this important discovery were successively removed by new visions and the ground was opened by the bishop in the presence of an innumerable multitude The coffins of Gamaliel of his son and of his friend were found in regular order but when the fourth coffin which contained the remains of Stephen was shown to the light the earth trembled and an odour such as that of Paradise was smelt which instantly cured the various diseases of seventy three of the assistants The companions of Stephen were left in their peaceful residence of Caphargamala but the relics of the first martyr were transported in solemn procession to a church constructed in their honour on Mount Sion and the minute particles of those relics a drop of blood [78] or the scrapings of a bone were acknowledged in almost every province of the Roman world to possess a divine and miraculous virtue The grave and learned Augustin [79] whose understanding scarcely admits the excuse of credulity has attested the innumerable prodigies which were performed in Africa by the relics of St Stephen and this marvellous narrative is inserted in the elaborate work of the City of God which the bishop of Hippo designed as a solid and immortal proof of the truth of Christianity Augustin solemnly declares that he has selected those miracles only which were publicly certified by the persons who were either the objects or the spectators of the power of the martyr Many prodigies were omitted or forgotten and Hippo had been less favourably treated than the other cities of the province And yet the bishop enumerates above seventy miracles of which three were resurrections from the dead, in the space of two years and within the limits of his own diocese [80] If we enlarge our view to all the diocese and all the saints of the Christian world it will not be easy to calculate the fables and the errors which issued from this inexhaustible source But we may surely be allowed to observe that a miracle in that age of superstition and credulity lost its name and its merit since it could scarcely be considered as a deviation from the ordinary and established laws of nature

III The innumerable miracles of which the tombs of the martyrs were the perpetual theatre, revealed to the pious believer the actual state and constitution of the invisible world and his religious speculations appeared to be founded on the firm basis of fact and experience Whatever might be the condition of vulgar souls in the long interval between the dissolution and the resurrection of their bodies it was evident that the superior spirits of the saints and martyrs did not consume that portion of their existence in silent and inglorious sleep [81] It was evident (without presuming to determine the place of their habitation or the nature of their felicity) that they enjoyed the lively and active consciousness of their happiness their virtue and their powers and that they had already secured the possession of their eternal reward The enlargement of their intellectual faculties surpassed the measure of the human imagination since it was proved by experience that they were capable of hearing and understanding the various petitions of their numerous votaries who in the same moment of time but in the most distant parts of the world invoked the name and assistance of Stephen or of Martin [82] The confidence of their petitioners was founded on the persuasion that the saints who reigned with Christ cast an eye of pity upon earth that they were warmly interested in the prosperity of the Catholic church and that the individuals who imitated the example of their faith and piety were the peculiar and favourite objects of their most tender regard Sometimes indeed their friendship might be influenced by considerations of a less exalted kind they viewed with partial affection the places which had been consecrated by their birth their residence their death their burial, or the possession of their relics The meaner passions of pride avarice and revenge may be deemed unworthy of a celestial breast yet the saints themselves condescended to testify their grateful approbation of the liberality of their votaries and the sharpest bolts of punishment

were hurled against those impious wretches who violated their magnificent shrines, or disbelieved their supernatural power[83] Atrocious, indeed, must have been the guilt, and strange would have been the scepticism, of those men, if they had obstinately resisted the proofs of a divine agency, which the elements, the whole range of the animal creation, and even the subtle and invisible operations of the human mind, were compelled to obey[84] The immediate, and almost instantaneous, effects, that were supposed to follow the prayer, or the offence, satisfied the Christians of the ample measure of favour and authority which the saints enjoyed in the presence of the Supreme God, and it seemed almost superfluous to inquire whether they were continually obliged to intercede before the throne of grace, or whether they might not be permitted to exercise, according to the dictates of their benevolence and justice, the delegated powers of their subordinate ministry The imagination, which had been raised by a painful effort to the contemplation and worship of the Universal Cause, eagerly embraced such inferior objects of adoration as were more proportioned to its gross conceptions and imperfect faculties The sublime and simple theology of the primitive Christians was gradually corrupted and the MONARCHY of heaven, already clouded by metaphysical subtleties, was degraded by the introduction of a popular mythology which tended to restore the reign of polytheism[85]

IV As the objects of religion were gradually reduced to the standard of the imagination, the rites and ceremonies were introduced that seemed most powerfully to affect the senses of the vulgar If, in the beginning of the fifth century,[86] Tertullian, or Lactantius,[87] had been suddenly raised from the dead, to assist at the festival of some popular saint or martyr,[88] they would have gazed with astonishment and indignation on the profane spectacle which had succeeded to the pure and spiritual worship of a Christian congregation As soon as the doors of the church were thrown open, they must have been offended by the smoke of incense, the perfume of flowers, and the glare of lamps and tapers, which diffused, at noon-day, a gaudy, superfluous, and, in their opinion, a sacrilegious light If they approached the balustrade of the altar, they made their way through the prostrate crowd, consisting, for the most part, of strangers and pilgrims, who resorted to the city on the vigil of the feast, and who already felt the strong intoxication of fanaticism, and, perhaps, of wine Their devout kisses were imprinted on the walls and pavement of the sacred edifice, and their fervent prayers were directed, whatever might be the language of their church, to the bones, the blood, or the ashes of the saint, which were usually concealed, by a linen or silken veil, from the eyes of the vulgar The Christians frequented the tombs of the martyrs, in the hope of obtaining, from their powerful intercession, every sort of spiritual, but more especially of temporal, blessings They implored the preservation of their health, or the cure of their infirmities, the fruitfulness of their barren wives, or the safety and happiness of their children Whenever they undertook any distant or dangerous journey, they requested that the holy martyrs would be their guides and protectors on the road, and if they returned without having experienced any misfortune, they again hastened to the tombs of the martyrs, to celebrate, with grateful thanksgivings, their obligations to the memory and relics of those heavenly patrons The walls were hung round with symbols of the favours which they had received, eyes, and hands, and feet, of gold and silver and edifying pictures, which could not long escape the abuse of indiscreet or idolatrous devotion, represented the image, the attributes, and the miracles of the tutelar saint The same uniform original spirit of superstition might suggest, in the most distant ages and countries, the same methods of deceiving the credulity, and of affecting the senses of mankind[89] but it must ingenuously be confessed that the ministers of the catholic church imitated the profane model which they were impatient to destroy The most respectable bishops had persuaded themselves that the ignorant rustics would more cheerfully renounce the superstitions of Paganism, if they found some resemblance, some compensation, in the bosom of Christianity The religion of Constantine achieved, in less than a century, the final conquest of the Roman empire but the victors themselves were insensibly subdued by the arts of their vanquished rivals[90]

CHAPTER XXIX

Final Division of the Roman Empire between the Sons of Theodosius Reign of Arca dius and Honorius Administration of Rufinus and Stilicho Revolt and Defeat of Gildo in Africa

THE genius of Rome expired with Theodosius the last of the successors of Augustus and Constantine who appeared in the field at the head of their armies and whose authority was universally acknowledged throughout the whole extent of the empire The memory of his virtues still continued how ever to protect the feeble and inexperienced youth of his two sons After the death of their father Arcadius and Honorius were saluted by the unanimous consent of mankind as the law ful emperors of the East and of the West and the oath of fidelity was eagerly taken by every order of the state the senates of old and new Rome the clergy the magistrates the soldiers and the people. Arcadius who then was about eighteen years of age was born in Spain in the humble habitation of a private family But he received a princely education in the palace of Constantinople and his inglorious life was spent in that peaceful and splendid seat of roy alty from whence he appeared to reign over the provinces of Thrace Asia Minor Syria and Egypt from the Lower Danube to the confines of Persia and Æthiopia His younger brother Honorius assumed in the eleventh year of his age the nominal government of Italy Africa Gaul Spain and Britain and the troops which guarded the frontiers of his kingdom were opposed on one side to the Caledonians and on the other to the Moors The great and martial præfecture of Illyricum was divided between the two princes the defence and possession of the provinces of Noricum Pannonia and Dal matia still belonged to the Western empire but the two large dioceses of Dacia and Mace donia which Gratian had intrusted to the val our of Theodosius were for ever united to the empire of the East. The boundary in Europe was not very different from the line which now separates the Germans and the Turks and the respective advantages of territory riches popu lousness and military strength, were fairly bal anced and compensated in this final and perma nent division of the Roman empire The heredi tary sceptre of the sons of Theodosius appeared to be the gift of nature and of their father, the generals and ministers had been accustomed to adore the majesty of the royal infants and the army and people were not admonished of their rights and of their power by the dangerous ex ample of a recent election. The gradual discov ery of the weakness of Arcadius and Honorius, and the repeated calamities of their reign were not sufficient to obliterate the deep and early impressions of loyalty The subjects of Rome, who still reverenced the persons or rather the names of their sovereigns beheld with equal abhorrence the rebels who opposed and the ministers who abused the authority of the throne

Theodosius had tarnished the glory of his reign by the elevation of Rufinus an odious fa vourite who in an age of civil and religious fac tion has deserved from every party the impu tation of every crime The strong impulse of ambition and avarice[1] had urged Rufinus to abandon his native country an obscure corner of Gaul [2] to advance his fortune in the capital of the East the talent of bold and ready elocution[3] qualified him to succeed in the lucrative profes sion of the law and his success in that profes sion was a regular step to the most honourable and important employments of the state He was raised by just degrees to the station of master of the offices In the exercise of his vari ous functions so essentially connected with t whole system of civil government, he acquir the confidence of a monarch who soon disco ered his diligence and capacity in business, a who long remained ignorant of the pride, t malice and the covetousness of his dispositio These vices were concealed beneath the mask profound dissimulation [4] his passions were su servient only to the passions of his master ye in the horrid massacre of Thessalonica the cru Rufinus inflamed the fury without imitatin the repentance of Theodosius The ministe who viewed with proud indifference the rest o mankind never forgave the appearance of an in jury and his personal enemies had forfeited, i his opinion the merit of all public services. Pr motus the master general of the infantry ha saved the empire from the invasion of the Ostro goths, but he indignantly supported the pre-eminence of a rival whose character and profession he despised, and, in the midst of a public council, the impatient soldier was provoked to chastise with a blow the indecent pride of the favourite This act of violence was represented to the emperor as an insult which it was incumbent on his dignity to resent The disgrace and exile of Promotus were signified by a peremptory order to repair without delay to a military station on the banks of the Danube, and the death of that general (though he was slain in a skirmish with the barbarians) was imputed to the perfidious arts of Rufinus [5] The sacrifice of an hero gratified his revenge, the honours of the consulship elated his vanity, but his power was still imperfect and precarious as long as the important posts of præfect of the East, and of præfect of Constantinople, were filled by Tatian[6] and his son Proculus, whose united authority balanced for some time the ambition and favour of the master of the offices The two præfects were accused of rapine and corruption in the administration of the laws and finances For the trial of these illustrious offenders the emperor constituted a special commission several judges were named to share the guilt and reproach of injustice, but the right of pronouncing sentence was reserved to the president alone, and that president was Rufinus himself The father, stripped of the præfecture of the East, was thrown into a dungeon, but the son, conscious that few ministers can be found innocent where an enemy is their judge, had secretly escaped, and Rufinus must have been satisfied with the least obnoxious victim, if despotism had not condescended to employ the basest and most ungenerous artifice The prosecution was conducted with an appearance of equity and moderation which flattered Tatian with the hope of a favourable event his confidence was fortified by the solemn assurances and perfidious oaths of the president, who presumed to interpose the sacred name of Theodosius himself, and the unhappy father was at last persuaded to recall, by a private letter, the fugitive Proculus He was instantly seized, examined, condemned, and beheaded in one of the suburbs of Constantinople, with a precipitation which disappointed the clemency of the emperor Without respecting the misfortunes of a consular senator, the cruel judges of Tatian compelled him to behold the execution of his son the fatal cord was fastened round his own neck, but in the moment when he expected, and perhaps desired, the relief of a speedy death, he was permitted to consume the miserable remnant of his old age in poverty and exile [7] The punishment of the two præfects might perhaps be excused by the exceptionable parts of their own conduct, the enmity of Rufinus might be palliated by the jealous and unsociable nature of ambition But he indulged a spirit of revenge, equally repugnant to prudence and to justice, when he degraded their native country of Lycia from the rank of Roman provinces, stigmatised a guiltless people with a mark of ignominy, and declared that the countrymen of Tatian and Proculus should for ever remain incapable of holding any employment of honour or advantage under the Imperial government [8] The new præfect of the East (for Rufinus instantly succeeded to the vacant honours of his adversary) was not diverted, however, by the most criminal pursuits from the performance of the religious duties which in that age were considered as the most essential to salvation. In the suburb of Chalcedon, surnamed the Oak, he had built a magnificent villa, to which he devoutly added a stately church consecrated to the apostles St Peter and St Paul, and continually sanctified by the prayers and penance of a regular society of monks A numerous and almost general synod of the bishops of the Eastern empire was summoned to celebrate at the same time the dedication of the church and the baptism of the founder This double ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp, and when Rufinus was purified in the holy font from all the sins that he had hitherto committed, a venerable hermit of Egypt rashly proposed himself as the sponsor of a proud and ambitious statesman [9]

The character of Theodosius imposed on his minister the task of hypocrisy, which disguised, and sometimes restrained, the abuse of power, and Rufinus was apprehensive of disturbing the indolent slumber of a prince still capable of exerting the abilities and the virtue which had raised him to the throne [10] But the absence, and soon afterwards the death, of the emperor confirmed the absolute authority of Rufinus over the person and dominions of Arcadius, a feeble youth, whom the imperious præfect considered as his pupil, rather than his sovereign Regardless of the public opinion, he indulged his passions without remorse and without resistance, and his malignant and rapacious spirit rejected every passion that might have contributed to his own glory or the happiness of the people His avarice,[11] which seems to have prevailed in his corrupt mind over every other sentiment, attracted the wealth of the East by the various arts of partial and general extortion—oppressive taxes scandalous bribery immoderate fines unjust confiscations forced or fictitious testaments by which the tyrant despoiled of their lawful inheritance the children of strangers or enemies and the public sale of justice as well as of favour which he instituted in the palace of Constantinople The ambitious candidate eagerly solicited at the expense of the fairest part of his patrimony the honours and emoluments of some provincial government the lives and fortunes of the unhappy people were abandoned to the most liberal purchaser and the public discontent was sometimes appeased by the sacrifice of an unpopular criminal whose punishment was profitable only to the præfect of the East his accomplice and his judge If avarice were not the blindest of the human passions the motives of Rufinus might excite our curiosity and we might be tempted to inquire with what view he violated every principle of humanity and justice to accumulate those immense treasures which he could not spend without folly nor possess without danger Perhaps he vainly imagined that he laboured for the interest of an only daughter on whom he intended to bestow his royal pupil and the august rank of empress of the East Perhaps he deceived himself by the opinion that his avarice was the instrument of his ambition He aspired to place his fortune on a secure and independent basis which should no longer depend on the caprice of the young emperor yet he neglected to conciliate the hearts of the soldiers and people by the liberal distribution of those riches which he had acquired with so much toil and with so much guilt The extreme parsimony of Rufinus left him only the reproach and envy of ill-gotten wealth his dependents served him without attachment the universal hatred of mankind was repressed only by the influence of servile fear The fate of Lucian proclaimed to the East that the præfect whose industry was much abated in the despatch of ordinary business was active and indefatigable in the pursuit of revenge Lucian the son of the præfect Florentius, the oppressor of Gaul and the enemy of Julian had employed a considerable part of his inheritance the fruit of rapine and corruption to purchase the friendship of Rufinus and the high office of count of the East. But the new magistrate imprudently departed from the maxims of the court and of the times disgraced his benefactor by the contrast of a virtuous and temperate administration and presumed to refuse an act of injustice which might have tended to the profit of the emperor s uncle Arcadius was easily persuaded to resent the supposed insult and the præfect of the East resolved to execute in person the cruel vengeance which he meditated against this ungrateful delegate of his power He performed with incessant speed the journey of seven or eight hundred miles from Constantinople to Antioch entered the capital of Syria at the dead of night, and spread universal consternation among a people ignorant of his design but not ignorant of his character The count of the fifteen provinces of the East was dragged like the vilest malefactor before the arbitrary tribunal of Rufinus Notwithstanding the clearest evidence of his integrity which was not impeached even by the voice of an accuser Lucian was condemned almost without a trial to suffer a cruel and ignominious punishment The ministers of the tyrant, by the order and in the presence of their master beat him on the neck[1] with leather thongs armed at the extremities with lead and when he fainted under the violence of the pain he was removed in a close litter to conceal his dying agonies from the eyes of the indignant city No sooner had Rufinus perpetrated this inhuman act the sole object of his expedition, than he returned amidst the deep and silent curses of a trembling people from Antioch to Constantinople and his diligence was accelerated by the hope of accomplishing without delay the nuptials of his daughter with the emperor of the East[11]

But Rufinus soon experienced that a prudent minister should constantly secure his royal captive by the strong though invisible chain of habit and that the merit and much more easily the favour of the absent are obliterated in a short time from the mind of a weak and capricious sovereign While the præfect satiated his revenge at Antioch a secret conspiracy of the favourite eunuchs, directed by the great chamberlain Eutropius undermined his power in the palace of Constantinople They discovered that Arcadius was not inclined to love the daughter of Rufinus who had been chosen without his consent for his bride and they contrived to substitute in her place the fair Eudoxia the daughter of Bauto[12] a general of the Franks in the service of Rome and who was educated, since the death of her father in the family of the sons of Promotus The young emperor whose chastity had been strictly guarded by the pious care of his tutor Arsenius[14] eagerly listened to the artful and flattering descriptions of the charms of Eudoxia he gazed with impatient ardour on her picture, and he understood the necessity of concealing his amorous designs from the knowledge of a minister who was so deeply interested to oppose the consummation of his happiness Soon after the return of Rufinus, the approaching ceremony of the royal nuptials was announced to the people of Constantinople, who prepared to celebrate with false and hollow acclamations the fortune of his daughter A splendid train of eunuchs and officers issued, in hymeneal pomp, from the gates of the palace, bearing aloft the diadem, the robes, and the inestimable ornaments of the future empress The solemn procession passed through the streets of the city, which were adorned with garlands and filled with spectators, but when it reached the house of the sons of Promotus, the principal eunuch respectfully entered the mansion, invested the fair Eudoxia with the Imperial robes, and conducted her in triumph to the palace and bed of Arcadius [15] The secrecy and success with which this conspiracy against Rufinus had been conducted imprinted a mark of indelible ridicule on the character of a minister who had suffered himself to be deceived, in a post where the arts of deceit and dissimulation constitute the most distinguished merit He considered, with a mixture of indignation and fear, the victory of an aspiring eunuch who had secretly captivated the favour of his sovereign, and the disgrace of his daughter, whose interest was inseparably connected with his own, wounded the tenderness, or at least the pride, of Rufinus At the moment when he flattered himself that he should become the father of a line of kings, a foreign maid, who had been educated in the house of his implacable enemies, was introduced into the Imperial bed, and Eudoxia soon displayed a superiority of sense and spirit to improve the ascendant which her beauty must acquire over the mind of a fond and youthful husband The emperor would soon be instructed to hate, to fear, and to destroy the powerful subject whom he had injured, and the consciousness of guilt deprived Rufinus of every hope, either of safety or comfort, in the retirement of a private life But he still possessed the most effectual means of defending his dignity, and perhaps of oppressing his enemies The præfect still exercised an uncontrolled authority over the civil and military government of the East, and his treasures, if he could resolve to use them, might be employed to procure proper instruments for the execution of the blackest designs that pride, ambition, and revenge could suggest to a desperate statesman The character of Rufinus seemed to justify the accusations that he conspired against the person of his sovereign to seat himself on the vacant throne, and that he had secretly invited the Huns and the Goths to invade the provinces of the empire and to increase the public confusion The subtle præfect, whose life had been spent in the intrigues of the palace, opposed with equal arms the artful measures of the eunuch Eutropius, but the timid soul of Rufinus was astonished by the hostile approach of a more formidable rival, of the great Stilicho, the general, or rather the master, of the empire of the West [16]

The celestial gift, which Achilles obtained, and Alexander envied, of a poet worthy to celebrate the actions of heroes, has been enjoyed by Stilicho, in a much higher degree than might have been expected from the declining state of genius and of art The muse of Claudian,[17] devoted to his service, was always prepared to stigmatise his adversaries, Rufinus or Eutropius, with eternal infamy, or to paint, in the most splendid colours, the victories and virtues of a powerful benefactor In the review of a period indifferently supplied with authentic materials, we cannot refuse to illustrate the annals of Honorius from the invectives, or the panegyrics, of a contemporary writer, but as Claudian appears to have indulged the most ample privilege of a poet and a courtier, some criticism will be requisite to translate the language of fiction or exaggeration into the truth and simplicity of historic prose His silence concerning the family of Stilicho may be admitted as a proof that his patron was neither able nor desirous to boast of a long series of illustrious progenitors, and the slight mention of his father, an officer of barbarian cavalry in the service of Valens, seems to countenance the assertion that the general who so long commanded the armies of Rome was descended from the savage and perfidious race of the Vandals [18] If Stilicho had not possessed the external advantages of strength and stature, the most flattering bard, in the presence of so many thousand spectators, would have hesitated to affirm that he surpassed the measure of the demi gods of antiquity, and that, whenever he moved, with lofty steps, through the streets of the capital, the astonished crowd made room for the stranger, who displayed, in a private condition, the awful majesty of a hero From his earliest youth he embraced the profession of arms, his prudence and valour were soon distinguished in the field, the horsemen and archers of the East admired his superior dexterity, and in each degree of his military promotions the public judgment always prevented and approved the choice of the sovereign He was named by Theodosius to ratify a solemn treaty with the monarch of Persia he supported during that important embassy the dignity of the Roman name and after his return to Constantinople his merit was rewarded by an intimate and honourable alliance with the Imperial family Theodosius had been prompted by a pious motive of fraternal affection to adopt for his own the daughter of his brother Honorius the beauty and accomplishments of Serena[19] were universally admired by the obsequious court and Stilicho obtained the preference over a crowd of rivals who ambitiously disputed the hand of the princess and the favour of her adoptive father [20] The assurance that the husband of Serena would be faithful to the throne which he was permitted to approach engaged the emperor to exalt the fortunes and to employ the abilities of the sagacious and intrepid Stilicho He rose through the successive steps of master of the horse and count of the domestics to the supreme rank of master general of all the cavalry and infantry of the Roman or at least of the Western empire [21] and his enemies confessed that he invariably disdained to barter for gold the rewards of merit or to defraud the soldiers of the pay and gratifications which they deserved or claimed from the liberality of the state [22] The valour and conduct which he afterwards displayed in the defence of Italy against the arms of Alaric and Radagaisus may justify the fame of his early achievements and in an age less attentive to the laws of honour or of pride the Roman generals might yield the pre-eminence of rank to the ascendant of superior genius [23] He lamented and revenged the murder of Promotus his rival and his friend and the massacre of many thousands of the flying Bastarnæ is represented by the poet as a bloody sacrifice which the Roman Achilles offered to the names of another Patroclus The virtues and victories of Stilicho deserved the hatred of Rufinus and the arts of calumny might have been successful if the tender and vigilant Serena had not protected her husband against his domestic foes whilst he vanquished in the field the enemies of the empire [24] Theodosius continued to support an unworthy minister to whose diligence he delegated the government of the palace and of the East but when he marched against the tyrant Eugenius he associated his faithful general to the labours and glories of the civil war and in the last moments of his life the dying monarch recommended to Stilicho the care of his sons and of the republic.[25] The ambition and the abilities of Stilicho were not unequal to the important trust and he claimed the guardianship of the two empires during the minority of Arcadius and Honorius [26] The first measure of his administration or rather of his reign displayed to the nations the vigour and activity of a spirit worthy to command He passed the Alps in the depth of winter descended the stream of the Rhine from the fortress of Basel to the marshes of Batavia reviewed the state of the garrisons repressed the enterprises of the Germans and, after establishing along the banks a firm and honourable peace returned with incredible speed to the palace of Milan [27] The person and court of Honorius were subject to the master general of the West and the armies and provinces of Europe obeyed without hesitation a regular authority which was exercised in the name of their young sovereign Two rivals only remained to dispute the claims and to provoke the vengeance of Stilicho Within the limits of Africa Gildo the Moor maintained a proud and dangerous independence and the minister of Constantinople asserted his equal reign over the emperor and the empire of the East.

The impartiality which Stilicho affected as the common guardian of the royal brothers, engaged him to regulate the equal division of the arms the jewels and the magnificent wardrobe and furniture of the deceased emperor [28] But the most important object of the inheritance consisted of the numerous legions cohorts, and squadrons of Romans or barbarians whom the event of the civil war had united under the standard of Theodosius The various multitudes of Europe and Asia exasperated by recent animosities were overawed by the authority of a single man and the rigid discipline of Stilicho protected the lands of the citizen from the rapine of the licentious soldier [29] Anxious however and impatient to relieve Italy from the presence of this formidable host which could be useful only on the frontiers of the empire he listened to the just requisition of the minister of Arcadius declared his intention of reconducting in person the troops of the East and dexterously employed the rumour of a Gothic tumult to conceal his private designs of ambition and revenge [30] The guilty soul of Rufinus was alarmed by the approach of a warrior and a rival whose enmity he deserved he computed with increasing terror the narrow space of his life and greatness and as the last hope of safety he interposed the authority of the emperor Arcadius

Stilicho, who appears to have directed his march along the sea coast of the Hadriatic, was not far distant from the city of Thessalonica when he received a peremptory message to recall the troops of the East, and to declare that his nearer approach would be considered, by the Byzantine court, as an act of hostility The prompt and unexpected obedience of the general of the West convinced the vulgar of his loyalty and moderation, and, as he had already engaged the affection of the Eastern troops, he recommended to their zeal the execution of his bloody design, which might be accomplished in his absence, with less danger perhaps, and with less reproach Stilicho left the command of the troops of the East to Gainas, the Goth, on whose fidelity he firmly relied, with an assurance at least that the hardy barbarian would never be diverted from his purpose by any consideration of fear or remorse The soldiers were easily persuaded to punish the enemy of Stilicho and of Rome, and such was the general hatred which Rufinus had excited, that the fatal secret, communicated to thousands, was faithfully preserved during the long march from Thessalonica to the gates of Constantinople As soon as they had resolved his death, they condescended to flatter his pride, the ambitious præfect was seduced to believe that those powerful auxiliaries might be tempted to place the diadem on his head, and the treasures which he distributed with a tardy and reluctant hand were accepted by the indignant multitude as an insult rather than as a gift At the distance of a mile from the capital, in the field of Mars, before the palace of Hebdomon, the troops halted, and the emperor, as well as his minister, advanced, according to ancient custom, respectfully to salute the power which supported their throne As Rufinus passed along the ranks, and disguised, with studied courtesy, his innate haughtiness, the wings insensibly wheeled from the right and left, and enclosed the devoted victim within the circle of their arms Before he could reflect on the danger of his situation, Gainas gave the signal of death, a daring and forward soldier plunged his sword into the breast of the guilty præfect, and Rufinus fell, groaned, and expired, at the feet of the affrighted emperor If the agonies of a moment could expiate the crimes of a whole life, or if the outrages inflicted on a breathless corpse could be the object of pity, our humanity might perhaps be affected by the horrid circumstances which accompanied the murder of Rufinus His mangled body was abandoned to the brutal fury of the populace of either sex, who hastened in crowds, from every quarter of the city, to trample on the remains of the haughty minister, at whose frown they had so lately trembled His right hand was cut off, and carried through the streets of Constantinople, in cruel mockery, to extort contributions for the avaricious tyrant, whose head was publicly exposed, borne aloft on the point of a long lance [31] According to the savage maxims of the Greek republics, his innocent family would have shared the punishment of his crimes The wife and daughter of Rufinus were indebted for their safety to the influence of religion Her sanctuary protected them from the raging madness of the people, and they were permitted to spend the remainder of their lives in the exercises of Christian devotion in the peaceful retirement of Jerusalem [32]

The servile poet of Stilicho applauds with ferocious joy this horrid deed, which, in the execution, perhaps of justice, violated every law of nature and society, profaned the majesty of the prince, and renewed the dangerous examples of military licence The contemplation of the universal order and harmony had satisfied Claudian of the existence of the Deity, but the prosperous impunity of vice appeared to contradict his moral attributes, and the fate of Rufinus was the only event which could dispel the religious doubts of the poet [33] Such an act might vindicate the honour of Providence, but it did not much contribute to the happiness of the people In less than three months they were informed of the maxims of the new administration, by a singular edict, which established the exclusive right of the treasury over the spoils of Rufinus, they silenced, under heavy penalties, the presumptuous claims of the subjects of the Eastern empire who had been injured by his rapacious tyranny [34] Even Stilicho did not derive from the murder of his rival the fruit which he had proposed, and though he gratified his revenge, his ambition was disappointed Under the name of a favourite, the weakness of Arcadius required a master, but he naturally preferred the obsequious arts of the eunuch Eutropius, who had obtained his domestic confidence, and the emperor contemplated with terror and aversion the stern genius of a foreign warrior Till they were divided by the jealousy of power, the sword of Gainas, and the charms of Eudoxia, supported the favour of the great chamberlain of the palace the perfidious Goth, who was appointed master-general of the East, betrayed, without scruple, the interest of his benefactor, and the same troops who had so lately mas-

sacred the enemy of Stilicho were engaged to support against him the independence of the throne of Constantinople The favourites of Arcadius fomented a secret and irreconcilable war against a formidable hero who aspired to govern and to defend the two empires of Rome and the two sons of Theodosius They incessantly laboured by dark and treacherous machinations to deprive him of the esteem of the prince the respect of the people and the friendship of the barbarians The life of Stilicho was repeatedly attempted by the dagger of hired assassins and a decree was obtained from the senate of Constantinople to declare him an enemy of the republic and to confiscate his ample possessions in the provinces of the East At a time when the only hope of delaying the ruin of the Roman name depended on the firm union and reciprocal aid of all the nations to whom it had been gradually communicated the subjects of Arcadius and Honorius were instructed by their respective masters, to view each other in a foreign and even hostile light to rejoice in their mutual calamities and to embrace as their faithful allies the barbarians whom they excited to invade the territories of their countrymen [35] The natives of Italy affected to despise the servile and effeminate Greeks of Byzantium who presumed to imitate the dress and to usurp the dignity of Roman senators [36] and the Greeks had not yet forgot the sentiments of hatred and contempt which their polished ancestors had so long entertained for the rude inhabitants of the West The distinction of two governments which soon produced the separation of two nations will justify my design of suspending the series of the Byzantine history to prosecute without interruption the disgraceful but memorable reign of Honorius

The prudent Stilicho instead of persisting to force the inclinations of a prince and people who rejected his government wisely abandoned Arcadius to his unworthy favourites and his reluctance to involve the two empires in a civil war displayed the moderation of a minister who had so often signalised his military spirit and abilities But if Stilicho had any longer endured the revolt of Africa he would have betrayed the security of the capital and the majesty of the Western emperor to the capricious insolence of a Moorish rebel. Gildo [37] the brother of the tyrant Firmus had preserved and obtained as the reward of his apparent fidelity the immense patrimony which was forfeited by treason long and meritorious service in the armies of Rome raised him to the dignity of a military count the narrow policy of the court of Theodosius had adopted the mischievous expedient of supporting a legal government by the interest of a powerful family and the brother of Firmus was invested with the command of Africa His ambition soon usurped the administration of justice and of the finances without account and without control and he maintained during a reign of twelve years, the possession of an office from which it was impossible to remove him without the danger of a civil war During those twelve years the provinces of Africa groaned under the dominion of a tyrant who seemed to unite the unfeeling temper of a stranger with the partial resentments of domestic faction The forms of law were often superseded by the use of poison and if the trembling guests who were invited to the table of Gildo presumed to express their fears the insolent suspicion served only to excite his fury and he loudly summoned the ministers of death Gildo alternately indulged the passions of avarice and lust [38] and if his days were terrible to the rich, his nights were not less dreadful to husbands and parents The fairest of their wives and daughters were prostituted to the embraces of the tyrant and afterwards abandoned to a ferocious troop of barbarians and assassins the black or swarthy natives of the desert whom Gildo considered as the only guardians of his throne In the civil war between Theodosius and Eugenius the count or rather the sovereign of Africa maintained a haughty and suspicious neutrality refused to assist either of the contending parties with troops or vessels expected the declaration of fortune and reserved for the conqueror the vain professions of his allegiance. Such professions would not have satisfied the master of the Roman world but the death of Theodosius and the weakness and discord of his sons confirmed the power of the Moor who condescended as a proof of his moderation, to abstain from the use of the diadem and to supply Rome with the customary tribute or rather subsidy of corn In every division of the empire the five provinces of Africa were invariably assigned to the West and Gildo had consented to govern that extensive country in the name of Honorius but his knowledge of the character and designs of Stilicho soon engaged him to address his homage to a more distant and feeble sovereign The ministers of Arcadius embraced the cause of a perfidious rebel and the delusive hope of adding the numerous cities of Africa to the empire of the East tempted them to assert a claim which they were incapable of supporting either by reason or by arms [39]

When Stilicho had given a firm and decisive answer to the pretensions of the Byzantine court, he solemnly accused the tyrant of Africa before the tribunal which had formerly judged the kings and nations of the earth, and the image of the republic was revived, after a long interval, under the reign of Honorius The emperor transmitted an accurate and ample detail of the complaints of the provincials, and the crimes of Gildo, to the Roman senate, and the members of that venerable assembly were required to pronounce the condemnation of the rebel Their unanimous suffrage declared him the enemy of the republic, and the decree of the senate added a sacred and legitimate sanction to the Roman arms [40] A people who still remembered that their ancestors had been the masters of the world would have applauded, with conscious pride, the representation of ancient freedom, if they had not long since been accustomed to prefer the solid assurance of bread to the unsubstantial visions of liberty and greatness The subsistence of Rome depended on the harvests of Africa, and it was evident that a declaration of war would be the signal of famine The præfect Symmachus, who presided in the deliberations of the senate, admonished the minister of his just apprehension that, as soon as the revengeful Moor should prohibit the exportation of corn, the tranquillity, and perhaps the safety, of the capital would be threatened by the hungry rage of a turbulent multitude [41] The prudence of Stilicho conceived, and executed without delay, the most effectual measure for the relief of the Roman people A large and seasonable supply of corn, collected in the inland provinces of Gaul, was embarked on the rapid stream of the Rhone, and transported by an easy navigation from the Rhone to the Tiber During the whole term of the African war, the granaries of Rome were continually filled, her dignity was vindicated from the humiliating dependence, and the minds of an immense people were quieted by the calm confidence of peace and plenty [42]

The cause of Rome, and the conduct of the African war, were intrusted by Stilicho to a general active and ardent to avenge his private injuries on the head of the tyrant The spirit of discord which prevailed in the house of Nabal had excited a deadly quarrel between two of his sons, Gildo and Mascezel [43] The usurper pursued, with implacable rage, the life of his younger brother, whose courage and abilities he feared, and Mascezel, oppressed by superior power, took refuge in the court of Milan, where he soon received the cruel intelligence that his two innocent and helpless children had been murdered by their inhuman uncle The affliction of the father was suspended only by the desire of revenge The vigilant Stilicho already prepared to collect the naval and military forces of the Western empire, and he had resolved, if the tyrant should be able to wage an equal and doubtful war, to march against him in person But as Italy required his presence, and as it might be dangerous to weaken the defence of the frontier, he judged it more advisable that Mascezel should attempt this arduous adventure at the head of a chosen body of Gallic veterans, who had lately served under the standard of Eugenius These troops, who were exhorted to convince the world that they could subvert, as well as defend, the throne of an usurper, consisted of the Jovian, the Herculian, and the Augustan legions, of the Nervian auxiliaries, of the soldiers who displayed in their banners the symbol of a lion, and of the troops which were distinguished by the auspicious names of Fortunate and Invincible Yet such was the smallness of their establishments, or the difficulty of recruiting, that these seven bands,[44] of high dignity and reputation in the service of Rome, amounted to no more than five thousand effective men [45] The fleet of galleys and transports sailed in tempestuous weather from the port of Pisa, in Tuscany, and steered their course to the little island of Capraria, which had borrowed that name from the wild goats, its original inhabitants, whose place was now occupied by a new colony of a strange and savage appearance "The whole island (says an ingenious traveller of those times) is filled, or rather defiled, by men who fly from the light They call themselves Monks or solitaries, because they choose to live alone, without any witnesses of their actions They fear the gifts of fortune, from the apprehension of losing them, and, lest they should be miserable, they embrace a life of voluntary wretchedness How absurd is their choice! how perverse their understanding! to dread the evils, without being able to support the blessings, of the human condition Either this melancholy madness is the effect of disease, or else the consciousness of guilt urges these unhappy men to exercise on their own bodies the tortures which are inflicted on fugitive slaves by the hand of justice "[46] Such was the contempt of a profane magistrate for the monks of Capraria, who were revered by the pious Mascezel as the chosen servants of God [47] Some of them were persuaded by his entreaties to embark on board the fleet and it is observed to the praise of the Roman general that his days and nights were employed in prayer fasting and the occupation of singing psalms The devout leader who with such a reinforcement appeared confident of victory avoided the dangerous rocks of Corsica coasted along the eastern side of Sardinia and secured his ships against the violence of the south wind by casting anchor in the safe and capacious harbour of Cagliari at the distance of one hundred and forty miles from the African shores [48]

Gildo was prepared to resist the invasion with all the forces of Africa By the liberality of his gifts and promises he endeavoured to secure the doubtful allegiance of the Roman soldiers whilst he attracted to his standard the distant tribes of Gætulia and Æthiopia He proudly reviewed an army of seventy thousand men and boasted with the rash presumption which is the forerunner of disgrace that his numerous cavalry would trample under their horses feet the troops of Mascezel and involve, in a cloud of burning sand the natives of the cold regions of Gaul and Germany [49] But the Moor who commanded the legions of Honorius was too well acquainted with the manners of the countrymen to entertain any serious apprehension of a naked and disorderly host of barbarians whose left arm instead of a shield was protected only by a mantle who were totally disarmed as soon as they had darted their javelin from their right hand and whose horses had never been taught to bear the control or to obey the guidance of the bridle He fixed his camp of five thousand veterans in the face of a superior enemy and after the delay of three days gave the signal of a general engagement [50] As Mascezel advanced before the front with fair offers of peace and pardon he encountered one of the foremost standard bearers of the Africans and on his refusal to yield struck him on the arm with his sword The arm and the standard sunk under the weight of the blow and the imaginary act of submission was hastily repeated by all the standards of the line. At this signal the disaffected cohorts proclaimed the name of their lawful sovereign the barbarians astonished by the defection of their Roman allies dispersed according to their custom, in tumultuary flight and Mascezel obtained the honours of an easy and almost bloodless victory [51] The tyrant escaped from the field of battle to the sea-shore and threw himself into a small vessel with the hope of reaching in safety some friendly port of the empire of the East but the obstinacy of the wind drove him back into the harbour of Tabraca [52] which had acknowledged, with the rest of the province the dominion of Honorius and the authority of his lieutenant The inhabitants, as a proof of their repentance and loyalty seized and confined the person of Gildo in a dungeon and his own despair saved him from the intolerable torture of supporting the presence of an injured and victorious brother [53] The captives and the spoils of Africa were laid at the feet of the emperor but Stilicho whose moderation appeared more conspicuous and more sincere in the midst of prosperity still affected to consult the laws of the republic and referred to the senate and people of Rome the judgment of the most illustrious criminals [54] Their trial was public and solemn but the judges in the exercise of this obsolete and precarious jurisdiction were impatient to punish the African magistrates who had intercepted the subsistence of the Roman people The rich and guilty province was oppressed by the Imperial ministers who had a visible interest to multiply the number of the accomplices of Gildo and if an edict of Honorius seems to check the malicious industry of informers a subsequent edict at the distance of ten years continues and renews the prosecution of the offences which had been committed in the time of the general rebellion [55] The adherents of the tyrant who escaped the first fury of the soldiers and the judges might derive some consolation from the tragic fate of his brother who could never obtain his pardon for the extraordinary services which he had performed After he had finished an important war in the space of a single winter Mascezel was received at the court of Milan with loud applause affected gratitude and secret jealousy [56] and his death which perhaps was the effect of accident has been considered as the crime of Stilicho In the passage of a bridge the Moorish prince who accompanied the master general of the West was suddenly thrown from his horse into the river the officious haste of the attendants was restrained by a cruel and perfidious smile which they observed on the countenance of Stilicho and while they delayed the necessary assistance the unfortunate Mascezel was irrecoverably drowned [57]

The joy of the African triumph was happily connected with the nuptials of the emperor Honorius and of his cousin Maria the daughter of Stilicho and this equal and honourable alliance seemed to invest the powerful minister with the authority of a parent over his submissive pupil The muse of Claudian was not silent on this propitious day,[58] he sung, in various and lively strains, the happiness of the royal pair, and the glory of the hero who confirmed their union and supported their throne The ancient fables of Greece, which had almost ceased to be the object of religious faith, were saved from oblivion by the genius of poetry The picture of the Cyprian grove, the seat of harmony and love, the triumphant progress of Venus over her native seas, and the mild influence which her presence diffused in the palace of Milan, express to every age the natural sentiments of the heart in the just and pleasing language of allegorical fiction But the amorous impatience which Claudian attributes to the young prince[59] must excite the smiles of the court, and his beauteous spouse (if she deserved the praise of beauty) had not much to fear or to hope from the passions of her lover Honorius was only in the fourteenth year of his age, Serena, the mother of his bride, deferred, by art or persuasion, the consummation of the royal nuptials, Maria died a virgin, after she had been ten years a wife, and the chastity of the emperor was secured by the coldness, or perhaps the debility, of his constitution [60] His subjects, who attentively studied the character of their young sovereign, discovered that Honorius was without passions, and consequently without talents, and that his feeble and languid disposition was alike incapable of discharging the duties of his rank, or of enjoying the pleasures of his age In his early youth he made some progress in the exercises of riding and drawing the bow, but he soon relinquished these fatiguing occupations, and the amusement of feeding poultry became the serious and daily care of the monarch of the West,[61] who resigned the reins of empire to the firm and skilful hand of his guardian Stilicho The experience of history will countenance the suspicion that a prince who was born in the purple received a worse education than the meanest peasant of his dominions, and that the ambitious minister suffered him to attain the age of manhood without attempting to excite his courage or to enlighten his understanding [62] The predecessors of Honorius were accustomed to animate by their example, or at least by their presence, the valour of the legions, and the dates of their laws attest the perpetual activity of their motions through the provinces of the Roman world But the son of Theodosius passed the slumber of his life a captive in his palace, a stranger in his country, and the patient, almost the indifferent, spectator of the ruin of the Western empire, which was repeatedly attacked, and finally subverted, by the arms of the barbarians In the eventful history of a reign of twenty-eight years, it will seldom be necessary to mention the name of the emperor Honorius

CHAPTER XXX

Revolt of the Goths They plunder Greece Two great Invasions of Italy by Alaric and Radagaisus They are repulsed by Stilicho The Germans overrun Gaul Usurpation of Constantine in the West Disgrace and Death of Stilicho

If the subjects of Rome could be ignorant of their obligations to the great Theodosius, they were too soon convinced how painfully the spirit and abilities of their deceased emperor had supported the frail and mouldering edifice of the republic He died in the month of January, and before the end of the winter of the same year, the Gothic nation was in arms [1] The barbarian auxiliaries erected their independent standard, and boldly avowed the hostile designs which they had long cherished in their ferocious minds Their countrymen, who had been condemned by the conditions of the last treaty to a life of tranquillity and labour, deserted their farms at the first sound of the trumpet, and eagerly resumed the weapons which they had reluctantly laid down The barriers of the Danube were thrown open, the savage warriors of Scythia issued from their forests, and the uncommon severity of the winter allowed the poet to remark "that they rolled their ponderous waggons over the broad and icy back of the indignant river"[2] The unhappy natives of the provinces to the south of the Danube submitted to the calamities which, in the course of twenty years, were almost grown familiar to their imagination, and the various troops of barbarians who gloried in the Gothic name were irregularly spread from the woody shores of Dalmatia to the walls of Constantinople [3] The interruption, or at least the diminution, of the subsidy which the Goths had received from the prudent liberality of Theodosius was the specious pretence of their revolt the affront was embittered by their contempt for the unwarlike sons of Theodosius and their resentment was inflamed by the weakness or treachery of the minister of Arcadius The frequent visits of Rufinus to the camp of the barbarians whose arms and apparel he affected to imitate were considered as a sufficient evidence of his guilty correspondence and the public enemy from a motive either of gratitude or of policy was attentive amidst the general devastation to spare the private estates of the unpopular præfect The Goths instead of being impelled by the blind and headstrong passions of their chiefs were now directed by the bold and artful genius of Alaric That renowned leader was descended from the noble race of the Balti [4] which yielded only to the royal dignity of the Amali he had solicited the command of the Roman armies and the Imperial court provoked him to demonstrate the folly of their refusal and the importance of their loss Whatever hopes might be entertained of the conquest of Constantinople, the judicious general soon abandoned an impracticable enterprise In the midst of a divided court and a discontented people the emperor Arcadius was terrified by the aspect of the Gothic arms but the want of wisdom and valour was supplied by the strength of the city and the fortific[illegible]ons both of the sea and land, might [illegible] brave the impotent and random dar[illegible] rians Alaric disdained to tran[illegible] or the prostrate and ruined [illegible] and Dacia and he resolv[illegible] ntiful harvest of fame and riches n a pro ince which had hitherto escaped the ravages of war [5]

The character of the civil and military officers on whom Rufinus had devolved the government of Greece confirmed the public suspicion that he had betrayed the ancient seat of freedom and learning to the Gothic invader The proconsul Antiochus was the unworthy son of a respectable father and Gerontius who commanded the provincial troops was much better qualified to execute the oppressive orders of a tyrant than to defend with courage and ability a country most remarkably fortified by the hand of nature Alaric had traversed without resistance the plains of Macedonia and Thessaly as far as the foot of Mount Oeta a steep and woody range of hills, almost impervious to his cavalry They stretched from east to west to the edge of the sea-shore and left between the precipice and the Malian Gulf an interval of three hundred feet, which in some places was contracted to a road capable of admitting only a single carriage [6] In this narrow pass of Thermopylæ where Leonidas and the three hundred Spartans had gloriously devoted their lives the Goths might have been stopped or destroyed, by a skilful general and perhaps the view of that sacred spot might have kindl d some sparks of military ardour in the breasts of the degenera e Greeks The troops which had been posted to defend the straits of Thermopylæ retired as they were directed without a temptin[illegible] to disturb the secure and rapid passage of Alaric [7] and the fertile fields of Phocis and Bœotia were instantly covered by a deluge of barbarians, who massacred the males of an age to bear arms, and drove away the beautiful females, with the spoil and cattle of the flaming villages The travellers who visited Greece several years afterwards could easily discover the deep and bloody traces of the march of the Goths and Th[illegible]bes was less indebted for her preservation to the strength of her seven gates than to the eager haste of Alaric, who advanced to occupy the city of Athens and the important harbour of the Piræus The same impatience urged him to prevent the delay and danger of a siege by the offer of a capitulation and as soon as the Athenians heard the voice of the Gothic herald they were easily persuaded to deliver the greatest par[illegible] their wealth, as the ransom of the city of M[illegible]nerva and its inhabitants The treaty was [illegible]tified by solemn oaths and observed with mutual fidelity The Gothic prince with a small and select train was admitted within the wal[illegible] he indulged himself in the refreshmen[illegible] of the bath accepted a splendid banquet which was provided by the magistrate, and affected to show that he was not ignorant of the manners of civilised nations [8] But the whole territory of Attica from the promontory of Sunium to the town of Megara was blasted by his baleful presence and if we may use the comparison of a contemporary philosopher Athens itself rese[illegible]bled the bleeding and empty skin of a slaughtered victim The distance between Megara and Corinth could not much exceed thirty miles but the bad road an expressive name which it still bears among the Greeks was or [illegible] easily have been made impassable for the march of an enemy The thick and gloomy woods of Mount Cithæron covered the inland co[illegible] the Scironian rocks approached the wa[illegible] edge and hung over the narrow and winding path which was confined above six miles along the sea-shore [9] The passage of those rocks, so [illegible] famous in every age, was termin[illegible]ed by the isthmus of Corinth, and a small body of firm and intrepid soldiers might have successfully defended a temporary entrenchment of five or six miles from the Ionian to the Ægean Sea The confidence of the cities of Peloponnesus in their natural rampart had tempted them to neglect the care of their antique walls, and the avarice of the Roman governors had exhausted and betrayed the unhappy province [10] Corinth, Argos, Sparta, yielded without resistance to the arms of the Goths, and the most fortunate of the inhabitants were saved by death from beholding the slavery of their families and the conflagration of their cities [11] The vases and statues were distributed among the barbarians, with more regard to the value of the materials than to the elegance of the workmanship, the female captives submitted to the laws of war, the enjoyment of beauty was the reward of valour, and the Greeks could not reasonably complain of an abuse which was justified by the example of the heroic times [12] The descendants of that extraordinary people, who had considered valour and discipline as the walls of Sparta, no longer remembered the generous reply of their ancestors to an invader more formidable than Alaric "If thou art a god, thou wilt not hurt those who have never injured thee, if thou art a man, advance—and thou wilt find men equal to thyself" [13] From Thermopylæ to Sparta the leader of the Goths pursued his victorious march without encountering any mortal antagonists, but one of the advocates of expiring Paganism has confidently asserted that the walls of Athens were guarded by the goddess Minerva, with her formidable Ægis, and by the angry phantom of Achilles,[14] and that the conqueror was dismayed by the presence of the hostile deities of Greece In an age of miracles it would perhaps be unjust to dispute the claim of the historian Zosimus to the common benefit, yet it cannot be dissembled that the mind of Alaric was ill prepared to receive, either in sleeping or waking visions, the impressions of Greek superstition The songs of Homer and the fame of Achilles had probably never reached the ear of the illiterate barbarian, and the Christian faith, which he had devoutly embraced, taught him to despise the imaginary deities of Rome and Athens The invasion of the Goths, instead of vindicating the honours, contributed, at least accidently, to extirpate the last remains of Paganism, and the mysteries of Ceres, which had subsisted eighteen hundred years, did not survive the destruction of Eleusis and the calamities of Greece [15]

The last hope of a people who could no longer depend on their arms, their gods, or their sovereign, was placed in the powerful assistance of the general of the West, and Stilicho, who had not been permitted to repulse, advanced to chastise the invaders of Greece [16] A numerous fleet was equipped in the ports of Italy, and the troops, after a short and prosperous navigation over the Ionian Sea, were safely disembarked on the isthmus, near the ruins of Corinth The woody and mountainous country of Arcadia, the fabulous residence of Pan and the Dryads, became the scene of a long and doubtful conflict between two generals not unworthy of each other The skill and perseverance of the Roman at length prevailed, and the Goths, after sustaining a considerable loss from disease and desertion, gradually retreated to the lofty mountain of Pholoe, near the sources of the Peneus, and on the frontiers of Elis—a sacred country, which had formerly been exempted from the calamities of war [17] The camp of the barbarians was immediately besieged, the waters of the river[18] were diverted into another channel, and while they laboured under the intolerable pressure of thirst and hunger, a strong line of circumvallation was formed to prevent their escape After these precautions Stilicho, too confident of victory, retired to enjoy his triumph in the theatrical games and lascivious dances of the Greeks, his soldiers, deserting their standards, spread themselves over the country of their allies, which they stripped of all that had been saved from the rapacious hands of the enemy Alaric appears to have seized the favourable moment to execute one of those hardy enterprises in which the abilities of a general are displayed with more genuine lustre than in the tumult of a day of battle To extricate himself from the prison of Peloponnesus it was necessary that he should pierce the entrenchments which surrounded his camp, that he should perform a difficult and dangerous march of thirty miles, as far as the Gulf of Corinth, and that he should transport his troops, his captives, and his spoil, over an arm of the sea, which, in the narrow interval between Rhium and the opposite shore, is at least half a mile in breadth [19] The operations of Alaric must have been secret, prudent, and rapid, since the Roman general was confounded by the intelligence that the Goths, who had eluded his efforts, were in full possession of the important province of Epirus This unfortunate delay allowed Alaric sufficient time to conclude the treaty which he secretly negotiated with the ministers of Constantinople The apprehension of a civil war compelled Stilicho to retire at the haughty mandate of his rivals from the dominions of Arcadius and he respected in the enemy of Rome the honourable character of the ally and servant of the emperor of the East

A Grecian philosopher [20] who visited Constantinople soon after the death of Theodosius published his liberal opinions concerning the duties of kings and the state of the Roman republic. Synesius observes and deplores the fatal abuse which the imprudent bounty of the late emperor had introduced into the military service The citizens and subjects had purchased an exemption from the indispensable duty of defending their country which was supported by the arms of barbarian mercenaries The fugitives of Scythia were permitted to disgrace the illustrious dignities of the empire their ferocious youth who disdained the salutary restraint of laws were more anxious to acquire the riches than to imitate the arts of a people the object of their contempt and hatred and the power of the Goths was the stone of Tantalus perpetually suspended over the peace and safety of the devoted state The measures which Synesius recommends are the dictates of a bold and generous patriot He exhorts the emperor to revive the courage of his subjects by the example of manly virtue to banish luxury from the court and from the camp to substitute in the place of the barbarian mercenaries an army of men interested in the defence of their laws and of their property to force in such a moment of public danger the mechanic from his shop and the philosopher from his school to rouse the indolent citizen from his dream of pleasure and to arm for the protection of agriculture the hands of the laborious husbandman At the head of such troops who might deserve the name and would display the spirit of Romans he animates the son of Theodosius to encounter a race of barbarians who were destitute of any real courage and never to lay down his arms till he had chased them far away into the solitudes of Scythia or had reduced them to the state of ignominious servitude which the Lacedæmonians formerly imposed on the captive Helots [21] The court of Arcadius indulged the zeal applauded the eloquence and neglected the advice of Synesius Perhaps the philosopher who addresses the emperor of the East in the language of reason and virtue which he might have used to a Spartan king had not condescended to form a practicable scheme consistent with the temper and circumstances of a degenerate age Perhaps the pride of the ministers whose business was seldom interrupted by reflection, might reject, as wild and visionary every proposal which exceeded the measure of their capacity and deviated from the forms and precedents of office While the oration of Synesius and the downfall of the barbarians were the topics of popular conversation an edict was published at Constantinople which declared the promotion of Alaric to the rank of master general of the Eastern Illyricum The Roman provincials and the allies who had respected the faith of treaties were justly indignant that the ruin of Greece and Epirus should be so liberally rewarded. The Gothic conqueror was received as a lawful magistrate in the cities which he had so lately besieged The fathers whose sons he had massacred, the husbands whose wives he had violated were subject to his authority and the success of his rebellion encouraged the ambition of every leader of the foreign mercenaries The use to which Alaric applied his new command distinguishes the firm and judicious character of his policy He issued his orders to the four magazines and manufactures of offensive and defensive arms Margus Ratiaria Naissus and Thessalonica to provide his troops with an extraordinary supply of shields helmets swords, and spears the unhappy provincials were compelled to forge the instruments of their own destruction and the barbarians removed the only defect which had sometimes disappointed the efforts of their courage [22] The birth of Alaric the glory of his past exploits and the confidence in his future designs insensibly united the body of the nation under his victorious standards and with the unanimous consent of the barbarian chieftains the master general of Illyricum was elevated according to ancient custom, on a shield and solemnly proclaimed king of the Visigoths [23] Armed with this double power seated on the verge of the two empires he alternately sold his deceitful promises to the courts of Arcadius and Honorius [24] till he declared and executed his resolution of invading the dominions of the West The provinces of Europe which belonged to the Eastern emperor were already exhausted those of Asia were inaccessible and the strength of Constantinople had resisted his attack But he was tempted by the fame the beauty the wealth of Italy which he had twice visited and he secretly aspired to plant the Gothic standard on the walls of Rome and to enrich his army with the accumulated spoils of three hundred triumphs [25]

The scarcity of facts [26] and the uncertainty of dates [27] oppose our attempts to describe the circumstances of the first invasion of Italy by the arms of Alaric His march, perhaps from Thessalonica, through the warlike and hostile country of Pannonia, as far as the foot of the Julian Alps, his passage of those mountains, which were strongly guarded by troops and entrenchments, the siege of Aquileia, and the conquest of the provinces of Istria and Venetia, appear to have employed a considerable time Unless his operations were extremely cautious and slow, the length of the interval would suggest a probable suspicion that the Gothic king retreated towards the banks of the Danube, and reinforced his army with fresh swarms of barbarians, before he again attempted to penetrate into the heart of Italy Since the public and important events escape the diligence of the historian, he may amuse himself with contemplating for a moment the influence of the arms of Alaric on the fortunes of two obscure individuals, a presbyter of Aquileia, and an husbandman of Verona The learned Rufinus, who was summoned by his enemies to appear before a Roman synod,[28] wisely preferred the dangers of a besieged city, and the barbarians, who furiously shook the walls of Aquileia, might save him from the cruel sentence of another heretic, who, at the request of the same bishops, was severely whipped and condemned to perpetual exile on a desert island [29] The old man[30] who had passed his simple and innocent life in the neighbourhood of Verona, was a stranger to the quarrels both of kings and of bishops, his pleasures, his desires, his knowledge, were confined within the little circle of his paternal farm, and a staff supported his aged steps on the same ground where he had sported in his infancy Yet even this humble and rustic felicity (which Claudian describes with so much truth and feeling) was still exposed to the undistinguishing rage of war His trees, his old contemporary trees,[31] must blaze in the conflagration of the whole country, a detachment of Gothic cavalry might sweep away his cottage and his family, and the power of Alaric could destroy this happiness, which he was not able either to taste or to bestow "Fame," says the poet, "encircling with terror her gloomy wings, proclaimed the march of the barbarian army, and filled Italy with consternation " the apprehensions of each individual were increased in just proportion to the measure of his fortune and the most timid, who had already embarked their valuable effects, meditated their escape to the island of Sicily or the African coast The public distress was aggravated by the fears and reproaches of superstition [32] Every hour produced some horrid tale of strange and portentous accidents the Pagans deplored the neglect of omens and the interruption of sacrifices, but the Christians still derived some comfort from the powerful intercession of the saints and martyrs [33]

The emperor Honorius was distinguished, above his subjects, by the pre-eminence of fear as well as of rank The pride and luxury in which he was educated had not allowed him to suspect that there existed on the earth any power presumptuous enough to invade the repose of the successor of Augustus The arts of flattery concealed the impending danger till Alaric approached the palace of Milan But when the sound of war had awakened the young emperor, instead of flying to arms with the spirit, or even the rashness, of his age, he eagerly listened to those timid counsellors who proposed to convey his sacred person and his faithful attendants to some secure and distant station in the provinces of Gaul Stilicho alone[34] had courage and authority to resist this disgraceful measure, which would have abandoned Rome and Italy to the barbarians, but as the troops of the palace had been lately detached to the Rhætian frontier, and as the resource of new levies was slow and precarious, the general of the West could only promise that, if the court of Milan would maintain their ground during his absence, he would soon return with an army equal to the encounter of the Gothic king Without losing a moment (while each moment was so important to the public safety), Stilicho hastily embarked on the Larian lake, ascended the mountains of ice and snow amidst the severity of an Alpine winter, and suddenly repressed, by his unexpected presence, the enemy, who had disturbed the tranquillity of Rhætia [35] The barbarians, perhaps some tribes of the Alemanni, respected the firmness of a chief who still assumed the language of command, and the choice which he condescended to make of a select number of their bravest youth was considered as a mark of his esteem and favour The cohorts, who were delivered from the neighbouring foe, diligently repaired to the Imperial standard, and Stilicho issued his orders to the most remote troops of the West, to advance, by rapid marches, to the defence of Honorius and of Italy The fortresses of the Rhine were abandoned, and the safety of Gaul was protected only by the faith of the Germans, and the ancient terror of the Roman name Even the legion which had been stationed to guard the wall of Britain against the Caledonians of the North was hastily recalled,[36]

and a numerous body of the cavalry of the Alani was persuaded to engage in the service of the emperor who anxiously expected the return of his general The prudence and vigour of Stilicho were conspicuous on this occasion which revealed at the same time the weakness of the falling empire The legions of Rome which had long since languished in the gradual decay of discipline and courage were exterminated by the Gothic and civil wars and it was found impossible without exhausting and exposing the provinces to assemble an army for the defence of Italy

When Stilicho seemed to abandon his sovereign in the unguarded palace of Milan he had probably calculated the term of his absence the distance of the enemy and the obstacles that might retard their march He principally depended on the rivers of Italy the Adige the Mincius the Oglio and the Addua which in the winter or spring by the fall of rains or by the melting of the snows are commonly swelled into broad and impetuous torrents [37] But the season happened to be remarkably dry and the Goths could traverse without impediment the wide and stony beds whose centre was faintly marked by the course of a shallow stream The bridge and passage of the Addua was secured by a strong detachment of the Gothic army and as Alaric approached the walls, or rather the suburbs of Milan he enjoyed the proud satisfaction of seeing the emperor of the Romans fly before him Honorius accompanied by a feeble train of statesmen and eunuchs hastily retreated towards the Alps with a design of securing his person in the city of Arles which had often been the royal residence of his predecessors But Honorius[38] had scarcely passed the Po before he was overtaken by the speed of the Gothic cavalry [39] since the urgency of the danger compelled him to seek a temporary shelter within the fortification of Asta a town of Liguria or Piemont situate on the banks of the Tanarus [40] The siege of an obscure place which contained so rich a prize and seemed incapable of a long resistance was instantly formed and indefatigably pressed by the king of the Goths and the bold declaration which the emperor might afterwards make that his breast had never been susceptible of fear did not probably obtain much credit even in his own court [41] In the last and almost hopeless extremity after the barbarians had already proposed the indignity of a capitulation the Imperial captive was suddenly relieved by the fame the approach and at length the presence of the hero whom he had so long expected At the head of a chosen and intrepid vanguard Stilicho swam the stream of the Addua to gain the time which he must have lost in the attack of the bridge the passage of the Po was an enterprise of much less hazard and difficulty and the successful action, in which he cut his way through the Gothic camp under the walls of Asta, revived the hopes and vindicated the honour of Rome Instead of grasping the fruit of his victory, the barbarian was gradually invested on every side by the troops of the West who successively issued through all the passes of the Alps his quarters were straitened, his convoys were intercepted and the vigilance of the Romans prepared to form a chain of fortifications and to besiege the lines of the besiegers A military council was assembled of the long haired chiefs of the Gothic nation of aged warriors whose bodies were wrapped in furs, and whose stern countenances were marked with honourable wounds They weighed the glory of persisting in their attempt against the advantage of securing their plunder and they recommended the prudent measure of a seasonable retreat In this important debate Alaric displayed the spirit of the conqueror of Rome and after he had reminded his countrymen of their achievements and of their designs he concluded his animating speech by the solemn and positive assurance that he was resolved to find in Italy either a kingdom or a grave [42]

The loose discipline of the barbarians always exposed them to the danger of a surprise but, instead of choosing the dissolute hours of riot and intemperance Stilicho resolved to attack the Christian Goths whilst they were devoutly employed in celebrating the festival of Easter [43] The execution of the stratagem, or as it was termed by the clergy of the sacrilege was entrusted to Saul a barbarian and a Pagan who had served however with distinguished reputation among the veteran generals of Theodosius The camp of the Goths which Alaric had pitched in the neighbourhood of Pollentia [44] was thrown into confusion by the sudden and impetuous charge of the Imperial cavalry but in a few moments the undaunted genius of their leader gave them an order and a field of battle and soon as they had recovered from their astonishment the pious confidence that the God of the Christians would assert their cause added new strength to their native valour In this engagement, which was long maintained with equal courage and success the chief of the Alani whose diminutive and savage form concealed a magnanimous soul approved his suspected loyalty

alty, by the zeal with which he fought and fell in the service of the republic, and the fame of this gallant barbarian has been imperfectly preserved in the verses of Claudian, since the poet, who celebrates his virtue, has omitted the mention of his name His death was followed by the flight and dismay of the squadrons which he commanded, and the defeat of the wing of cavalry might have decided the victory of Alaric, if Stilicho had not immediately led the Roman and barbarian infantry to the attack The skill of the general, and the bravery of the soldiers, surmounted every obstacle In the evening of the bloody day, the Goths retreated from the field of battle, the entrenchments of their camp were forced, and the scene of rapine and slaughter made some atonement for the calamities which they had inflicted on the subjects of the empire [45] The magnificent spoils of Corinth and Argos enriched the veterans of the West, the captive wife of Alaric, who had impatiently claimed his promise of Roman jewels and Patrician handmaids,[46] was reduced to implore the mercy of the insulting foe, and many thousand prisoners, released from the Gothic chains, dispersed through the provinces of Italy the praises of their heroic deliverer The triumph of Stilicho[47] was compared by the poet, and perhaps by the public, to that of Marius, who, in the same part of Italy, had encountered and destroyed another army of Northern barbarians The huge bones and the empty helmets of the Cimbri and of the Goths would easily be confounded by succeeding generations, and posterity might erect a common trophy to the memory of the two most illustrious generals, who had vanquished, on the same memorable ground, the two most formidable enemies of Rome [48]

The eloquence of Claudian[49] has celebrated, with lavish applause, the victory of Pollentia, one of the most glorious days in the life of his patron, but his reluctant and partial muse bestows more genuine praise on the character of the Gothic king His name is, indeed, branded with the reproachful epithets of pirate and robber, to which the conquerors of every age are so justly entitled, but the poet of Stilicho is compelled to acknowledge that Alaric possessed the invincible temper of mind which rises superior to every misfortune, and derives new resources from adversity After the total defeat of his infantry, he escaped, or rather withdrew, from the field of battle, with the greatest part of his cavalry entire and unbroken Without wasting a moment to lament the irreparable loss of so many brave companions, he left his victorious enemy to bind in chains the captive images of a Gothic king,[50] and boldly resolved to break through the unguarded passes of the Apennine, to spread desolation over the fruitful face of Tuscany, and to conquer or die before the gates of Rome The capital was saved by the active and incessant diligence of Stilicho, but he respected the despair of his enemy, and, instead of committing the fate of the republic to the chance of another battle, he proposed to purchase the absence of the barbarians The spirit of Alaric would have rejected such terms, the permission of a retreat, and the offer of a pension, with contempt and indignation, but he exercised a limited and precarious authority over the independent chieftains who had raised him, for their service, above the rank of his equals, they were still less disposed to follow an unsuccessful general, and many of them were tempted to consult their interest by a private negotiation with the minister of Honorius The king submitted to the voice of his people, ratified the treaty with the empire of the West, and repassed the Po with the remains of the flourishing army which he had led into Italy A considerable part of the Roman forces still continued to attend his motions and Stilicho, who maintained a secret correspondence with some of the barbarian chiefs, was punctually appraised of the designs that were formed in the camp and council of Alaric The king of the Goths, ambitious to signalise his retreat by some splendid achievement, had resolved to occupy the important city of Verona, which commands the principal passage of the Rhætian Alps, and, directing his march through the territories of those German tribes whose alliance would restore his exhausted strength, to invade, on the side of the Rhine, the wealthy and unsuspecting provinces of Gaul Ignorant of the treason which had already betrayed his bold and judicious enterprise, he advanced towards the passes of the mountains, already possessed by the Imperial troops, where he was exposed, almost at the same instant, to a general attack in the front, on his flanks, and in the rear In this bloody action, at a small distance from the walls of Verona, the loss of the Goths was not less heavy than that which they had sustained in the defeat of Pollentia, and their valiant king, who escaped by the swiftness of his horse, must either have been slain or made prisoner, if the hasty rashness of the Alani had not disappointed the measures of the Roman general Alaric secured the remains of his army on the adjacent rocks, and prepared himself, with undaunted resolution, to maintain a siege against the superior numbers of the enemy who invested him on all sides But he could not oppose the destructive progress of hunger and disease nor was it possible for him to check the continual desertion of his impatient and capricious barbarians In this extremity he still found resources in his own courage or in the moderation of his adversary and the retreat of the Gothic king was considered as the deliverance of Italy [51] Yet the people and even the clergy incapable of forming any rational judgment of the business of peace and war presumed to arraign the policy of Stilicho who so often vanquished so often surrounded and so often dismissed the implacable enemy of the republic The first moment of the public safety is devoted to gratitude and joy but the second is diligently occupied by envy and calumny [52]

The citizens of Rome had been astonished by the approach of Alaric and the diligence with which they laboured to restore the walls of the capital confessed their own fears and the decline of the empire After the retreat of the barbarians Honorius was directed to accept the dutiful invitation of the senate and to celebrate in the Imperial city the auspicious era of the Gothic victory and of his sixth consulship [53] The suburbs and the streets from the Milvian bridge to the Palatine mount, were filled by the Roman people who in the space of an hundred years had only thrice been honoured with the presence of their sovereigns While their eyes were fixed on the chariot where Stilicho was deservedly seated by the side of his royal pupil they applauded the pomp of a triumph which was not stained like that of Constantine or of Theodosius, with civil blood The procession passed under a lofty arch which had been purposely erected but in less than seven years the Gothic conquerors of Rome might read if they were able to read the superb inscription of that monument which attested the total defeat and destruction of their nation [54] The emperor resided several months in the capital and every part of his behaviour was regulated with care to conciliate the affection of the clergy the senate and the people of Rome The clergy was edified by his frequent visits and liberal gifts to the shrines of the apostles The senate who in the triumphal procession had been excused from the humiliating ceremony of preceding on foot the Imperial chariot was treated with the decent reverence which Stilicho always affected for that assembly The people was repeatedly gratified by the attention and courtesy of Honorius in the public games which were celebrated on that occasion with a magnificence not unworthy of the spectator As soon as the appointed number of chariot races was concluded the decoration of the circus was suddenly changed the hunting of wild beasts afforded a various and splendid entertainment and the chase was succeeded by a military dance which seems in the lively description of Claudian to present the image of a modern tournament

In these games of Honorius the inhuman combats of gladiators [55] polluted for the last time the amphitheatre of Rome. The first Christian emperor may claim the honour of the first edict which condemned the art and amusement of shedding human blood [56] but this benevolent law expressed the wishes of the prince, without reforming an inveterate abuse which degraded a civilised nation below the condition of savage cannibals Several hundred perhaps several thousand victims were annually slaughtered in the great cities of the empire and the month of December more peculiarly devoted to the combats of gladiators still exhibited to the eyes of the Roman people a grateful spectacle of blood and cruelty Amidst the general joy of the victory of Pollentia a Christian poet exhorted the emperor to extirpate by his authority the horrid custom which had so long resisted the voice of humanity and religion.[57] The pathetic representations of Prudentius were less effectual than the generous boldness of Telemachus an Asiatic monk whose death was more useful to mankind than his life [58] The Romans were provoked by the interruption of their pleasures and the rash monk who had descended into the arena, to separate the gladiators was overwhelmed under a shower of stones But the madness of the people soon subsided they respected the memory of Telemachus who had deserved the honours of martyrdom and they submitted without a murmur to the laws of Honorius which abolished for ever the human sacrifices of the amphitheatre The citizens who adhered to the manners of their ancestors might perhaps insinuate that the last remains of a martial spirit were preserved in this school of fortitude which accustomed the Romans to the sight of blood and to the contempt of death a vain and cruel prejudice so nobly confuted by the valour of ancient Greece and of modern Europe![59]

The recent danger to which the person of the emperor had been exposed in the defenceless palace of Milan urged him to seek a retreat in some inaccessible fortress of Italy where he might securely remain while the open country was covered by a deluge of barbarians On the coast of the Hadriatic, about ten or twelve miles from the most southern of the seven mouths of the Po, the Thessalians had founded the ancient colony of RAVENNA,[60] which they afterwards resigned to the natives of Umbria Augustus, who had observed the opportunity of the place, prepared, at the distance of three miles from the old town, a capacious harbour for the reception of two hundred and fifty ships of war This naval establishment, which included the arsenals and magazines, the barracks of the troops, and the houses of the artificers, derived its origin and name from the permanent station of the Roman fleet, the intermediate space was soon filled with buildings and inhabitants, and the three extensive and populous quarters of Ravenna gradually contributed to form one of the most important cities of Italy The principal canal of Augustus poured a copious stream of the waters of the Po through the midst of the city, to the entrance of the harbour, the same waters were introduced into the profound ditches that encompassed the walls, they were distributed by a thousand subordinate canals into every part of the city, which they divided into a variety of small islands, the communication was maintained only by the use of boats and bridges, and the houses of Ravenna, whose appearance may be compared to that of Venice, were raised on the foundation of wooden piles The adjacent country, to the distance of many miles, was a deep and impassable morass, and the artificial causeway which connected Ravenna with the continent might be easily guarded or destroyed on the approach of an hostile army These morasses were interspersed, however, with vineyards, and though the soil was exhausted by four or five crops, the town enjoyed a more plentiful supply of wine than of fresh water [61] The air, instead of receiving the sickly and almost pestilential exhalations of low and marshy grounds, was distinguished, like the neighbourhood of Alexandria, as uncommonly pure and salubrious, and this singular advantage was ascribed to the regular tides of the Hadriatic, which swept the canals, interrupted the unwholesome stagnation of the waters, and floated, every day, the vessels of the adjacent country into the heart of Ravenna The gradual retreat of the sea has left the modern city at the distance of four miles from the Hadriatic, and as early as the fifth or sixth century of the Christian era the port of Augustus was converted into pleasant orchards, and a lonely grove of pines covered the ground where the Roman fleet once rode at anchor [62] Even this alteration contributed to increase the natural strength of the place, and the shallowness of the water was a sufficient barrier against the large ships of the enemy This advantageous situation was fortified by art and labour, and in the twentieth year of his age the emperor of the West, anxious only for his personal safety, retired to the perpetual confinement of the walls and morasses of Ravenna The example of Honorius was imitated by his feeble successors, the Gothic kings, and afterwards the Exarchs, who occupied the throne and palace of the emperors, and till the middle of the eighth century Ravenna was considered as the seat of government and the capital of Italy [63]

The fears of Honorius were not without foundation, nor were his precautions without effect While Italy rejoiced in her deliverance from the Goths, a furious tempest was excited among the nations of Germany, who yielded to the irresistible impulse that appears to have been gradually communicated from the eastern extremity of the continent of Asia The Chinese annals, as they have been interpreted by the learned industry of the present age, may be usefully applied to reveal the secret and remote causes of the fall of the Roman empire The extensive territory to the north of the great wall was possessed after the flight of the Huns by the victorious Sienpi, who were sometimes broken into independent tribes, and sometimes re-united under a supreme chief, till at length, styling themselves Topa, or masters of the earth, they acquired a more solid consistence and a more formidable power The Topa soon compelled the pastoral nations of the eastern desert to acknowledge the superiority of their arms, they invaded China in a period of weakness and intestine discord, and these fortunate Tartars, adopting the laws and manners of the vanquished people, founded an Imperial dynasty, which reigned near one hundred and sixty years over the northern provinces of the monarchy Some generations before they ascended the throne of China, one of the Topa princes had enlisted in his cavalry a slave of the name of Moko, renowned for his valour, but who was tempted, by the fear of punishment, to desert his standard, and to range the desert at the head of an hundred followers This gang of robbers and outlaws swelled into a camp, a tribe, a numerous people, distinguished by the appellation of Geougen, and their hereditary chieftains, the posterity of Moko the slave, assumed their rank among the Scythian monarchs The youth of Toulun, the greatest of his descendants, was exercised by those misfortunes which are the school of heroes He bravely struggled with adversity broke the imperious yoke of the Topa and became the legislator of his nation and the conqueror of Tartary His troops were distributed into regular bands of an hundred and of a thousand men cowards were stoned to death the most splendid honours were proposed as the reward of valour and Toulun who had knowledge enough to despise the learning of China adopted only such arts and institutions as were favourable to the military spirit of his government His tents which he removed in the winter season to a more southern latitude were pitched during the summer on the fruitful banks of the Selinga His conquests stretched from Corea far beyond the river Irtish. He vanquished in the country to the north of the Caspian sea the nation of the Huns and the new title of Khan or Cagan, expressed the fame and power which he derived from this memorable victory [64]

The chain of events is interrupted or rather is concealed as it passes from the Volga to the Vistula through the dark interval which separates the extreme limits of the Chinese and of the Roman geography Yet the temper of the barbarians and the experience of successive emigrations sufficiently declare that the Huns who were oppressed by the arms of the Geougen soon withdrew from the presence of an insulting victor The countries towards the Euxine were already occupied by their kindred tribes and their hasty flight which they soon converted into a bold attack, would more naturally be directed towards the rich and level plains through which the Vistula gently flows into the Baltic sea The North must again have been alarmed and agitated by the invasion of the Huns and the nations who retreated before them must have pressed with incumbent weight on the confines of Germany [65] The inhabitants of those regions which the ancients have assigned to the Suevi the Vandals and the Burgundians might embrace the resolution of abandoning to the fugitives of Sarmatia their woods and morasses or at least discharging their superfluous numbers on the provinces of the Roman empire [66] About four years after the victorious Toulun had assumed the title of Khan of the Geougen, another barbarian the haughty Rhodogast or Radagaisus [67] marched from the northern extremities of Germany almost to the gates of Rome and left the remains of his army to achieve the destruction of the West. The Vandals, the Suevi and the Burgundians, formed the strength of this mighty host but the Alani who had found an hospitable reception in their new seats added their active cavalry to the heavy infantry of the Germans and the Gothic adventurers crowded so eagerly to the standard of Radagaisus that by some historians he has been styled the King of the Goths. Twelve thousand warriors distinguished above the vulgar by their noble birth or their valiant deeds glittered in the van [68] and the whole multitude which was not less than two hundred thousand fighting men, might be increased by the accession of women of children and of slaves to the amount of four hundred thousand persons This formidable emigration issued from the same coast of the Baltic which had poured forth the myriads of the Cimbri and Teutones to assault Rome and Italy in the vigour of the republic After the departure of those barbarians their native country which was marked by the vestiges of their greatness long ramparts and gigantic moles [69] remained during some ages a vast and dreary solitude till the human species was renewed by the powers of generation and the vacancy was filled by the influx of new inhabitants The nations who now usurp an extent of land which they are unable to cultivate would soon be assisted by the industrious poverty of their neighbours if the government of Europe did not protect the claims of dominion and property

The correspondence of nations was in that age so imperfect and precarious that the revolutions of the North might escape the knowledge of the court of Ravenna till the dark cloud which was collected along the coast of the Baltic burst in thunder upon the banks of the Upper Danube The emperor of the West, if his ministers disturbed his amusements by the news of the impending danger was satisfied with being the occasion and the spectator of the war [70] The safety of Rome was intrusted to the counsels and the sword of Stilicho but such was the feeble and exhausted state of the empire, that it was impossible to restore the fortifications of the Danube or to prevent by a vigorous effort the invasion of the Germans [71] The hopes of the vigilant minister of Honorius were confined to the defence of Italy He once more abandoned the provinces recalled the troops, pressed the new levies which were rigorously exacted and pusillanimously eluded employed the most efficacious means to arrest or allure the deserters and offered the gift of freedom and of two pieces of gold to all the slaves who would enlist [72] By these efforts he painfully collected from the subjects of a great empire an army of

thirty or forty thousand men, which in the days of Scipio or Camillus, would have been instantly furnished by the free citizens of the territory of Rome [73] The thirty legions of Stilicho were reinforced by a large body of barbarian auxiliaries, the faithful Alani were personally attached to his service, and the troops of Huns and of Goths, who marched under the banners of their native princes Huldin and Sarus, were animated by interest and resentment to oppose the ambition of Radagaisus The king of the confederate Germans passed without resistance the Alps, the Po, and the Apennine, leaving on one hand the inaccessible palace of Honorius securely buried among the marshes of Ravenna, and, on the other, the camp of Stilicho, who had fixed his head-quarters at Ticinum, or Pavia, but who seems to have avoided a decisive battle till he had assembled his distant forces Many cities of Italy were pillaged or destroyed, and the siege of Florence[74] by Radagaisus is one of the earliest events in the history of that celebrated republic, whose firmness checked and delayed the unskilful fury of the barbarians The senate and people trembled at their approach within an hundred and eighty miles of Rome, and anxiously compared the danger which they had escaped with the new perils to which they were exposed Alaric was a Christian and a soldier, the leader of a disciplined army, who understood the laws of war, who respected the sanctity of treaties, and who had familiarly conversed with the subjects of the empire in the same camps and the same churches The savage Radagaisus was a stranger to the manners, the religion, and even the language of the civilised nations of the South The fierceness of his temper was exasperated by cruel superstition, and it was universally believed that he had bound himself by a solemn vow to reduce the city into a heap of stones and ashes, and to sacrifice the most illustrious of the Roman senators on the altars of those gods who were appeased by human blood The public danger, which should have reconciled all domestic animosities, displayed the incurable madness of religious faction The oppressed votaries of Jupiter and Mercury respected, in the implacable enemy of Rome, the character of a devout Pagan, loudly declared that they were more apprehensive of the sacrifices than of the arms of Radagaisus, and secretly rejoiced in the calamities of their country, which condemned the faith of their Christian adversaries [75]

Florence was reduced to the last extremity, and the fainting courage of the citizens was supported only by the authority of St Ambrose, who had communicated in a dream the promise of a speedy deliverance [76] On a sudden they beheld from their walls the banners of Stilicho, who advanced with his united force to the relief of the faithful city, and who soon marked that fatal spot for the grave of the barbarian host The apparent contradictions of those writers who variously relate the defeat of Radagaisus, may be reconciled without offering much violence to their respective testimonies Orosius and Augustin, who were intimately connected by friendship and religion, ascribe this miraculous victory to the providence of God rather than to the valour of man [77] They strictly exclude every idea of chance, or even of bloodshed, and positively affirm that the Romans, whose camp was the scene of plenty and idleness, enjoyed the distress of the barbarians slowly expiring on the sharp and barren ridge of the hills of Fæsulæ, which rise above the city of Florence Their extravagant assertion that not a single soldier of the Christian army was killed, or even wounded, may be dismissed with silent contempt, but the rest of the narrative of Augustin and Orosius is consistent with the state of the war and the character of Stilicho Conscious that he commanded the last army of the republic, his prudence would not expose it in the open field to the headstrong fury of the Germans The method of surrounding the enemy with strong lines of circumvallation, which he had twice employed against the Gothic king, was repeated on a larger scale and with more considerable effect The examples of Cæsar must have been familiar to the most illiterate of the Roman warriors, and the fortifications of Dyrrachium, which connected twenty-four castles by a perpetual ditch and rampart of fifteen miles, afforded the model of an entrenchment which might confine and starve the most numerous host of barbarians [78] The Roman troops had less degenerated from the industry than from the valour of their ancestors, and if the servile and laborious work offended the pride of the soldiers, Tuscany could supply many thousand peasants who would labour, though perhaps they would not fight, for the salvation of their native country The imprisoned multitude of horses and men[79] was gradually destroyed by famine rather than by the sword, but the Romans were exposed during the progress of such an extensive work to the frequent attacks of an impatient enemy The despair of the hungry barbarians would precipitate them against the fortifications of Stilicho, the general might sometimes indulge the ardour of his brave auxiliaries who eagerly pressed to assault the camp of the Germans and these various incidents might produce the sharp and bloody conflicts which dignify the narrative of Zosimus and the Chronicles of Prosper and Marcellinus [80] A seasonable supply of men and provisions had been introduced into the walls of Florence and the famished host of Radagaisus was in its turn besieged The proud monarch of so many warlike nations after the loss of his bravest warriors was reduced to confide either in the faith of a capitulation or in the clemency of Stilicho [81] But the death of the royal captive who was ignominiously beheaded disgraced the triumph of Rome and of Christianity and the short delay of his execution was sufficient to brand the conqueror with the guilt of cool and deliberate cruelty [82] The famished Germans who escaped the fury of the auxiliaries were sold as slaves, at the contemptible price of as many single pieces of gold but the difference of food and climate swept away great numbers of those unhappy strangers and it was observed that the inhuman purchasers instead of reaping the fruits of their labour were soon obliged to provide the expense of their interment. Stilicho informed the emperor and the senate of his success and deserved a second time the glorious title of Deliverer of Italy [83]

The fame of the victory and more especially of the miracle has encouraged a vain persuasion that the whole army or rather nation of Germans who migrated from the shores of the Baltic miserably perished under the walls of Florence. Such indeed was the fate of Radagaisus himself of his brave and faithful companions and of more than one third of the various multitude of Sueves and Vandals of Alani and Burgundians who adhered to the standard of their general [84] The union of such an army might excite our surprise but the causes of separation are obvious and forcible the pride of birth, the insolence of valour the jealousy of command the impatience of subordination and the obstinate conflict of opinions of interests and of passions among so many kings and warriors who were untaught to yield or to obey After the defeat of Radagaisus two parts of the German host, which must have exceeded the number of one hundred thousand men, still remained in arms between the Apennine and the Alps, or between the Alps and the Danube. It is uncertain whether they attempted to revenge the death of their general but their irregular fury was soon diverted by the prudence and firmness of Stilicho, who opposed their march and facilitated their retreat who considered the safety of Rome and Italy as the great object of his care and who sacrificed with too much indifference the wealth and tranquillity of the distant provinces [85] The barbarians acquired from the junction of some Pannonian deserters the knowledge of the country and of the roads and the invasion of Gaul, which Alaric had designed was executed by the remains of the great army of Radagaisus [86]

Yet if they expected to derive any assistance from the tribes of Germany who inhabited the banks of the Rhine their hopes were disappointed The Alemanni preserved a state of inactive neutrality and the Franks distinguished their zeal and courage in the defence of the empire In the rapid progress down the Rhine which was the first act of the administration of Stilicho he had applied himself with peculiar attention to secure the alliance of the warlike Franks and to remove the irreconcilable enemies of peace and of the republic Marcomir one of their kings was publicly convicted before the tribunal of the Roman magistrate of violating the faith of treaties He was sentenced to a mild but distant exile in the province of Tuscany and this degradation of the regal dignity was so far from exciting the resentment of his subjects that they punished with death the turbulent Sunno who attempted to revenge his brother and maintained a dutiful allegiance to the princes who were established on the throne by the choice of Stilicho [87] When the limits of Gaul and Germany were shaken by the northern emigration the Franks bravely encountered the single force of the Vandals who, regardless of the lessons of adversity had again separated their troops from the standard of their barbarian allies They paid the penalty of their rashness and twenty thousand Vandals, with their king Godigisclus were slain in the field of battle The whole people must have been extirpated if the squadrons of the Alani advancing to their relief had not trampled down the infantry of the Franks who after an honourable resistance were compelled to relinquish the unequal contest. The victorious confederates pursued their march and on the last day of the year in a season when the waters of the Rhine were most probably frozen they entered without opposition the defenceless provinces of Gaul. This memorable passage of the Suevi the Vandals the Alani and the Burgundians, who never afterwards retreated may be considered as the fall of the Roman empire in the countries

beyond the Alps, and the barriers, which had so long separated the savage and the civilised nations of the earth, were from that fatal moment levelled with the ground [88]

While the peace of Germany was secured by the attachment of the Franks and the neutrality of the Alemanni, the subjects of Rome, unconscious of their approaching calamities, enjoyed the state of quiet and prosperity which had seldom blessed the frontiers of Gaul Their flocks and herds were permitted to graze in the pastures of the barbarians, their huntsmen penetrated, without fear or danger, into the darkest recesses of the Hercynian wood [89] The banks of the Rhine were crowned, like those of the Tiber, with elegant houses and well cultivated farms, and if a poet descended the river, he might express his doubt on which side was situated the territory of the Romans [90] This scene of peace and plenty was suddenly changed into a desert, and the prospect of the smoking ruins could alone distinguish the solitude of nature from the desolation of man The flourishing city of Mentz was surprised and destroyed, and many thousand Christians were inhumanly massacred in the church Worms perished after a long and obstinate siege, Strasburg, Spires, Rheims, Tournay, Arras, Amiens, experienced the cruel oppression of the German yoke, and the consuming flames of war spread from the banks of the Rhine over the greatest part of the seventeen provinces of Gaul That rich and extensive country, as far as the ocean, the Alps, and the Pyrenees, was delivered to the barbarians, who drove before them in a promiscuous crowd the bishop, the senator, and the virgin, laden with the spoils of their houses and altars [91] The ecclesiastics, to whom we are indebted for this vague description of the public calamities, embraced the opportunity of exhorting the Christians to repent of the sins which had provoked the Divine Justice, and to renounce the perishable goods of a wretched and deceitful world But as the Pelagian controversy,[92] which attempts to sound the abyss of grace and predestination, soon became the serious employment of the Latin clergy, the Providence which had decreed, or foreseen, or permitted, such a train of moral and natural evils, was rashly weighed in the imperfect and fallacious balance of reason The crimes and the misfortunes of the suffering people were presumptuously compared with those of their ancestors, and they arraigned the Divine Justice, which did not exempt from the common destruction, the feeble, the guiltless, the infant portion of the human species These idle disputants overlooked the invariable laws of nature, which have connected peace with innocence, plenty with industry, and safety with valour The timid and selfish policy of the court of Ravenna might recall the Palatine legions for the protection of Italy, the remains of the stationary troops might be unequal to the arduous task, and the barbarian auxiliaries might prefer the unbounded licence of spoil to the benefits of a moderate and regular stipend But the provinces of Gaul were filled with a numerous race of hardy and robust youth, who, in the defence of their houses, their families, and their altars, if they had dared to die, would have deserved to vanquish The knowledge of their native country would have enabled them to oppose continual and insuperable obstacles to the progress of an invader, and the deficiency of the barbarians in arms as well as in discipline removed the only pretence which excuses the submission of a populous country to the inferior numbers of a veteran army When France was invaded by Charles the Fifth, he inquired of a prisoner how many days Paris might be distant from the frontier, "Perhaps twelve, but they will be days of battle "[93] such was the gallant answer which checked the arrogance of that ambitious prince The subjects of Honorius and those of Francis I were animated by a very different spirit, and in less than two years the divided troops of the savages of the Baltic, whose numbers, were they fairly stated, would appear contemptible, advanced without a combat to the foot of the Pyrenæan mountains

In the early part of the reign of Honorius, the vigilance of Stilicho had successfully guarded the remote island of Britain from her incessant enemies of the ocean, the mountains, and the Irish coast [94] But those restless barbarians could not neglect the fair opportunity of the Gothic war, when the walls and stations of the province were stripped of the Roman troops If any of the legionaries were permitted to return from the Italian expedition, their faithful report of the court and character of Honorius must have tended to dissolve the bounds of allegiance, and to exasperate the seditious temper of the British army The spirit of revolt, which had formerly disturbed the age of Gallienus, was revived by the capricious violence of the soldiers, and the unfortunate, perhaps the ambitious, candidates, who were the objects of their choice, were the instruments, and at length the victims, of their passion [95] Marcus was the first whom they placed on the throne, as the lawful emperor of Britain and of the West They violated, by the hasty murder ot Marcus the oath of fidelity which they had imposed on themselves and their dis approbation of his manners may seem to in scribe an honourable epitaph on his tomb Gra tian was the next whom they adorned with the diadem and the purple and at the end of four months Gratian experienced the fate of his pred ecessor The memory of th great Constantine whom the British legions had given to the church and to the empire, suggested the singu lar motive of their third choice They discovered in the ranks a private soldier of the name of Constantine and their impetuous levity had already seated him on the throne before they perceived his incapacity to sustain the weight of that glorious appellation [96] Yet the authority of Constantine was less precarious and his govern ment was more successful than the transient reigns of Marcus and of Gratian The danger of l aving his inactive troops in those camps which had been twice polluted with blood and sedi tion urged him to attempt the reduction of the Western provinces He landed at Boulogne with an inconsiderable force and after he had re posed himself some days he summoned the cities of Gaul which had escaped the yoke of the barbarians to acknowledge their lawful sovereign They obeyed the summons without reluctance The neglect of the court of Ravenna had absolved a deserted people from the duty of allegiance their actual distress encouraged them to accept any circumstances of chang without apprehension and perhaps a ge degree of hope and they might flatter with ome selves that the troops the authority them the name of a Roman emperor who and even residence in Gaul would protect the fixed his country from the rage of the barbarians unhappy The first successes of Constantine against the de tached parties of the Germans were magnified by the voice of adulation into splendid and de cisive victories which the reunion and insolence of the enemy soon reduced to their just value His negotiations procured a short and precari ous truce and if some tribes of the barbarians were engaged by the liberality of his gifts and promises to und rtake the defence of the Rhine, these expensive and uncertain treaties instead of restoring the pristine vigour of the Gallic frontier served only to disgrace the majesty of the prince and to exhaust what yet remained of the treasures of the republic. Elated however with this imaginary triumph the vain deliverer of Gaul advanced into the provinces of the South to encounter a more pressing and per sonal danger Sarus the Goth was ordered to lay the head of the rebel at the feet of the emperor Honorius and the forces of Britain and Italy were unworthily consumed in this domestic quarrel After the loss of his two bravest gener als Justinian and Nevigastes, the former of whom was slain in the field of battle, the latter in a peaceful but treacherous interview Con stantine fortified himself within the walls of Vienna The place was ineffectually attacked seven days and the Imperial army supported, in a precipitate retreat, the ignominy of pur chasing a secure passage from the freebooters and outlaws of the Alps [97] Those mountains now separated the dominions of two rival monarchs and the fortifications of the doubl frontier were guarded by the troops of the empire whose arms would have been more usefully employed to maintain the Roman limits against the bar barians of Germany and Scythia.

On this side of the Pyrenees the ambition of Constantine might be justified by the proximity of danger but his throne was soon established by the conquest or rather submission of Spain which yielded to the influence of regular and habitual subordination and received the laws and magistrates of the Gallic prefecture The only opposition which was made to the author ity of Constantine proceeded not so much from the powers of government or the spirit of the people as from the private zeal and interest of the family of Theodosius Four brothers[98] had obtained by the favour of their kinsman the deceased emperor an honourabl rank and ample possessions in their native country and the grateful youths resolved to risk those advan tages in the service of his son After an unsuccess ful effort to main a n their ground at the head of the stationary troops of Lusitania, they re tired to their estates where they armed and levied at their own expense a considerable body of slaves and dependents, and boldly marched to occupy the strong posts of the Pyr enean mountains This domestic insurrection alarm d and perplexed the sovereign of Gaul and Britain and he was compelled to negotiate with ome troops of barbarian auxiliaries, for the serv ce of the Spanish war They were dis tinguished by the title of Honorarians [99] a name which might have reminded them of their fidel ity to their lawful sovereign and if it should candidly be allowed that the Scots were influ enced by any partial affection for a British prince the Moors and the Marcomanni could be tempted only by the profuse liberality of the usurper who distributed among the barbarians the military and even the civil honours of

Spain The nine bands of Honorians, which may be easily traced on the establishment of the Western empire, could not exceed the number of five thousand men, yet this inconsiderable force was sufficient to terminate a war which had threatened the power and safety of Constantine The rustic army of the Theodosian family was surrounded and destroyed in the Pyrenees two of the brothers had the good fortune to escape by sea to Italy or the East, the other two, after an interval of suspense, were executed at Arles, and if Honorius could remain insensible of the public disgrace, he might perhaps be affected by the personal misfortunes of his generous kinsmen Such were the feeble arms which decided the possession of the Western provinces of Europe, from the wall of Antoninus to the Columns of Hercules The events of peace and war have undoubtedly been diminished by the narrow and imperfect view of the historians of the times, who were equally ignorant of the causes and of the effects of the most important revolutions But the total decay of the national strength had annihilated even the last resource of a despotic government, and the revenue of exhausted provinces could no longer purchase the military service of a discontented and pusillanimous people

The poet, whose flattery has ascribed to the Roman eagle the victories of Pollentia and Verona, pursues the hasty retreat of Alaric from the confines of Italy, with a horrid train of imaginary spectres, such as might hover over an army of barbarians which was almost exterminated by war, famine, and disease[100] In the course of this unfortunate expedition, the king of the Goths must indeed have sustained a considerable loss, and his harassed forces required interval of repose to recruit their numbers and revive their confidence Adversity had exercised and displayed the genius of Alaric, and the fame of his valour invited to the Gothic standard the bravest of the barbarian warriors, who, from the Euxine to the Rhine, were agitated by the desire of rapine and conquest He had deserved the esteem, and he soon accepted the friendship, of Stilicho himself Renouncing the service of the emperor of the East, Alaric concluded, with the court of Ravenna, a treaty of peace and alliance, by which he was declared master-general of the Roman armies throughout the præfecture of Illyricum, as it was claimed, according to the true and ancient limits, by the minister of Honorius[101] The execution of the ambitious design, which was either stipulated or implied in the articles of the treaty, appears to have been suspended by the formidable irruption of Radagaisus, and the neutrality of the Gothic king may perhaps be compared to the indifference of Cæsar, who, in the conspiracy of Catiline, refused either to assist or to oppose the enemy of the republic After the defeat of the Vandals, Stilicho resumed his pretensions to the provinces of the East, appointed civil magistrates for the administration of justice and of the finances, and declared his impatience to lead to the gates of Constantinople the united armies of the Romans and of the Goths The prudence, however, of Stilicho, his aversion to civil war, and his perfect knowledge of the weakness of the state, may countenance the suspicion that domestic peace, rather than foreign conquest, was the object of his policy, and that his principal care was to employ the forces of Alaric at a distance from Italy This design could not long escape the penetration of the Gothic king, who continued to hold a doubtful, and perhaps a treacherous, correspondence with the rival courts, who protracted, like a dissatisfied mercenary, his languid operations of Thessaly and Epirus, and who soon returned to claim the extravagant reward of his ineffectual services From his camp near Æmona,[102] on the confines of Italy, he transmitted to the emperor of the West a long account of promises, of expenses, and of demands, called for immediate satisfaction, and clearly intimated the consequences of a refusal Yet, if his conduct was hostile, his language was decent and dutiful He humbly professed himself the friend of Stilicho, and the soldier of Honorius, offered his person and his troops to march, without delay, against the usurper of Gaul, and solicited, as a permanent retreat for the Gothic nation, the possession of some vacant province of the Western empire

The political and secret transactions of two statesmen who laboured to deceive each other and the world must for ever have been concealed in the impenetrable darkness of the cabinet, if the debates of a popular assembly had not thrown some rays of light on the correspondence of Alaric and Stilicho The necessity of finding some artificial support for a government which, from a principle, not of moderation, but of weakness, was reduced to negotiate with its own subjects, had insensibly revived the authority of the Roman senate and the minister of Honorius respectfully consulted the legislative council of the republic. Stilicho assembled the senate in the palace of the Cæsars, represented, in a studied oration, the actual state of affairs, proposed the demands of the Gothic king and submitted to their consideration the choice of peace or war The senators as if they had been suddenly awakened from a dream of four hundred years appeared on this important occasion to be inspired by the courage rather than by the wisdom of their predecessors They loudly declared in regular speeches or in tumultuary acclamations that it was unworthy of the majesty of Rome to purchase a precarious and disgraceful truce from a barbarian king and that in the judgment of a magnanimous people the chance of ruin was always preferable to the certainty of dishonour The minister whose pacific intentions were seconded only by the voices of a few servile and venal followers attempted to allay the general ferment by an apology for his own conduct and even for the demands of the Gothic prince The payment of a subsidy which had excited the indignation of the Romans ought not (such was the language of Stilicho) to be considered in the odious light either of a tribute or of a ransom extorted by the menaces of a barbarian enemy Alaric had faithfully asserted the just pretensions of the republic to the provinces which were usurped by the Greeks of Constantinople he modestly required the fair and stipulated recompense of his services and if he had desisted from the prosecution of his enterprise he had obeyed in his retreat the peremptory though private letters of the emperor himself These contradictory orders (he would not dissemble the errors of his own family) had been procured by the intercession of Serena The tender piety of his wife had been too deeply affected by the discord of the royal brothers the sons of her adopted father and the sentiments of nature had too easily prevailed over the stern dictates of the public welfare These ostensible reasons which faintly disguise the obscure intrigues of the palace of Ravenna were supported by the authority of Stilicho and obtained after a warm debate the reluctant approbation of the senate The tumult of virtue and freedom subsided and the sum of four thousand pounds of gold was granted under the name of a subsidy to secure the peace of Italy and to conciliate the friendship of the king of the Goths Lampadius alone one of the most illustrious members of the assembly still persisted in his dissent exclaimed with a loud voice This is not a treaty of peace but of servitude [103] and escaped the danger of such bold opposition by immediately retiring to the sanctuary of a Christian church.

But the reign of Stilicho drew towards its end and the proud minister might perceive the symptoms of his approaching disgrace The generous boldness of Lampadius had been applauded and the senate so patiently resigned to a long servitude rejected with disdain the offer of invidious and imaginary freedom. The troops who still assumed the name and prerogatives of the Roman legions were exasperated by the partial affection of Stilicho for the barbarians and the people imputed to the mischievous policy of the minister the public misfortunes which were the natural consequences of their own degeneracy Yet Stilicho might have continued to brave the clamours of the people and even of the soldiers if he could have maintained his dominion over the feeble mind of his pupil But the respectful attachment of Honorius was converted into fear, suspicion, and hatred The crafty Olympius [104] who concealed his vices under the mask of Christian piety had secretly undermined the benefactor by whose favour he was promoted to the honourable offices of the Imperial palace Olympius revealed to the unsuspecting emperor who had attained the twenty fifth year of his age that he was without weight or authority in his own government and artfully alarmed his timid and indolent disposition by a lively picture of the designs of Stilicho who already meditated the death of his sovereign with the ambitious hope of placing the diadem on the head of his son Eucherius The emperor was instigated by his new favourite to assume the tone of independent dignity and the minister was astonished to find that secret resolutions were formed in the court and council which were repugnant to his interest or to his intentions Instead of residing in the palace of Rome Honorius declared that it was his pleasure to return to the secure fortress of Ravenna On the first intelligence of the death of his brother Arcadius he prepared to visit Constantinople and to regulate with the authority of a guardian the provinces of the infant Theodosius [105] The representation of the difficulty and expense of such a distant expedition checked this strange and sudden sally of active diligence but the dangerous project of showing the emperor to the camp of Pavia, which was composed of the Roman troops the enemies of Stilicho and his barbarian auxiliaries remained fixed and unalterable The minister was pressed by the advice of his confidant, Justinian a Roman advocate, of a lively and penetrating genius to oppose a journey so prejudicial to his reputation and safety His strenuous but ineffectual efforts confirmed the triumph of Olympius, and the prudent lawyer withdrew himself from the impending ruin of his patron

In the passage of the emperor through Bologna a mutiny of the guards was excited and appeased by the secret policy of Stilicho, who announced his instructions to decimate the guilty, and ascribed to his own intercession the merit of their pardon After this tumult, Honorius embraced, for the last time, the minister whom he now considered as a tyrant, and proceeded on his way to the camp of Pavia, where he was received by the loyal acclamations of the troops who were assembled for the service of the Gallic war On the morning of the fourth day he pronounced, as he had been taught, a military oration in the presence of the soldiers, whom the charitable visits and artful discourses of Olympius had prepared to execute a dark and bloody conspiracy At the first signal they massacred the friends of Stilicho, the most illustrious officers of the empire, two Prætorian præfects, of Gaul and of Italy, two masters-general of the cavalry and infantry, the master of the offices, the quæstor, the treasurer, and the count of the domestics Many lives were lost, many houses were plundered, the furious sedition continued to rage till the close of the evening, and the trembling emperor, who was seen in the streets of Pavia without his robes or diadem, yielded to the persuasions of his favourite, condemned the memory of the slain, and solemnly approved the innocence and fidelity of their assassins The intelligence of the massacre of Pavia filled the mind of Stilicho with just and gloomy apprehensions, and he instantly summoned, in the camp of Bologna, a council of the confederate leaders who were attached to his service, and would be involved in his ruin The impetuous voice of the assembly called aloud for arms and for revenge, to march, without a moment's delay, under the banners of a hero whom they had so often followed to victory, to surprise, to oppress, to extirpate the guilty Olympius and his degenerate Romans, and perhaps to fix the diadem on the head of their injured general Instead of executing a resolution which might have been justified by success, Stilicho hesitated till he was irrecoverably lost He was still ignorant of the fate of the emperor, he distrusted the fidelity of his own party, and he viewed with horror the fatal consequences of arming a crowd of licentious barbarians against the soldiers and people of Italy The confederates, impatient of his timorous and doubtful delay, hastily retired with fear and indignation At the hour of midnight Sarus, a Gothic warrior, renowned among the barbarians themselves for his strength and valour, suddenly invaded the camp of his benefactor, plundered the baggage, cut in pieces the faithful Huns who guarded his person, and penetrated to the tent, where the minister, pensive and sleepless, meditated on the dangers of his situation Stilicho escaped with difficulty from the sword of the Goth, and after issuing a last and generous admonition to the cities of Italy to shut their gates against the barbarians, his confidence or his despair urged him to throw himself into Ravenna, which was already in the absolute possession of his enemies Olympius, who had assumed the dominion of Honorius, was speedily informed that his rival had embraced, as a suppliant, the altar of the Christian church The base and cruel disposition of the hypocrite was incapable of pity or remorse, but he piously affected to elude, rather than to violate, the privilege of the sanctuary Count Heraclian, with a troop of soldiers, appeared at the dawn of day before the gates of the church of Ravenna The bishop was satisfied by a solemn oath that the Imperial mandate only directed them to secure the person of Stilicho but as soon as the unfortunate minister had been tempted beyond the holy threshold, he produced the warrant for his instant execution Stilicho supported with calm resignation the injurious names of traitor and parricide, repressed the unseasonable zeal of his followers, who were ready to attempt an ineffectual rescue, and, with a firmness not unworthy of the last of the Roman generals, submitted his neck to the sword of Heraclian [106]

The servile crowd of the palace, who had so long adored the fortune of Stilicho, affected to insult his fall, and the most distant connection with the master-general of the West, which had so lately been a title to wealth and honours, was studiously denied, and rigorously punished His family, united by a triple alliance with the family of Theodosius, might envy the condition of the meanest peasant The flight of his son Eucherius was intercepted, and the death of that innocent youth soon followed the divorce of Thermantia, who filled the place of her sister Maria, and who, like Maria, had remained a virgin in the Imperial bed [107] The friends of Stilicho who had escaped the massacre of Pavia were persecuted by the implacable revenge of Olympius, and the most exquisite cruelty was employed to extort the confession of a treasonable and sacrilegious conspiracy They died in silence, their firmness justified the choice,[108]

and perhaps absolved the innocence of their patron and the despotic power which could take his life without a trial and stigmatise his memory without a proof has no jurisdiction over the impartial suffrage of posterity [109] The services of Stilicho are great and manifest his crimes as they are vaguely stated in the language of flattery and hatred are obscure at least and improbable About four months after his death an edict was published in the name of Honorius to restore the free communication of the two empires which had been so long interrupted by the public enemy [110] The minister whose fame and fortune depended on the prosperity of the state was accused of betraying Italy to the barbarians whom he repeatedly vanquished at Pollentia at Verona and before the walls of Florence His pretended design of placing the diadem on the head of his son Eucherius could not have been conducted without preparations or accomplices and the ambitious father would not surely have left the future emperor till the twentieth year of his age in the humble station of tribune of the notaries Even the religion of Stilicho was arraigned by the malice of his rival The seasonable and almost miraculous deliverance was devoutly celebrated by the applause of the clergy who asserted that the restoration of idols and the persecution of the church would have been the first measure of the reign of Eucherius The son of Stilicho however was educated in the bosom of Christianity which his father had uniformly professed and zealously supported [111] Serena had borrowed her magnificent necklace from the statue of Vesta [112] and the Pagans execrated the memory of the sacrilegious minister by whose order the Sibylline books the oracles of Rome had been committed to the flames [113] The pride and power of Stilicho constituted his real guilt An honourable reluctance to shed the blood of his countrymen appears to have contributed to the success of his unworthy rival and it is the last humiliation of the character of Honorius that posterity has not condescended to reproach him with his base ingratitude to the guardian of his youth and the support of his empire

Among the train of dependents whose wealth and dignity attracted the notice of their own times, our curiosity is excited by the celebrated name of the poet Claudian who enjoyed the favour of Stilicho and was overwhelmed in the ruin of his patron. The titular offices of tribune and notary fixed his rank in the Imperial court he was indebted to the powerful intercession of Serena for his marriage with a rich heiress of the province of Africa [114] and the statue of Claudian erected in the forum of Trajan was a monument of the taste and liberality of the Roman senate [115] After the praises of Stilicho became offensive and criminal Claudian was exposed to the enmity of a powerful and unforgiving courtier whom he had provoked by the insolence of wit He had compared in a lively epigram the opposite characters of two Praetorian praefects of Italy he contrasts the innocent repose of a philosopher who sometimes resigned the hours of business to slumber perhaps to study with the interested diligence of a rapacious minister indefatigable in the pursuit of unjust or sacrilegious gain How happy continues Claudian how happy might it be for the people of Italy if Mallius could be constantly awake and if Hadrian would always sleep! [116] The repose of Mallius was not disturbed by this friendly and gentle admonition but the cruel vigilance of Hadrian watched the opportunity of revenge and easily obtained from the enemies of Stilicho the trifling sacrifice of an obnoxious poet The poet concealed himself, however during the tumult of the revolution and consulting the dictates of prudence rather than of honour he addressed in the form of an epistle a suppliant and humble recantation to the offended praefect He deplores in mournful strains the fatal indiscretion into which he had been hurried by passion and folly submits to the imitation of his adversary the generous examples of the clemency of gods of heroes and of lions and expresses his hope that the magnanimity of Hadrian will not trample on a defenseless and contemptible foe already humbled by disgrace and poverty and deeply wounded by the exile the tortures and the death of his dearest friends [117] Whatever might be the success of his prayer or the accidents of his future life the period of a few years levelled in the grave the minister and the poet but the name of Hadrian is almost sunk in oblivion while Claudian is read with pleasure in every country which has retained or acquired the knowledge of the Latin language If we fairly balance his merits and his defects we shall acknowledge that Claudian does not either satisfy or silence our reason It would not be easy to produce a passage that deserves the epithet of sublime or pathetic to select a verse that melts the heart or enlarges the imagination. We should vainly seek in the poems of Claudian the happy invention and artificial conduct of an interesting fable or the just and lively representation of the characters and situations of real life For the service of his patron he published occasional panegyrics and invectives, and the design of these slavish compositions encouraged his propensity to exceed the limits of truth and nature These imperfections, however, are compensated in some degree by the poetical virtues of Claudian He was endowed with the rare and precious talent of raising the meanest, of adorning the most barren, and of diversifying the most similar topics, his colouring, more especially in descriptive poetry, is soft and splendid, and he seldom fails to display, and even to abuse, the advantages of a cultivated understanding, a copious fancy, an easy and sometimes forcible expression, and a perpetual flow of harmonious versification To these commendations, independent of any accidents of time and place, we must add the peculiar merit which Claudian derived from the unfavourable circumstances of his birth In the decline of arts and of empire, a native of Egypt,[118] who had received the education of a Greek, assumed in a mature age the familiar use and absolute command of the Latin language,[119] soared above the heads of his feeble contemporaries, and placed himself, after an interval of three hundred years, among the poets of ancient Rome[120]

CHAPTER XXXI

Invasion of Italy by Alaric Manners of the Roman Senate and People Rome is thrice besieged, and at length pillaged, by the Goths Death of Alaric The Goths evacuate Italy Fall of Constantine Gaul and Spain are occupied by the Barbarians Independence of Britain

THE incapacity of a weak and distracted government may often assume the appearance and produce the effects of a treasonable correspondence with the public enemy If Alaric himself had been introduced into the council of Ravenna, he would probably have advised the same measures which were actually pursued by the ministers of Honorius[1] The king of the Goths would have conspired, perhaps with some reluctance, to destroy the formidable adversary by whose arms, in Italy as well as in Greece, he had been twice overthrown Their active and interested hatred laboriously accomplished the disgrace and ruin of the great Stilicho The valour of Sarus, his fame in arms, and his personal or hereditary influence over the confederate barbarians, could recommend him only to the friends of their country who despised or detested the worthless characters of Turpilio, Varanes, and Vigilantius By the pressing instances of the new favourites, these generals, unworthy as they had shown themselves of the name of soldiers,[2] were promoted to the command of the cavalry, of the infantry, and of the domestic troops The Gothic prince would have subscribed with pleasure the edict which the fanaticism of Olympius dictated to the simple and devout emperor Honorius excluded all persons who were adverse to the catholic church from holding any office in the state, obstinately rejected the service of all those who dissented from his religion, and rashly disqualified many of his bravest and most skilful officers who adhered to the Pagan worship or who had imbibed the opinions of Arianism[3] These measures, so advantageous to an enemy, Alaric would have approved, and might perhaps have suggested, but it may seem doubtful whether the barbarian would have promoted his interest at the expense of the inhuman and absurd cruelty which was perpetrated by the direction, or at least with the connivance, of the Imperial ministers The foreign auxiliaries who had been attached to the person of Stilicho lamented his death, but the desire of revenge was checked by a natural apprehension for the safety of their wives and children, who were detained as hostages in the strong cities of Italy, where they had likewise deposited their most valuable effects At the same hour, and as if by a common signal, the cities of Italy were polluted by the same horrid scenes of universal massacre and pillage, which involved in promiscuous destruction the families and fortunes of the barbarians Exasperated by such an injury, which might have awakened the tamest and most servile spirit, they cast a look of indignation and hope towards the camp of Alaric, and unanimously swore to pursue with just and implacable war the perfidious nation that had so basely violated the laws of hospitality By the imprudent conduct of the ministers of Honorius

the republic lost the assistance and deserved the enmity of thirty thousand of her bravest soldiers and the weight of that formidable army which alone might have determined the event of the war was transferred from the scale of the Romans into that of the Goths

In the arts of negotiation as well as in those of war the Gothic king maintained his superior ascendant over an enemy whose seeming changes proceeded from the total want of counsel and design From his camp on the confines of Italy Alaric attentively observed the revolutions of the palace watched the progress of faction and discontent disguised the hostile aspect of a barbarian invader and assumed the more popular appearance of the friend and ally of the great Stilicho to whose virtues when they were no longer formidable he could pay a just tribute of sincere praise and regret The pressing invitation of the malcontents who urged the king of the Goths to invade Italy was enforced by a lively sense of his personal injuries and he might speciously complain that the Imperial ministers still delayed and eluded the payment of the four thousand pounds of gold which had been granted by the Roman senate either to reward his services or to appease his fury His decent firmness was supported by an artful moderation which contributed to the success of his designs He required a fair and reasonable satisfaction but he gave the strongest assurances that as soon as he had obtained it he would immediately retire He refused to trust the faith of the Romans unless Aetius and Jason the sons of two great officers of state were sent as hostages to his camp but he offered to deliver in exchange several of the noblest youths of the Gothic nation The modesty of Alaric was interpreted by the ministers of Ravenna as a sure evidence of his weakness and fear They disdained either to negotiate a treaty or to assemble an army and with a rash confidence derived only from their ignorance of the extreme danger irretrievably wasted the decisive moments of peace and war While they expected in sullen silence that the barbarians should evacuate the confines of Italy Alaric with bold and rapid marches passed the Alps and the Po hastily pillaged the cities of Aquileia Altinum, Concordia and Cremona which yielded to his arms increased his forces by the accession of thirty thousand auxiliaries and without meeting a single enemy in the field advanced as far as the edge of the morass which protected the impregnable residence of the emperor of the West. Instead of attempting the hopeless siege of Ravenna the prudent leader of the Goths proceeded to Rimini stretched his ravages along the sea-coast of the Hadriatic, and meditated the conquest of the ancient mistress of the world An Italian hermit whose zeal and sanctity were respected by the barbarians themselves encountered the victorious monarch and boldly denounced the indignation of Heaven against the oppressors of the earth but the saint himself was confounded by the solemn asseveration of Alaric that he felt a secret and præternatural impulse which directed and even compelled his march to the gates of Rome He felt that his genius and his fortune were equal to the most arduous enterprises and the enthusiasm which he communicated to the Goths insensibly removed the popular and almost superstitious reverence of the nations for the majesty of the Roman name His troops animated by the hopes of spoil followed the course of the Flaminian way occupied the unguarded passes of the Apennine [4] descended into the rich plains of Umbria and as they lay encamped on the banks of the Clitumnus might wantonly slaughter and devour the milk white oxen which had been so long reserved for the use of Roman triumphs [5] A lofty situation and a seasonable tempest of thunder and lightning preserved the little city of Narni but the king of the Goths despising the ignoble prey still advanced with unabated vigour and after he had passed through the stately arches adorned with the spoils of barbaric victories he pitched his camp under the walls of Rome [6]

During a period of six hundred and nineteen years the seat of empire had never been violated by the presence of a foreign enemy The unsuccessful expedition of Hannibal[7] served only to display the character of the senate and people of a senate degraded rather than ennobled by the comparison of an assembly of kings and of a people to whom the ambassador of Pyrrhus ascribed the inexhaustible resources of the Hydra.[8] Each of the senators in the time of the Punic war had accomplished his term of military service either in a subordinate or a superior station and the decree which invested with temporary command all those who had been consuls or censors or dictators gave the republic the immediate assistance of many brave and experienced generals In the beginning of the war the Roman people consisted of two hundred and fifty thousand citizens of an age to bear arms [9] Fifty thousand had already died in the defence of their country and the twenty three legions which were employed in the different camps of Italy, Greece, Sardinia, Sicily, and Spain, required about one hundred thousand men But there still remained an equal number in Rome and the adjacent territory who were animated by the same intrepid courage, and every citizen was trained from his earliest youth in the discipline and exercises of a soldier Hannibal was astonished by the constancy of the senate, who, without raising the siege of Capua or recalling their scattered forces, expected his approach He encamped on the banks of the Anio, at the distance of three miles from the city and he was soon informed that the ground on which he had pitched his tent was sold for an adequate price at a public auction, and that a body of troops was dismissed by an opposite road to reinforce the legions of Spain [10] He led his Africans to the gates of Rome, where he found three armies in order of battle prepared to receive him, but Hannibal dreaded the event of a combat from which he could not hope to escape unless he destroyed the last of his enemies, and his speedy retreat confessed the invincible courage of the Romans

From the time of the Punic war the uninterrupted succession of senators had preserved the name and image of the republic, and the degenerate subjects of Honorius ambitiously derived their descent from the heroes who had repulsed the arms of Hannibal and subdued the nations of the earth The temporal honours which the devout Paula[11] inherited and despised are carefully recapitulated by Jerom, the guide of her conscience and the historian of her life The genealogy of her father, Rogatus, which ascended as high as Agamemnon, might seem to betray a Grecian origin, but her mother, Blæsilla, numbered the Scipios, Æmilius Paulus, and the Gracchi in the list of her ancestors, and Toxotius, the husband of Paula, deduced his royal lineage from Æneas, the father of the Julian line The vanity of the rich, who desired to be noble, was gratified by these lofty pretensions Encouraged by the applause of their parasites, they easily imposed on the credulity of the vulgar, and were countenanced in some measure by the custom of adopting the name of their patron, which had always prevailed among the freedmen and clients of illustrious families Most of those families, however, attacked by so many causes of external violence or internal decay, were gradually extirpated and it would be more reasonable to seek for a lineal descent of twenty generations among the mountains of the Alps or in the peaceful solitude of Apulia, than on the theatre of Rome, the seat of fortune, of danger, and of perpetual revolutions Under each successive reign and from every province of the empire a crowd of hardy adventurers, rising to eminence by their talents or their vices, usurped the wealth, the honours, and the palaces of Rome, and oppressed or protected the poor and humble remains of consular families, who were ignorant, perhaps, of the glory of their ancestors [12]

In the time of Jerom and Claudian the senators unanimously yielded the pre-eminence to the Anician line, and a slight view of their history will serve to appreciate the rank and antiquity of the noble families which contended only for the second place [13]

During the five first ages of the city the name of the Anicians was unknown, they appear to have derived their origin from Præneste, and the ambition of those new citizens was long satisfied with the plebeian honours of tribunes of the people [14] One hundred and sixty-eight years before the Christian era the family was ennobled by the prætorship of Anicius, who gloriously terminated the Illyrian war by the conquest of the nation and the captivity of their king [15] From the triumph of that general three consulships in distant periods mark the succession of the Anician name [16] From the reign of Diocletian to the final extinction of the Western empire that name shone with a lustre which was not eclipsed in the public estimation by the majesty of the Imperial purple [17] The several branches to whom it was communicated united, by marriage or inheritance, the wealth and titles of the Annian, the Petronian, and the Olybrian houses, and in each generation the number of consulships was multiplied by an hereditary claim [18] The Anician family excelled in faith and in riches they were the first of the Roman senate who embraced Christianity, and it is probable that Anicius Julian, who was afterwards consul and præfect of the city, atoned for his attachment to the party of Maxentius by the readiness with which he accepted the religion of Constantine [19] Their ample patrimony was increased by the industry of Probus, the chief of the Anician family, who shared with Gratian the honours of the consulship, and exercised four times the high office of Prætorian præfect [20] His immense estates were scattered over the wide extent of the Roman world, and though the public might suspect or disapprove the methods by which they had been acquired, the generosity and magnificence of that fortunate statesman deserved the gratitude of his clients the admiration of strangers [21] Such was

spect entertained for his memory that the two sons of Probus in their earliest youth and at the request of the senate were associated in the consular dignity a memorable distinction without example in the annals of Rome [22]

The marbles of the Anician palace were used as a proverbial expression of opulence and splendour [23] but the nobles and senators of Rome aspired in due gradation to imitate that illustrious family The accurate description of the city which was composed in the Theodosian age enumerates one thousand seven hundred and eighty houses the residence of wealthy and honourable citizens [24] Many of these stately mansions might almost excuse the exaggeration of the poet—that Rome contained a multitude of palaces and that each palace was equal to a city since it included within its own precincts everything which could be subservient either to use or luxury markets hippodromes temples fountains baths porticos shady groves and artificial aviaries [25] The historian Olympiodorus who represents the state of Rome when it was besieged by the Goths [26] continues to observe that several of the richest senators received from their estates an annual income of four thousand pounds of gold above one hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling without computing the stated provision of corn and wine which had they been sold might have equalled in value one third of the money Compared to this immoderate wealth an ordinary revenue of a thousand or fifteen hundred pounds of gold might be considered as no more than adequate to the dignity of the senatorian rank which required many expenses of a public and ostentatious kind. Several examples are recorded in the age of Honorius of vain and popular nobles who celebrated the year of their prætorship by a festival which lasted seven days and cost above one hundred thousand pounds sterling [27] The estates of the Roman senators which so far exceed the proportion of modern wealth were not confined to the limits of Italy Their possessions extended far beyond the Ionian and Ægean seas to the most distant provinces the city of Nicopolis, which Augustus had founded as an eternal monument of the Actian victory was the property of the devout Paula [28] and it is observed by Seneca that the rivers which had divided hostile nations now flowed through the lands of private citizens [29] According to their temper and circumstances the estates of the Romans were either cultivated by the labour of their slaves, or granted for a certain and stipulated rent, to the industrious farmer The economical writers of antiquity strenuously recommend the former method wherever it may be practicable but if the object should be removed by its distance or magnitude from the immediate eye of the master they prefer the active care of an old hereditary tenant attached to the soil and interested in the produce to the mercenary administration of a negligent perhaps an unfaithful steward [30]

The opulent nobles of an immense capital who were never excited by the pursuit of military glory and seldom engaged in the occupations of civil government naturally resigned their leisure to the business and amusements of private life At Rome commerce was always held in contempt, but the senators from the first age of the republic increased their patrimony and multiplied their clients by the lucrative practice of usury and the obsolete laws were eluded or violated by the mutual inclinations and interest of both parties [31] A considerable mass of treasure must always have existed at Rome either in the current coin of the empire or in the form of gold and silver plate and there were many sideboards in the time of Pliny which contained more solid silver than had been transported by Scipio from vanquished Carthage [32] The greater part of the nobles who dissipated their fortunes in profuse luxury found themselves poor in the midst of wealth and idle in a constant round of dissipation Their desires were continually gratified by the labour of a thousand hands of the numerous train of their domestic slaves who were actuated by the fear of punishment and of the various professions of artificers and merchants, who were more powerfully impelled by the hopes of gain The ancients were destitute of many of the conveniences of life which have been invented or improved by the progress of industry and the plenty of glass and linen has diffused more real comforts among the modern nations of Europe than the senators of Rome could derive from all the refinements of pompous or sensual luxury [33] Their luxury and their manners have been the subject of minute and laborious disquisition but as such inquiries would divert me too long from the design of the present work, I shall produce an authentic state of Rome and its inhabitants which is more peculiarly applicable to the period of the Gothic invasion. Ammianus Marcellinus, who prudently chose the capital of the empire as the residence the best adapted to the historian of his own times, has mixed with the narrative of public events a lively representation of the scenes with which he was familiarly conversant The judicious reader will not always approve the asperity of censure, the choice of circumstances, or the style of expression; he will perhaps detect the latent prejudices and personal resentments which soured the temper of Ammianus himself, but he will surely observe, with philosophic curiosity, the interesting and original picture of the manners of Rome [34]

"The greatness of Rome (such is the language of the historian) was founded on the rare and almost incredible alliance of virtue and of fortune The long period of her infancy was employed in a laborious struggle against the tribes of Italy, the neighbours and enemies of the rising city In the strength and ardour of youth she sustained the storms of war, carried her victorious arms beyond the seas and the mountains, and brought home triumphal laurels from every country of the globe At length, verging towards old age, and sometimes conquering by the terror only of her name, she sought the blessings of ease and tranquillity The VENERABLE CITY, which had trampled on the necks of the fiercest nations, and established a system of laws, the perpetual guardians of justice and freedom, was content, like a wise and wealthy parent, to devolve on the Cæsars, her favourite sons, the care of governing her ample patrimony [35] A secure and profound peace, such as had been once enjoyed in the reign of Numa, succeeded to the tumults of a republic, while Rome was still adored as the queen of the earth, and the subject nations still reverenced the name of the people and the majesty of the senate But this native splendour (continues Ammianus) is degraded and sullied by the conduct of some nobles, who, unmindful of their own dignity and of that of their country, assume an unbounded licence of vice and folly They contend with each other in the empty vanity of titles and surnames, and curiously select or invent the most lofty and sonorous appellations—Reburrus or Fabunius, Pagonius or Tarrasius[36]—which may impress the ears of the vulgar with astonishment and respect From a vain ambition of perpetuating their memory, they affect to multiply their likeness in statues of bronze and marble, nor are they satisfied unless those statues are covered with plates of gold, an honourable distinction, first granted to Acilius the consul, after he had subdued by his arms and counsels the power of king Antiochus The ostentation of displaying, of magnifying perhaps, the rent roll of the estates which they possess in all the provinces, from the rising to the setting sun, provokes the just resentment of every man who recollects that their poor and invincible ancestors were not distinguished from the meanest of the soldiers by the delicacy of their food or the splendour of their apparel But the modern nobles measure their rank and consequence according to the loftiness of their chariots,[37] and the weighty magnificence of their dress Their long robes of silk and purple float in the wind, and as they are agitated, by art or accident, they occasionally discover the under garments, the rich tunics, embroidered with the figures of various animals [38] Followed by a train of fifty servants, and tearing up the pavement, they move along the streets with the same impetuous speed as if they travelled with post-horses, and the example of the senators is boldly imitated by the matrons and ladies, whose covered carriages are continually driving round the immense space of the city and suburbs Whenever these persons of high distinction condescend to visit the public baths, they assume, on their entrance, a tone of loud and insolent command, and appropriate to their own use the conveniences which were designed for the Roman people If, in these places of mixed and general resort, they meet any of the infamous ministers of their pleasures, they express their affection by a tender embrace, while they proudly decline the salutations of their fellow-citizens, who are not permitted to aspire above the honour of kissing their hands or their knees As soon as they have indulged themselves in the refreshment of the bath, they resume their rings and the other ensigns of their dignity, select from their private wardrobe of the finest linen, such as might suffice for a dozen persons, the garments the most agreeable to their fancy, and maintain till their departure the same haughty demeanour, which perhaps might have been excused in the great Marcellus after the conquest of Syracuse Sometimes indeed these heroes undertake more arduous achievements they visit their estates in Italy, and procure themselves, by the toil of servile hands, the amusements of the chase.[39] If at any time, but more especially on a hot day, they have courage to sail in their painted galleys from the Lucrine lake[40] to their elegant villas on the sea-coast of Puteoli and Caieta,[41] they compare their own expeditions to the marches of Cæsar and Alexander Yet should a fly presume to settle on the silken folds of their gilded umbrellas, should a sunbeam penetrate through some unguarded and imperceptible chink, they deplore their intolerable hardships, and lament in affected language that they were not born in the land of the Cimmerians [42] the regions of eternal darkness In these journeys into the country[43] the whole body of the house hold marches with their master In the same manner as the cavalry and infantry, the heavy and the light armed troops the advanced guard and the rear are marshalled by the skill of their military leaders, so the domestic officers who bear a rod as an ensign of authority distribute and arrange the numerous train of slaves and attendants The baggage and wardrobe move in the front and are immediately followed by a multitude of cooks and inferior ministers em ployed in the service of the kitchens and of the table The main body is composed of a promis cuous crowd of slaves increased by the acci dental concourse of idle or dependent plebeians The rear is closed by the favourite band of eunuchs distributed from age to youth accord ing to the order of seniority Their numbers and their deformity excite the horror of the indig nant spectators who are ready to execrate the memory of Semiramis for the cruel art which she invented of frustrating the purposes of na ture and of blasting in the bud the hopes of fu ture generations In the exercise of domestic jurisdiction the nobles of Rome express an ex quisite sensibility for any personal injury and a contemptuous indifference for the rest of the human species When they have called for warm water if a slave has been tardy in his obe dience he is instantly chastised with three hun dred lashes but should the same slave commit a wilful murder the master will mildly observe that he is a worthless fellow but that if he re peats the offence he shall not escape punish ment Hospitality was formerly the virtue of the Romans and every stranger who could plead either merit or misfortune was relieved or rewarded by their generosity At present if a foreigner perhaps of no contemptible rank is introduced to one of the proud and wealthy sen ators he is welcomed indeed in the first audi ence with such warm professions and such kind inquiries that he retires enchanted with the affability of his illustrious friend and full of re gret that he had so long delayed his journey to Rome the native seat of manners as well as of empire Secure of a favourable reception he repeats his visit the ensuing day and is morti fied by the discovery that his person his name and his country are already forgotten. If he still has resolution to persevere he is gradually num bered in the train of dependents and obtains the permission to pay his assiduous and unprofit able court to a haughty patron incapable of gratitude or friendship who scarcely deigns t remark his presence his departure or his re turn Whenever the rich prepare a solemn an popular entertainment [44] whenever they cele brate with profuse and pernicious luxury their private banquets the choice of the guests is the subject of anxious deliberation The modest th sober and the learned are seldom preferred and the nomenclators who are commonl swayed by interested motives have the addres to insert in the list of invitations the obscure names of the most worthless of mankind But the frequent and familiar companions of the great are those parasites who practise the most useful of all arts the art of flattery who eagerly ap plaud each word and every action of their im mortal patron gaze with rapture on his marble columns and variegated pavements and strenu ously praise the pomp and elegance which he is taught to consider as a part of his personal mer it At the Roman tables the birds the squirrels [45] or the fish which appear of an uncommon size are contemplated with curious attention a pair of scales is accurately applied to ascertain their real weight and while the more rational guests are disgusted by the vain and tedious repetition notaries are summoned to attest by an authen tic record the truth of such a marvellous event Another method of introduction into the houses and society of the great is derived from the pro fession of gaming or as it is more politely styled of play The confederates are united by a strict and indissoluble bond of friendship or rather of conspiracy a superior degree of skill in the Tesserarian art (which may be interpreted the game of dice and tables[46]) is a sure road to wealth and reputation A master of that sub lime science who in a supper or assembly is placed below a magistrate displays in his coun tenance the surprise and indignation which Cato might be supposed to feel when he was re fused the prætorship by the votes of a capricious people The acquisition of knowledge seldom engages the curiosity of the nobles who abhor the fatigue and disdain the advantages of study and the only books which they peruse are the Satires of Juvenal and the verbose and fabulous histories of Marius Maximus [47] The libraries which they have inherited from their fathers are secluded like dreary sepulchres from the light of day [48] But the costly instruments of the th a tre flutes and enormous lyres and hydraulic organs are constructed for their use and the harmony of vocal and instrumental music is in cessantly repeated in the palaces of Rome. In those palaces sound is preferred to sense and the care of the body to that of the mind It is allowed as a salutary maxim, that the light and frivolous suspicion of a contagious malady is of sufficient weight to excuse the visits of the most intimate friends, and even the servants who are despatched to make the decent inquiries are not suffered to return home till they have undergone the ceremony of a previous ablution Yet this selfish and unmanly delicacy occasionally yields to the more imperious passion of avarice The prospect of gain will urge a rich and gouty senator as far as Spoleto, every sentiment of arrogance and dignity is subdued by the hopes of an inheritance, or even of a legacy, and a wealthy childless citizen is the most powerful of the Romans The art of obtaining the signature of a favourable testament and sometimes of hastening the moment of its execution, is perfectly understood, and it has happened that in the same house, though in different apartments, a husband and a wife, with the laudable design of over-reaching each other, have summoned their respective lawyers, to declare at the same time their mutual but contradictory intentions The distress which follows and chastises extravagant luxury often reduces the great to the use of the most humiliating expedients When they desire to borrow, they employ the base and supplicating style of the slave in the comedy, but when they are called upon to pay, they assume the royal and tragic declamation of the grandsons of Hercules If the demand is repeated, they readily procure some trusty sycophant, instructed to maintain a charge of poison, or magic, against the insolent creditor, who is seldom released from prison till he has signed a discharge of the whole debt These vices, which degrade the moral character of the Romans, are mixed with a puerile superstition that disgraces their understanding They listen with confidence to the predictions of haruspices, who pretend to read in the entrails of victims the signs of future greatness and prosperity, and there are many who do not presume either to bathe or to dine, or to appear in public, till they have diligently consulted, according to the rules of astrology, the situation of Mercury and the aspect of the moon [49] It is singular enough that this vain credulity may often be discovered among the profane sceptics who impiously doubt or deny the existence of a celestial power "

In populous cities, which are the seat of commerce and manufactures, the middle ranks of inhabitants, who derive their subsistence from the dexterity or labour of their hands, are commonly the most prolific, the most useful, and, in that sense, the most respectable part of the community But the plebeians of Rome, who disdained such sedentary and servile arts, had been oppressed from the earliest times by the weight of debt and usury, and the husbandman, during the term of his military service, was obliged to abandon the cultivation of his farm [50] The lands of Italy, which had been originally divided among the families of free and indigent proprietors, were insensibly purchased or usurped by the avarice of the nobles, and in the age which preceded the fall of the republic, it was computed that only two thousand citizens were possessed of any independent substance [51] Yet as long as the people bestowed by their suffrages the honours of the state, the command of the legions, and the administration of wealthy provinces, their conscious pride alleviated in some measure the hardships of poverty, and their wants were seasonably supplied by the ambitious liberality of the candidates, who aspired to secure a venal majority in the thirty-five tribes, or the hundred and ninety-three centuries, of Rome But when the prodigal commons had imprudently alienated not only the use, but the inheritance, of power, they sunk, under the reign of the Cæsars, into a vile and wretched populace, which must, in a few generations, have been totally extinguished, if it had not been continually recruited by the manumission of slaves and the influx of strangers As early as the time of Hadrian it was the just complaint of the ingenuous natives that the capital had attracted the vices of the universe and the manners of the most opposite nations The intemperance of the Gauls, the cunning and levity of the Greeks, the savage obstinacy of the Egyptians and Jews, the servile temper of the Asiatics, and the dissolute, effeminate prostitution of the Syrians, were mingled in the various multitude, which, under the proud and false denomination of Romans, presumed to despise their fellow subjects, and even their sovereigns, who dwelt beyond the precincts of the ETERNAL CITY [52]

Yet the name of that city was still pronounced with respect the frequent and capricious tumults of its inhabitants were indulged with impunity, and the successors of Constantine, instead of crushing the last remains of the democracy by the strong arm of military power, embraced the mild policy of Augustus, and studied to relieve the poverty and to amuse the idleness of an innumerable people [53] I For the convenience of the lazy plebeians, the monthly distributions of corn were converted into a daily allowance of bread a great number of ovens were constructed and maintained at the public expense and at the appointed hour each citizen, who was furnished with a ticket ascended the flight of steps which had been assigned to his peculiar quarter or division and received either as a gift or at a very low price a loaf of bread of the weight of three pounds for the use of his family II The forests of Lucania whose acorns fattened large droves of wild hogs [54] afforded as a species of tribute, a plentiful supply of cheap and wholesome meat During five months of the year a regular allowance of bacon was distributed to the poorer citizens and the annual consumption of the capital at a time when it was much declined from its former lustre was ascertained by an edict of Valentinian the Third at three millions six hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds [55] III In the manners of antiquity the use of oil was indispensable for the lamp as well as for the bath and the annual tax which was imposed on Africa for the benefit of Rome amounted to the weight of three millions of pounds to the measure perhaps, of three hundred thousand English gallons IV The anxiety of Augustus to provide the metropolis with sufficient plenty of corn was not extended beyond that necessary article of human subsistence and when the popular clamour accused the dearness and scarcity of wine a proclamation was issued by the grave reformer to remind his subjects that no man could reasonably complain of thirst since the aqueducts of Agrippa had introduced into the city so many copious streams of pure and salubrious water [56] This rigid sobriety was insensibly relaxed and although the generous design of Aurelian[57] does not appear to have been executed in its full extent the use of wine was allowed on very easy and liberal terms The administration of the public cellars was delegated to a magistrate of honourable rank and a considerable part of the vintage of Campania was reserved for the fortunate inhabitants of Rome

The stupendous aqueducts so justly celebrated by the praises of Augustus himself replenished the Thermæ or baths which had been constructed in every part of the city with Imperial magnificence The baths of Antoninus Caracalla which were open, at stated hours for the indiscriminate service of the senators and the people contained above sixteen hundred seats of marble and more than three thousand were reckoned in the baths of Diocletian.[58] The walls of the lofty apartments were covered with curious mosaics that imitated the art of the pencil in the elegance of design and the variety of colours The Egyptian granite was beautifully encrusted with the precious green marble of Numidia the perpetual stream of hot water was poured into the capacious basins through so many wide mouths of bright and massy silver and the meanest Roman could purchase with a small copper coin the daily enjoyment of a scene of pomp and luxury which might excite the envy of the kings of Asia [59] From these stately palaces issued a swarm of dirty and ragged plebeians without shoes and without a mantle who loitered away whole days in the street or Forum to hear news and to hold disputes who dissipated in extravagant gaming the miserable pittance of their wives and children and spent the hours of the night in obscure taverns and brothels in the indulgence of gross and vulgar sensuality [60]

But the most lively and splendid amusement of the idle multitude depended on the frequent exhibition of public games and spectacles The piety of Christian princes had suppressed the inhuman combats of gladiators but the Roman people still considered the Circus as their home their temple and the seat of the republic. The impatient crowd rushed at the dawn of day to secure their places and there were many who passed a sleepless and anxious night in the adjacent porticos From the morning to the evening careless of the sun or of the rain, the spectators who sometimes amounted to the number of four hundred thousand remained in eager attention their eyes fixed on the horses and charioteers their minds agitated with hope and fear for the success of the colours which they espoused and the happiness of Rome appeared to hang on the event of a race [61] The same immoderate ardour inspired their clamours and their applause as often as they were entertained with the hunting of wild beasts and the various modes of theatrical representation. These representations in modern capitals may deserve to be considered as a pure and elegant school of taste and perhaps of virtue But the Tragic and Comic Muse of the Romans who seldom aspired beyond the imitation of Attic genius,[62] had been almost totally silent since the fall of the republic [63] and their place was unworthily occupied by licentious farce effeminate music, and splendid pageantry The pantomimes,[64] who maintained their reputation from the age of Augustus to the sixth century expressed, without the use of words the various fables of the gods and heroes of antiquity and the perfection of their art, which sometimes disarmed the gravity of the philosopher, always excited the applause and wonder of the people The vast and magnificent theatres of Rome were filled by three thousand female dancers, and by three thousand singers, with the masters of the respective choruses Such was the popular favour which they enjoyed, that, in a time of scarcity, when all strangers were banished from the city, the merit of contributing to the public pleasures exempted them from a law which was strictly executed against the professors of the liberal arts [65]

It is said that the foolish curiosity of Elagabalus attempted to discover, from the quantity of spiders' webs, the number of the inhabitants of Rome A more rational method of inquiry might not have been undeserving of the attention of the wisest princes, who could easily have resolved a question so important for the Roman government and so interesting to succeeding ages The births and deaths of the citizens were duly registered, and if any writer of antiquity had condescended to mention the annual amount, or the common average, we might now produce some satisfactory calculation which would destroy the extravagant assertions of critics, and perhaps confirm the modest and probable conjectures of philosophers [66] The most diligent researches have collected only the following circumstances, which, slight and imperfect as they are, may tend in some degree to illustrate the question of the populousness of ancient Rome I When the capital of the empire was besieged by the Goths, the circuit of the walls was accurately measured by Ammonius, the mathematician, who found it equal to twenty-one miles [67] It should not be forgotten that the form of the city was almost that of a circle, the geometrical figure which is known to contain the largest space within any given circumference II The architect Vitruvius, who flourished in the Augustan age, and whose evidence, on this occasion, has peculiar weight and authority, observes that the innumerable habitations of the Roman people would have spread themselves far beyond the narrow limits of the city, and that the want of ground, which was probably contracted on every side by gardens and villas, suggested the common, though inconvenient, practice of raising the houses to a considerable height in the air [68] But the loftiness of these buildings, which often consisted of hasty work and insufficient materials, was the cause of frequent and fatal accidents, and it was repeatedly enacted by Augustus, as well as by Nero, that the height of private edifices within the walls of Rome should not exceed the measure of seventy feet from the ground [69] III Juvenal[70] laments, as it should seem from his own experience, the hardships of the poorer citizens, to whom he addresses the salutary advice of emigrating, without delay, from the smoke of Rome, since they might purchase in the little towns of Italy a cheerful, commodious dwelling at the same price which they annually paid for a dark and miserable lodging House-rent was therefore immoderately dear the rich acquired, at an enormous expense, the ground, which they covered with palaces and gardens, but the body of the Roman people was crowded into a narrow space, and the different floors and apartments of the same house were divided, as it is still the custom of Paris and other cities, among several families of plebeians IV The total number of houses in the fourteen regions of the city is accurately stated in the description of Rome composed under the reign of Theodosius, and they amount to forty eight thousand three hundred and eighty-two [71] The two classes of domus and of insulæ, into which they are divided, include all the habitations of the capital, of every rank and condition, from the marble palace of the Anicii, with a numerous establishment of freedmen and slaves, to the lofty and narrow lodging-house where the poet Codrus and his wife were permitted to hire a wretched garret immediately under the tiles If we adopt the same average which, under similar circumstances, has been found applicable to Paris,[72] and indifferently allow about twenty five persons for each house, of every degree, we may fairly estimate the inhabitants of Rome at twelve hundred thousand a number which cannot be thought excessive for the capital of a mighty empire, though it exceeds the populousness of the greatest cities of modern Europe [73]

Such was the state of Rome under the reign of Honorius, at the time when the Gothic army formed the siege, or rather the blockade, of the city [74] By a skilful disposition of his numerous forces, who impatiently watched the moment of an assault, Alaric encompassed the walls, commanded the twelve principal gates, intercepted all communication with the adjacent country, and vigilantly guarded the navigation of the Tiber, from which the Romans derived the surest and most plentiful supply of provisions The first emotions of the nobles and of the people were those of surprise and indignation, that a vile barbarian should dare to insult the capital of the world, but their arrogance was first days of the reign of Attalus were fair and prosperous An officer of confidence was sent with an inconsiderable body of troops to secure the obedience of Africa, the greatest part of Italy submitted to the terror of the Gothic powers and though the city of Bologna made a vigorous and effectual resistance the people of Milan dissatisfied perhaps with the absence of Honorius accepted with loud acclamations the choice of the Roman senate At the head of a formidable army Alaric conducted his royal captive almost to the gates of Ravenna and a solemn embassy of the principal ministers—of Jovius the Prætorian præfect of Valens master of the cavalry and infantry of the quæstor Potamius and of Julian the first of the notaries—was introduced with martial pomp into the Gothic camp In the name of their sovereign they consented to acknowledge the lawful election of his competitor and to divide the provinces of Italy and the West between the two emperors Their proposals were rejected with disdain and the refusal was aggravated by the insulting clemency of Attalus who condescended to promise that if Honorius would instantly resign the purple he should be permitted to pass the remainder of his life in the peaceful exile of some remote island [93] So desperate indeed did the situation of the son of Theodosius appear to those who were the best acquainted with his strength and resources that Jovius and Valens his minister and his general betrayed their trust infamously deserted the sinking cause of their benefactor and devoted their treacherous allegiance to the service of his more fortunate rival Astonished by such examples of domestic treason Honorius trembled at the approach of every servant at the arrival of every messenger He dreaded the secret enemies who might lurk in his capital his palace his bed-chamber and some ships lay ready in the harbour of Ravenna to transport the abdicated monarch to the dominions of his infant nephew the emperor of the East

But there is a Providence (such at least was the opinion of the historian Procopius[94]) that watches over innocence and folly and the pretensions of Honorius to its peculiar care cannot reasonably be disputed At the moment when his despair incapable of any wise or manly resolution meditated a shameful flight a seasonable reinforcement of four thousand veterans unexpectedly landed in the port of Ravenna To these valiant strangers whose fidelity had not been corrupted by the factions of the court he committed the walls and gates of the city and the slumbers of the emperor were no longer disturbed by the apprehension of imminent and internal danger The favourable intelligence which was received from Africa suddenly changed the opinions of men and the state of public affairs The troops and officers whom Attalus had sent into that province were defeated and slain and the active zeal of Heraclian maintained his own allegiance and that of his people The faithful count of Africa transmitted a large sum of money which fixed the attachment of the Imperial guards and his vigilance in preventing the exportation of corn and oil introduced famine tumult and discontent into the walls of Rome The failure of the African expedition was the source of mutual complaint and recrimination in the party of Attalus and the mind of his protector was insensibly alienated from the interest of a prince who wanted spirit to command or docility to obey The most imprudent measures were adopted without the knowledge or against the advice of Alaric and the obstinate refusal of the senate to allow in the embarkation the mixture even of five hundred Goths betrayed a suspicious and distrustful temper which in their situation was neither generous nor prudent The resentment of the Gothic king was exasperated by the malicious arts of Jovius who had been raised to the rank of patrician and who afterwards excused his double perfidy by declaring without a blush that he had only seemed to abandon the service of Honorius more effectually to ruin the cause of the usurper In a large plain near Rimini and in the presence of an innumerable multitude of Romans and barbarians the wretched Attalus was publicly despoiled of the diadem and purple and those ensigns of royalty were sent by Alaric as the pledge of peace and friendship to the son of Theodosius [95] The officers who returned to their duty were reinstated in their employments and even the merit of a tardy repentance was graciously allowed but the degraded emperor of the Romans desirous of life and insensible of disgrace implored the permission of following the Gothic camp in the train of a haughty and capricious barbarian [96]

The degradation of Attalus removed the only real obstacle to the conclusion of the peace and Alaric advanced within three miles of Ravenna to press the irresolution of the Imperial ministers whose insolence soon returned with the return of fortune His indignation was kindled by the report that a rival chieftain that Sarus the personal enemy of Adolphus and the heredi-

itary foe of the house of Balti, had been received into the palace At the head of three hundred followers that fearless barbarian immediately sallied from the gates of Ravenna, surprised and cut in pieces a considerable body of Goths, re-entered the city in triumph, and was permitted to insult his adversary by the voice of a herald, who publicly declared that the guilt of Alaric had for ever excluded him from the friendship and alliance of the emperor [97] The crime and folly of the court of Ravenna was expiated a third time by the calamities of Rome The king of the Goths, who no longer dissembled his appetite for plunder and revenge, appeared in arms under the walls of the capital, and the trembling senate, without any hopes of relief, prepared by a desperate resistance to delay the ruin of their country But they were unable to guard against the secret conspiracy of their slaves and domestics, who either from birth or interest were attached to the cause of the enemy At the hour of midnight the Salarian gate was silently opened, and the inhabitants were awakened by the tremendous sound of the Gothic trumpet Eleven hundred and sixty-three years after the foundation of Rome, the Imperial city, which had subdued and civilised so considerable a part of mankind, was delivered to the licentious fury of the tribes of Germany and Scythia [98]

The proclamation of Alaric, when he forced his entrance into a vanquished city, discovered, however, some regard for the laws of humanity and religion He encouraged his troops boldly to seize the rewards of valour, and to enrich themselves with the spoils of a wealthy and effeminate people, but he exhorted them at the same time to spare the lives of the unresisting citizens, and to respect the churches of the apostles St Peter and St Paul as holy and inviolable sanctuaries Amidst the horrors of a nocturnal tumult several of the Christian Goths displayed the fervour of a recent conversion, and some instances of their uncommon piety and moderation are related, and perhaps adorned, by the zeal of ecclesiastical writers [99] While the barbarians roamed through the city in quest of prey, the humble dwelling of an aged virgin, who had devoted her life to the service of the altar, was forced open by one of the powerful Goths He immediately demanded, though in civil language, all the gold and silver in her possession, and was astonished at the readiness with which she conducted him to a splendid hoard of massy plate of the richest materials and the most curious workmanship The barbarian viewed with wonder and delight this valuable acquisition, till he was interrupted by a serious admonition, addressed to him in the following words "These," said she, "are the consecrated vessels belonging to St Peter if you presume to touch them, the sacrilegious deed will remain on your conscience For my part, I dare not keep what I am unable to defend" The Gothic captain, struck with reverential awe, despatched a messenger to inform the king of the treasure which he had discovered, and received a peremptory order from Alaric, that all the consecrated plate and ornaments should be transported, without damage or delay, to the church of the apostle From the extremity, perhaps, of the Quirinal hill to the distant quarter of the Vatican, a numerous detachment of Goths, marching in order of battle through the principal streets, protected with glittering arms the long train of their devout companions who bore aloft on their heads the sacred vessels of gold and silver, and the martial shouts of the barbarians were mingled with the sound of religious psalmody From all the adjacent houses a crowd of Christians hastened to join this edifying procession, and a multitude of fugitives, without distinction of age or rank, or even of sect, had the good fortune to escape to the secure and hospitable sanctuary of the Vatican The learned work concerning the City of God was professedly composed by St Augustin, to justify the ways of Providence in the destruction of the Roman greatness He celebrates with peculiar satisfaction this memorable triumph of Christ, and insults his adversaries by challenging them to produce some similar example of a town taken by storm, in which the fabulous gods of antiquity had been able to protect either themselves or their deluded votaries [100]

In the sack of Rome some rare and extraordinary examples of barbarian virtue have been deservedly applauded But the holy precincts of the Vatican and the apostolic churches could receive a very small proportion of the Roman people many thousand warriors, more especially of the Huns who served under the standard of Alaric, were strangers to the name, or at least to the faith, of Christ, and we may suspect, without any breach of charity or candour, that in the hour of savage licence, when every passion was inflamed and every restraint was removed, the precepts of the Gospel seldom influenced the behaviour of the Gothic Christians The writers the best disposed to exaggerate their clemency have freely confessed that a cruel slaughter was made of the Romans,[101] and that the streets of the city were filled with dead bodies which remained without burial during the general consternation The despair of the citizens was sometimes converted into fury and whenever the barbarians were provoked by opposition they extend d the promiscuous massacre to the feeble the innocent and the helpless The private revenge of forty thousand slaves was exercised without pity or remorse and the ignominious lashes which they had formerly received were washed away in the blood of the guilty or obnoxious families The matrons and virgins of Rome were expo ed to injuries more dreadful in the apprehension of chastity than death itself and the ecclesiastical historian has selected an example of female virtue for the admiration of future ages [102] A Roman lady of singular beauty and orthodox faith had excited the impatient desires of a young Goth who according to the sagacious remark of Sozomen was attached to the Arian heresy Exasperated by her obstinate resistance, he drew his sword and with the anger of a lover slightly wounded her neck The bleeding heroine still continued to brave his resentment and to repel his love till the ravisher desisted from his unavailing efforts respectfully conducted her to the sanctuary of the Vatican and gave six pieces of gold to the guards of the church on condition that they should restore her inviolate to the arms of her husband Such instances of courage and generosity were not extremely common The brutal soldiers satisfied their sensual appetites without consulting either the inclination or the duties of their female captives and a nice question of casuistry was seriously agitated, Whether those tender victims who had inflexibly refused their consent to the violation which they sustained had lost by their misfortune the glorious crown of virginity [103] There were other losses indeed of a more substantial kind and more general concern It cannot be presumed that all the barbarians were at all times capable of perpetrating such amorous outrages and the want of youth or beauty or chastity, protected the greatest part of the Roman women from the danger of a rape But avarice is an insatiate and universal passion since the enjoyment of almost every object that can afford pleasure to the different tastes and tempers of mankind may be procured by the possession of wealth In the pillage of Rome a just preference was given to gold and jewels, which contain the greatest value in the smallest compass and weight but, after these portable riches had been removed by the more diligent robbers the palaces of Rome were rudely stripped of their splendid and costly furniture The sideboards of massy plate and the variegated wardrobes of silk and purple were irregularly piled in the waggons that always followed the march of a Gothic army The most exquisite works of art were roughly handled or wantonly destroyed many a statue was melted for the sake of the precious materials and many a vase in the division of the spoil, was shivered into fragments by the stroke of a battle axe The acquisition of riches served only to stimulate the avarice of the rapacious barbarians who proceeded by threats, by blows, and by tortures to force from their prisoners the confession of hidden treasure [104] Visible splendour and expense were alleged as the proof of a plentiful fortune the appearance of poverty was imputed to a parsimonious disposition and the obstinacy of some misers who endured the most cruel torments before they would discover the secret object of their affection was fatal to many unhappy wretches who expired under the lash for refusing to reveal their imaginary treasures The edifices of Rome though the damage has been much exaggerated received some injury from the violence of the Goths At their entrance through the Salarian gate they fired the adjacent houses to guide their march and to distract the attention of the citizens, the flames which encountered no obstacle in the disorder of the night consumed many private and public buildings and the ruins of the palace of Sallust[105] remained in the age of Justinian a stately monument of the Gothic conflagration [106] Yet a contemporary historian has observed that fire could scarcely consume the enormous beams of solid brass, and that the strength of man was insufficient to subvert the foundations of ancient structures Some truth may possibly be concealed in his devout assertion that the wrath of Heaven supplied the imperfections of hostile rage and that the proud Forum of Rome decorated with the statues of so many gods and heroes was levelled in the dust by the stroke of lightning [107]

Whatever might be the numbers of equestrian or plebeian rank who perished in the massacre of Rome it is confidently affirmed that only one senator lost his life by the sword of the enemy [108] But it was not easy to compute the multitudes who from an honourable station and a prosperous fortune were suddenly reduced to the miserable condition of captives and exiles As the barbarians had more occasion for money than for slaves, they fixed at a moderate price the redemption of their indigent prisoners, and the ransom was often paid by the benevolence of their friends, or the charity of strangers [109] The captives, who were regularly sold, either in open market or by private contract, would have legally regained their native freedom, which it was impossible for a citizen to lose or to alienate [110] But as it was soon discovered that the vindication of their liberty would endanger their lives, and that the Goths, unless they were tempted to sell, might be provoked to murder their useless prisoners, the civil jurisprudence had been already qualified by a wise regulation, that they should be obliged to serve the moderate term of five years, till they had discharged by their labour the price of their redemption [111] The nations who invaded the Roman empire had driven before them, into Italy, whole troops of hungry and affrighted provincials, less apprehensive of servitude than of famine The calamities of Rome and Italy dispersed the inhabitants to the most lonely, the most secure, the most distant places of refuge While the Gothic cavalry spread terror and desolation along the sea-coast of Campania and Tuscany, the little island of Igilium, separated by a narrow channel from the Argentarian promontory, repulsed, or eluded, their hostile attempts, and at so small a distance from Rome, great numbers of citizens were securely concealed in the thick woods of that sequestered spot [11] The ample patrimonies which many senatorian families possessed in Africa invited them, if they had time and prudence to escape from the ruin of their country, to embrace the shelter of that hospitable province The most illustrious of these fugitives was the noble and pious Proba,[113] the widow of the præfect Petronius After the death of her husband, the most powerful subject of Rome, she had remained at the head of the Anician family, and successively supplied, from her private fortune, the expense of the consulships of her three sons When the city was besieged and taken by the Goths, Proba supported with Christian resignation the loss of immense riches, embarked in a small vessel, from whence she beheld, at sea, the flames of her burning palace, and fled with her daughter Læta, and her grand-daughter, the celebrated virgin Demetrias, to the coast of Africa The benevolent profusion with which the matron distributed the fruits or the price of her estates contributed to alleviate the misfortunes of exile and captivity But even the family of Proba herself was not exempt from the rapacious oppression of Count Heraclian, who basely sold, in matrimonial prostitution, the noblest maidens of Rome to the lust or avarice of the Syrian merchants The Italian fugitives were dispersed through the provinces, along the coast of Egypt and Asia, as far as Constantinople and Jerusalem, and the village of Bethlehem, the solitary residence of St Jerom and his female converts, was crowned with illustrious beggars, of either sex and every age, who excited the public compassion by the remembrance of their past fortune [114] This awful catastrophe of Rome filled the astonished empire with grief and terror So interesting a contrast of greatness and ruin disposed the fond credulity of the people to deplore, and even to exaggerate, the afflictions of the queen of cities The clergy, who applied to recent events the lofty metaphors of Oriental prophecy, were sometimes tempted to confound the destruction of the capital and the dissolution of the globe

There exists in human nature a strong propensity to depreciate the advantages, and to magnify the evils, of the present times Yet, when the first emotions had subsided, and a fair estimate was made of the real damage, the more learned and judicious contemporaries were forced to confess that infant Rome had formerly received more essential injury from the Gauls than she had now sustained from the Goths in her declining age [115] The experience of eleven centuries has enabled posterity to produce a much more singular parallel, and to affirm with confidence, that the ravages of the barbarians whom Alaric had led from the banks of the Danube were less destructive than the hostilities exercised by the troops of Charles the Fifth, a catholic prince, who styled himself Emperor of the Romans [116] The Goths evacuated the city at the end of six days, but Rome remained above nine months in the possession of the Imperialists, and every hour was stained by some atrocious act of cruelty, lust, and rapine The authority of Alaric preserved some order and moderation among the ferocious multitude which acknowledged him for their leader and king, but the constable of Bourbon had gloriously fallen in the attack of the walls, and the death of the general removed every restraint of discipline from an army which consisted of three independent nations, the Italians, the Spaniards, and the Germans In the beginning of the sixteenth century the manners of Italy exhibited a remarkable scene of the depravity of mankind They united the sanguinary crimes that prevail in an unsettled state of society, with the polished vices which spring from the abuse of art and luxury and the loose adventurers who had violated every prejudice of patriotism and superstition to assault the palace of the Roman pontiff must deserve to be considered as the most profligate of the Italians At the same era the Spaniards were the terror both of the Old and New World but their high spirited valour was disgraced by gloomy pride rapacious avarice and unrelenting cruelty Indefatigable in the pursuit of fame and riches they had improved by repeated practice the most exquisite and effectual methods of torturing their prisoners many of the Castilians who pillaged Rome were familiars of the holy inquisition and some volunteers perhaps were lately returned from the conquest of Mexico The Germans were less corrupt than the Italians less cruel than the Spaniards and the rustic or even savage aspect of those Tramontane warriors often disguised a simple and merciful disposition But they had imbibed in the first fervour of the Reformation the spirit as well as the principles of Luther It was their favourite amusement to insult or destroy the consecrated objects of catholic superstition they indulged without pity or remorse a devout hatred against the clergy of every denomination and degree who form so considerable a part of the inhabitants of modern Rome and their fanatic zeal might aspire to subvert the throne of Antichrist, to purify with blood and fire the abominations of the spiritual ylon [117]

The retreat of the victorious Goths who evacuated Rome on the sixth day [118] might be the result of prudence but it was not surely the effect of fear [119] At the head of an army encumbered with rich and weighty spoils their intrepid leader advanced along the Appian Way into the southern provinces of Italy destroying whatever dared to oppose his passage and contenting himself with the plunder of the unresisting country The fate of Capua the proud and luxurious metropolis of Campania and which was respected even in its decay as the eighth city of the empire [120] is buried in oblivion whilst the adjacent town of Nola [121] has been illustrated on this occasion by the sanctity of Paulinus,[122] who was successively a consul a monk, and a bishop At the age of forty he renounced the enjoyment of wealth and honour of society and literature to embrace a life of solitude and penance and the loud applause of the clergy encouraged him to despise the reproaches of his worldly friends who ascribed this desperate act to some disorder of the mind or body [123] An early and passionate attachment determined him to fix his humble dwelling in one of the suburbs of Nola near the miraculous tomb of St Felix which the public devotion had already surrounded with five large and populous churches The remains of his fortune and of his understanding were dedicated to the service of the glorious martyr, whose praise, on the day of his festival Paulinus never failed to celebrate by a solemn hymn and in whose name he erected a sixth church of superior elegance and beauty which was decorated with many curious pictures from the history of the Old and New Testament Such assiduous zeal secured the favour of the saint [124] or at least of the people and after fifteen years retirement the Roman consul was compelled to accept the bishopric of Nola, a few months before the city was invested by the Goths During the siege, some religious persons were satisfied that they had seen either in dreams or visions the divine form of their tutelar patron yet it soon appeared by the event that Felix wanted power or inclination to preserve the flock of which he had formerly been the shepherd Nola was not saved from the general devastation,[125] and the captive bishop was protected only by the general opinion of his innocence and poverty Above four years elapsed from the successful invasion of Italy by the arms of Alaric, to the voluntary retreat of the Goths under the conduct of his successor Adolphus and during the whole time they reigned without control over a country which in the opinion of the ancients, had united all the various excellences of nature and art The prosperity indeed which Italy had attained in the auspicious age of the Antonines had gradually declined with the decline of the empire The fruits of a long peace perished under the rude grasp of the barbarians and they themselves were incapable of tasting the more elegant refinements of luxury which had been prepared for the use of the soft and polished Italians Each soldier however claimed an ample portion of the substantial plenty the corn and cattle oil and wine that was daily collected and consumed in the Gothic camp and the principal warriors insulted the villas and gardens once inhabited by Lucullus and Cicero along the beauteous coast of Campania Their trembling captives the sons and daughters of Roman senators presented in goblets of gold and gems large draughts of Falernian wine to the haughty victors, who stretched their huge limbs under the shade of plane trees [126] artificially disposed to exclude the scorching rays, and to admit the genial warmth, of the sun These delights were enhanced by the memory of past hardships the comparison of their native soil, the bleak and barren hills of Scythia, and the frozen banks of the Elbe and Danube, added new charms to the felicity of the Italian climate [127]

Whether fame, or conquest, or riches were the object of Alaric, he pursued that object with an indefatigable ardour which could neither be quelled by adversity nor satiated by success No sooner had he reached the extreme land of Italy than he was attracted by the neighbouring prospect of a fertile and peaceful island Yet even the possession of Sicily he considered only an intermediate step to the important expedition which he already meditated against the continent of Africa The straits of Rhegium and Messina[128] are twelve miles in length, and in the narrowest passage about one mile and a half broad, and the fabulous monsters of the deep, the rocks of Scylla and the whirlpool of Charybdis, could terrify none but the most timid and unskilled mariners Yet as soon as the first division of the Goths had embarked, a sudden tempest arose, which sunk or scattered many of the transports, their courage was daunted by the terrors of a new element, and the whole design was defeated by the premature death of Alaric, which fixed, after a short illness, the fatal term of his conquests The ferocious character of the barbarians was displayed in the funeral of a hero whose valour and fortune they celebrated with mournful applause By the labour of a captive multitude they forcibly diverted the course of the Busentinus, a small river that washes the walls of Consentia The royal sepulchre, adorned with the splendid spoils and trophies of Rome, was constructed in the vacant bed, the waters were then restored to their natural channel, and the secret spot where the remains of Alaric had been deposited was for ever concealed by the inhuman massacre of the prisoners who had been employed to execute the work [129]

The personal animosities and hereditary feuds of the barbarians were suspended by the strong necessity of their affairs, and the brave Adolphus, the brother in law of the deceased monarch, was unanimously elected to succeed to his throne The character and political system of the new king of the Goths may be best understood from his own conversation with an illustrious citizen of Narbonne, who afterwards, in a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, related it to St. Jerom, in the presence of the historian Orosius "In the full confidence of valour and victory, I once aspired (said Adolphus) to change the face of the universe, to obliterate the name of Rome, to erect on its ruins the dominion of the Goths, and to acquire, like Augustus, the immortal fame of the founder of a new empire By repeated experiments I was gradually convinced that laws are essentially necessary to maintain and regulate a well constituted state, and that the fierce untractable humour of the Goths was incapable of bearing the salutary yoke of laws and civil government From that moment I proposed to myself a different object of glory and ambition, and it is now my sincere wish that the gratitude of future ages should acknowledge the merit of a stranger, who employed the sword of the Goths not to subvert, but to restore and maintain, the prosperity of the Roman empire"[130] With these pacific views the successor of Alaric suspended the operations of war, and seriously negotiated with the Imperial court a treaty of friendship and alliance It was the interest of the ministers of Honorius, who were now released from the obligation of their extravagant oath, to deliver Italy from the intolerable weight of the Gothic powers, and they readily accepted their service against the tyrants and barbarians who infested the provinces beyond the Alps [131] Adolphus, assuming the character of a Roman General, directed his march from the extremity of Campania to the southern provinces of Gaul His troops, either by force or agreement, immediately occupied the cities of Narbonne, Toulouse, and Bordeaux, and though they were repulsed by Count Boniface from the walls of Marseilles, they soon extended their quarters from the Mediterranean to the ocean The oppressed provincials might exclaim that the miserable remnant which the enemy had spared was cruelly ravished by their pretended allies, yet some specious colours were not wanting to palliate or justify the violence of the Goths The cities of Gaul which they attacked might perhaps be considered as in a state of rebellion against the government of Honorius the articles of the treaty or the secret instructions of the court might sometimes be alleged in favour of the seeming usurpations of Adolphus, and the guilt of any irregular unsuccessful act of hostility might always be imputed, with an appearance of truth, to the ungovernable spirit of a barbarian host impatient of peace or discipline. The luxury of Italy had been less effectual to soften the temper than to relax the courage of the Goths, and they had imbibed the vices, without imitating the arts and institutions, of civilised society [132]

The professions of Adolphus were probably sincere and his attachment to the cause of the republic was secured by the ascendant which a Roman princess had acquired over the heart and understanding of the barbarian king Placidia [133] the daughter of the great Theodosius and of Galla his second wife had received a royal education in the palace of Constantinople but the eventful story of her life is connected with the revolutions which agitated the Western empire under the reign of her brother Honorius When Rome was first invested by the arms of Alaric, Placidia who was then about twenty years of age resided in the city and her ready consent of the death of her cousin Serena has a cruel and ungrateful appearance which according to the circumstances of the action may be aggravated or excused by the consideration of her tender age [134] The victorious barbarians detained either as a hostage or a captive [135] the sister of Honorius but while she was exposed to the disgrace of following round Italy the motions of a Gothic camp she experienced however a decent and respectful treatment The authority of Jornandes who praises the beauty of Placidia may perhaps be counterbalanced by the silence the expressive silence of her flatterers yet the splendour of her birth the bloom of youth the elegance of manners and the dexterous insinuations which she condescended to employ made a deep impression on the mind of Adolphus and the Gothic king aspired to call himself the brother of the emperor The ministers of Honorius rejected with disdain the proposal of an alliance so injurious to every sentiment of Roman pride and repeatedly urged the restitution of Placidia as an indispensable condition of the treaty of peace But the daughter of Theodosius submitted without reluctance to the desires of the conqueror a young and valiant prince who yielded to Alaric in loftiness of stature but who excelled in the more attractive qualities of grace and beauty The marriage of Adolphus and Placidia[136] was consummated before the Goths retired from Italy and the solemn, perhaps the anniversary day of their nuptials was afterwards celebrated in the house of Ingenuus, one of the most illustrious citizens of Narbonne in Gaul The bride attired and adorned like a Roman empress was placed on a throne of state and the king of the Goths who assumed on this occasion the Roman habit, contented himself with a less honourable seat by her side The nuptial gift which, according to the custom of his nation [137] was offered to Placidia consisted of the rare and magnificent spoils of her country Fifty beautiful youths in silken robes carried a basin in each hand and one of these basins was filled with pieces of gold the other with precious stones of an inestimable value Attalus so long the sport of fortune and of the Goths was appointed to lead the chorus of the Hymeneal song and the degraded emperor might aspire to the praise of a skilful musician The barbarians enjoyed the insolence of their triumph and the provincials rejoiced in this alliance which tempered by the mild influence of love and reason the fierce spirit of their Gothic lord [138]

The hundred basins of gold and gems presented to Placidia at her nuptial feast formed an inconsiderable portion of the Gothic treasures of which some extraordinary specimens may be selected from the history of the successors of Adolphus Many curious and costly ornaments of pure gold enriched with jewels were found in their palace of Narbonne when it was pillaged in the sixth century by the Franks sixty cups or chalices fifteen patens or plates for the use of the communion twenty boxes, or cases, to hold the books of the gospels this consecrated wealth[139] was distributed by the son of Clovis among the churches of his dominions, and his pious liberality seems to upbraid some former sacrilege of the Goths They possessed, with more security of conscience the famous missorium or great dish for the service of the table of massy gold of the weight of five hundred pounds and of far superior value from the precious stones the exquisite workmanship and the tradition that it had been presented by Aetius the patrician to Torismond king of the Goths One of the successors of Torismond purchased the aid of the French monarch by the promise of this magnificent gift When he was seated on the throne of Spain he delivered it with reluctance to the ambassadors of Dagobert despoiled them on the road stipulated, after a long negotiation the inadequate ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold and preserved the missorium as the pride of the Gothic treasury [140] When that treasury after the conquest of Spain, was plundered by the Arabs they admired and they have celebrated another object still more remarkable a table of considerable size of one single piece of solid emerald [141] encircled with three rows of fine pearls supported by three hundred and sixty five feet of gems and massy gold and estimated at the price of five hundred thousand pieces of gold [142] Some portion of the Gothic treasures might be the gift of friendship or the tribute of obedience, but the far greater part had been the fruits of war and rapine, the spoils of the empire, and perhaps of Rome

After the deliverance of Italy from the oppression of the Goths, some secret counsellor was permitted, amidst the factions of the palace, to heal the wounds of that afflicted country [143] By a wise and humane regulation the eight provinces which had been the most deeply injured—Campania, Tuscany, Picenum, Samnium, Apulia, Calabria, Bruttium, and Lucania—obtained an indulgence of five years, the ordinary tribute was reduced to one-fifth, and even that fifth was destined to restore and support the useful institution of the public posts By another law the lands which had been left without inhabitants or cultivation were granted, with some diminution of taxes, to the neighbours who should occupy or the strangers who should solicit them, and the new possessors were secured against the future claims of the fugitive proprietors About the same time a general amnesty was published in the name of Honorius, to abolish the guilt and memory of all the involuntary offences which had been committed by his unhappy subjects during the term of the public disorder and calamity A decent and respectful attention was paid to the restoration of the capital, the citizens were encouraged to rebuild the edifices which had been destroyed or damaged by hostile fire, and extraordinary supplies of corn were imported from the coast of Africa The crowds that so lately fled before the sword of the barbarians were soon recalled by the hopes of plenty and pleasure, and Albinus, præfect of Rome, informed the court, with some anxiety and surprise, that in a single day he had taken an account of the arrival of fourteen thousand strangers [144] In less than seven years the vestiges of the Gothic invasion were almost obliterated, and the city appeared to resume its former splendour and tranquillity The venerable matron replaced her crown of laurel, which had been ruffled by the storms of war, and was still amused in the last moment of her decay with the prophecies of revenge, of victory, and of eternal dominion [145]

This apparent tranquillity was soon disturbed by the approach of an hostile armament from the country which afforded the daily subsistence of the Roman people Heraclian, count of Africa, who under the most difficult and distressful circumstances had supported with active loyalty the cause of Honorius, was tempted in the year of his consulship to assume the character of a rebel and the title of emperor The ports of Africa were immediately filled with the naval forces, at the head of which he prepared to invade Italy, and his fleet, when it cast anchor at the mouth of the Tiber, indeed surpassed the fleets of Xerxes and Alexander, if all the vessels, including the royal galley and the smallest boat, did actually amount to the incredible number of three thousand two hundred [146] Yet with such an armament, which might have subverted or restored the greatest empires of the earth, the African usurper made a very faint and feeble impression on the provinces of his rival As he marched from the port along the road which leads to the gates of Rome, he was encountered, terrified, and routed by one of the Imperial captains, and the lord of this mighty host, deserting his fortune and his friends, ignominiously fled with a single ship [147] When Heraclian landed in the harbour of Carthage, he found that the whole province, disdaining such an unworthy ruler, had returned to their allegiance The rebel was beheaded in the ancient temple of Memory, his consulship was abolished,[148] and the remains of his private fortune, not exceeding the moderate sum of four thousand pounds of gold, were granted to the brave Constantius, who had already defended the throne which he afterwards shared with his feeble sovereign Honorius viewed with supine indifference the calamities of Rome and Italy,[149] but the rebellious attempts of Attalus and Heraclian against his personal safety awakened for a moment the torpid instinct of his nature He was probably ignorant of the causes and events which preserved him from these impending dangers, and as Italy was no longer invaded by any foreign or domestic enemies, he peaceably existed in the palace of Ravenna, while the tyrants beyond the Alps were repeatedly vanquished in the name and by the lieutenants of the son of Theodosius [150] In the course of a busy and interesting narrative I might possibly forget to mention the death of such a prince, and I shall therefore take the precaution of observing in this place that he survived the last siege of Rome about thirteen years

The usurpation of Constantine, who received the purple from the legions of Britain, had been successful, and seemed to be secure His title was acknowledged from the wall of Antoninus to the Columns of Hercules, and, in the midst of the public disorder, he shared the dominion and the plunder of Gaul and Spain with the tribes of barbarians whose destructive progress was no longer checked by the Rhine or Pyrenees Stained with the blood of the kinsmen of

Honorius he extorted from the court of Ravenna, with which he secretly corresponded the ratification of his rebellious claims Constantine engaged himself by a solemn promise to deliver Italy from the Goths advanced as far as the banks of the Po and after alarming rather than assisting his pusillanimous ally hastily returned to the palace of Arles to celebrate with intemperate luxury his vain and ostentatious triumph. But this transient prosperity was soon interrupted and destroyed by the revolt of Count Gerontius the bravest of his generals who during the absence of his son Constans a prince already invested with the Imperial purple had been left to command in the provinces of Spain For some reason of which we are ignorant Gerontius instead of assuming the diadem placed it on the head of his friend Maximus who fixed his residence at Tarragona while the active count pressed forwards through the Pyrenees to surprise the two emperors Constantine and Constans before they could prepare for their defence The son was made prisoner at Vienne and immediately put to death and the unfortunate youth had scarcely leisure to deplore the elevation of his family which had tempted or compelled him sacrilegiously to desert the peaceful obscurity of the monastic life The father maintained a siege within the walls of Arles but those walls must have yielded to the assailants had not the city been unexpectedly relieved by the approach of an Italian army The name of Honorius, the proclamation of a lawful emperor astonished the contending parties of the rebels Gerontius abandoned by his own troops escaped to the confines of Spain and rescued his name from oblivion by the Roman courage which appeared to animate the last moments of his life In the middle of the night a great body of his perfidious soldiers surrounded and attacked his house which he had strongly barricaded. His wife a valiant friend of the nation of the Alani and some faithful slaves were still attached to his person and he used with so much skill and resolution a large magazine of darts and arrows that above three hundred of the assailants lost their lives in the attempt His slaves when all the missile weapons were spent fled at the dawn of day and Gerontius if he had not been restrained by conjugal tenderness might have imitated their example till the soldiers provoked by such obstinate resistance applied fire on all sides to the house. In this fatal extremity he complied with the request of his barbarian friend and cut off his head. The wife of Gerontius who conjured him not to abandon her to a life of misery and disgrace eagerly presented her neck to his sword and the tragic scene was terminated by the death of the count himself who after three ineffectual strokes drew a short dagger and sheathed it in his heart[151] The unprotected Maximus whom he had invested with the purple was indebted for his life to the contempt that was entertained of his power and abilities. The caprice of the barbarians who ravaged Spain once more seated this Imperial phantom on the throne but they soon resigned him to the justice of Honorius and the tyrant Maximus, after he had been shown to the people of Ravenna and Rome was publicly executed

The general Constantius was his name who raised by his approach the siege of Arles and dissipated the troops of Gerontius was born a Roman and this remarkable distinction is strongly expressive of the decay of military spirit among the subjects of the empire. The strength and majesty which were conspicuous in the person of that general[152] marked him in the popular opinion as a candidate worthy of the throne which he afterwards ascended In the familiar intercourse of private life his manners were cheerful and engaging nor would he sometimes disdain in the license of convivial mirth, to vie with the pantomimes themselves in the exercises of their ridiculous profession But when the trumpet summoned him to arms when he mounted his horse and bending down (for such was his singular practice) almost upon the neck, fiercely rolled his large animated eyes round the field Constantius then struck terror into his foes and inspired his soldiers with the assurance of victory He had received from the court of Ravenna the important commission of extirpating rebellion in the provinces of the West and the pretended emperor Constantine after enjoying a short and anxious respite was again besieged in his capital by the arms of a more formidable enemy Yet this interval allowed time for a successful negotiation with the Franks and Alemanni and his ambassador Edobic, soon returned at the head of an army to disturb the operations of the siege of Arles The Roman general instead of expecting the attack in his lines boldly and perhaps wisely resolved to pass the Rhone and to meet the barbarians. His measures were conducted with so much skill and secrecy that while they engaged the infantry of Constantius in the front they were suddenly attacked surrounded and destroyed by the cavalry of his lieutenant Ulphilas, who had silently gained an advantageous post in their rear The remains of the army of Edobic were preserved by flight or submission, and their leader escaped from the field of battle to the house of a faithless friend, who too clearly understood that the head of his obnoxious guest would be an acceptable and lucrative present for the Imperial general On this occasion Constantius behaved with the magnanimity of a genuine Roman Subduing or suppressing every sentiment of jealousy, he publicly acknowledged the merit and services of Ulphilas, but he turned with horror from the assassin of Edobic, and sternly intimated his commands that the camp should no longer be polluted by the presence of an ungrateful wretch who had violated the laws of friendship and hospitality The usurper, who beheld from the walls of Arles the ruin of his last hopes, was tempted to place some confidence in so generous a conqueror He required a solemn promise for his security, and after receiving, by the imposition of hands, the sacred character of a Christian presbyter, he ventured to open the gates of the city But he soon experienced that the principles of honour and integrity, which might regulate the ordinary conduct of Constantius, were superseded by the loose doctrines of political morality The Roman general indeed refused to sully his laurels with the blood of Constantine, but the abdicated emperor and his son Julian were sent, under a strong guard, into Italy, and before they reached the palace of Ravenna they met the ministers of death

At a time when it was universally confessed that almost every man in the empire was superior in personal merit to the princes whom the accident of their birth had seated on the throne, a rapid succession of usurpers, regardless of the fate of their predecessors, still continued to arise This mischief was peculiarly felt in the provinces of Spain and Gaul, where the principles of order and obedience had been extinguished by war and rebellion Before Constantine resigned the purple, and in the fourth month of the siege of Arles, intelligence was received in the Imperial camp that Jovinus had assumed the diadem at Mentz, in the Upper Germany, at the instigation of Goar, king of the Alani, and of Guntiarius, king of the Burgundians, and that the candidate on whom they had bestowed the empire advanced with a formidable host of barbarians from the banks of the Rhine to those of the Rhone Every circumstance is dark and extraordinary in the short history of the reign of Jovinus It was natural to expect that a brave and skilful general, at the head of a victorious army, would have asserted, in a field of battle, the justice of the cause of Honorius The hasty retreat of Constantius might be justified by weighty reasons, but he resigned without a struggle the possession of Gaul, and Dardanus, the Prætorian præfect, is recorded as the only magistrate who refused to yield obedience to the usurper[153] When the Goths, two years after the siege of Rome, established their quarters in Gaul, it was natural to suppose that their inclinations could be divided only between the emperor Honorius, with whom they had formed a recent alliance, and the degraded Attalus, whom they reserved in their camp for the occasional purpose of acting the part of a musician or a monarch Yet in a moment of disgust (for which it is not easy to assign a cause or a date) Adolphus connected himself with the usurper of Gaul, and imposed on Attalus the ignominious task of negotiating the treaty which ratified his own disgrace We are again surprised to read, that, instead of considering the Gothic alliance as the firmest support of his throne, Jovinus upbraided, in dark and ambiguous language, the officious importunity of Attalus, that, scorning the advice of his great ally, he invested with the purple his brother Sebastian, and that he most imprudently accepted the service of Sarus, when that gallant chief, the soldier of Honorius, was provoked to desert the court of a prince who knew not how to reward or punish Adolphus, educated among a race of warriors, who esteemed the duty of revenge as the most precious and sacred portion of their inheritance, advanced with a body of ten thousand Goths to encounter the hereditary enemy of the house of Balti He attacked Sarus at an unguarded moment, when he was accompanied only by eighteen or twenty of his valiant followers United by friendship, animated by despair, but at length oppressed by multitudes, this band of heroes deserved the esteem, without exciting the compassion, of their enemies, and the lion was no sooner taken in the toils[154] than he was instantly despatched The death of Sarus dissolved the loose alliance which Adolphus still maintained with the usurpers of Gaul He again listened to the dictates of love and prudence, and soon satisfied the brother of Placidia, by the assurance that he would immediately transmit to the palace of Ravenna the heads of the two tyrants, Jovinus and Sebastian The king of the Goths executed his promise without difficulty or delay the helpless brothers, unsupported by any personal merit, were abandoned by their barbarian auxiliaries, and the short opposition of Valentia was expiated by the ruin of one of the oldest cities of Gaul. The emperor chosen by the Roman senate who had been promoted degraded insulted, restored again degraded and again insulted, was finally abandoned to his fate but when the Gothic king withdrew his protection he was restrained by pity or contempt from offering any violence to the person of Attalus The unfortunate Attalus who was left without subjects or allies embarked in one of the ports of Spain in search of some secure and solitary retreat but he was intercepted at sea conducted to the presence of Honorius led in triumph through the streets of Rome or Ravenna and publicly exposed to the gazing multitude on the second step of the throne of his invincible conqueror The same measure of punishment with which in the days of his prosperity he was accused of menacing his rival was inflicted on Attalus himself he was condemned after the amputation of two fingers to a perpetual exile in the isle of Lipari where he was supplied with the decent necessaries of life The remainder of the reign Honorius was undisturbed by rebellion and it may be observed that in the space of five years seven usurpers had yielded to the fortune of a prince who was himself incapable either of counsel or of action

The situation of Spain separated on all sides from the enemies of Rome by the sea by the mountains and by intermediate provinces had secured the long tranquillity of that remote and sequestered country and we may observe as a sure symptom of domestic happiness that in a period of four hundred years Spain furnished very few materials to the history of the Roman empire The footsteps of the barbarians who in the reign of Gallienus had penetrated beyond the Pyrenees, were soon obliterated by the return of peace and in the fourth century of the Christian era the cities of Emerita or Merida of Corduba Seville Bracara and Tarragona, were numbered with the most illustrious of the Roman world. The various plenty of the animal the vegetable and the mineral kingdoms, was improved and manufactured by the skill of an industrious people and the peculiar advantages of naval stores contributed to support an extensive and profitable trade [115] The arts and sciences flourished under the protection of the emperors and if the character of the Spaniards was enfeebled by peace and servitude the hostile approach of the Germans who had spread terror and desolation from the Rhine to the Pyrenees, seemed to rekindle some sparks of military ardour As long as the defence of the mountains was intrusted to the hardy and faithful militia of the country they successfully repelled the frequent attempts of the barbarians. But no sooner had the national troops been compelled to resign their post of the Honorian bands in the service of Constantine than the gates of Spain were treacherously betrayed to the public enemy about ten months before the sack of Rome by the Goths [116] The consciousness of guilt and the thirst of rapine prompted the mercenary guards of the Pyrenees to desert their station to invite the arms of the Suevi the Vandals and the Alani and to swell the torrent which was poured with irresistible violence from the frontiers of Gaul to the sea of Africa. The misfortunes of Spain may be described in the language of its most eloquent historian who has concisely expressed the passionate and perhaps exaggerated declamations of contemporary writers [117] The irruption of these nations was followed by the most dreadful calamities as the barbarians exercised their indiscriminate cruelty on the fortunes of the Romans and the Spaniards and ravaged with equal fury the cities and the open country The progress of famine reduced the miserable inhabitants to feed on the flesh of their fellow creatures and even the wild beasts who multiplied without control in the desert were exasperated by the taste of blood and the impatience of hunger boldly to attack and devour their human prey Pestilence soon appeared the inseparable companion of famine a large proportion of the people was swept away and the groans of the dying excited only the envy of their surviving friends At length the barbarians satiated with carnage and rapine and afflicted by the contagious evils which they themselves had introduced fixed their permanent seats in the depopulated country The ancient Gallicia whose limits included the kingdom of Old Castille was divided between the Suevi and the Vandals the Alani were scattered over the provinces of Carthagena and Lusitania, from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic Ocean and the fruitful territory of Bætica was allotted to the Silingi another branch of the Vandalic nation After regulating this partition the conquerors contracted with their new subjects some reciprocal engagements of protection and obedience the lands were again cultivated and the towns and villages were again occupied by a captive people The greatest part of the Spaniards was even disposed to prefer this new condition of poverty and barbarism to the severe oppressions of the Roman government, yet there were many who still asserted their native freedom, and who refused, more especially in the mountains of Gallicia, to submit to the barbarian yoke [158]

The important present of the heads of Jovinus and Sebastian had approved the friendship of Adolphus, and restored Gaul to the obedience of his brother Honorius Peace was incompatible with the situation and temper of the king of the Goths He readily accepted the proposal of turning his victorious arms against the barbarians of Spain, the troops of Constantius intercepted his communication with the seaports of Gaul, and gently pressed his march towards the Pyrenees [159] he passed the mountains, and surprised, in the name of the emperor, the city of Barcelona The fondness of Adolphus for his Roman bride was not abated by time or possession, and the birth of a son, surnamed, from his illustrious grandsire, Theodosius, appeared to fix him for ever in the interest of the public The loss of that infant, whose remains were deposited in a silver coffin in one of the churches near Barcelona, afflicted his parents, but the grief of the Gothic king was suspended by the labours of the field, and the course of his victories was soon interrupted by domestic treason He had imprudently received into his service one of the followers of Sarus, a barbarian of a daring spirit, but of a diminutive stature, whose secret desire of revenging the death of his beloved patron was continually irritated by the sarcasms of his insolent master Adolphus was assassinated in the palace of Barcelona, the laws of the succession were violated by a tumultuous faction,[160] and a stranger to the royal race, Singeric, the brother of Sarus himself, was seated on the Gothic throne The first act of his reign was the inhuman murder of the six children of Adolphus, the issue of a former marriage, whom he tore, without pity, from the feeble arms of a venerable bishop [161] The unfortunate Placidia, instead of the respectful compassion which she might have excited in the most savage breasts, was treated with cruel and wanton insult The daughter of the emperor Theodosius, confounded among a crowd of vulgar captives, was compelled to march on foot above twelve miles, before the horse of a barbarian, the assassin of an husband whom Placidia loved and lamented [162]

But Placidia soon obtained the pleasure of revenge, and the view of her ignominious sufferings might rouse an indignant people against the tyrant, who was assassinated on the seventh day of his usurpation After the death of Singeric, the free choice of the nation bestowed the Gothic sceptre on Wallia, whose warlike and ambitious temper appeared, in the beginning of his reign, extremely hostile to the republic He marched in arms from Barcelona to the shores of the Atlantic Ocean, which the ancients revered and dreaded as the boundary of the world But when he reached the southern promontory of Spain,[163] and, from the rock now covered by the fortress of Gibralter, contemplated the neighbouring and fertile coast of Africa, Wallia resumed the designs of conquest which had been interrupted by the death of Alaric The winds and waves again disappointed the enterprise of the Goths, and the minds of a superstitious people were deeply affected by the repeated disasters of storms and shipwrecks In this disposition, the successor of Adolphus no longer refused to listen to a Roman ambassador, whose proposals were enforced by the real, or supposed, approach of a numerous army, under the conduct of the brave Constantius A solemn treaty was stipulated and observed Placidia was honourably restored to her brother, six hundred thousand measures of wheat were delivered to the hungry Goths,[164] and Wallia engaged to draw his sword in the service of the empire A bloody war was instantly excited among the barbarians of Spain, and the contending princes are said to have addressed their letters, their ambassadors, and their hostages, to the throne of the Western emperor, exhorting him to remain a tranquil spectator of their contest the events of which must be favourable to the Romans by the mutual slaughter of their common enemies [165] The Spanish war was obstinately supported, during three campaigns, with desperate valour and various success, and the martial achievements of Wallia diffused through the empire the superior renown of the Gothic hero He exterminated the Silingi, who had irretrievably ruined the elegant plenty of the province of Bætica He slew, in battle, the king of the Alani, and the remains of those Scythian wanderers who escaped from the field, instead of choosing a new leader, humbly sought a refuge under the standard of the Vandals, with whom they were ever afterwards confounded The Vandals themselves, and the Suevi, yielded to the efforts of the invincible Goths The promiscuous multitude of barbarians, whose retreat had been intercepted, were driven into the mountains of Gallicia, where they still continued, in a narrow compass and on a barren soil, to exercise their domestic and implacable hostilities In the pride of victory, Wallia

was faithful to his engagements he restored his Spanish conquests to the obedience of Honorius and the tyranny of the Imperial officers soon reduced an oppressed people to regret the time of their barbarian servitude While the event of the war was still doubtful the first advantages obtained by the arms of Wallia had encouraged the court of Ravenna to decree the honours of a triumph to their feeble sovereign He entered Rome like the ancient conquerors of nations and if the monuments of servile corruption had not long since met with the fate which they deserved we should probably find that a crowd of poets and orators of magistrates and bishops, applauded the fortune the wisdom and the invincible courage of the emperor Honorius [166]

Such a triumph might have been justly claimed by the ally of Rome if Wallia before he repassed the Pyrenees had extirpated the seeds of the Spanish war His victorious Goths forty three years after they had passed the Danube were established according to the faith of treaties in the possession of the second Aquitain a maritime province between the Garonne and the Loire under the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Bourdeaux That metropolis advantageously situated for the trade of the ocean was built in a regular and elegant form and its numerous inhabitants were distinguished among the Gauls by their wealth their learning and the politeness of their manners The adjacent province which has been fondly compared to the garden of Eden is blessed with a fruitful soil and a temperate climate the face of the country displayed the arts and the rewards of industry and the Goths after their martial toils luxuriously exhausted the rich vineyards of Aquitain [167] The Gothic limits were enlarged by the additional gift of some neighbouring dioceses and the successors of Alaric fixed their royal residence at Toulouse which included five populous quarters or cities within the spacious circuit of its walls About the same time in the last years of the reign of Honorius the GOTHS, the BURGUNDIANS, and the FRANKS, obtained a permanent seat and dominion in the provinces of Gaul. The liberal grant of the usurper Jovinus to his Burgundian allies was confirmed by the lawful emperor the lands of the First or Upper Germany were ceded to those formidable barbarians and they gradually occupied either by conquest or treaty the two provinces which still retain with the titles of Duchy and of County the national appellation of Burgundy [168] The Franks the valiant and faithful allies of the Roman republic were soon tempted to imitate the invaders whom they had so bravely resisted Trèves the capital of Gaul, was pillaged by their lawless bands and the humble colony which they so long maintained in the district of Toxandria in Brabant insensibly multiplied along the banks of the Meuse and Scheld till their independent power filled the whole extent of the Second or Lower Germany These facts may be sufficiently justified by historic evidence but the foundation of the French monarchy by Pharamond the conquests the laws and even the existence of that hero have been justly arraigned by the impartial severity of modern criticism [169]

The ruin of the opulent provinces of Gaul may be dated from the establishment of these barbarians whose alliance was dangerous and oppressive and who were capriciously impelled, by interest or passion to violate the public peace A heavy and partial ransom was imposed on the surviving provincials who had escaped the calamities of war the fairest and most fertile lands were assigned to the rapacious strangers for the use of their families their slaves, and their cattle and the trembling natives relinquished with a sigh the inheritance of their fathers Yet these domestic misfortunes which are seldom the lot of a vanquished people had been felt and inflicted by the Romans themselves not only in the insolence of foreign conquest but in the madness of civil discord The Triumvirs proscribed eighteen of the most flourishing colonies of Italy and distributed their lands and houses to the veterans who revenged the death of Cæsar and oppressed the liberty of their country Two poets of unequal fame have deplored in similar circumstances the loss of their patrimony but the legionaries of Augustus appear to have surpassed in violence and injustice the barbarians who invaded Gaul under the reign of Honorius It was not without the utmost difficulty that Virgil escaped from the sword of the centurion who had usurped his farm in the neighbourhood of Mantua [170] but Paulinus of Bourdeaux received a sum of money from his Gothic purchaser which he accepted with pleasure and surprise and though it was much inferior to the real value of his estate this act of rapine was disguised by some colours of moderation and equity [171] The odious name of conquerors was softened into the mild and friendly appellation of the guests of the Romans and the barbarians of Gaul more especially the Goths repeatedly declared that they were bound to the people by the ties of hospitality and to the emperor by the duty of allegiance and military service The title of Honorius and his successors, their laws and their civil magistrates, were still respected in the provinces of Gaul, of which they had resigned the possession to the barbarian allies, and the kings, who exercised a supreme and independent authority over their native subjects, ambitiously solicited the more honourable rank of master-generals of the Imperial armies [172] Such was the involuntary reverence which the Roman name still impressed on the minds of those warriors who had borne away in triumph the spoils of the Capitol

Whilst Italy was ravaged by the Goths, and a succession of feeble tyrants oppressed the provinces beyond the Alps, the British island separated itself from the body of the Roman empire The regular forces which guarded that remote province had been gradually withdrawn, and Britain was abandoned without defence, to the Saxon pirates and the savages of Ireland and Caledonia The Britons, reduced to this extremity, no longer relied on the tardy and doubtful aid of a declining monarchy They assembled in arms, repelled the invaders, and rejoiced in the important discovery of their own strength.[173] Afflicted by similar calamities, and actuated by the same spirit, the Armorican provinces (a name which comprehended the maritime countries of Gaul between the Seine and the Loire)[174] resolved to imitate the example of the neighbouring island They expelled the Roman magistrate, who acted under the authority of the usurper Constantine, and a free government was established among a people who had so long been subject to the arbitrary will of a master The independence of Britain and Armorica was soon confirmed by Honorius himself, the lawful emperor of the West, and the letters by which he committed to the new states the care of their own safety might be interpreted as an absolute and perpetual abdication of the exercise and rights of sovereignty This interpretation was, in some measure, justified by the event After the usurpers of Gaul had successively fallen, the maritime provinces were restored to the empire Yet their obedience was imperfect, and precarious the vain, the inconstant, rebellious disposition of the people, was incompatible either with freedom or servitude,[175] and Armorica, though it could not long maintain the form of a republic,[176] was agitated by frequent and destructive revolts Britain was irrecoverably lost [177] But as the emperors wisely acquiesced in the independence of a remote province, the separation was not embittered by the reproach of tyranny or rebellion, and the claims of allegiance and protection were succeeded by the mutual and voluntary offices of national friendship [178]

This revolution dissolved the artificial fabric of civil and military government, and the independent country, during a period of forty years, till the descent of the Saxons, was ruled by the authority of the clergy, the nobles, and the municipal towns [179] I Zosimus, who alone has preserved the memory of this singular transaction, very accurately observes that the letters of Honorius were addressed to the cities of Britain [180] Under the protection of the Romans, ninety-two considerable towns had arisen in the several parts of that great province, and, among these, thirty-three cities were distinguished above the rest by their superior privileges and importance [181] Each of these cities, as in all the other provinces of the empire, formed a legal corporation, for the purpose of regulating their domestic policy, and the powers of municipal government were distributed among annual magistrates, a select senate, and the assembly of the people, according to the original model of the Roman constitution [18] The management of a common revenue, the exercise of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and the habits of public counsel and command, were inherent to these petty republics, and when they asserted their independence, the youth of the city, and of the adjacent districts, would naturally range themselves under the standard of the magistrate But the desire of obtaining the advantages, and of escaping the burthens, of political society, is a perpetual and inexhaustible source of discord, nor can it reasonably be presumed that the restoration of British freedom was exempt from tumult and faction The pre-eminence of birth and fortune must have been frequently violated by bold and popular citizens, and the haughty nobles, who complained that they were become the subjects of their own servants,[183] would sometimes regret the reign of an arbitrary monarch II The jurisdiction of each city over the adjacent country was supported by the patrimonial influence of the principal senators, and the smaller towns, the villages, and the proprietors of land, consulted their own safety by adhering to the shelter of these rising republics The sphere of their attraction was proportioned to the respective degrees of their wealth and populousness, but the hereditary lords of ample possessions, who were not oppressed by the neighbourhood of any powerful city, aspired to the rank of independent princes, and boldly exercised the rights of peace and war The gardens and villas which exhibited some faint imitation of Italian elegance would soon be converted into strong castles the refuge in time of danger of the adjacent country [184] the produce of the land was applied to purchase arms and horses to maintain a military force of slaves of peasants and of licentious followers and the chieftain might assume within his own domain the powers of a civil magistrate Several of these British chiefs might be the genuine posterity of ancient kings and many more would be tempted to adopt this honourable genealogy and to vindicate there hereditary claims which had been suspended by the usurpation of the Cæsars [185] Their situation and their hopes would dispose them to affect the dress the language and the customs of their ancestors If the princes of Britain relapsed into barbarism while the cities studiously preserved the laws and manners of Rome the whole island must have been gradually divided by the distinction of two national parties again broken into a thousand subdivisions of war and faction by the various provocations of interest and resentment The public strength instead of being united against a foreign enemy was consumed in obscure and intestine quarrels and the personal merit which had placed a successful leader at the head of his equals might enable him to subdue the freedom of some neighbouring cities and to claim a rank among the tyrants[186] who infested Britain after the dissolution of the Roman government III The British church might be composed of thirty or forty bishops [187] with an adequate proportion of the inferior clergy and the want of riches (for they seem to have been poor)[188] would compel them to deserve the public esteem by a decent and exemplary behaviour The interest as well as the temper of the clergy was favourable to the peace and union of their distracted country those salutary lessons might be frequently inculcated in their popular discourses and the episcopal synods were the only councils that could pretend to the weight and authority of a national assembly In such councils where the princes and magistrates sat promiscuously with the bishops the important affairs of the state as well as of the church might be freely debated differences reconciled alliances formed contributions imposed wise resolutions often concerted and sometimes executed and there is reason to believe that in moments of extreme danger a Pendragon or Dictator was elected by the general consent of the Britons These pastoral cares so worthy of the episcopal character were interrupted however by zeal and superstition and the British clergy incessantly laboured to eradicate the Pelagian heresy which they abhorred as the peculiar disgrace of their native country [189]

It is somewhat remarkable or rather it is extremely natural that the revolt of Britain and Armorica should have introduced an appearance of liberty into the obedient provinces of Gaul In a solemn edict [190] filled with the strongest assurances of that paternal affection which princes so often express and so seldom feel the emperor Honorius promulgated his intention of convening an annual assembly of the seven provinces a name peculiarly appropriated to Aquitain and the ancient Narbonnese which had long since exchanged their Celtic rudeness for the useful and elegant arts of Italy [191] Arles the seat of government and commerce was appointed for the place of the assembly which regularly continued twenty eight days from the fifteenth of August to the thirteenth of September of every year It consisted of the Prætorian præfect of the Gauls of seven provincial governors, one consular and six presidents of the magistrates and perhaps the bishops of about sixty cities and of a competent though indefinite number of the most honourable and opulent possessors of land who might justly be considered as the representatives of their country They were empowered to interpret and communicate the laws of their sovereign to expose the grievances and wishes of their constituents to moderate the excessive or unequal weight of taxes and to deliberate on every subject of local or national importance that could tend to the restoration of the peace and prosperity of the seven provinces If such an institution which gave the people an interest in their own government had been universally established by Trajan or the Antonines the seeds of public wisdom and virtue might have been cherished and propagated in the empire of Rome The privileges of the subject would have secured the throne of the monarch the abuses of an arbitrary administration might have been prevented in some degree or corrected by the interposition of these representative assemblies and the country would have been defended against a foreign enemy by the arms of natives and freemen Under the mild and generous influence of liberty the Roman empire might have remained invincible and immortal or if its excessive magnitude and the instability of human affairs had opposed such perpetual continuance its vital and constituent members might have sep arately preserved their vigour and independence But in the decline of the empire, when every principle of health and life had been exhausted, the tardy application of this partial remedy was incapable of producing any important or salutary effects The emperor Honorius expresses his surprise that he must compel the reluctant provinces to accept a privilege which they should ardently have solicited A fine of three, or even five, pounds of gold was imposed on the absent representatives, who seem to have declined this imaginary gift of a free constitution, as the last and most cruel insult of their oppressors

CHAPTER XXXII

Arcadius Emperor of the East Administration and Disgrace of Eutropius Revolt of Gainas Persecution of St John Chrysostom Theodosius II Emperor of the East His Sister Pulcheria His Wife Eudocia The Persian War, and Division of Armenia

THE division of the Roman world between the sons of Theodosius marks the final establishment of the empire of the East, which, from the reign of Arcadius to the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, subsisted one thousand and fifty eight years in a state of premature and perpetual decay The sovereign of that empire assumed and obstinately retained the vain, and at length fictitious, title of Emperor of the ROMANS, and the hereditary appellations of CÆSAR and AUGUSTUS continued to declare that he was the legitimate successor of the first of men, who had reigned over the first of nations The palace of Constantinople rivalled, and perhaps excelled, the magnificence of Persia, and the eloquent sermons of St Chrysostom[1] celebrate, while they condemn, the pompous luxury of the reign of Arcadius "The emperor," says he, "wears on his head either a diadem or a crown of gold, decorated with precious stones of inestimable value These ornaments and his purple garments are reserved for his sacred person alone, and his robes of silk are embroidered with the figures of golden dragons His throne is of massy gold Whenever he appears in public he is surrounded by his courtiers, his guards, and his attendants Their spears, their shields, their cuirasses, the bridles and trappings of their horses, have either the substance or the appearance of gold, and the large splendid boss in the midst of their shield is encircled with smaller bosses, which represent the shape of the human eye. The two mules that draw the chariot of the monarch are perfectly white, and shining all over with gold The chariot itself, of pure and solid gold, attracts the admiration of the spectators, who contemplate the purple curtains, the snowy carpet, the size of the precious stones, and the resplendent plates of gold, that glitter as they are agitated by the motion of the carriage The Imperial pictures are white, on a blue ground, the emperor appears seated on his throne, with his arms, his horses, and his guards beside him, and his vanquished enemies in chains at his feet" The successors of Constantine established their perpetual residence in the royal city which he had erected on the verge of Europe and Asia Inaccessible to the menaces of their enemies, and perhaps to the complaints of their people, they received with each wind the tributary productions of every climate, while the impregnable strength of their capital continued for ages to defy the hostile attempts of the barbarians Their dominions were bounded by the Hadriatic and the Tigris, and the whole interval of twenty-five days' navigation, which separated the extreme cold of Scythia from the torrid zone of Æthiopia,[2] was comprehended within the limits of the empire of the East The populous countries of that empire were the seat of art and learning, of luxury and wealth, and the inhabitants, who had assumed the language and manners of Greeks, styled themselves, with some appearance of truth, the most enlightened and civilised portion of the human species The form of government was a pure and simple monarchy, the name of the ROMAN REPUBLIC, which so long preserved a faint tradition of freedom, was confined to the Latin provinces, and the princes of Constantinople measured their greatness by the servile obedience of their people They were ignorant how much this passive disposition enervates and degrades every faculty of the mind The subjects who had resigned their will to the absolute commands of a master were equally incapable of guarding their lives and fortunes against the assaults of the barbarians or of defending their reason from the terrors of superstition

The first events of the reign of Arcadius and Honorius are so intimately connected that the rebellion of the Goths and the fall of Rufinus have already claimed a place in the history of the West It has already been observed that Eutropius[3] one of the principal eunuchs of the palace of Constantinople succeeded the haughty minister whose ruin he had accomplished and whose vices he soon imitated Every order of the state bowed to the new favourite and their tame and obsequious submission encouraged him to insult the laws and what is still more difficult and dangerous the manners of his country Under the weakest of the predecessors of Arcadius the reign of the eunuchs had been secret and almost invisible They insinuated themselves into the confidence of the prince but their ostensible functions were confined to the menial service of the wardrobe and Imperial bedchamber They might direct in a whisper the public coun els and blast by their malicious suggestions the fame and fortunes of the most illustrious citizens but they never presumed to stand forward in the front of empire[4] or to profane the public honours of the state Eutropius was the first of his artificial sex who dared to assume the character of a Roman magistrate and general[5] Sometimes in the presence of the blushing senate he ascended the tribunal to pronounce judgment or to repeat elaborate harangues and sometimes appeared on horseback at the head of his troops in the dress and armour of a hero The disregard of custom and decency always betrays a weak and ill regulated mind nor does Eutropius seem to have compensated for the folly of the design by any superior merit or ability in the execution His form r habits of life had not introduced him to the study of the laws or the exercises of the field his awkward and unsuccessful attempts provoked the secret contempt of the spectators the Goths expressed their wish that such a general might always command the armies of Rome and the name of the minister was branded with ridicule more pernicious perhaps than hatred to a public character The subjects of Arcadius were exasperated by the recollection that this deformed and decrepit eunuch[6] who so perversely mimicked the actions of a man was born in the most abject conditions of s rvitude that before he entered the Imperial palace he had been successively sold and purchased by an hundred masters who had exhausted his youthful strength in every mean and infamous office and at length dismissed him in his old age to freedom and poverty[7] While these disgraceful stories were circulated, and perhaps exaggerated in private conversations the vanity of the favourite was flattered with the most extraordinary honours In the senate in the capital in the provinces the statues of Eutropius were erected in brass or marble decorated with the symbols of his civil and military virtues and inscribed with the pompous title of the third founder of Constantinople He was promoted to the rank of patrician which began to signify in a popular and even legal acceptation the father of the emperor and the last year of the fourth century was polluted by the consulship of an eunuch and a slave This strange and inexpiable prodigy[8] awakened however the prejudices of the Romans The effeminate consul was rejected by the West as an indelible stain to the annals of the republic and without invoking the shades of Brutus and Camillus the colleague of Eutropius a learned and respectable magistrate[9] sufficiently represented the different maxims of the two administrations

The bold and vigorous mind of Rufinus seems to have been actuated by a more sanguinary and revengeful spirit but the avarice of the eunuch was not less insatiate than that of the præfect[10] As long as he despoiled the oppressors who had enriched themselves with the plunder of the people Eutropius might gratify his covetous disposition without much envy or injustice but the progress of his rapine soon invaded the wealth which had been acquired by lawful inheritance or laudable industry The usual methods of extortion were practised and improved and Claudian has sketched a lively and original picture of the public auction of the state The impotence of the eunuch (says that agreeable satirist) has served only to stimulate his avarice the same hand which, in his servile condition was exercised in petty thefts to unlock the coffers of his master now grasps the riches of the world and this infamous broker of the empire appreciates and divides the Roman provinces from Mount Hæmus to the Tigris One man at the expense of his villa, is made proconsul of Asia a second purchases Syria with his wife s jewels and a third laments that he has exchanged his paternal estate for the government of Bithynia In the antechamber of Eutropius a large tablet is exposed to public view which marks the respective prices of the provinces The different value of Pontus, of

Galatia, of Lydia is accurately distinguished Lycia may be obtained for so many thousand pieces of gold, but the opulence of Phrygia will require a more considerable sum The eunuch wishes to obliterate by the general disgrace his personal ignominy, and as he has been sold himself, he is desirous of selling the rest of mankind In the eager contention, the balance, which contains the fate and fortunes of the province, often trembles on the beam, and till one of the scales is inclined by a superior weight, the mind of the impartial judge remains in anxious suspense [11] Such" (continues the indignant poet) "are the fruits of Roman valour, of the defeat of Antiochus, and of the triumph of Pompey" This venal prostitution of public honours secured the impunity of future crimes, but the riches which Eutropius derived from confiscation were already stained with injustice, since it was decent to accuse and to condemn the proprietors of the wealth which he was impatient to confiscate Some noble blood was shed by the hand of the executioner, and the most inhospitable extremities of the empire were filled with innocent and illustrious exiles Among the generals and consuls of the East, Abundantius[12] had reason to dread the first effects of the resentment of Eutropius He had been guilty of the unpardonable crime of introducing that abject slave to the palace of Constantinople, and some degree of praise must be allowed to a powerful and ungrateful favourite who was satisfied with the disgrace of his benefactor Abundantius was stripped of his ample fortunes by an Imperial rescript, and banished to Pityus, on the Euxine, the last frontier of the Roman world, where he subsisted by the precarious mercy of the barbarians till he could obtain, after the fall of Eutropius, a milder exile at Sidon in Phœnicia The destruction of Timasius[13] required a more serious and regular mode of attack That great officer, the master-general of the armies of Theodosius, had signalised his valour by a decisive victory which he obtained over the Goths of Thessaly, but he was too prone, after the example of his sovereign, to enjoy the luxury of peace and to abandon his confidence to wicked and designing flatterers Timasius had despised the public clamour by promoting an infamous dependent to the command of a cohort, and he deserved to feel the ingratitude of Bargus, who was secretly instigated by the favourite to accuse his patron of a treasonable conspiracy The general was arraigned before the tribunal of Arcadius himself, and the principal eunuch stood by the side of the throne to suggest the questions and answers of his sovereign But as this form of trial might be deemed partial and arbitrary, the further inquiry into the crimes of Timasius was delegated to Saturnius and Procopius, the former of consular rank, the latter still respected as the father-in-law of the emperor Valens The appearances of a fair and legal proceeding were maintained by the blunt honesty of Procopius, and he yielded with reluctance to the obsequious dexterity of his colleague, who pronounced a sentence of condemnation against the unfortunate Timasius His immense riches were confiscated in the name of the emperor and for the benefit of the favourite, and he was doomed to perpetual exile at Oasis, a solitary spot in the midst of the sandy deserts of Libya [14] Secluded from all human converse, the master-general of the Roman armies was lost for ever to the world, but the circumstances of his fate have been related in a various and contradictory manner It is insinuated that Eutropius despatched a private order for his secret execution [15] It was reported that in attempting to escape from Oasis he perished in the desert of thirst and hunger, and that his dead body was found on the sands of Libya [16] It has been asserted with more confidence that his son Syagrius, after successfully eluding the pursuit of the agents and emissaries of the court, collected a band of African robbers, that he rescued Timasius from the place of his exile, and that both the father and the son disappeared from the knowledge of mankind [17] But the ungrateful Bargus, instead of being suffered to possess the reward of guilt, was soon afterwards circumvented and destroyed by the more powerful villainy of the minister himself, who retained sense and spirit enough to abhor the instrument of his own crimes

The public hatred and the despair of individuals continually threatened, or seemed to threaten, the personal safety of Eutropius, as well as of the numerous adherents who were attached to his fortune and had been promoted by his venal favour For their mutual defence he contrived the safeguard of a law which violated every principle of humanity and justice [18] I It is enacted, in the name and by the authority of Arcadius, that all those who shall conspire, either with subjects or with strangers, against the lives of any of the persons whom the emperor considers as the members of his own body, shall be punished with death and confiscation This species of fictitious and metaphorical treason is extended to protect not only the illustrious officers of the state and army who are admitted into the sacred consistory but likewise the principal domestics of the palace the senators of Constantinople the military commanders and the civil magistrates of the provinces a vague and indefinite list which under the successors of Constantine included an obscure and numerous train of subordinate ministers II This extreme severity might perhaps be justified had it been only directed to secure the representatives of the sovereign from any actual violence in the execution of their office But the whole body of Imperial dependents claimed a privilege or rather impunity which screened them in the loosest moments of their lives from the hasty perhaps the justifiable resentment of their fellow-citizens and by a strange perversion of the laws the same degree of guilt and punishment was applied to a private quarrel and to a deliberate conspiracy against the emperor and the empire The edict of Arcadius most positively and most absurdly declares that in such cases of treason thoughts and actions ought to be punished with equal severity that the knowledge of a mischievous intention unless it be instantly revealed becomes equally criminal with the intention itself [19] and that those rash men who shall presume to solicit the pardon of traitors shall themselves be branded with public and perpetual infamy III With regard to the sons of traitors (continues the emperor) although they ought to share the punishment since they will probably imitate the guilt of their parents yet by the special effect of our Imperial lenity we grant them their lives but at the same time we declare them incapable of inheriting either on the father s or on the mother's side or of receiving any gift or legacy from the testament either of kinsmen or of strangers Stigmatised with hereditary infamy excluded from the hopes of honours or fortune let them endure the pangs of poverty and contempt till they shall consider life as a calamity and death as a comfort and relief In such words so well adapted to insult the feelings of mankind did the emperor or rather his favourite eunuch, applaud the moderation of a law which transferred the same unjust and inhuman penalties to the children of all those who had seconded or who had not disclosed these fictitious conspiracies Some of the noblest regulations of Roman jurisprudence have been suffered to expire but this edict a convenient and forcible engine of ministerial tyranny was carefully inserted in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian and the same maxims have been revived in modern ages to protect the electors of Germany and the cardinals of the church of Rome,[20]

Yet these sanguinary laws which spread terror among a disarmed and dispirited people were of too weak a texture to restrain the bold enterprise of Tribigild [1] the Ostrogoth The colony of that warlike nation which had been planted by Theodosius in one of the most fertile districts of Phrygia [22] impatiently compared the slow returns of laborious husbandry with the successful rapine and liberal rewards of Alaric and their leader resented as a personal affront, his own ungracious reception in the palace of Constantinople A soft and wealthy province in the heart of the empire was astonished by the sound of war and the faithful vassal who had been disregarded or oppressed was again respected as soon as he resumed the hostile character of a barbarian The vineyards and fruitful fields between the rapid Marsyas and the winding Mæander[23] were consumed with fire the decayed walls of the cities crumbled into dust at the first stroke of an enemy the trembling inhabitants escaped from a bloody massacre to the shores of the Hellespont and a considerable part of Asia Minor was desolated by the rebellion of Tribigild His rapid progress was checked by the resistance of the peasants of Pamphylia and the Ostrogoths attacked in a narrow pass between the city of Selgæ[24] a deep morass and the craggy cliffs of Mount Taurus were defeated with the loss of their bravest troops But the spirit of their chief was not daunted by misfortune and his army was continually recruited by swarms of barbarians and outlaws who were desirous of exercising the profession of robbery under the more honourable names of war and conquest The rumours of the success of Tribigild might for some time be suppressed by fear or disguised by flattery yet they gradually alarmed both the court and the capital. Every misfortune was exaggerated in dark and doubtful hints and the future designs of the rebels became the subject of anxious conjecture. Whenever Tribigild advanced into the inland country the Romans were inclined to suppose that he meditated the passage of Mount Taurus and the invasion of Syria If he descended towards the sea they imputed and perhaps suggested, to the Gothic chief the more dangerous project of arming a fleet in the harbours of Ionia and of extending his depredations along the maritime coast, from the mouth of the Nile to the port of Constantinople The approach of danger and the obstinacy of Tribigild who refused all terms of accommodation, compelled Eutropius to summon a council of war.[25] After claiming for himself the privilege of a veteran soldier, the eunuch intrusted the guard of Thrace and the Hellespont to Gainas the Goth, and the command of the Asiatic army to his favourite Leo, two generals who differently but effectually promoted the cause of the rebels. Leo,[26] who from the bulk of his body and the dulness of his mind was surnamed the Ajax of the East, had deserted his original trade of a woolcomber, to exercise with much less skill and success the military profession, and his uncertain operations were capriciously framed and executed with an ignorance of real difficulties and a timorous neglect of every favourable opportunity. The rashness of the Ostrogoths had drawn them into a disadvantageous position between the rivers Melas and Eurymedon, where they were almost besieged by the peasants of Pamphylia, but the arrival of an Imperial army, instead of completing their destruction, afforded the means of safety and victory. Tribigild surprised the unguarded camp of the Romans in the darkness of the night, seduced the faith of the greater part of the barbarian auxiliaries, and dissipated without much effort the troops which had been corrupted by the relaxation of discipline and the luxury of the capital. The discontent of Gainas, who had so boldly contrived and executed the death of Rufinus, was irritated by the fortune of his unworthy successor, he accused his own dishonourable patience under the servile reign of an eunuch, and the ambitious Goth was convicted, at least in the public opinion, of secretly fomenting the revolt of Tribigild, with whom he was connected by a domestic as well as by a national alliance.[27] When Gainas passed the Hellespont, to unite under his standard the remains of the Asiatic troops, he skilfully adapted his motions to the wishes of the Ostrogoths, abandoning by his retreat the country which they desired to invade, or facilitating by his approach the desertion of the barbarian auxiliaries. To the Imperial court he repeatedly magnified the valour, the genius, the inexhaustible resources of Tribigild, confessed his own inability to prosecute the war, and extorted the permission of negotiating with his invincible adversary. The conditions of peace were dictated by the haughty rebel, and the peremptory demand of the head of Eutropius revealed the author and the design of this hostile conspiracy.

The bold satirist, who has indulged his discontent by the partial and passionate censure of the Christian emperors, violates the dignity rather than the truth of history by comparing the son of Theodosius to one of those harmless and simple animals who scarcely feel that they are the property of their shepherd. Two passions, however—fear and conjugal affection—awakened the languid soul of Arcadius. he was terrified by the threats of a victorious barbarian, and he yielded to the tender eloquence of his wife Eudoxia, who, with a flood of artificial tears, presenting her infant children to their father, implored his justice for some real or imaginary insult which she imputed to the audacious eunuch.[28] The emperor's hand was directed to sign the condemnation of Eutropius, the magic spell, which during four years had bound the prince and the people, was instantly dissolved, and the acclamations that so lately hailed the merit and fortune of the favourite were converted into the clamours of the soldiers and people, who reproached his crimes and pressed his immediate execution. In this hour of distress and despair his only refuge was in the sanctuary of the church, whose privileges he had wisely, or profanely, attempted to circumscribe, and the most eloquent of the saints, John Chrysostom, enjoyed the triumph of protecting a prostrate minister, whose choice had raised him to the ecclesiastical throne of Constantinople. The archbishop, ascending the pulpit of the cathedral that he might be distinctly seen and heard by an innumerable crowd of either sex and of every age, pronounced a seasonable and pathetic discourse on the forgiveness of injuries and the instability of human greatness. The agonies of the pale and affrighted wretch, who lay grovelling under the table of the altar, exhibited a solemn and instructive spectacle, and the orator, who was afterwards accused of insulting the misfortunes of Eutropius, laboured to excite the contempt, that he might assuage the fury, of the people.[29] The powers of humanity, of superstition, and of eloquence prevailed. The empress Eudoxia was restrained, by her own prejudices or by those of her subjects, from violating the sanctuary of the church, and Eutropius was tempted to capitulate, by the milder arts of persuasion, and by an oath that his life should be spared.[30] Careless of the dignity of their sovereign, the new ministers of the palace immediately published an edict, to declare that his late favourite had disgraced the names of consul and patrician, to abolish his statues, to confiscate his wealth, and to inflict a perpetual exile in the island of Cyprus.[31] A despicable and decrepit eunuch could no longer alarm the fears of his enemies nor was he capable of enjoying what yet remained—the comforts of peace of solitude and of a happy climate But their implacable revenge still en vied him the last moments of a miserable life and Eutropius had no sooner touched the shores of Cyprus than he was hastily recalled The vain hope of eluding by a change of place the obligation of an oath engaged the empress to transfer the scene of his trial and execution from Constantinople to the adjacent suburb of Chalcedon The consul Aurelian pronounced the sentence and the motives of that sentence expose the jurisprudence of a despotic govern ment The crimes which Eutropius had com mitted against the people might have justified his death but he was found guilty of harnessing to his chariot the sacred animals who from their breed or colour were reserved for the use of the emperor alone [32]

While this domestic revolution was trans acted Gainas[33] openly revolted from his alle giance united his forces at Thyatira in Lydia with those of Tribigild and still maintained his superior ascendant over the rebellious leader of the Ostrogoths The confederate armies ad vanced without resistance to the straits of the Hellespont and the Bosphorus and Arcadius was instructed to prevent the loss of his Asiatic dominions by resigning his authority and his person to the faith of the barbarians The church of the holy martyr Euphemia situate on a lofty eminence near Chalcedon [34] was chosen for the place of the interview Gainas bowed with reverence at the feet of the emperor whilst he required the sacrifice of Aurelian and Satur ninus two ministers of consular rank and their naked necks were exposed by the haughty rebel to the edge of the sword till he condescended to grant them a precarious and disgraceful respite The Goths according to the terms of the agree ment were immediately transported from Asia into Europe and the victorious chief who ac cepted the title of master general of the Roman armies soon filled Constantinople with his troops and distributed among his dependents the honours and rewards of the empire In his early youth Gainas had passed the Danube as a suppliant and a fugitive his elevation had been the work of valour and fortune and his indis creet or perfidious conduct was the cause of his rapid downfall Notwithstanding the vigorous opposition of the archbishop he importunately claimed for his Arian sectaries the possession of a peculiar church and the pride of the catholics was offended by the public toleration of here sy [35] Every quarter of Constantinople was filled with tumult and disorder and the barbarians gazed with such ardour on the rich shops of the jewellers and the tables of the bankers which were covered with gold and silver that it was judged prudent to remove those dangerous temptations from their sight They resented the injurious precaution and some alarming at tempts were made during the night to attack and destroy with fire the Imperial palace [36] In this state of mutual and suspicious hostility the guards and the people of Constantinople shut the gates and rose in arms to prevent or to pun ish the conspiracy of the Goths During the ab sence of Gainas his troops were surprised and oppressed seven thousand barbarians perished in this bloody massacre In the fury of the pur suit the catholics uncovered the roof and con tinued to throw down flaming logs of wood till they overwhelmed their adversaries who had retreated to the church or conventicle of the Arians Gainas was either innocent of the de sign or too confident of his success he was as tonished by the intelligence that the flower of his army had been ingloriously destroyed that he himself was declared a public enemy and that his countryman Fravitta a brave and loyal confederate had assumed the management of the war by sea and land The enterprises of the rebel against the cities of Thrace were encoun tered by a firm and well-ordered defence his hungry soldiers were soon reduced to the grass that grew on the margin of the fortifications and Gainas who vainly regretted the wealth and luxury of Asia embraced a desperate reso lution of forcing the passage of the Hellespont. He was destitute of vessels but the woods of the Chersonesus afforded materials for rafts, and his intrepid barbarians did not refuse to trust themselves to the waves But Fravitta attentive ly watched the progress of their undertaking As soon as they had gained the middle of the stream the Roman galleys [37] impelled by the full force of oars of the current and of a favour able wind rushed forwards in compact order and with irresistible weight and the Hellespont was covered with the fragments of the Gothic shipwreck After the destruction of his hopes and the loss of many thousands of his bravest soldiers Gainas who could no longer aspire to govern or to subdue the Romans determined to resume the independence of a savage life A light and active body of barbarian horse dis engaged from their infantry and baggage might[38] perform in eight or ten days a march of three hundred miles from the Hellespont to the Da-

ube,[38] the garrisons of that important frontier had been gradually annihilated, the river in the month of December would be deeply frozen, and the unbounded prospect of Scythia was open to the ambition of Gainas This design was secretly communicated to the national troops, who devoted themselves to the fortunes of their leader, and before the signal of departure was given, a great number of provincial auxiliaries, whom he suspected of an attachment to their native country, were perfidiously massacred The Goths advanced by rapid marches through the plains of Thrace, and they were soon delivered from the fear of pursuit by the vanity of Fravitta, who, instead of extinguishing the war, hastened to enjoy the popular applause, and to assume the peaceful honours of the consulship But a formidable ally appeared in arms to vindicate the majesty of the empire, and to guard the peace and liberty of Scythia [39] The superior forces of Uldin, king of the Huns, opposed the progress of Gainas, an hostile and ruined country prohibited his retreat, he disdained to capitulate, and after repeatedly attempting to cut his way through the ranks of the enemy, he was slain, with his desperate followers, in the field of battle Eleven days after the naval victory of the Hellespont, the head of Gainas, the inestimable gift of the conqueror, was received at Constantinople with the most liberal expressions of gratitude, and the public deliverance was celebrated by festivals and illuminations The triumphs of Arcadius became the subject of epic poems,[40] and the monarch, no longer oppressed by any hostile terrors, resigned himself to the mild and absolute dominion of his wife, the fair and artful Eudoxia, who has sullied her fame by the persecution of St John Chrysostom

After the death of the indolent Nectarius, the successor of Gregory Nazianzen, the church of Constantinople was distracted by the ambition of rival candidates, who were not ashamed to solicit, with gold or flattery, the suffrage of the people or of the favourite On this occasion Eutropius seems to have deviated from his ordinary maxims, and his uncorrupted judgment was determined only by the superior merit of a stranger In a late journey into the East he had admired the sermons of John, a native and presbyter of Antioch, whose name has been distinguished by the epithet of Chrysostom, or the Golden Mouth [41] A private order was despatched to the governor of Syria, and as the people might be unwilling to resign their favourite preacher, he was transported, with speed and secrecy, in a post-chariot, from Antioch to Constantinople The unanimous and unsolicited consent of the court, the clergy, and the people ratified the choice of the minister, and, both as a saint and as an orator, the new archbishop surpassed the sanguine expectations of the public Born of a noble and opulent family in the capital of Syria, Chrysostom had been educated, by the care of a tender mother, under the tuition of the most skilful masters He studied the art of rhetoric in the school of Libanius, and that celebrated sophist, who soon discovered the talents of his disciple, ingenuously confessed that John would have deserved to succeed him had he not been stolen away by the Christians His piety soon disposed him to receive the sacrament of baptism, to renounce the lucrative and honourable profession of the law, and to bury himself in the adjacent desert, where he subdued the lusts of the flesh by an austere penance of six years His infirmities compelled him to return to the society of mankind, and the authority of Meletius devoted his talents to the service of the church but in the midst of his family, and afterwards on the archiepiscopal throne, Chrysostom still persevered in the practice of the monastic virtues The ample revenues, which his predecessors had consumed in pomp and luxury, he diligently applied to the establishment of hospitals, and the multitudes who were supported by his charity preferred the eloquent and edifying discourses of their archbishop to the amusements of the theatre or the circus The monuments of that eloquence, which was admired near twenty years at Antioch and Constantinople, have been carefully preserved, and the possession of near one thousand sermons or homilies has authorised the critics[42] of succeeding times to appreciate the genuine merit of Chrysostom They unanimously attribute to the Christian orator the free command of an elegant and copious language, the judgment to conceal the advantages which he derived from the knowledge of rhetoric and philosophy, an inexhaustible fund of metaphors and similitudes, of ideas and images, to vary and illustrate the most familiar topics, the happy art of engaging the passions in the service of virtue, and of exposing the folly as well as the turpitude of vice almost with the truth and spirit of a dramatic representation

The pastoral labours of the archbishop of Constantinople provoked and gradually united against him two sorts of enemies, the aspiring clergy, who envied his success, and the obstinate sinners, who were offended by his reproofs.

When Chrysostom thundered from the pulpit of St Sophia against the degeneracy of the Christians his shafts were spent among the crowd without wounding or even marking the character of any individual When he declaimed against the peculiar vices of the rich poverty might obtain a transient consolation from his invectives but the guilty were still sheltered by their numbers and the reproach itself was dignified by some ideas of superiority and enjoyment But as the pyramid rose towards the summit it insensibly diminished to a point and the magistrates the ministers the favourite eunuchs the ladies of the court [43] the empress Eudoxia herself had a much larger share of guilt to divide among a smaller proportion of criminals The personal applications of the audience were anticipated or confirmed by the testimony of their own conscience and the intrepid preacher assumed the dangerous right of exposing both the offence and the offender to the public abhorrence The secret resentment of the court encouraged the discontent of the clergy and monks of Constantinople who were too hastily reformed by the fervent zeal of their archbishop He had condemned from the pulpit the domestic females of the clergy of Constantinople who under the name of servants or sisters afforded a perpetual occasion either of sin or of scandal The silent and solitary ascetics who had secluded themselves from the world were entitled to the warmest approbation of Chrysostom but he despised and stigmatised as the disgrace of their holy profession the crowd of degenerate monks who from some unworthy motives of pleasure or profit so frequently infested the streets of the capital To the voice of persuasion the archbishop was obliged to add the terrors of authority and his ardour in the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was not always exempt from passion nor was it always guided by prudence Chrysostom was naturally of a cholene disposition [44] Although he struggled according to the precepts of the Gospel to love his private enemies he indulged himself in the privilege of hating the enemies of God and of the church and his sentiments were sometimes delivered with too much energy of countenance and expression He still maintained from some considerations of health or abstinence his former habits of taking his repasts alone and this inhospitable custom [45] which his enemies imputed to pride contributed at least to nourish the infirmity of a morose and unsocial humour Separated from that familiar intercourse which facilitates the knowledge and the despatch of business, he reposed an unsuspecting confidence in his deacon Serapion and seldom applied his speculative knowledge of human nature to the particular characters either of his dependents or of his equals Conscious of the purity of his intentions, and perhaps of the superiority of his genius the archbishop of Constantinople extended the jurisdiction of the Imperial city that he might enlarge the sphere of his pastoral labours and the conduct which the profane imputed to an ambitious motive appeared to Chrysostom himself in the light of a sacred and indispensable duty In his visitation through the Asiatic provinces he deposed thirteen bishops of Lydia and Phrygia and indiscreetly declared that a deep corruption of simony and licentiousness had infected the whole episcopal order [46] If those bishops were innocent such a rash and unjust condemnation must excite a well grounded discontent If they were guilty the numerous associates of their guilt would soon discover that their own safety depended on the ruin of the archbishop, whom they studied to represent as the tyrant of the Eastern church.

This ecclesiastical conspiracy was managed by Theophilus [47] archbishop of Alexandria, an active and ambitious prelate who displayed the fruits of rapine in monuments of ostentation His national dislike to the rising greatness of a city which degraded him from the second to the third rank in the Christian world was exasperated by some personal disputes with Chrysostom himself [48] By the private invitation of the empress Theophilus landed at Constantinople with a stout body of Egyptian mariners, to encounter the populace and a train of dependent bishops to secure by their voices the majority of a synod The synod [49] was convened in the suburb of Chalcedon surnamed the Oak, where Rufinus had erected a stately church and monastery and their proceedings were continued during fourteen days or sessions. A bishop and a deacon accused the archbishop of Constantinople but the frivolous or improbable nature of the forty-seven articles which they presented against him may justly be considered as a fair and unexceptionable panegyric. Four successive summons were signified to Chrysostom but he still refused to trust either his person or his reputation in the hands of his implacable enemies who prudently declining the examination of any particular charges, condemned his contumacious disobedience and hastily pronounced a sentence of deposition. The synod of the Oak immediately addressed the emperor to ratify and execute their judgment, and charitably insinuated that the penalties of treason might be inflicted on the audacious preacher, who had reviled, under the name of Jezebel, the empress Eudoxia herself The archbishop was rudely arrested, and conducted through the city, by one of the Imperial messengers, who landed him, after a short navigation, near the entrance of the Euxine, from whence, before the expiration of two days, he was gloriously recalled

The first astonishment of his faithful people had been mute and passive they suddenly rose with unanimous and irresistible fury Theophilus escaped, but the promiscuous crowd of monks and Egyptian mariners was slaughtered without pity in the streets of Constantinople [50] A seasonable earthquake justified the interposition of Heaven, the torrent of sedition rolled forwards to the gates of the palace, and the empress, agitated by fear or remorse, threw herself at the feet of Arcadius, and confessed that the public safety could be purchased only by the restoration of Chrysostom The Bosphorus was covered with innumerable vessels, the shores of Europe and Asia were profusely illuminated, and the acclamations of a victorious people accompanied, from the port to the cathedral, the triumph of the archbishop, who too easily consented to resume the exercise of his functions, before his sentence had been legally reversed by the authority of an ecclesiastical synod Ignorant, or careless, of the impending danger, Chrysostom indulged his zeal, or perhaps his resentment, declaimed with peculiar asperity against female vices, and condemned the profane honours which were addressed, almost in the precincts of St Sophia, to the statue of the empress His imprudence tempted his enemies to inflame the haughty spirit of Eudoxia, by reporting, or perhaps inventing, the famous exordium of a sermon, "Herodias is again furious, Herodias again dances, she once more requires the head of John" an insolent allusion, which, as a woman and a sovereign, it was impossible for her to forgive [51] The short interval of a perfidious truce was employed to concert more effectual measures for the disgrace and ruin of the archbishop A numerous council of the Eastern prelates, who were guided from a distance by the advice of Theophilus, confirmed the validity, without examining the justice, of the former sentence, and a detachment of barbarian troops was introduced into the city, to suppress the emotions of the people. On the vigil of Easter the solemn administration of baptism was rudely interrupted by the soldiers, who alarmed the modesty of the naked catechumens, and violated, by their presence, the awful mysteries of the Christian worship Arsacius occupied the church of St Sophia and the archiepiscopal throne The catholics retreated to the baths of Constantine, and afterwards to the fields, where they were still pursued and insulted by the guards, the bishops, and the magistrates The fatal day of the second and final exile of Chrysostom was marked by the conflagration of the cathedral, of the senate-house, and of the adjacent buildings, and this calamity was imputed, without proof, but not without probability, to the despair of a persecuted faction [52]

Cicero might claim some merit if his voluntary banishment preserved the peace of the republic,[53] but the submission of a Chrysostom was the indispensable duty of a Christian and a subject. Instead of listening to his humble prayer that he might be permitted to reside at Cyzicus or Nicomedia, the inflexible empress assigned for his exile the remote and desolate town of Cucusus, among the ridges of Mount Taurus, in the Lesser Armenia A secret hope was entertained that the archbishop might perish in a difficult and dangerous march of seventy days in the heat of summer, through the provinces of Asia Minor, where he was continually threatened by the hostile attacks of the Isaurians, and the more implacable fury of the monks Yet Chrysostom arrived in safety at the place of his confinement, and the three years which he spent at Cucusus, and the neighbouring town of Arabissus, were the last and most glorious of his life. His character was consecrated by absence and persecution, the faults of his administration were no longer remembered, but every tongue repeated the praises of his genius and virtue and the respectful attention of the Christian world was fixed on a desert spot among the mountains of Taurus From that solitude the archbishop, whose active mind was invigorated by misfortunes, maintained a strict and frequent correspondence[54] with the most distant provinces, exhorted the separate congregation of his faithful adherents to persevere in their allegiance, urged the destruction of the temples of Phœnicia, and the extirpation of heresy in the isle of Cyprus, extended his pastoral care to the missions of Persia and Scythia, negotiated, by his ambassadors, with the Roman pontiff and the emperor Honorius, and boldly appealed, from a partial synod, to the supreme tribunal of a free and general council The mind of the illustrious exile was still independent but his captive body was exposed to the revenge of the oppressors who continued to abuse the name and authority of Arcadius [55] An order was despatched for the instant removal of Chrysostom to the extreme desert of Pityus and his guards so faithfully obeyed their cruel instructions that before he reached the sea coast of the Euxine he expired at Comana in Pontus in the sixtieth year of his age The succeeding generation acknowledged his innocence and merit The archbishops of the East who might blush that their predecessors had been the enemies of Chrysostom were gradually disposed by the firmness of the Roman pontiff to restore the honours of that venerable name [56] At the pious solicitation of the clergy and people of Constantinople his relics thirty years after his death were transported from their obscure sepulchre to the royal city [57] The emperor Theodosius advanced to receive them as far as Chalcedon and falling prostrate on the coffin implored in the name of his guilty parents Arcadius and Eudoxia the forgiveness of the injured saint [58]

Yet a reasonable doubt may be entertained whether any stain of hereditary guilt could be derived from Arcadius to his successor Eudoxia was a young and beautiful woman who indulged her passions and despised her husband Count John enjoyed at least the familiar confidence of the empress and the public named him as the real father of Theodosius the younger [59] The birth of a son was accepted however by the pious husband as an event the most fortunate and honourable to himself to his family and to the Eastern world and the royal infant, by an unprecedented favour was invested with the titles of Cæsar and Augustus In less than four years afterwards Eudoxia in the bloom of youth, was destroyed by the consequences of a miscarriage and this untimely death confounded the prophecy of a holy bishop [60] who amidst the universal joy had ventured to foretell that she should behold the long and auspicious reign of her glorious son The catholics applauded the justice of Heaven which avenged the persecution of St. Chrysostom and perhaps the emperor was the only person who sincerely bewailed the loss of the haughty and rapacious Eudoxia. Such a domestic misfortune afflicted him more deeply than the public calamities of the East[61]—the licentious excursions from Pontus to Palestine of the Isaurian robbers whose impunity accused the weakness of the government and the earthquakes the conflagrations the famine, and the flights of locusts,[62] which the popular discontent was equally disposed to attribute to the incapacity of the monarch. At length in the thirty first year of his age after a reign (if we may abuse that word) of thirteen years three months and fifteen days Arcadius expired in the palace of Constantinople. It is impossible to delineate his character since in a period very copiously furnished with historical materials it has not been possible to remark one action that properly belongs to the son of the great Theodosius

The historian Procopius[63] has indeed illuminated the mind of the dying emperor with a ray of human prudence or celestial wisdom. Arcadius considered with anxious foresight, the helpless condition of his son Theodosius, who was no more than seven years of age the dangerous factions of a minority and the aspiring spirit of Jezdegerd the Persian monarch. Instead of tempting the allegiance of an ambitious subject by the participation of supreme power he boldly appealed to the magnanimity of a king and placed by a solemn testament the sceptre of the East in the hands of Jezdegerd himself The royal guardian accepted and discharged this honourable trust with unexampled fidelity and the infancy of Theodosius was protected by the arms and councils of Persia. Such is the singular narrative of Procopius and his veracity is not disputed by Agathias [64] while he presumes to dissent from his judgment and to arraign the wisdom of a Christian emperor who so rashly though so fortunately committed his son and his dominions to the unknown faith of a stranger a rival and a heathen At the distance of one hundred and fifty years this political question might be debated in the court of Justinian but a prudent historian will refuse to examine the propriety till he has ascertained the truth of the testament of Arcadius As it stands without a parallel in the history of the world, we may justly require that it should be attested by the positive and unanimous evidence of contemporaries The strange novelty of the event, which excites our distrust must have attracted their notice and their universal silence annihilates the vain tradition of the succeeding age

The maxims of Roman jurisprudence if they could fairly be transferred from private property to public dominion would have adjudged to the emperor Honorius the guardianship of his nephew till he had attained at least the fourteenth year of his age But the weakness of Honorius and the calamities of his reign disqualified him from prosecuting this natural

claim, and such was the absolute separation of the two monarchies, both in interest and affection, that Constantinople would have obeyed with less reluctance the orders of the Persian, than those of the Italian court Under a prince whose weakness is disguised by the external signs of manhood and discretion, the most worthless favourites may secretly dispute the empire of the palace, and dictate to submissive provinces the commands of a master whom they direct and despise But the ministers of a child, who is incapable of arming them with the sanction of the royal name, must acquire and exercise an independent authority The great officers of the state and army, who had been appointed before the death of Arcadius, formed an aristocracy which might have inspired them with the idea of a free republic, and the government of the Eastern empire was fortunately assumed by the præfect Anthemius,[65] who obtained, by his superior abilities, a lasting ascendant over the minds of his equals The safety of the young emperor proved the merit and integrity of Anthemius, and his prudent firmness sustained the force and reputation of an infant reign Uldin, with a formidable host of barbarians, was encamped in the heart of Thrace, he proudly rejected all terms of accommodation, and, pointing to the rising sun, declared to the Roman ambassadors that the course of that planet should alone terminate the conquests of the Huns But the desertion of his confederates, who were privately convinced of the justice and liberality of the Imperial ministers, obliged Uldin to repass the Danube the tribe of the Scyrri, which composed his rear-guard, was almost extirpated, and many thousand captives were dispersed, to cultivate, with servile labour, the fields of Asia [66] In the midst of the public triumph, Constantinople was protected by a strong enclosure of new and more extensive walls, the same vigilant care was applied to restore the fortifications of the Illyrian cities, and a plan was judiciously conceived, which, in the space of seven years, would have secured the command of the Danube, by establishing on that river a perpetual fleet of two hundred and fifty armed vessels [67]

But the Romans had so long been accustomed to the authority of a monarch, that the first, even among the females of the Imperial family, who displayed any courage or capacity, was permitted to ascend the vacant throne of Theodosius His sister Pulcheria,[68] who was only two years older than himself, received at the age of sixteen the title of Augusta, and though her favour might be sometimes clouded by caprice or intrigue, she continued to govern the Eastern empire near forty years, during the long minority of her brother, and after his death in her own name, and in the name of Marcian, her nominal husband From a motive either of prudence or religion, she embraced a life of celibacy, and notwithstanding some aspersions on the chastity of Pulcheria,[69] this resolution, which she communicated to her sisters Arcadia and Marina, was celebrated by the Christian world as the sublime effort of heroic piety In the presence of the clergy and people the three daughters of Arcadius[70] dedicated their virginity to God, and the obligation of their solemn vow was inscribed on a tablet of gold and gems, which they publicly offered in the great church of Constantinople Their palace was converted into a monastery, and all males—except the guides of their conscience, the saints who had forgotten the distinction of sexes—were scrupulously excluded from the holy threshold Pulcheria, her two sisters, and a chosen train of favourite damsels, formed a religious community they renounced the vanity of dress, interrupted by frequent fasts their simple and frugal diet, allotted a portion of their time to works of embroidery, and devoted several hours of the day and night to the exercises of prayer and psalmody The piety of a Christian virgin was adorned by the zeal and liberality of an empress Ecclesiastical history describes the splendid churches which were built at the expense of Pulcheria in all the provinces of the East, her charitable foundations for the benefit of strangers and the poor, the ample donations which she assigned for the perpetual maintenance of monastic societies, and the active severity with which she laboured to suppress the opposite heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches Such virtues were supposed to deserve the peculiar favour of the Deity and the relics of martyrs, as well as the knowledge of future events, were communicated in visions and revelations to the Imperial saint [71] Yet the devotion of Pulcheria never diverted her indefatigable attention from temporal affairs, and she alone, among all the descendants of the great Theodosius, appears to have inherited any share of his manly spirit and abilities The elegant and familiar use which she had acquired both of the Greek and Latin languages was readily applied to the various occasions of speaking or writing on public business her deliberations were maturely weighed, her actions were prompt and decisive, and while she moved without noise or ostentation the wheel of government she discreetly attributed to the genius of the emperor the long tranquillity of his reign In the last years of his peaceful life Europe was indeed afflicted by the arms of Attila but the more extensive provinces of Asia still continued to enjoy a profound and permanent repose. Theodosius the younger was never reduced to the disgraceful necessity of encountering and punishing a rebellious subject and since we cannot applaud the vigour, some praise may be due to the mildness and prosperity, of the administration of Pulcheria

The Roman world was deeply interested in the education of its master A regular course of study and exercise was judiciously instituted of the military exercises of riding and shooting with the bow of the liberal studies of grammar rhetoric and philosophy the most skilful masters of the East ambitiously solicited the attention of their royal pupil and several noble youths were introduced into the palace to animate his diligence by the emulation of friendship Pulcheria alone discharged the important task of instructing her brother in the arts of government but her precepts may countenance some suspicion of the extent of her capacity or of the purity of her intentions She taught him to maintain a grave and majestic deportment to walk to hold his robes, to seat himself on his throne in a manner worthy of a great prince to abstain from laughter to listen with condescension to return suitable answers to assume by turns a serious or a placid countenance in a word to represent with grace and dignity the external figure of a Roman emperor But Theodosius[72] was never excited to support the weight and glory of an illustrious name and instead of aspiring to imitate his ancestors he degenerated (if we may presume to measure the degrees of incapacity) below the weakness of his father and his uncle Arcadius and Honorius had been assisted by the guardian care of a parent whose lessons were enforced by his authority and example But the unfortunate prince who is born in the purple must remain a stranger to the voice of truth and the son of Arcadius was condemned to pass his perpetual infancy encompassed only by a servile train of women and eunuchs The ample leisure which he acquired by neglecting the essential duties of his high office was filled by idle amusements and unprofitable studies. Hunting was the only active pursuit that could tempt him beyond the limits of the palace but he most assiduously laboured sometimes by the light of a midnight lamp in the mechanic occupations of painting and carving and the elegance with which he transcribed religious books entitled the Roman emperor to the singular epithet of Calligraphes or a fair writer Separated from the world by an impenetrable veil Theodosius trusted the persons whom he loved he loved those who were accustomed to amuse and flatter his indolence and as he never perused the papers that were presented for the royal signature, the acts of injustice the most repugnant to his character were frequently perpetrated in his name The emperor himself was chaste, temperate, liberal, and merciful but these qualities—which can only deserve the name of virtues when they are supported by courage and regulated by discretion—were seldom beneficial and they sometimes proved mischievous to mankind. His mind enervated by a royal education was oppressed and degraded by abject superstition he fasted he sung psalms he blindly accepted the miracles and doctrines with which his faith was continually nourished Theodosius devoutly worshipped the dead and living saints of the catholic church and he once refused to eat till an insolent monk who had cast an excommunication on his sovereign condescended to heal the spiritual wound which he had inflicted.[73]

The story of a fair and virtuous maiden exalted from a private condition to the Imperial throne might be deemed an incredible romance if such a romance had not been verified in the marriage of Theodosius The celebrated Athenais[74] was educated by her father Leontius in the religion and sciences of the Greeks and so advantageous was the opinion which the Athenian philosopher entertained of his contemporaries that he divided his patrimony between his two sons bequeathing to his daughter a small legacy of one hundred pieces of gold, in the lively confidence that her beauty and merit would be a sufficient portion The jealousy and avarice of her brothers soon compelled Athenais to seek a refuge at Constantinople and with some hopes either of justice or favour to throw herself at the feet of Pulcheria. That sagacious princess listened to her eloquent complaint, and secretly destined the daughter of the philosopher Leontius for the future wife of the emperor of the East, who had now attained the twentieth year of his age She easily excited the curiosity of her brother by an interesting picture of the charms of Athenais large eyes a well-proportioned nose a fair complexion golden locks, a slender person a graceful demeanour an understanding improved by study, and a virtue tried by distress Theodosius concealed behind a curtain in the apartment of his sister, was permitted to behold the Athenian virgin the modest youth immediately declared his pure and honourable love, and the royal nuptials were celebrated amidst the acclamations of the capital and the provinces Athenais, who was easily persuaded to renounce the errors of Paganism, received at her baptism the Christian name of Eudocia but the cautious Pulcheria withheld the title of Augusta till the wife of Theodosius had approved her fruitfulness by the birth of a daughter, who espoused fifteen years afterwards the emperor of the West The brothers of Eudocia obeyed, with some anxiety, her Imperial summons, but as she could easily forgive their fortunate unkindness, she indulged the tenderness, or perhaps the vanity, of a sister, by promoting them to the rank of consuls and præfects In the luxury of the palace she still cultivated those ingenuous arts which had contributed to her greatness, and wisely dedicated her talents to the honour of religion and of her husband Eudocia composed a poetical paraphrase of the first eight books of the Old Testament and of the prophecies of Daniel and Zechariah, a cento of the verses of Homer, applied to the life and miracles of Christ, the legend of St Cyprian, and a panegyric on the Persian victories of Theodosius, and her writings, which were applauded by a servile and superstitious age, have not been disdained by the candour of impartial criticism [75] The fondness of the emperor was not abated by time and possession, and Eudocia, after the marriage of her daughter, was permitted to discharge her grateful vows by a solemn pilgrimage to Jerusalem Her ostentatious progress through the East may seem inconsistent with the spirit of Christian humility she pronounced from a throne of gold and gems an eloquent oration to the senate of Antioch, declared her royal intention of enlarging the walls of the city, bestowed a donative of two hundred pounds of gold to restore the public baths, and accepted the statues which were decreed by the gratitude of Antioch In the Holy Land her alms and pious foundations exceeded the munificence of the great Helena, and though the public treasure might be impoverished by this excessive liberality, she enjoyed the conscious satisfaction of returning to Constantinople with the chains of St Peter, the right arm of St Stephen, and the undoubted picture of the Virgin, painted by St Luke [76] But this pilgrimage was the fatal term of the glories of Eudocia Satiated with empty pomp, and unmindful perhaps of her obligations to Pulcheria, she ambitiously aspired to the government of the Eastern empire the palace was distracted by female discord, but the victory was at last decided by the superior ascendant of the sister of Theodosius The execution of Paulinus, master of the offices, and the disgrace of Cyrus, Prætorian præfect of the East, convinced the public that the favour of Eudocia was insufficient to protect her most faithful friends, and the uncommon beauty of Paulinus encouraged the secret rumour that his guilt was that of a successful lover [77] As soon as the empress perceived that the affection of Theodosius was irretrievably lost, she requested the permission of retiring to the distant solitude of Jerusalem She obtained her request, but the jealousy of Theodosius, or the vindictive spirit of Pulcheria, pursued her in her last retreat, and Saturninus, count of the domestics, was directed to punish with death two ecclesiastics, her most favoured servants Eudocia instantly revenged them by the assassination of the count the furious passions which she indulged on this suspicious occasion seemed to justify the severity of Theodosius, and the empress, ignominiously stripped of the honours of her rank,[78] was disgraced, perhaps unjustly, in the eyes of the world The remainder of the life of Eudocia, about sixteen years, was spent in exile and devotion, and the approach of age, the death of Theodosius, the misfortunes of her only daughter, who was led a captive from Rome to Carthage, and the society of the Holy Monks of Palestine, insensibly confirmed the religious temper of her mind After a full experience of the vicissitudes of human life, the daughter of the philosopher Leontius expired at Jerusalem, in the sixty-seventh year of her age, protesting with her dying breath that she had never transgressed the bounds of innocence and friendship [79]

The gentle mind of Theodosius was never inflamed by the ambition of conquest or military renown, and the slight alarm of a Persian war scarcely interrupted the tranquillity of the East The motives of this war were just and honourable In the last year of the reign of Jezdegerd, the supposed guardian of Theodosius a bishop, who aspired to the crown of martyrdom, destroyed one of the fire temples of Susa [80] His zeal and obstinacy were revenged on his brethren the Magi excited a cruel persecution, and the intolerant zeal of Jezdegerd was imitated by his son Varanes, or Bahram, who soon afterwards ascended the throne. Some Christian fugitives, who escaped to the Roman frontier, were sternly demanded, and generously refused and the refusal aggravated by commercial disputes, soon kindled a war between the rival monarchies The mountains of Armenia and the plains of Mesopotamia were filled with hostile armies but the operations of two successive campaigns were not productive of any decisive or memorable events Some engagements were fought some towns were besieged with various and doubtful success and if the Romans failed in their attempt to recover the long lost possession of Nisibis the Persians were repulsed from the walls of a Mesopotamian city by the valour of a martial bishop who pointed his thundering engine in the name of St Thomas the Apostle Yet the splendid victories which the incredible speed of the messenger Palladius repeatedly announced to the palace of Constantinople were celebrated with festivals and panegyrics From these panegyrics the historians[81] of the age might borrow their extraordinary and perhaps fabulous tales of the proud challenge of a Persian hero who was entangled by the net and despatched by the sword of Areobindus the Goth of the ten thousand Immortals who were slain in the attack of the Roman camp and of the hundred thousand Arabs or Saracens who were impelled by a panic terror to throw themselves headlong into the Euphrates Such events may be disbelieved or disregarded but the charity of a bishop Acacius of Amida whose name might have dignified the saintly calendar shall not be lost in oblivion Boldly declaring that vases of gold and silver are useless to a God who neither eats nor drinks the generous prelate sold the plate of the church of Amida employed the price in the redemption of seven thousand Persian captives supplied their wants with affectionate liberality and dismissed them to their native country to inform their king of the true spirit of the religion which he persecuted The practice of benevolence in the midst of war must always tend to assuage the animosity of contending nations and I wish to persuade myself that Acacius contributed to the restoration of peace In the conference which was held on the limits of the two empires the Roman ambassadors degraded the personal character of their sovereign by a vain attempt to magnify the extent of his power when they seriously advised the Persians to prevent by a timely accommodation the wrath of a monarch who was yet ignorant of this distant war A truce of one hundred years was solemnly ratified and although the revolutions of Armenia might threaten the public tranquillity the essential conditions of this treaty were respected near fourscore years by the successors of Constantine and Artaxerxes

Since the Roman and Parthian standards first encountered on the banks of the Euphrates, the kingdom of Armenia[82] was alternately oppressed by its formidable protectors and in the course of this History several events, which inclined the balance of peace and war have been already related A disgraceful treaty had resigned Armenia to the ambition of Sapor and the scale of Persia appeared to preponderate. But the royal race of Arsaces impatiently submitted to the house of Sassan the turbulent nobles asserted or betrayed their hereditary independence and the nation was still attached to the Christian princes of Constantinople In the beginning of the fifth century Armenia was divided by the progress of war and faction[83] and the unnatural division precipitated the downfall of that ancient monarchy Chosroes, the Persian vassal reigned over the eastern and most extensive portion of the country while the western province acknowledged the jurisdiction of Arsaces and the supremacy of the emperor Arcadius After the death of Arsaces the Romans suppressed the regal government and imposed on their allies the condition of subjects The military command was delegated to the count of the Armenian frontier the city of Theodosiopolis[84] was built and fortified in a strong situation on a fertile and lofty ground, near the sources of the Euphrates and the dependent territories were ruled by five satraps, whose dignity was marked by a peculiar habit of gold and purple The less fortunate nobles, who lamented the loss of their king and envied the honours of their equals were provoked to negotiate their peace and pardon at the Persian court and returning with their followers to the palace of Artaxata acknowledged Chosroes for their lawful sovereign About thirty years afterwards Artasires the nephew and successor of Chosroes fell under the displeasure of the haughty and capricious nobles of Armenia and they unanimously desired a Persian governor in the room of an unworthy king The answer of the archbishop Isaac whose sanction they earnestly solicited is expressive of the character of a superstitious people He deplored the manifest and inexcusable vices of Artasires and declared that he should not hesitate to accuse him before the tribunal of a Christian emperor who would punish without destroying the sinner

lover of women, but he does not adore the fire or the elements He may deserve the reproach of lewdness, but he is an undoubted catholic, and his faith is pure, though his manners are flagitious I will never consent to abandon my sheep to the rage of devouring wolves, and you would soon repent your rash exchange of the infirmities of a believer, for the specious virtues of an heathen"[85] Exasperated by the firmness of Isaac, the factious nobles accused both the king and the archbishop as the secret adherents of the emperor, and absurdly rejoiced in the sentence of condemnation, which, after a partial hearing, was solemnly pronounced by Bahram himself The descendants of Arsaces were degraded from the royal dignity,[86] which they had possessed above five hundred and sixty years,[87] and the dominions of the unfortunate Artasires, under the new and significant appellation of Persarmenia, were reduced into the form of a province This usurpation excited the jealousy of the Roman government, but the rising disputes were soon terminated by an amicable, though unequal, partition of the ancient kingdom of Armenia, and a territorial acquisition, which Augustus might have despised, reflected some lustre on the declining empire of the younger Theodosius

Death of Honorius Valentinian III Emperor of the West Administration of his Mother Placidia Aetius and Boniface Conquest of Africa by the Vandals

During a long and disgraceful reign of twenty-eight years, Honorius, emperor of the West, was separated from the friendship of his brother, and afterwards of his nephew, who reigned over the East, and Constantinople beheld, with apparent indifference and secret joy, the calamities of Rome The strange adventures of Placidia gradually renewed and cemented the alliance of the two empires The daughter of the great Theodosius had been the captive and the queen of the Goths, she lost an affectionate husband, she was dragged in chains by his insulting assassin, she tasted the pleasure of revenge, and was exchanged, in the treaty of peace, for six hundred thousand measures of wheat After her return from Spain to Italy, Placidia experienced a new persecution in the bosom of her family She was averse to a marriage which had been stipulated without her consent, and the brave Constantius, as a noble reward for the tyrants whom he had vanquished, received, from the hand of Honorius himself, the struggling and reluctant hand of the widow of Adolphus But her resistance ended with the ceremony of the nuptials, nor did Placidia refuse to become the mother of Honoria and Valentinian the Third, or to assume and exercise an absolute dominion over the mind of her grateful husband The generous soldier, whose time had hitherto been divided between social pleasure and military service, was taught new lessons of avarice and ambition he extorted the title of Augustus, and the servant of Honorius was associated to the empire of the West. The death of Constantius, in the seventh month of his reign, instead of diminishing, seemed to increase, the power of Placidia, and the indecent familiarity[1] of her brother, which might be no more than the symptoms of a childish affection, were universally attributed to incestuous love On a sudden, by some base intrigues of a steward and a nurse, this excessive fondness was converted into an irreconcilable quarrel the debates of the emperor and his sister were not long confined within the walls of the palace, and as the Gothic soldiers adhered to their queen, the city of Ravenna was agitated with bloody and dangerous tumults, which could only be appeased by the forced or voluntary retreat of Placidia and her children The royal exiles landed at Constantinople, soon after the marriage of Theodosius, during the festival of the Persian victories They were treated with kindness and magnificence, but as the statues of the emperor Constantius had been rejected by the Eastern court, the title of Augusta could not decently be allowed to his widow Within a few months after the arrival of Placidia a swift messenger announced the death of Honorius, the consequence of a dropsy, but the important secret was not divulged till the necessary orders had been despatched for the march of a large body of troops to the sea-coast of Dalmatia The shops and the gates of Constantinople remained shut during seven days, and the loss of a foreign prince, who could neither be esteemed nor regretted, was celebrated with loud and affected demonstrations of the public grief

While the ministers of Constantinople deliberated the vacant throne of Honorius was usurped by the ambition of a stranger The name of the rebel was John he filled the confidential office of Primicerius or principal secretary and history has attributed to his character more virtues than can easily be reconciled with the violation of the most sacred duty Elated by the submission of Italy and the hope of an alliance with the Huns John presumed to insult by an embassy the majesty of the Eastern emperor but when he understood that his agents had been banished imprisoned and at length chased away with deserved ignominy John prepared to assert by arms the injustice of his claims In such a cause the grandson of the great Theodosius should have marched in person but the young emperor was easily diverted by his physicians from so rash and hazardous a design and the conduct of the Italian expedition was prudently intrusted to Ardaburius and his son Aspar who had already signalised their valour against the Persians It was resolved that Ardaburius should embark with the infantry whilst Aspar at the head of the cavalry conducted Placidia and her son Valentinian along the sea-coast of the Hadriatic The march of the cavalry was performed with such active diligence that they surprised without resistance the important city of Aquileia when the hopes of Aspar were unexpectedly confounded by the intelligence that a storm had dispersed the Imperial fleet and that his father with only two galleys was taken and carried a prisoner into the port of Ravenna Yet this incident unfortunate as it might seem facilitated the conquest of Italy Ardaburius employed or abused the courteous freedom which he was permitted to enjoy to revive among the troops a sense of loyalty and gratitude and as soon as the conspiracy was ripe for execution he invited by private messages and pressed the approach of Aspar A shepherd whom the popular credulity transformed into an angel guided the Eastern cavalry by a secret and it was thought an impassable road through the morasses of the Po the gates of Ravenna after a short struggle were thrown open and the defenceless tyrant was delivered to the mercy or rather to the cruelty of the conquerors His right hand was first cut off and after he had been exposed mounted on an ass, to the public derision John was beheaded in the circus of Aquileia The emperor Theodosius when he received the news of the victory interrupted the horse races and singing as he marched through the streets, a suitable psalm conducted his people from the Hippodrome to the church, where he spent the remainder of the day in grateful devotion [3]

In a monarchy which according to various precedents might be considered as elective or hereditary or patrimonial it was impossible that the intricate claims of female and collateral succession should be clearly defined [4] and Theodosius by the right of consanguinity or conquest might have reigned the sole legitimate emperor of the Romans For a moment, perhaps his eyes were dazzled by the prospect of unbounded sway but his indolent temper gradually acquiesced in the dictates of sound policy He contented himself with the possession of the East and wisely relinquished the laborious task of waging a distant and doubtful war against the barbarians beyond the Alps or of securing the obedience of the Italians and Africans whose minds were alienated by the irreconcilable difference of language and interest Instead of listening to the voice of ambition, Theodosius resolved to imitate the moderation of his grandfather and to seat his cousin Valentinian on the throne of the West The royal infant was distinguished at Constantinople by the title of Nobilissimus he was promoted before his departure from Thessalonica to the rank and dignity of Cæsar and after the conquest of Italy the patrician Helion by the authority of Theodosius and in the presence of the senate saluted Valentinian the Third by the name of Augustus and solemnly invested him with the diadem and the Imperial purple [5] By the agreement of the three females who governed the Roman world the son of Placidia was betrothed to Eudoxia the daughter of Theodosius and Athenais and as soon as the lover and his bride had attained the age of puberty this honourable alliance was faithfully accomplished At the same time as a compensation perhaps for the expenses of the war the Western Illyricum was detached from the Italian dominions and yielded to the throne of Constantinople [6] The emperor of the East acquired the useful dominion of the rich and maritime province of Dalmatia and the dangerous sovereignty of Pannonia and Noricum, which had been filled and ravaged above twenty years by a promiscuous crowd of Huns Ostrogoths, Vandals and Bavarians Theodosius and Valentinian continued to respect the obligations of their public and domestic alliance but the unity of the Roman government was finally dissolved By a positive declaration, the validity of all future laws was limited to the dominions of their peculiar author, unless he should think proper to communicate them, subscribed with his own hand, for the approbation of his independent colleague [6]

Valentinian, when he received the title of Augustus, was no more than six years of age, and his long minority was intrusted to the guardian care of a mother who might assert a female claim to the succession of the Western empire Placidia envied, but she could not equal, the reputation and virtues of the wife and sister of Theodosius; the elegant genius of Eudocia, the wise and successful policy of Pulcheria The mother of Valentinian was jealous of the power which she was incapable of exercising [7] she reigned twenty-five years, in the name of her son, and the character of that unworthy emperor gradually countenanced the suspicion that Placidia had enervated his youth by a dissolute education, and studiously diverted his attention from every manly and honourable pursuit Amidst the decay of military spirit, her armies were commanded by two generals, Aëtius[8] and Boniface,[9] who may be deservedly named as the last of the Romans Their union might have supported a sinking empire, their discord was the fatal and immediate cause of the loss of Africa The invasion and defeat of Attila has immortalised the fame of Aetius, and though time has thrown a shade over the exploits of his rival, the defence of Marseilles, and the deliverance of Africa, attest the military talents of Count Boniface In the field of battle, in partial encounters, in single combats, he was still the terror of the barbarians the clergy, and particularly his friend Augustin, were edified by the Christian piety which had once tempted him to retire from the world, the people applauded his spotless integrity, the army dreaded his equal and inexorable justice, which may be displayed in a very singular example A peasant, who complained of the criminal intimacy between his wife and a Gothic soldier, was directed to attend his tribunal the following day in the evening the count, who had diligently informed himself of the time and place of the assignation, mounted his horse, rode ten miles into the country, surprised the guilty couple, punished the soldier with instant death, and silenced the complaints of the husband, by presenting him, the next morning, with the head of the adulterer The abilities of Aëtius and Boniface might have been usefully employed against the public enemies in separate and important commands, but the experience of their past conduct should have decided the real favour and confidence of the empress Placidia In the melancholy season of her exile and distress, Boniface alone had maintained her cause with unshaken fidelity, and the troops and treasures of Africa had essentially contributed to extinguish the rebellion The same rebellion had been supported by the zeal and activity of Aetius, who brought an army of sixty thousand Huns from the Danube to the confines of Italy, for the service of the usurper The untimely death of John compelled him to accept an advantageous treaty, but he still continued, the subject and the soldier of Valentinian, to entertain a secret, perhaps a treasonable, correspondence with his barbarian allies, whose retreat had been purchased by liberal gifts and more liberal promises But Aëtius possessed an advantage of singular moment in a female reign he was present he besieged with artful and assiduous flattery the palace of Ravenna, disguised his dark designs with the mask of loyalty and friendship, and at length deceived both his mistress and his absent rival, by a subtle conspiracy which a weak woman and a brave man could not easily suspect He secretly persuaded [10] Placidia to recall Boniface from the government of Africa, he secretly advised Boniface to disobey the Imperial summons to the one, he represented the order as a sentence of death, to the other, he stated the refusal as a signal of revolt, and when the credulous and unsuspectful count had armed the province in his defence, Aëtius applauded his sagacity in foreseeing the rebellion which his own perfidy had excited A temperate inquiry into the real motives of Boniface would have restored a faithful servant to his duty and to the republic, but the arts of Aëtius still continued to betray and to inflame, and the count was urged by persecution to embrace the most desperate counsels The success with which he eluded or repelled the first attacks could not inspire a vain confidence that, at the head of some loose disorderly Africans, he should be able to withstand the regular forces of the West, commanded by a rival whose military character it was impossible for him to despise. After some hesitation, the last struggles of prudence and loyalty, Boniface despatched a trusty friend to the court, or rather to the camp, of Gonderic, king of the Vandals, with the proposal of a strict alliance, and the offer of an advantageous and perpetual settlement.

Honorius had obtained a precarious establishment in Spain except only in the province of Gallicia where the Suevi and the Vandals had fortified their camps in mutual discord and hostile independence The Vandals prevailed and their adversaries were besieged in the Nervasian hills between Leon and Oviedo till the approach of Count Asterius compelled or rather provoked the victorious barbarians to remove the scene of the war to the plains of Bætica The rapid progress of the Vandals soon required a more effectual opposition and the master general Castinus marched against them with a numerous army of Romans and Goths Vanquished in battle by an inferior enemy Castinus fled with dishonour to Tarragona and this memorable defeat, which has been represented as the punishment was most probably the effect of his rash presumption [11] Seville and Carthagena became the reward or rather the prey of the ferocious conquerors and the vessels which they found in the harbour of Carthagena might easily transport them to the isles of Majorca and Minorca where the Spanish fugitives as in a secure recess had vainly concealed their families and their fortunes The experience of navigation and perhaps the prospect of Africa encouraged the Vandals to accept the invitation which they received from Count Boniface and the death of Gonderic served only to forward and animate the bold enterprise In the room of a prince not conspicuous for any superior powers of the mind or body they acquired his bastard brother the terrible Genseric [12] a name which in the destruction of the Roman empire has reserved an equal rank with the names of Alaric and Attila The king of the Vandals is described to have been of a middle stature with a lameness in one leg which he had contracted by an accidental fall from his horse His slow and cautious speech seldom declared the deep purposes of his soul he disdained to imitate the luxury of the vanquished but he indulged the sterner passions of anger and revenge The ambition of Genseric was without bounds and without scruples and the warrior could dexterously employ the dark engines of policy to solicit the allies who might be useful to his success or to scatter among his enemies the seeds of hatred and contention Almost in the moment of his departure he was informed that Hermanric king of the Suevi had presumed to ravage the Spanish territories which he was resolved to abandon Impatient of the insult Genseric pursued the hasty retreat of the Suevi as far as Merida precipitated the king and his army into the river Anas, and calmly returned to the sea shore to embark his victorious troops The vessels which transported the Vandals over the modern Straits of Gibralter a channel only twelve miles in breadth were furnished by the Spaniards, who anxiously wished their departure and by the African general who had implored their formidable assistance [13]

Our fancy so long accustomed to exaggerate and multiply the martial swarms of barbarians that seemed to issue from the North will perhaps be surprised by the account of the army which Genseric mustered on the coast of Mauritania The Vandals who in twenty years had penetrated from the Elbe to Mount Atlas were united under the command of their warlike king and he reigned with equal authority over the Alani who had passed within the term of human life from the cold of Scythia to the excessive heat of an African climate The hopes of the bold enterprise had excited many brave adventurers of the Gothic nation and many desperate provincials were tempted to repair their fortunes by the same means which had occasioned their ruin. Yet this various multitude amounted only to fifty thousand effective men and though Genseric artfully magnified his apparent strength by appointing eighty chiliarchs or commanders of thousands, the fallacious increase of old men of children and of slaves would scarcely have swelled his army to the number of fourscore thousand persons.[14] But his own dexterity and the discontents of Africa soon fortified the Vandal powers by the accession of numerous and active allies The parts of Mauritania which border on the great desert and the Atlantic ocean were filled with a fierce and untractable race of men whose savage temper had been exasperated rather than reclaimed by their dread of the Roman arms The wandering Moors [15] as they gradually ventured to approach the sea shore and the camp of the Vandals must have viewed with terror and astonishment the dress the armour the martial pride and discipline of the unknown strangers who had landed on their coast and the fair complexions of the blue-eyed warriors of Germany formed a very singular contrast with the swarthy or olive hue which is derived from the neighbourhood of the torrid zone After the first difficulties had in some measure been removed which arose from the mutual ignorance of their respective language the Moors, regardless of any future consequence embraced the alliance of the enemies of Rome and a crowd of naked savages rushed from the woods and valleys of Mount Atlas, to satiate their revenge on the polished tyrants who had injuriously expelled them from the native sovereignty of the land

The persecution of the Donatists[16] was an event not less favourable to the designs of Genseric Seventeen years before he landed in Africa, a public conference was held at Carthage by the order of the magistrate The catholics were satisfied that, after the invincible reasons which they had alleged, the obstinacy of the schismatics must be inexcusable and voluntary, and the emperor Honorius was persuaded to inflict the most rigorous penalties on a faction which had so long abused his patience and clemency Three hundred bishops,[17] with many thousands of the inferior clergy, were torn from their churches, stripped of their ecclesiastical possessions, banished to the islands, and proscribed by the laws, if they presumed to conceal themselves in the provinces of Africa Their numerous congregations, both in cities and in the country, were deprived of the rights of citizens and of the exercise of religious worship A regular scale of fines, from ten to two hundred pounds of silver, was curiously ascertained, according to the distinctions of rank and fortune, to punish the crime of assisting at a schismatic conventicle, and if the fine had been levied five times without subduing the obstinacy of the offender, his future punishment was referred to the discretion of the Imperial court[18] By these severities, which obtained the warmest approbation of St Augustin,[19] great numbers of Donatists were reconciled to the Catholic church, but the fanatics who still persevered in their opposition were provoked to madness and despair, the distracted country was filled with tumult and bloodshed, the armed troops of Circumcellions alternately pointed their rage against themselves or against their adversaries, and the calendar of martyrs received on both sides a considerable augmentation[20] Under these circumstances Genseric, a Christian, but an enemy of the orthodox communion, showed himself to the Donatists as a powerful deliverer, from whom they might reasonably expect the repeal of the odious and oppressive edicts of the Roman emperors[21] The conquest of Africa was facilitated by the active zeal or the secret favour of a domestic faction, the wanton outrages against the churches and the clergy, of which the Vandals are accused, may be fairly imputed to the fanaticism of their allies, and the intolerant spirit which disgraced the triumph of Christianity contributed to the loss of the most important province of the West[22]

The court and the people were astonished by the strange intelligence that a virtuous hero, after so many favours and so many services, had renounced his allegiance and invited the barbarians to destroy the province entrusted to his command The friends of Boniface, who still believed that his criminal behaviour might be excused by some honourable motive, solicited, during the absence of Aëtius, a free conference with the Count of Africa, and Darius, an officer of high distinction, was named for the important embassy[23] In their first interview at Carthage the imaginary provocations were mutually explained, the opposite letters of Aëtius were produced and compared, and the fraud was easily detected Placidia and Boniface lamented their fatal error, and the count had sufficient magnanimity to confide in the forgiveness of his sovereign, or to expose his head to her future resentment His repentance was fervent and sincere, but he soon discovered that it was no longer in his power to restore the edifice which he had shaken to its foundations Carthage and the Roman garrisons returned with their general to the allegiance of Valentinian, but the rest of Africa was still distracted with war and faction, and the inexorable king of the Vandals, disdaining all terms of accommodation, sternly refused to relinquish the possession of his prey The band of veterans who marched under the standard of Boniface, and his hasty levies of provincial troops, were defeated with considerable loss, the victorious barbarians insulted the open country, and Carthage, Cirta, and Hippo Regius, were the only cities that appeared to rise above the general inundation

The long and narrow tract of the African coast was filled with frequent monuments of Roman art and magnificence, and the respective degrees of improvement might be accurately measured by the distance from Carthage and the Mediterranean A simple reflection will impress every thinking mind with the clearest idea of fertility and cultivation the country was extremely populous, the inhabitants reserved a liberal subsistence for their own use, and the annual exportation, particularly of wheat, was so regular and plentiful, that Africa deserved the name of the common granary of Rome and of mankind On a sudden the seven fruitful provinces, from Tangier to Tripoli, were overwhelmed by the invasion of the Vandals, whose destructive rage has perhaps been exaggerated

by popular animosity religious zeal and extravagant declamation War in its fairest form implies a perpetual violation of humanity and justice and the hostilities of barbarians are inflamed by the fierce and lawless spirit which incessantly disturbs their peaceful and domestic society The Vandals where they found resistance seldom gave quarter and the deaths of the valiant countrymen were expiated by the ruin of the cities under whose walls they had fallen Careless of the distinction of age or sex or rank they employed every species of indignity and torture to force from the captives a discovery of their hidden wealth. The stern policy of Genseric justified his frequent examples of military execution he was not always the master of his own passions or of those of his followers and the calamities of war were aggravated by the licentiousness of the Moors and the fanaticism of the Donatists Yet I shall not easily be persuaded that it was the common practice of the Vandals to extirpate the olives and other fruit trees of a country where they intended to settle nor can I believe that it was a usual stratagem to slaughter great numbers of their prisoners before the walls of a besieged city for the sole purpose of infecting the air and producing a pestilence of which they themselves must have been the first victims [24]

The generous mind of Count Boniface was tortured by the exquisite distress of beholding the ruin which he had occasioned and whose rapid progress he was unable to check After the loss of a battle he retired to Hippo Regius, where he was immediately besieged by an enemy who considered him as the real bulwark of Africa The maritime colony of Hippo [25] about two hundred miles westward of Carthage had formerly acquired the distinguishing epithet of Regius from the residence of Numidian kings and some remains of trade and populousness still adhere to the modern city which is known in Europe by the corrupted name of Bona. The military labours and anxious reflections of Count Boniface were alleviated by the edifying conversation of his friend St Augustin [26] till that bishop the light and pillar of the Catholic church was gently released in the third month of the siege and in the seventy-sixth year of his age from the actual and the impending calamities of his country The youth of Augustin had been stained by the vices and errors which he so ingenuously confesses but from the moment of his conversion to that of his death the manners of the bishop of Hippo were pure and austere and the most conspicuous of his virtues was an ardent zeal against heretics of every denomination—the Manichæans the Donatists and the Pelagians, against whom he waged a perpetual controversy When the city some months after his death, was burnt by the Vandals the library was fortunately saved which contained his voluminous writings—two hundred and thirty two separate books or treatises on theological subjects, besides a complete exposition of the psalter and the gospel and a copious magazine of epistles and homilies [27] According to the judgment of the most impartial critics the superficial learning of Augustin was confined to the Latin language [28] and his style though sometimes animated by the eloquence of passion is usually clouded by false and affected rhetoric. But he possessed a strong capacious argumentative mind he boldly sounded the dark abyss of grace predestination free will and original sin and the rigid system of Christianity which he framed or restored [29] has been entertained with public applause and secret reluctance by the Latin church [30]

By the skill of Boniface and perhaps by the ignorance of the Vandals the siege of Hippo was protracted above fourteen months the sea was continually open and when the adjacent country had been exhausted by irregular rapine the besiegers themselves were compelled by famine to relinquish their enterprise The importance and danger of Africa were deeply felt by the regent of the West Placidia implored the assistance of her Eastern ally, and the Italian fleet and arms were reinforced by Aspar who sailed from Constantinople with a powerful armament As soon as the force of the two empires was united under the command of Boniface he boldly marched against the Vandals and the loss of a second battle irretrievably decided the fate of Africa He embarked with the precipitation of despair and the people of Hippo were permitted with their families and effects to occupy the vacant place of the soldiers the greatest part of whom were either slain or made prisoners by the Vandals. The count, whose fatal credulity had wounded the vitals of the republic, might enter the palace of Ravenna with some anxiety which was soon removed by the smiles of Placidia Boniface accepted with gratitude the rank of patrician and the dignity of master-general of the Roman armies but he must have blushed at the sight of those medals in which he was represented with the name and attributes of victory [31] The discovery of his fraud the despair sure of the empress, and the distinguished favour of his rival, exasperated the haughty and perfidious soul of Aëtius He hastily returned from Gaul to Italy, with a retinue, or rather with an army, of barbarian followers, and such was the weakness of the government, that the two generals decided their private quarrel in a bloody battle Boniface was successful, but he received in the conflict a mortal wound from the spear of his adversary, of which he expired within a few days, in such Christian and charitable sentiments that he exhorted his wife, a rich heiress of Spain, to accept Aetius for her second husband But Aëtius could not derive any immediate advantage from the generosity of his dying enemy he was proclaimed a rebel by the justice of Placidia, and though he attempted to defend some strong fortresses, erected on his patrimonial estate, the Imperial power soon compelled him to retire into Pannonia, to the tents of his faithful Huns The republic was deprived by their mutual discord of the service of her two most illustrious champions [32]

It might naturally be expected, after the retreat of Boniface, that the Vandals would achieve without resistance or delay the conquest of Africa Eight years however elapsed from the evacuation of Hippo to the reduction of Carthage In the midst of that interval the ambitious Genseric, in the full tide of apparent prosperity, negotiated a treaty of peace, by which he gave his son Hunneric for an hostage, and consented to leave the Western emperor in the undisturbed possession of the three Mauritanias [33] This moderation, which cannot be imputed to the justice, must be ascribed to the policy, of the conqueror His throne was encompassed with domestic enemies, who accused the baseness of his birth, and asserted the legitimate claims of his nephews, the sons of Gonderic Those nephews, indeed, he sacrificed to his safety, and their mother, the widow of the deceased king, was precipitated by his order into the river Ampsaga But the public discontent burst forth in dangerous and frequent conspiracies, and the warlike tyrant is supposed to have shed more Vandal blood by the hand of the executioner than in the field of battle [34] The convulsions of Africa, which had favoured his attack, opposed the firm establishment of his power, and the various seditions of the Moors and Germans, the Donatists and catholics, continually disturbed or threatened the unsettled reign of the conqueror As he advanced towards Carthage he was forced to withdraw his troops from the Western provinces, the seacoast was exposed to the naval enterprises of the Romans of Spain and Italy, and, in the heart of Numidia, the strong inland city of Cirta still persisted in obstinate independence [35] These difficulties were gradually subdued by the spirit, the perseverance, and the cruelty of Genseric, who alternately applied the arts of peace and war to the establishment of his African kingdom He subscribed a solemn treaty, with the hope of deriving some advantage from the term of its continuance and the moment of its violation The vigilance of his enemies was relaxed by the protestations of friendship which concealed his hostile approach, and Carthage was at length surprised by the Vandals, five hundred and eighty-five years after the destruction of the city and republic by the younger Scipio [36]

A new city had arisen from its ruins, with the title of a colony, and though Carthage might yield to the royal prerogatives of Constantinople, and perhaps to the trade of Alexandria, or the splendour of Antioch, she still maintained the second rank in the West, as the Rome (if we may use the style of contemporaries) of the African world. That wealthy and opulent metropolis[37] displayed, in a dependent condition, the image of a flourishing republic. Carthage contained the manufactures, the arms, and the treasures of the six provinces A regular subordination of civil honours gradually ascended from the procurators of the streets and quarters of the city to the tribunal of the supreme magistrate, who, with the title of proconsul, represented the state and dignity of a consul of ancient Rome Schools and gymnasia were instituted for the education of the African youth, and the liberal arts and manners, grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy, were publicly taught in the Greek and Latin languages The buildings of Carthage were uniform and magnificent a shady grove was planted in the midst of the capital, the new port, a secure and capacious harbour, was subservient to the commercial industry of citizens and strangers, and the splendid games of the circus and theatre were exhibited almost in the presence of the barbarians The reputation of the Carthaginians was not equal to that of their country, and the reproach of Punic faith still adhered to their subtle and faithless character [38] The habits of trade and the abuse of luxury had corrupted their manners, but their impious contempt of monks and the shameless practice of unnatural lusts are the two abominations which excite the pious vehemence of Salvian the preacher of the age [39] The king of the Vandals severely re formed the vices of a voluptuous people and the ancient noble ingenuous freedom of Car thage (these expressions of Victor are not with out energy) was reduced by Genseric into a state of ignominious servitude After he had permitted his licentious troops to satiate their rage and avarice he instituted a more regular system of rapine and oppression An edict was promulgated which enjoined all persons with out fraud or delay to deliver their gold silver, jewels and valuable furniture or apparel to the royal officers and the attempt to secrete any part of their patrimony was inexorably pun ished with death and torture as an act of treason against the state The lands of the proconsular province which formed the immediate district of Carthage, were accurately measured and divided among the barbarians and the con queror reserved for his peculiar domain the fertile territory of Byzacium and the adjacent parts of Numidia and Gætulia [40]

It was natural enough that Genseric should hate those whom he had injured the nobility and senators of Carthage were exposed to his jealousy and resentment and all those who refused the ignominious terms which their honour and religion forbade them to accept were compelled by the Arian tyrant to embrace the condition of perpetual banishment Rome, Italy and the provinces of the East were filled with a crowd of exiles of fugitives and of in genuous captives who solicited the public com passion and the benevolent epistles of Theodoret still preserve the names and misfortunes of Cælestian and Maria [41] The Syrian bishop deplores the misfortunes of Cælestian who from the state of a noble and opulent senator of Carthage was reduced with his wife and fam ily and servants to beg his bread in a foreign country but he applauds the resignation of the Christian exile and the philosophic temper which under the pressure of such calamities could enjoy more real happiness than was the ordinary lot of wealth and prosperity The story of Maria the daughter of the magnificent Eu dæmon, is singular and interesting In the sack of Carthage she was purchased from the Van dals by some merchants of Syria who after wards sold her as a slave in their native country A female attendant, transported in the same ship and sold in the same family still continued to respect a mistress whom fortune had reduced to the common level of servitude and the daughter of Eudæmon received from her grate ful affection the domestic services which she had once required from her obedience This remarkable behaviour divulged the real condi tion of Maria who in the absence of the bishop of Cyrrhus was redeemed from slavery by the generosity of some soldiers of the garrison The liberality of Theodoret provided for her decent maintenance and she passed ten months among the deaconesses of the church till she was unexpectedly informed that her father who had escaped from the ruin of Carthage, exer cised an honourable office in one of the Western provinces Her filial impatience was seconded by the pious bishop Theodoret in a letter still extant recommends Maria to the bishop of Ægæ a maritime city of Cilicia which was fre quented during the annual fair by the vessels of the West most earnestly requesting that his colleague would use the maiden with a tender ness suitable to her birth and that he would intrust her to the care of such faithful mer chants as would esteem it a sufficient gain if they restored a daughter lost beyond all human hope to the arms of her afflicted parent

Among the insipid legends of ecclesiastical history, I am tempted to distinguish the mem orable fable of the SEVEN SLEEPERS [42] whose imaginary date corresponds with the reign of the younger Theodosius and the conquest of Africa by the Vandals [43] When the emperor Decius persecuted the Christians seven noble youths of Ephesus concealed themselves in a spacious cavern in the side of an adjacent mountain where they were doomed to perish by the tyrant who gave orders that the entrance should be firmly secured with a pile of huge stones They immediately fell into a deep slum ber which was miraculously prolonged with out injuring the powers of life during a period of one hundred and eighty seven years At the end of that time the slaves of Adolius to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed the stones to supply materials for some rustic edifice the light of the sun darted into the cavern and the Seven Sleepers were permitted to awake After a slumber as they thought of a few hours they were pressed by the calls of hunger and resolved that Jamblichus, one of their number should secretly return to the city to purchase bread for the use of his companions The youth (if we may still employ that appellation) could no longer recognise the once familiar aspect of his native country and his surprise was increased by the appearance of a large cross triumphantly erected over the principal gate of Ephesus. His singular dress and obsolete language confounded the baker, to whom he offered an ancient medal of Decius as the current coin of the empire, and Jamblichus, on the suspicion of a secret treasure, was dragged before the judge Their mutual inquiries produced the amazing discovery that two centuries were almost elapsed since Jamblichus and his friends had escaped from the rage of a Pagan tyrant The bishop of Ephesus, the clergy, the magistrates, the people, and, as it is said, the emperor Theodosius himself, hastened to visit the cavern of the Seven Sleepers, who bestowed their benediction, related their story, and at the same instant peaceably expired The origin of this marvellous fable cannot be ascribed to the pious fraud and credulity of the modern Greeks, since the authentic tradition may be traced within half a century of the supposed miracle James of Sarug, a Syrian bishop, who was born only two years after the death of the younger Theodosius, has devoted one of his two hundred and thirty homilies to the praise of the young men of Ephesus [44] Their legend, before the end of the sixth century, was translated from the Syriac into the Latin language, by the care of Gregory of Tours The hostile communions of the East preserve their memory with equal reverence, and their names are honourably inscribed in the Roman, the Abyssinian, and the Russian calendar [45] Nor has their reputation been confined to the Christian world This popular tale, which Mahomet might learn when he drove his camels to the fairs of Syria, is introduced, as a divine revelation, into the Koran [46] The story of the Seven Sleepers has been adopted and adorned by the nations, from Bengal to Africa, who profess the Mahometan religion,[47] and some vestiges of a similar tradition have been discovered in the remote extremities of Scandinavia [48] This easy and universal belief, so expressive of the sense of mankind, may be ascribed to the genuine merit of the fable itself We imperceptibly advance from youth to age without observing the gradual, but incessant, change of human affairs, and even in our larger experience of history, the imagination is accustomed, by a perpetual series of causes and effects, to unite the most distant revolutions But if the interval between two memorable eras could be instantly annihilated, if it were possible, after a momentary slumber of two hundred years, to display the new world to the eyes of a spectator who still retained a lively and recent impression of the old, his surprise and his reflections would furnish the pleasing subject of a philosophical romance. The scene could not be more advantageously placed than in the two centuries which elapsed between the reigns of Decius and of Theodosius the Younger During this period the seat of government had been transported from Rome to a new city on the banks of the Thracian Bosphorus and the abuse of military spirit had been suppressed by an artificial system of tame and ceremonious servitude The throne of the persecuting Decius was filled by a succession of Christian and orthodox princes, who had extirpated the fabulous gods of antiquity and the public devotion of the age was impatient to exalt the saints and martyrs of the Catholic church on the altars of Diana and Hercules The union of the Roman empire was dissolved, its genius was humbled in the dust, and armies of unknown barbarians, issuing from the frozen regions of the North, had established their victorious reign over the fairest provinces of Europe and Africa

CHAPTER XXXIV

The Character, Conquests, and Court of Attila, King of the Huns Death of Theodosius the Younger Elevation of Marcian to the Empire of the East

THE WESTERN world was oppressed by the Goths and Vandals, who fled before the Huns, but the achievements of the Huns themselves were not adequate to their power and prosperity Their victorious hordes had spread from the Volga to the Danube, but the public force was exhausted by the discord of independent chieftains, their valour was idly consumed in obscure and predatory excursions, and they often degraded their national dignity, by condescending, for the hopes of spoil, to enlist under the banners of their fugitive enemies In the reign of ATTILA[1] the Huns again became the terrors of the world, and I shall now describe the character and actions of that formidable barbarian, who alternately insulted and invaded the East and the West and urged the rapid downfall of the Roman Empire.

In the tide of emigration which impetuously rolled from the confines of China to those of

Germany the most powerful and populous tribes may commonly be found on the verge of the Roman provinces The accumulated weight was sustained for a while by artificial barriers and the easy condescension of the emperors in vited without satisfying the insolent demands of the barbarians who had acquired an eager appetite for the luxuries of civilised life The Hungarians who ambitiously insert the name of Attila among their native kings may affirm with truth that the hordes which were subject to his uncle Roas or Rugilas had formed their encampments within the limits of modern Hun gary [2] in a fertile country which liberally supplied the wants of a nation of hunters and shepherds In this advantageous situation Rugilas and his valiant brothers who continually added to their power and reputation commanded the alternative of peace or war with the two em pires His alliance with the Romans of the West was cemented by his personal friendship for the great Aëtius who was always secure of finding in the barbarian camp an hospitable reception and a powerful support At his solicitation and in the name of John the usurper sixty thousand Huns advanced to the confines of Italy their march and their retreat were alike expensive to the state and the grateful policy of Aëtius aban doned the possession of Pannonia to his faithful confederates The Romans of the East were not less apprehensive of the arms of Rugilas which threatened the provinces or even the capital Some ecclesiastical historians have destroyed the barbarians with lightning and pestilence [3] but Theodosius was reduced to the more hum ble expedient of stipulating an annual payment of three hundred and fifty pounds of gold and of disguising this dishonourable tribute by the title of general which the king of the Huns con descended to accept The public tranquillity was frequently interrupted by the fierce impa tience of the barbarians and the perfidious in trigues of the Byzantine court Four dependent nations among whom we may distinguish the Bavarians disclaimed the sovereignty of the Huns and their revolt was encouraged and protected by a Roman alliance till the just claims and formidable power of Rugilas were effectually urged by the voice of Eslaw his am bassador Peace was the unanimous wish of the senate their decree was ratified by the emperor and two ambassadors were named—Plinthas a general of Scythian extraction but of consular rank and the quaestor Epigenes a wise and ex perienced statesman who was recommended to that office by his ambitious colleague

The death of Rugilas suspended the progress of the treaty His two nephews Attila and Bleda who succeeded to the throne of their uncle consented to a personal interview with the ambassadors of Constantinople but as they proudly refused to dismount the business was transacted on horseback in a spacious plain near the city of Margus in the Upper Mæsia. The kings of the Huns assumed the solid benefits as well as the vain honours of the negotia tion They dictated the conditions of peace, and each condition was an insult on the majesty of the empire Besides the freedom of a safe and plentiful market on the banks of the Danube they required that the annual contribution should be augmented from three hundred and fifty to seven hundred pounds of gold that a fine or ransom of eight pieces of gold should be paid for every Roman captive who had escaped from his barbarian master that the emperor should renounce all treaties and engagements with the enemies of the Huns and that all the fugitives who had taken refuge in the court or provinces of Theodosius should be de livered to the justice of their offended sovereign. This justice was rigorously inflicted on some unfortunate youths of a royal race. They were crucified on the territories of the empire, by the command of Attila and as soon as the king of the Huns had impressed the Romans with the terror of his name he indulged them in a short and arbitrary respite whilst he subdued the rebellious or independent nations of Scythia and Germany [4]

Attila the son of Mundzuk deduced his noble perhaps his regal descent[5] from the ancient Huns who had formerly contended with the monarchs of China His features according to the observation of a Gothic historian bore the stamp of his national origin and the portrait of Attila exhibits the genuine deformity of a modern Calmuck [6] a large head a swarthy complexion small deep-seated eyes a flat nose a few hairs in the place of a beard, broad shoulders and a short square body of nervous strength though of a disproportioned form. The haughty step and demeanor of the king of the Huns expressed the consciousness of his superiority above the rest of mankind and he had a custom of fiercely rolling his eyes as if he wished to enjoy the terror which he inspired. Yet this savage hero was not inaccessible to pity his suppliant enemies might confide in the assurance of peace or pardon and Attila was considered by his subjects as a just and indulgent master He delighted in war but after he had ascended the throne in a mature age, his head, rather than his hand, achieved the conquest of the North, and the fame of an adventurous soldier was usefully exchanged for that of a prudent and successful general The effects of personal valour are so inconsiderable, except in poetry or romance, that victory, even among barbarians, must depend on the degree of skill with which the passions of the multitude are combined and guided for the service of a single man The Scythian conquerors, Attila and Zingis, surpassed their rude countrymen in art, rather than in courage, and it may be observed that the monarchies, both of the Huns and of the Moguls, were erected by their founders on the basis of popular superstition The miraculous conception, which fraud and credulity ascribed to the virgin mother of Zingis, raised him above the level of human nature, and the naked prophet, who, in the name of the Deity, invested him with the empire of the earth, pointed the valour of the Moguls with irresistible enthusiasm [7] The religious arts of Attila were not less skilfully adapted to the character of his age and country It was natural enough that the Scythians should adore, with peculiar devotion, the god of war, but as they were incapable of forming either an abstract idea or a corporeal representation, they worshipped their tutelar deity under the symbol of an iron cimeter [8] One of the shepherds of the Huns perceived that a heifer, who was grazing, had wounded herself in the foot, and curiously followed the track of the blood, till he discovered, among the long grass, the point of an ancient sword, which he dug out of the ground, and presented to Attila That magnanimous, or rather that artful, prince accepted, with pious gratitude, this celestial favour, and, as the rightful possessor of the sword of Mars, asserted his divine and indefeasible claim to the dominion of the earth [9] If the rites of Scythia were practised on this solemn occasion, a lofty altar, or rather pile of faggots, three hundred yards in length and in breadth, was raised in a spacious plain, and the sword of Mars was placed erect on the summit of this rustic altar, which was annually consecrated by the blood of sheep, horses, and of the hundredth captive.[10] Whether human sacrifices formed any part of the worship of Attila, or whether he propitiated the god of war with the victims which he continually offered in the field of battle, the favourite of Mars soon acquired a sacred character, which rendered his conquests more easy and more permanent, and the barbarian princes confessed, in the language of devotion or flattery, that they could not presume to gaze, with a steady eye, on the divine majesty of the king of the Huns [11] His brother Bleda, who reigned over a considerable part of the nation, was compelled to resign his sceptre and his life Yet even this cruel act was attributed to a supernatural impulse, and the vigour with which Attila wielded the sword of Mars convinced the world that it had been reserved alone for his invincible arm [12] But the extent of his empire affords the only remaining evidence of the number and importance of his victories, and the Scythian monarch, however ignorant of the value of science and philosophy, might perhaps lament that his illiterate subjects were destitute of the art which could perpetuate the memory of his exploits

If a line of separation were drawn between the civilised and the savage climates of the globe, between the inhabitants of cities, who cultivated the earth, and the hunters and shepherds, who dwelt in tents, Attila might aspire to the title of supreme and sole monarch of the barbarians [13] He alone, among the conquerors of ancient and modern times, united the two mighty kingdoms of Germany and Scythia, and those vague appellations, when they are applied to his reign, may be understood with an ample latitude Thuringia, which stretched beyond its actual limits as far as the Danube, was in the number of his provinces, he interposed, with the weight of a powerful neighbour, in the domestic affairs of the Franks, and one of his lieutenants chastised, and almost exterminated, the Burgundians of the Rhine He subdued the islands of the ocean, the kingdoms of Scandinavia, encompassed and divided by the waters of the Baltic, and the Huns might derive a tribute of furs from that northern region, which has been protected from all other conquerors by the severity of the climate and the courage of the natives Towards the East, it is difficult to circumscribe the dominion of Attila over the Scythian deserts, yet we may be assured that he reigned on the banks of the Volga, that the king of the Huns was dreaded, not only as a warrior, but as a magician,[14] that he insulted and vanquished the Khan of the formidable Geougen, and that he sent ambassadors to negotiate an equal alliance with the empire of China In the proud review of the nations who acknowledged the sovereignty of Attila, and who never entertained, during his lifetime, the thought of a revolt, the Gepidæ and the Ostrogoths were distinguished by their numbers, their bravery and the personal merit of their chiefs The renowned Ardaric king of the Gepidæ was the faithful and sagacious counsellor of the monarch who esteemed his intrepid genius whilst he loved the mild and discreet virtues of the noble Walamir king of the Ostrogoths The crowd of vulgar kings the leaders of so many martial tribes who served under the standard of Attila were ranged in the submissive order of guards and domestics round the person of their master They watched his nod, they trembled at his frown and at the first signal of his will they executed without murmur or hesitation his stern and absolute commands In time of peace the dependent princes with their national troops attended the royal camp in regular succession but when Attila collected his military force he was able to bring into the field an army of five or according to another account of seven hundred thousand barbarians [15]

The ambassadors of the Huns might awaken the attention of Theodosius by reminding him that they were his neighbours both in Europe and Asia since they touched the Danube on one hand and reached with the other as far as the Tanais In the reign of his father Arcadius, a band of adventurous Huns had ravaged the provinces of the East from whence they brought away rich spoils and innumerable captives They advanced by a secret path along the shores of the Caspian Sea traversed the snowy mountains of Armenia passed the Tigris the Euphrates and the Halys recruited their weary cavalry with the generous breed of Cappadocian horses occupied the hilly country of Cilicia and disturbed the festal songs and dances of the citizens of Antioch [16] Egypt trembled at their approach and the monks and pilgrims of the Holy Land prepared to escape their fury by a speedy embarkation The memory of this invasion was still recent in the minds of the Orientals The subjects of Attila might execute with superior forces the design which these adventurers had so boldly attempted and it soon became the subject of anxious conjecture whether the tempest would fall on the dominions of Rome or of Persia Some of the great vassals of the king of the Huns who were themselves in the rank of powerful princes had been sent to ratify an alliance and society of arms with the emperor or rather with the general of the West. They related during their residence at Rome the circumstances of an expedition which they had lately made into the East After passing a desert and a morass supposed by the Romans to be the lake Mæotis, they penetrated through the mountains and arrived at the end of fifteen days march on the confines of Media, where they advanced as far as the unknown cities of Basic and Cursic.[17] They encountered the Persian army in the plains of Media and the air according to their own expression was darkened by a cloud of arrows But the Huns were obliged to retire before the numbers of the enemy Their laborious retreat was affected by a different road they lost the greatest part of their booty and at length returned to the royal camp with some knowledge of the country, and an impatient desire of revenge In the free conversation of the Imperial ambassadors who discussed at the court of Attila the character and designs of their formidable enemy the ministers of Constantinople expressed their hope that his strength might be diverted and employed in a long and doubtful contest with the princes of the house of Sassan The more sagacious Italians admonished their Eastern brethren of the folly and danger of such a hope and convinced them that the Medes and Persians were incapable of resisting the arms of the Huns and that the easy and important acquisition would exalt the pride as well as power of the conqueror Instead of contenting himself with a moderate contribution and a military title which equalled him only to the generals of Theodosius Attila would proceed to impose a disgraceful and intolerable yoke on the necks of the prostrate and captive Romans, who would then be encompassed on all sides by the empire of the Huns [18]

While the powers of Europe and Asia were solicitous to avert the impending danger the alliance of Attila maintained the Vandals in the possession of Africa An enterprise had been concerted between the courts of Ravenna and Constantinople for the recovery of that valuable province and the ports of Sicily were already filled with the military and naval forces of Theodosius But the subtle Genseric, who spread his negotiations round the world, prevented their designs by exciting the king of the Huns to invade the Eastern empire and a trifling incident soon became the motive or pretence of a destructive war [19] Under the faith of the treaty of Margus a free market was held on the northern side of the Danube which was protected by a Roman fortress surnamed Constantia A troop of barbarians violated the commercial security killed or dispersed the unsuspecting traders and levelled the fortress with the ground The Huns justified this outrage as an act of reprisal, alleged that the bishop of Margus had entered their territories, to discover and steal a secret treasure of their kings, and sternly demanded the guilty prelate, the sacrilegious spoil, and the fugitive subjects, who had escaped from the justice of Attila The refusal of the Byzantine court was the signal of war, and the Mæsians at first applauded the generous firmness of their sovereign But they were soon intimidated by the destruction of Viminiacum and the adjacent towns, and the people was persuaded to adopt the convenient maxim, that a private citizen, however innocent or respectable, may be justly sacrificed to the safety of his country The bishop of Margus, who did not possess the spirit of a martyr, resolved to prevent the designs which he suspected He boldly treated with the princes of the Huns, secured, by solemn oaths, his pardon and reward, posted a numerous detachment of barbarians, in silent ambush, on the banks of the Danube, and, at the appointed hour, opened, with his own hand, the gates of his episcopal city This advantage, which had been obtained by treachery, served as a prelude to more honourable and decisive victories The Illyrian frontier was covered by a line of castles and fortresses, and though the greatest part of them consisted only of a single tower, with a small garrison, they were commonly sufficient to repel, or to intercept, the inroads of an enemy who was ignorant of the art, and impatient of the delay, of a regular siege But these slight obstacles were instantly swept away by the inundation of the Huns [20] They destroyed, with fire and sword, the populous cities of Sirmium and Singidunum, of Ratiaria and Marcianopolis, of Naissus and Sardica, where every circumstance in the discipline of the people and the construction of the buildings had been gradually adapted to the sole purpose of defence The whole breadth of Europe, as it extends above five hundred miles from the Euxine to the Hadriatic, was at once invaded, and occupied, and desolated, by the myriads of barbarians whom Attila led into the field The public danger and distress could not, however, provoke Theodosius to interrupt his amusements and devotion, or to appear in person at the head of the Roman legions But the troops which had been sent against Genseric were hastily recalled from Sicily, the garrisons, on the side of Persia, were exhausted, and a military force was collected in Europe, formidable by their arms and numbers, if the generals had understood the science of command, and their soldiers the duty of obedience The armies of the Eastern empire were vanquished in three successive engagements, and the progress of Attila may be traced by the fields of battle The two former, on the banks of the Utus, and under the walls of Marcianopolis, were fought in the extensive plains between the Danube and Mount Hæmus As the Romans were pressed by a victorious enemy, they gradually, and unskilfully, retired towards the Chersonesus of Thrace, and that narrow peninsula, the last extremity of the land, was marked by their third and irreparable defeat By the destruction of this army, Attila acquired the indisputable possession of the field From the Hellespont to Thermopylæ and the suburbs of Constantinople he ravaged, without resistance and without mercy, the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia Heraclea and Hadrianople might, perhaps, escape this dreadful irruption of the Huns, but the words the most expressive of total extirpation and erasure are applied to the calamities which they inflicted on seventy cities of the Eastern empire [21] Theodosius, his court, and the unwarlike people, were protected by the walls of Constantinople, but those walls had been shaken by a recent earthquake, and the fall of fifty-eight towers had opened a large and tremendous breach The damage indeed was speedily repaired, but this accident was aggravated by a superstitious fear that Heaven itself had delivered the Imperial city to the shepherds of Scythia, who were strangers to the laws, the language, and the religion of the Romans [22]

In all their invasions of the civilised empires of the South, the Scythian shepherds have been uniformly actuated by a savage and destructive spirit The laws of war, that restrain the exercise of national rapine and murder, are founded on two principles of substantial interest the knowledge of the permanent benefits which may be obtained by a moderate use of conquest, and a just apprehension lest the desolation which we inflict on the enemy's country may be retaliated on our own But these considerations of hope and fear are almost unknown in the pastoral state of nations The Huns of Attila may without injustice be compared to the Moguls and Tartars before their primitive manners were changed by religion and luxury, and the evidence of Oriental history may reflect some light on the short and imperfect annals of Rome After the Moguls had subdued the northern provinces of China, it was seriously proposed, not in the hour of victory and passion, but in calm deliberate council, to exterminate all the inhabitants of that populous country that the vacant land might be converted to the pasture of cattle The firmness of a Chinese mandarin [23] who insinuated some principles of rational policy into the mind of Zingis diverted him from the execution of this horrid design But in the cities of Asia which yielded to the Moguls the inhuman abuse of the rights of war was exercised with a regular form of discipline which may with equal reason though not with equal authority be imputed to the victorious Huns The inhabitants who had submitted to their discretion were ordered to evacuate their houses and to assemble in some plain adjacent to the city where a division was made of the vanquished into three parts The first class consisted of the soldiers of the garrison and the young men capable of bearing arms and their fate was instantly decided they were either enlisted among the Moguls or they were massacred on the spot by the troops who with pointed spears and bended bows had formed a circle round the captive multitude The second class composed of the young and beautiful women of the artificers of every rank and profession and of the more wealthy or honourable citizens from whom a private ransom might be expected was distributed in equal or proportionable lots The remainder whose life or death was alike useless to the conquerors were permitted to return to the city which in the meanwhile had been stripped of its valuable furniture and a tax was imposed on those wretched inhabitants for the indulgence of breathing their native air Such was the behaviour of the Moguls when they were not conscious of any extraordinary rigour [24] But the most casual provocation the slightest motive of caprice or convenience often provoked them to involve a whole people in an indiscriminate massacre and the ruin of some flourishing cities was executed with such unrelenting perseverance that according to their own expression horses might run without stumbling over the ground where they had once stood The three great capitals of Khorasan Maru Neisabour and Herat were destroyed by the armies of Zingis and the exact account which was taken of the slain amounted to four millions three hundred and forty seven thousand persons [25] Timur or Tamerlane was educated in a less barbarous age and in the profession of the Mahometan religion yet if Attila equalled the hostile ravages of Tamerlane [26] either the Tartar or the Hun might deserve the epithet of the SCOURGE OF GOD [27]

It may be affirmed with bolder assurance th_t the Huns depopulated the provinces of the empire by the number of Roman subjects whom they led away into captivity In the hands of a wise legislator such an industrious colony might have contributed to diffuse through the deserts of Scythia the rudiments of the us(ful and ornamental arts but these captives who had been taken in war were accidentally dispersed among the hordes that obeyed the empire of Attila. The estimate of their respective value was formed by the simple judgment of unenlightened and unprejudiced barbarians Perhaps they might not un Jerstand the merit of a theologian profoundly skilled in the controversies of the Trinity and the Incarnation yet they respected the ministers of every religion and the active zeal of the Christian missionaries without approaching the person or the palace of the monarch successfully laboured in the propagation of the gospel [28] The pastoral tribes who were ignorant of the distinction of landed property must have disregarded the use as well as the abuse of civil jurisprudence and the skill of an eloquent lawyer could excite only their contempt or their abhorrence.[29] The perpetual intercourse of the Huns and the Goths had communicated the familiar knowledge of the two national dialects and the barbarians were ambitious of conversing in Latin the military idiom even of the Eastern empire [30] But they disdained the language and the sciences of the Greeks and the vain sophist or grave philosopher who had enjoyed the flattering applause of the schools was mortified to find that his robust servant was a captive of more value and importance than himself The mechanic arts were encouraged and esteemed as they tended to satisfy the wants of the Huns An architect in the service of Onegesius one of the favourites of Attila was employed to construct a bath but this work was a rare example of private luxury and the trades of the smith the carpenter the armourer were much more adapted to supply a wandering people with the useful instruments of peace and war But the merit of the physician was received with universal favour and respect the barbarians who despised death might be apprehensive of disease and the haughty conqueror trembled in the presence of a captive to whom he ascribed perhaps an imaginary power of prolonging or preserving his life [31] The Huns might be provoked to insult the misery of their slaves over whom they exercised a despotic command [32] but their manners were not susceptible of a refined system of oppression and the efforts of courage and di-

ence were often recompensed by the gift of reedom The historian Priscus, whose embassy s a source of curious instruction, was accosted n the camp of Attila by a stranger, who saluted im in the Greek language, but whose dress and gure displayed the appearance of a wealthy cythian. In the siege of Viminiacum he had ost, according to his own account, his fortune nd liberty he became the slave of Onegesius, ut his faithful services against the Romans and he Acatzires had gradually raised him to the ank of the native Huns, to whom he was ttached by the domestic pledges of a new wife nd several children The spoils of war had reored and improved his private property, he as admitted to the table of his former lord, nd the apostate Greek blessed the hour of his aptivity, since it had been the introduction to happy and independent state, which he held y the honourable tenure of military service his reflection naturally produced a dispute on he advantages and defects of the Roman govrnment, which was severely arraigned by the postate, and defended by Priscus in a prolix nd feeble declamation The freedman of Oneesius exposed, in true and lively colours, the ices of a declining empire of which he had so ng been the victim, the cruel absurdity of the oman princes, unable to protect their subjects gainst the public enemy, unwilling to trust hem with arms for their own defence, the inlerable weight of taxes, rendered still more ppressive by the intricate or arbitrary modes f collection, the obscurity of numerous and ontradictory laws, the tedious and expensive rms of judicial proceedings, the partial adinistration of justice, and the universal corption which increased the influence of the ch and aggravated the misfortunes of the oor A sentiment of patriotic sympathy was length revived in the breast of the fortunate ule, and he lamented with a flood of tears he guilt or weakness of those magistrates who ad perverted the wisest and most salutary stitutions [23]

The timid or selfish policy of the Western omans had abandoned the Eastern empire to e Huns.[24] The loss of armies and the want of scipline or virtue were not supplied by the rsonal character of the monarch Theodosius ight still affect the style as well as the title of rable Augustus, but he was reduced to solicit e clemency of Attila who imperiously dictated ese harsh and humiliating conditions of peace The emperor of the East resigned by in press or tacit convention, an extensive and important territory which stretched along the southern banks of the Danube, from Singidunum, or Belgrade, as far as Novæ, in the diocese of Thrace The breadth was defined by the vague computation of fifteen days' journey, but, from the proposal of Attila to remove the situation of the national market, it soon appeared that he comprehended the ruined city of Naissus within the limits of his dominions II The king of the Huns required and obtained that his tribute or subsidy should be augmented from seven hundred pounds of gold to the annual sum of two thousand one hundred, and he stipulated the immediate payment of six thousand pounds of gold to defray the expenses, or to expiate the guilt, of the war One might imagine that such a demand, which scarcely equalled the measure of private wealth, would have been readily discharged by the opulent empire of the East, and the public distress affords a remarkable proof of the impoverished, or at least of the disorderly, state of the finances A large porportion of the taxes extorted from the people was detained and intercepted in their passage through the foulest channels to the treasury of Constantinople The revenue was dissipated by Theodosius and his favourites in wasteful and profuse luxury, which was disguised by the names of imperial magnificence or Christian charity The immediate supplies had been exhausted by the unforeseen necessity of military preparations A personal contribution, rigorously but capriciously imposed on the members of the senatorian order, was the only expedient that could disarm without loss of time the impatient avarice of Attila and the poverty of the nobles compelled them to adopt the scandalous resource of exposing to public auction the jewels of their wives and the hereditary ornaments of their palaces [25] III The king of the Huns appears to have established as a principle of national jurisprudence, that he could never lose the property which he had once acquired in the persons who had yielded either a voluntary or reluctant submission to his authority From this principle he concluded, and the conclusions of Attila were irrevocable laws, that the Huns who had been taken prisoners in war should be released without delay and with out ransom, that every Roman captive who had presumed to escape should purchase his right to freedom at the price of twelve pieces of gold, and that all the barbarians who had the standard of Attila should be out any promise or stipulation of the execution of this cruel and treaty the Imperial officers were forced to massacre several loyal and noble deserters who refused to devote themselves to certain death and the Romans forfeited all reasonable claims to the friendship of any Scythian people by this public confession that they were destitute either of faith or power to protect the suppliant who had embraced the throne of Theodosius [36]

The firmness of a single town so obscure that except on this occasion it has never been mentioned by any historian or geographer exposed the disgrace of the emperor and empire Azimus or Azimuntium a small city of Thrace on the Illyrian borders [37] had been distinguished by the martial spirit of its youth the skill and reputation of the leaders whom they had chosen, and their daring exploits against the innumerable host of the barbarians Instead of tamely expecting their approach the Azimuntines attacked in frequent and successful sallies the troops of the Huns who gradually declined the dangerous neighbourhood rescued from their hands the spoil and the captives and recruited their domestic force by the voluntary association of fugitives and deserters After the conclusion of the treaty Attila still menaced the empire with implacable war unless the Azimuntines were persuaded or compelled to comply with the conditions which their sovereign had accepted The ministers of Theodosius confessed with shame and with truth that they no longer possessed any authority over a society of men who so bravely asserted their natural independence and the king of the Huns condescended to negotiate an equal exchange with the citizens of Azimus They demanded the restitution of some shepherds who with their cattle had been accidentally surprised A strict though fruitless inquiry was allowed but the Huns were obliged to swear that they did not detain any prisoners belonging to the city before they could recover two surviving countrymen whom the Azimuntines had reserved as pledges for the safety of their lost companions Attila on his side was satisfied and deceived by their solemn asseveration that the rest of the captives had been put to the sword and that it was their constant practice immediately to dismiss the Romans and the deserters who had obtained the security of the public faith. This prudent and officious dissimulation may be condemned or excused by the casuists as they incline to the rigid decree of St Augustin or the milder sentiment of St Jerom and St Chrysostom but every soldier every statesman must acknowledge that if the race of the Azimuntines had been encouraged and multiplied the barbarians would have ceased to trample on the majesty of the empire [38]

It would have been strange indeed, if Theodosius had purchased by the loss of honour a secure and solid tranquillity or if his tameness had not invited the repetition of injuries The Byzantine court was insulted by five or six successive embassies [39] and the ministers of Attila were uniformly instructed to press the tardy or imperfect execution of the last treaty to produce the names of fugitives and deserters who were still protected by the empire and to declare with seeming moderation that, unless their sovereign obtained complete and immediate satisfaction it would be impossible for him were it even his wish to check the resentment of his warlike tribes Besides the motive of pride and interest which might prompt the king of the Huns to continue this train of negotiation, he was influenced by the less honourable view of enriching his favourites at the expense of his enemies The Imperial treasury was exhausted to procure the friendly offices of the ambassadors and their principal attendants whose favourable report might conduce to the maintenance of peace The barbarian monarch was flattered by the liberal reception of his ministers he computed with pleasure the value and splendour of their gifts rigorously exacted the performance of every promise which would contribute to their private emolument, and treated as an important business of state the marriage of his secretary Constantius.[40] That Gallic adventurer who was recommended by Aëtius to the king of the Huns had engaged his service to the ministers of Constantinople for the stipulated reward of a wealthy and noble wife and the daughter of Count Saturninus was chosen to discharge the obligations of her country The reluctance of the victim, some domestic troubles and the unjust confiscation of her fortune cooled the ardour of her interested lover but he still demanded in the name of Attila an equivalent alliance and, after many ambiguous delays and excuses the Byzantine court was compelled to sacrifice to this insolent stranger the widow of Armatius whose birth opulence and beauty placed her in the most illustrious rank of the Roman matrons. For these importunate and oppressive embassies Attila claimed a suitable return he weighed with suspicious pride the character and station of the Imperial envoys but he condescended to promise that he would advance as far as Sardica receive any minister who had been invested ith the consular dignity The council of Theo-osius eluded this proposal by representing the esolate and ruined condition of Sardica, and en ventured to insinuate that every officer of e army or household was qualified to treat ith the most powerful princes of Scythia axımin,[41] a respectable courtier, whose abili-es had been long exercised in civil and mili-ry employments, accepted with reluctance the oublesome, and perhaps dangerous, commis-on of reconciling the angry spirit of the king the Huns His friend, the historian Priscus,[42] nbraced the opportunity of observing the bar-rian hero in the peaceful and domestic scenes life but the secret of the embassy, a fatal and ilty secret, was intrusted only to the inter-eter Vigilius The two last ambassadors of e Huns, Orestes, a noble subject of the Pan-nian province, and Edecon, a valiant chief-in of the tribe of the Scyrri, returned at the me time from Constantinople to the royal mp Their obscure names were afterwards ustrated by the extraordinary fortune and e contrast of their sons the two servants of ttila became the fathers of the last Roman nperor of the West, and of the first barbarian ng of Italy

The ambassadors, who were followed by a umerous train of men and horses, made their st halt at Sardica, at the distance of three undred and fifty miles, or thirteen days' jour-y, from Constantinople As the remains of rdica were still included within the limits of e empire, it was incumbent on the Romans exercise the duties of hospitality They pro-ded, with the assistance of the provincials, a fficient number of sheep and oxen, and in-ted the Huns to a splendid, or, at least, a entiful supper But the harmony of the enter-inment was soon disturbed by mutual preju-ce and indiscretion The greatness of the nperor and the empire was warmly main-ined by their ministers, the Huns, with equal dour, asserted the superiority of their victori-is monarch the dispute was inflamed by the sh and unseasonable flattery of Vigilius, who ssionately rejected the comparison of a mere ortal with the divine Theodosius, and it was ith extreme difficulty that Maximin and iscus were able to divert the conversation or soothe the angry minds of the barbarians hen they rose from table the Imperial am-ssador presented Edecon and Orestes with h gifts of silk robes and Indian pearls which ey thankfully accepted Yet Orestes could not forbear insinuating that he had not always been treated with such respect and liberality and the offensive distinction which was implied between his civil office and the hereditary rank of his colleague seems to have made Edecon a doubtful friend and Orestes an irreconcilable enemy After this entertainment they travelled about one hundred miles from Sardica to Naissus That flourishing city, which had given birth to the great Constantine, was levelled with the ground, the inhabitants were destroyed or dispersed, and the appearance of some sick persons, who were still permitted to exist among the ruins of the churches, served only to increase the horror of the prospect The surface of the country was covered with the bones of the slain, and the ambassadors, who directed their course to the northwest, were obliged to pass the hills of modern Servia before they descended into the flat and marshy grounds which are terminated by the Danube The Huns were masters of the great river their navigation was performed in large canoes, hollowed out of the trunk of a single tree, the ministers of Theodosius were safely landed on the opposite bank, and their barbarian associates immediately hastened to the camp of Attila, which was equally prepared for the amusements of hunting or of war No sooner had Maximin advanced about two miles from the Danube than he began to experience the fastidious insolence of the conqueror He was sternly forbid to pitch his tents in a pleasant valley, lest he should infringe the distant awe that was due to the royal mansion The ministers of Attila pressed him to communicate the business and the instructions which he reserved for the ear of their sovereign When Maximin temperately urged the contrary practice of nations, he was still more confounded to find that the resolutions of the Sacred Consistory, those secrets (says Priscus) which should not be revealed to the gods themselves, had been treacherously disclosed to the public enemy On his refusal to comply with such ignominious terms, the Imperial envoy was commanded instantly to depart, the order was recalled, it was again repeated, and the Huns renewed their ineffectual attempts to subdue the patient firmness of Maximin. At length by the intercession of Scotta, the brother of Onegesius, whose friendship had been purchased by a liberal gift, he was admitted to the royal presence, but, instead of obtaining a decisive answer, he was compelled to undertake a remote journey towards the North, that Attila might enjoy the proud satisfaction of receiving in the same camp the ambassadors of the Eastern and Western empires His journey was regulated by the guides who obliged him to halt to hasten his march or to deviate from the common road as it best suited the convenience of the king The Romans who traversed the plains of Hungary suppose that they passed several navigable rivers either in canoes or portable boats but there is reason to suspect that the winding stream of the Theiss or Tibiscus might present itself in different places under different names From the contiguous villages they received a plentiful and regular supply of provisions mead instead of wine millet in the place of bread and a certain liquor named camus which according to the report of Priscus was distilled from barley [43] Such fare might appear coarse and indelicate to men who had tasted the luxury of Constantinople but in their accidental distress they were relieved by the gentleness and hospitality of the same barbarians so terrible and so merciless in war The ambassadors had encamped on the edge of a large morass A violent tempest of wind and rain of thunder and lightning overturned their tents immersed their baggage and furniture in the water and scattered their retinue who wandered in the darkness of the night uncertain of their road and apprehensive of some unknown danger till they awakened by their cries the inhabitants of a neighbouring village the property of the widow of Bleda A bright illumination and in a few moments a comfortable fire of reeds was kindled by their officious benevolence the wants and even the desires of the Romans were liberally satisfied and they seem to have been embarrassed by the singular politeness of Bleda s widow who added to her other favours the gift or at least the loan of a sufficient number of beautiful and obsequious damsels The sunshine of the succeeding day was dedicated to repose to collect and dry the baggage and to the refreshment of the men and horses but in the evening before they pursued their journey the ambassadors expressed their gratitude to the bounteous lady of the village by a very acceptable present of silver cups, red fleeces dried fruits and Indian pepper Soon after this adventure they rejoined the march of Attila from whom they had been separated about six days and slowly proceeded to the capital of an empire which did not contain in the space of several thousand miles a single city

As far as we may ascertain the vague and obscure geography of Priscus, this capital appears to have been seated between the Danube the Theiss and the Carpathian hills in the plains of Upper Hungary and most probably in the neighbourhood of Jazberin Agria or Tokay [44] In its origin it could be no more than an accidental camp which by the long and frequent residence of Attila had insensibly swelled into a huge village for the reception of his court, of the troops who followed his person and of the various multitude of idle or industrious slaves and retainers [45] The baths constructed by Onegesius were the only edifice of stone th materials had been transported from Pannonia and since the adjacent country was destitute even of large timber it may be presumed that the meaner habitations of the royal village consisted of straw of mud or of canvas The wooden houses of the more illustrious Huns were built and adorned with rude magnificence, according to the rank the fortune or the taste of the proprietors They seem to have been distributed with some degree of order and symmetry and each spot became more honourable as it approached the person of the sovereign. The palace of Attila which surpassed all other houses in his dominions was built entirely of wood and covered an ample space of ground. The outward enclosure was a lofty wall, or palisade of smooth square timber intersected with high towers but intended rather for ornament than defence This wall which seems to have encircled the declivity of a hill comprehended a great variety of wooden edifices, adapted to the uses of royalty A separate house was assigned to each of the numerous wives of Attila and instead of the rigid and illiberal confinement imposed by Asiatic jealousy they politely admitted the Roman ambassadors to their presence their table and even to the freedom of an innocent embrace When Maximus offered his presents to Cerca the principal queen he admired the singular architecture of her mansion the height of the round columns the size and beauty of the wood which was curiously shaped or turned or polished or carved and his attentive eye was able to discover some taste in the ornaments and some regularity in the proportions After passing through the guards who watched before the gate the ambassadors were introduced into the private apartment of Cerca The wife of Attila received their visit sitting or rather lying on a soft couch the floor was covered with a carpet the domestics formed a circle round the queen and her damsels seated on the ground, were employed in working the variegated embroidery which adorned the dress of the barbaric warriors The Huns were ambitious of displaying those riches which were the fruit and evidence of their victories, the trappings of their horses, their swords, and even their shoes, were studded with gold and precious stones, and their tables were profusely spread with plates, and goblets, and vases of gold and silver, which had been fashioned by the labour of Grecian artists The monarch alone assumed the superior pride of still adhering to the simplicity of his Scythian ancestors [46] The dress of Attila, his arms, and the furniture of his horse, were plain, without ornament, and of a single colour The royal table was served in wooden cups and platters, flesh was his only food, and the conqueror of the North never tasted the luxury of bread

When Attila first gave audience to the Roman ambassadors on the banks of the Danube, his tent was encompassed with a formidable guard The monarch himself was seated in a wooden chair His stern countenance, angry gestures, and impatient tone astonished the firmness of Maximin, but Vigilius had more reason to tremble, since he distinctly understood the menace, that if Attila did not respect the law of nations, he would nail the deceitful interpreter to a cross, and leave his body to the vultures The barbarians condescended, by producing an accurate list, to expose the bold falsehood of Vigilius, who had affirmed that no more than seventeen deserters could be found But he arrogantly declared that he apprehended only the disgrace of contending with his fugitive slaves, since he despised their impotent efforts to defend the provinces which Theodosius had intrusted to their arms "For what fortress" (added Attila), "what city, in the wide extent of the Roman empire, can hope to exist, secure and impregnable, if it is our pleasure that it should be erased from the earth?" He dismissed, however, the interpreter, who returned to Constantinople with his peremptory demand of more complete restitution, and a more splendid embassy His anger gradually subsided, and his domestic satisfaction in a marriage which he celebrated on the road with the daughter of Eslam might perhaps contribute to mollify the native fierceness of his temper The entrance of Attila into the royal village was marked by a very singular ceremony A numerous troop of women came out to meet their hero and their king They marched before him, distributed into long and regular files the intervals between the files were filled by white veils of thin linen, which the women on either side bore aloft in their hands, and which formed a canopy for a chorus of young virgins, who chanted hymns and songs in the Scythian language The wife of his favourite Onegesius, with a train of female attendants, saluted Attila at the door of her own house, on his way to the palace, and offered, according to the custom of the country, her respectful homage, by entreating him to taste the wine and meat which she had prepared for his reception As soon as the monarch had graciously accepted her hospitable gift, his domestics lifted a small silver table to a convenient height, as he sat on horseback, and Attila, when he had touched the goblet with his lips, again saluted the wife of Onegesius, and continued his march During his residence at the seat of empire his hours were not wasted in the recluse idleness of a seraglio, and the king of the Huns could maintain his superior dignity without concealing his person from the public view He frequently assembled his council, and gave audience to the ambassadors of the nations, and his people might appeal to the supreme tribunal, which he held at stated times, and, according to the Eastern custom, before the principal gate of his wooden palace The Romans, both of the East and of the West, were twice invited to the banquet where Attila feasted with the princes and nobles of Scythia Maximin and his colleagues were stopped on the threshold, till they had made a devout libation to the health and prosperity of the king of the Huns, and were conducted, after this ceremony, to their respective seats in a spacious hall The royal table and couch, covered with carpets and fine linen, was raised by several steps in the midst of the hall, and a son, an uncle, or perhaps a favourite king, were admitted to share the simple and homely repast of Attila Two lines of small tables, each of which contained three or four guests, were ranged in order on either hand, the right was esteemed the most honourable, but the Romans ingenuously confess that they were placed on the left, and that Beric, an unknown chieftain, most probably of the Gothic race, preceded the representatives of Theodosius and Valentinian The barbarian monarch received from his cupbearer a goblet filled with wine, and courteously drank to the health of the most distinguished guest, who rose from his seat and expressed, in the same manner, his loyal and respectful vows This ceremony was successively performed for all, or at least for the illustrious persons of assembly, and a considerable time must been consumed since it was thrice repeated as each course or service was placed on the table But the wine still remained after the meat had been removed and the Huns continued to indulge their intemperance long after the sober and decent ambassadors of the two empires had withdrawn themselves from the nocturnal banquet Yet before they retired they enjoyed a singular opportunity of observing the manners of the nation in their convivial amusements Two Scythians stood before the couch of Attila and recited the verses which they had composed to celebrate his valour and his victories A profound silence prevailed in the hall and the attention of the guests was captivated by the vocal harmony which revived and perpetuated the memory of their own exploits a martial ardour flashed from the eyes of the warriors who were impatient for battle and the tears of the old men expressed their generous despair that they could no longer partake the danger and glory of the field [47] This entertainment which might be considered as a school of military virtue was succeeded by a farce that debased the dignity of human nature A Moorish and a Scythian buffoon successively excited the mirth of the rude spectators by their deformed figure ridiculous dress antic gestures absurd speeches and the strange unintelligible confusion of the Latin the Gothic and the Hunnic languages and the hall resounded with loud and licentious peals of laughter In the midst of this intemperate riot Attila alone without a change of countenance maintained his stead fast and inflexible gravity which was never relaxed except on the entrance of Irnac the youngest of his sons he embraced the boy with a smile of paternal tenderness gently pinched him by the cheek and betrayed a partial affection which was justified by the assurance of his prophets that Irnac would be the future support of his family and empire Two days afterwards the ambassadors received a second invitation and they had reason to praise the politeness as well as the hospitality of Attila The king of the Huns held a long and familiar conversation with Maximin but his civility was interrupted by rude expressions and haughty reproaches and he was provoked by a motive of interest to support with unbecoming zeal the private claims of his secretary Constantius The emperor (said Attila) has long promised him a rich wife Constantius must not be disappointed nor should a Roman emperor deserve the name of liar On the third day the ambassadors were dismissed th freedom of several captives was granted for a moderate ransom, to their pressing entreaties and besides the royal presents they were permitted to accept from each of the Scythian nobles the honourable and useful gift of a horse Maximin returned by the same road to Constantinople and though he was involved in an accidental dispute with Beric the new ambassador of Attila he flattered himself that he had contributed by the laborious journey to confirm the peace and alliance of the two nations [48]

But the Roman ambassador was ignorant o the treacherous design which had been con ce iled under the mask of the public faith Th surprise and satisfaction of Edecon when h contemplated the splendour of Constantinople had encouraged the interpreter Vigilius to pro cure for him a secret interview with the eunuc Chrysaphius [49] who governed the emperor an the empire After some previous conversation and a mutual oath of secrecy the eunuch wh had not from his own feelings or experience imbibed any exalted notions of ministerial vir tue ventured to propose the death of Attila as an important service by which Edeco might deserve a liberal share of the wealth an luxury which he admired The ambassador o the Huns listened to the tempting offer an professed with apparent zeal his ability a well as readiness to execute the bloody deed the design was communicated to the master o the offices and the devout Theodosius consent ed to the assassination of his invincible enemy But this perfidious conspiracy was defeated b the dissimulation or the repentance of Edecon and though he might exaggerate his inwar abhorrence for the treason which he seemed t approve he dexterously assumed the merit o an early and voluntary confession If we re review the embassy of Maximin and the be haviour of Attila we must applaud the barba rian who respected the laws of hospitality an generously entertained and dismissed the minis ter of a prince who had conspired against h life But the rashness of Vigilius will appear s more extraordinary since he returned con scious of his guilt and danger, to the roya camp accompanied by his son and carryin with him a weighty purse of gold which th favourite eunuch had furnished to satisfy th demands of Edecon and to corrupt the fide of the guards The interpreter was instan seized and dragged before the tribunal of Attila where he asserted his innocence with specious firmness till the threat of inflicting ins death on his son extorted from him a sincere discovery of the criminal transaction Under the name of ransom, or confiscation, the rapacious king of the Huns accepted two hundred pounds of gold for the life of a traitor whom he disdained to punish He pointed his just indignation against a nobler object His ambassadors, Eslaw and Orestes, were immediately despatched to Constantinople with a peremptory instruction, which it was much safer for them to execute than to disobey They boldly entered the Imperial presence with the fatal purse hanging down from the neck of Orestes, who interrogated the eunuch Chrysaphius, as he stood beside the throne, whether he recognised the evidence of his guilt But the office of reproof was reserved for the superior dignity of his colleague Eslaw, who gravely addressed the emperor of the East in the following words "Theodosius is the son of an illustrious and respectable parent Attila likewise is descended from a noble race, and he has supported, by his actions, the dignity which he inherited from his father Mundzuk. But Theodosius has forfeited his paternal honours, and, by consenting to pay tribute, has degraded himself to the condition of a slave It is therefore just that he should reverence the man whom fortune and merit have placed above him, instead of attempting, like a wicked slave, clandestinely to conspire against his master" The son of Arcadius, who was accustomed only to the voice of flattery, heard with astonishment the severe language of truth he blushed and trembled, nor did he presume directly to refuse the head of Chrysaphius, which Eslaw and Orestes were instructed to demand A solemn embassy, armed with full powers and magnificent gifts, was hastily sent to deprecate the wrath of Attila, and his pride was gratified by the choice of Nomius and Anatolius, two ministers of consular or patrician rank, of whom the one was great treasurer, and the other was master-general of the armies of the East He condescended to meet these ambassadors on the banks of the river Drenco, and though he at first affected a stern and haughty demeanour, his anger was insensibly mollified by their eloquence and liberality He condescended to pardon the emperor, the eunuch, and the interpreter, bound himself by an oath to observe the conditions of peace, released a great number of captives, abandoned the fugitives and deserters to their fate, and resigned a large territory, to the south of the Danube, which he had already exhausted of its wealth and inhabitants But this treaty was purchased at an expense which might have supported a vigorous and successful war, and the subjects of Theodosius were compelled to redeem the safety of a worthless favourite by oppressive taxes which they would more cheerfully have paid for his destruction [50]

The emperor Theodosius did not long survive the most humiliating circumstance of an inglorious life As he was riding or hunting in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, he was thrown from his horse into the river Lycus the spine of his back was injured by the fall, and he expired some days afterwards, in the fiftieth year of his age, and the forty-third of his reign [51] His sister Pulcheria, whose authority had been controlled both in civil and ecclesiastical affairs by the pernicious influence of the eunuchs, was unanimously proclaimed empress of the East, and the Romans, for the first time, submitted to a female reign No sooner had Pulcheria ascended the throne than she indulged her own and the public resentment by an act of popular justice Without any legal trial, the eunuch Chrysaphius was executed before the gates of the city, and the immense riches which had been accumulated by the rapacious favourite served only to hasten and to justify his punishment [52] Amidst the general acclamations of the clergy and people, the empress did not forget the prejudice and disadvantage to which her sex was exposed, and she wisely resolved to prevent their murmurs by the choice of a colleague who would always respect the superior rank and virgin chastity of his wife She gave her hand to Marcian, a senator, about sixty years of age, and the nominal husband of Pulcheria was solemnly invested with the Imperial purple The zeal which he displayed for the orthodox creed, as it was established by the council of Chalcedon, would alone have inspired the grateful eloquence of the catholics But the behaviour of Marcian in a private life, and afterwards on the throne, may support a more rational belief that he was qualified to restore and invigorate an empire which had been almost dissolved by the successive weakness of two hereditary monarchs He was born in Thrace, and educated to the profession of arms, but Marcian's youth had been severely exercised by poverty and misfortune, since his only resource, when he first arrived at Constantinople, consisted in two hundred pieces of gold which he had borrowed of a friend He passed nineteen years in the domestic and military service of Aspar and his son Ardaburius followed those powerful generals to the Persian and African wars and obtained by their influence the honourable rank of tribune and senator His mild disposition and useful talents without alarming the jealousy recommended Marcian to the esteem and favour of his patrons he had seen perhaps he had felt, the abuses of a venal and oppressive administration and his own example gave weight and energy to the laws which he promulgated for the reformation of manners [33]

CHAPTER XXXV

Invasion of Gaul by Attila He is repulsed by Aetius and the Visigoths Attila invades and evacuates Italy The Deaths of Attila, Aetius, and Valentinian the Third

It was the opinion of Marcian that war should be avoided as long as it is possible to preserve a secure and honourable peace but it was likewise his opinion that peace can not be honourable or secure if the sovereign betrays a pusillanimous aversion to war This temperate courage dictated his reply to the demands of Attila who insolently pressed the payment of the annual tribute The emperor signified to the barbarians that they must no longer insult the majesty of Rome by the mention of a tribute that he was disposed to reward with becoming liberality the faithful friendship of his allies but that if they presumed to violate the public peace they should feel that he possessed troops and arms and resolution to repel their attacks The same language even in the camp of the Huns was used by his ambassador Apollonius whose bold refusal to deliver the presents till he had been admitted to a personal interview displayed a sense of dignity and a contempt of danger which Attila was not prepared to expect from the degenerate Romans [1] He threatened to chastise the rash successor of Theodosius but he hesitated whether he should first direct his invincible arms against the Eastern or the Western empire While mankind awaited his decision with awful suspense he sent an equal defiance to the courts of Ravenna and Constantinople and his ministers saluted the two emperors with the same haughty declaration Attila my lord and thy lord commands thee to provide a palace for his immediate reception [2] But as the barbarian despised or affected to despise the Romans of the East whom he had so often vanquished he soon declared his resolution of suspending the easy conquest till he had achieved a more glorious and important enterprise In the memorable invasions of Gaul and Italy the Huns were naturally attracted by the wealth and fertility of those provinces but the particular motives and provocations of Attila can only be explained by the state of the Western empire under the reign of Valentinian or to speak more correctly under the administration of Aetius [3]

After the death of his rival Boniface Aetius had prudently retired to the tents of the Huns and he was indebted to their alliance for his safety and his restoration Instead of the suppliant language of a guilty exile he solicited his pardon at the head of sixty thousand barbarians and the empress Placidia confessed by a feeble resistance that the condescension which might have been ascribed to clemency was the effect of weakness or fear She delivered herself, her son Valentinian and the Western empire into the hands of an insolent subject nor could Placidia protect the son in law of Boniface, the virtuous and faithful Sebastian [4] from the implacable persecution which urged him from one kingdom to another, till he miserably perished in the service of the Vandals The fortunate Aetius who was immediately promoted to the rank of patrician and thrice invested with the honours of the consulship assumed with the title of master of the cavalry and infantry the whole military power of the state and he is sometimes styled by contemporary writers, the duke or general of the Romans of the West His prudence rather than his virtue engaged him to leave the grandson of Theodosius in the possession of the purple and Valentinian was permitted to enjoy the peace and luxury of Italy while the patrician appeared in the glorious light of a hero and a patriot who supported near twenty years the ruins of the Western empire The Gothic historian ingenuously confesses that Aetius was born for the salvation of the Roman republic [5] and the following portrait, though it is drawn in the fairest colours, must be allowed to contain a much larger proportion of truth than of flattery His mother was a wealthy and noble Italian, and his father Gaudentius, who held a distinguished rank in the province of Scythia, gradually rose from the station of a military domestic to the dignity of master of the cavalry Their son, who was enrolled almost in his infancy in the guards, was given as a hostage, first to Alaric, and afterwards to the Huns, and he successively obtained the civil and military honours of the palace, for which he was equally qualified by superior merit The graceful figure of Aetius was not above the middle stature, but his manly limbs were admirably formed for strength, beauty, and agility, and he excelled in the martial exercises of managing a horse, drawing a bow, and darting the javelin He could patiently endure the want of food or of sleep, and his mind and body were alike capable of the most laborious efforts He possessed the genuine courage that can despise not only dangers, but injuries and it was impossible either to corrupt, or deceive, or intimidate the firm integrity of his soul "[6] The barbarians, who had seated themselves in the Western provinces, were insensibly taught to respect the faith and valour of the patrician Aëtius He soothed their passions, consulted their prejudices, balanced their interest, and checked their ambition A seasonable treaty which he concluded with Genseric protected Italy from the depredations of the Vandals, the independent Britons implored and acknowledged his salutary aid, the Imperial authority was restored and maintained in Gaul and Spain, and he compelled the Franks and the Suevi, whom he had vanquished in the field, to become the useful confederates of the republic.

From a principle of interest, as well as gratitude, Aëtius assiduously cultivated the alliance of the Huns While he resided in their tents as an hostage or an exile, he had familiarly conversed with Attila himself, the nephew of his benefactor, and the two famous antagonists appear to have been connected by a personal and military friendship, which they afterwards confirmed by mutual gifts, frequent embassies, and the education of Carpilio, the son of Aëtius, in the camp of Attila By the specious professions of gratitude and voluntary attachment, the patrician might disguise his apprehensions of the Scythian conqueror, who pressed the two empires with his innumerable armies His demands were obeyed or eluded When he claimed the spoils of a vanquished city, some vases of gold, which had been fraudulently embezzled, the civil and military governors of Noricum were immediately despatched to satisfy his complaints [7] and it is evident, from their conversation with Maximin and Priscus in the royal village, that the valour and prudence of Aetius had not saved the Western Romans from the common ignominy of tribute Yet his dexterous policy prolonged the advantages of a salutary peace, and a numerous army of Huns and Alani, whom he had attached to his person was employed in the defence of Gaul Two colonies of these barbarians were judiciously fixed in the territories of Valence and Orleans,[8] and their active cavalry secured the important passages of the Rhône and of the Loire These savage allies were not indeed less formidable to the subjects than to the enemies of Rome Their original settlement was enforced with the licentious violence of conquest, and the province through which they marched was exposed to all the calamities of an hostile invasion [9] Strangers to the emperor or the republic, the Alani of Gaul were devoted to the ambition of Aëtius, and though he might suspect that, in a contest with Attila himself, they would revolt to the standard of their national king, the patrician laboured to restrain, rather than to excite, their zeal and resentment against the Goths, the Burgundians, and the Franks

The kingdom established by the Visigoths in the southern provinces of Gaul had gradually acquired strength and maturity, and the conduct of those ambitious barbarians, either in peace or war, engaged the perpetual vigilance of Aëtius After the death of Wallia, the Gothic sceptre devolved to Theodoric, the son of the great Alaric,[10] and his prosperous reign of more than thirty years over a turbulent people may be allowed to prove that his prudence was supported by uncommon vigour, both of mind and body Impatient of his narrow limits, Theodoric aspired to the possession of Arles, the wealthy seat of government and commerce, but the city was saved by the timely approach of Aëtius, and the Gothic king, who had raised the siege with some loss and disgrace, was persuaded, for an adequate subsidy, to divert the martial valour of his subjects in a Spanish war Yet Theodoric still watched, and eagerly seized, the favourable moment of renewing his hostile attempts The Goths besieged Narbonne, while the Belgic provinces were invaded by the Burgundians, and the public safety was threatened on every side by the apparent union of the enemies of Rome On every side, the activity of Aëtius and his Scythian cavalry opposed a and successful resistance Twenty

mains of the nation humbly accepted a dependent seat in the mountains of Savoy [11] The walls of Narbonne had been shaken by the battering engines and the inhabitants had endured the last extremities of famine when Count Litorius approaching in silence and directing each horseman to carry behind him two sacks of flour cut his way through the entrenchments of the besiegers The siege was immediately raised and the more decisive victory which is ascribed to the personal conduct of Aetius himself was marked with the blood of eight thousand Goths But in the absence of the patrician who was hastily summoned to Italy by some public or private interest Count Litorius succeeded to the command and his presumption soon discovered that far different talents are required to lead a wing of cavalry or to direct the operations of an important war At the head of an army of Huns he rashly advanced to the gates of Toulouse full of careless contempt for an enemy whom his misfortunes had rendered prudent and his situation made desperate The predictions of the augurs had inspired Litorius with the profane confidence that he should enter the Gothic capital in triumph and the trust which he reposed in his Pagan allies encouraged him to reject the fair conditions of peace which were repeatedly proposed by the bishops in the name of Theodoric The king of the Goths exhibited in his distress the edifying contrast of Christian piety and moderation nor did he lay aside his sackcloth and ashes till he was prepared to arm for the combat His soldiers animated with martial and religious enthusiasm assaulted the camp of Litorius The conflict was obstinate the slaughter was mutual The Roman general after a total defeat which could be imputed only to his unskilful rashness, was actually led through the streets of Toulouse not in his own but in an hostile triumph and the misery which he experienced in a long and ignominious captivity excited the compassion of the barbarians themselves [12] Such a loss in a country whose spirit and finances were long since exhausted could not easily be repaired and the Goths assuming in their turn the sentiments of ambition and revenge would have planted their victorious standards on the banks of the Rhône if the presence of Aëtius had not restored strength and discipline to the Romans [13] The two armies expected the signal of a decisive action but the generals, who were conscious of each other's force, and doubtful of their own superiority prudently sheathed their swords in the field of battle and their reconciliation was permanent and sincere Theodoric king of the Visigoths, appears to have deserved the love of his subjects the confidence of his allies and the esteem of mankind His throne was surrounded by six valiant sons who were educated with equal care in the exercises of the barbarian camp and in those of the Gallic schools from the study of the Roman jurisprudence they acquired the theory at least of law and justice and the harmonious sense of Virgil contributed to soften the asperity of their native manners [14] The two daughters of the Gothic king were given in marriage to the eldest sons of the kings of the Suevi and of the Vandals who reigned in Spain and Africa but these illustrious alliances were pregnant with guilt and discord The queen of the Suevi bewailed the death of an husband, inhumanly massacred by her brother The princess of the Vandals was the victim of a jealous tyrant whom she called her father The cruel Genseric suspected that his son s wife had conspired to poison him the supposed crime was punished by the amputation of her nose and ears and the unhappy daughter of Theodoric was ignominiously returned to the court of Toulouse in that deformed and mutilated condition This horrid act which must seem incredible to a civilised age drew tears from every spectator but Theodoric was urged by the feelings of a parent and a king to revenge such irreparable injuries The Imperial ministers, who always cherished the discord of the barbarians would have supplied the Goths with arms and ships and treasures for the African war and the cruelty of Genseric might have been fatal to himself if the artful Vandal had not armed in his cause the formidable power of the Huns His rich gifts and pressing solicitations inflamed the ambition of Attila and the designs of Aetius and Theodoric were prevented by the invasion of Gaul [15]

The Franks whose monarchy was still confined to the neighbourhood of the Lower Rhine had wisely established the right of hereditary succession in the noble family of the Merovingians [16] These princes were elevated on a buckler the symbol of military command [17] and the royal fashion of long hair was the ensign of their birth and dignity Their flaxen locks which they combed and dressed with singular care hung down in flowing ringlets on their back and shoulders while the rest of the nation were obliged either by law or custom to shave the hinder part of their head, to comb their hair over the forehead and to con tent themselves with the ornament of two small whiskers [18] The lofty stature of the Franks and their blue eyes denoted a Germanic origin, their close apparel accurately expressed the figure of their limbs, a weighty sword was suspended from a broad belt, their bodies were protected by a large shield and these warlike barbarians were trained from their earliest youth to run, to leap, to swim, to dart the javelin or battle axe with unerring aim, to advance without hesitation against a superior enemy, and to maintain, either in life or death, the invincible reputation of their ancestors [19] Clodion, the first of their long-haired kings whose name and actions are mentioned in authentic history, held his residence at Dispargum,[20] a village or fortress, whose place may be assigned between Louvain and Brussels From the report of his spies the king of the Franks was informed that the defenceless state of the second Belgic must yield, on the slightest attack, to the valour of his subjects He boldly penetrated through the thickets and morasses of the Carbonarian forest,[21] occupied Tournay and Cambray, the only cities which existed in the fifth century, and extended his conquests as far as the river Somme, over a desolate country whose cultivation and populousness are the effects of more recent industry [22] While Clodion lay encamped in the plains of Artois,[23] and celebrated with vain and ostentatious security the marriage perhaps of his son, the nuptial feast was interrupted by the unexpected and unwelcome presence of Aetius, who had passed the Somme at the head of his light cavalry The tables, which had been spread under the shelter of a hill along the banks of a pleasant stream, were rudely overturned, the Franks were oppressed before they could recover their arms or their ranks, and their unavailing valour was fatal only to themselves The loaded waggons which had followed their march afforded a rich booty, and the virgin-bride with her female attendants submitted to the new lovers who were imposed on them by the chance of war This advantage, which had been obtained by the skill and activity of Aëtius, might reflect some disgrace on the military prudence of Clodion, but the king of the Franks soon regained his strength and reputation and still maintained the possession of his Gallic kingdom from the Rhine to the Somme [24] Under his reign, and most probably from the enterprising spirit of his subjects, the three capitals, Mentz, Trèves, and Cologne, experienced the effects of hostile cruelty and avarice. The distress of Cologne was prolonged by the perpetual dominion of the same barbarians who evacuated the ruins of Trèves, and Trèves, which in the space of forty years had been four times besieged and pillaged, was disposed to lose the memory of her afflictions in the vain amusements of the circus [25] The death of Clodion, after a reign of twenty years, exposed his kingdom to the discord and ambition of his two sons Meroveus, the younger,[26] was persuaded to implore the protection of Rome, he was received at the Imperial court as the ally of Valentinian and the adopted son of the patrician Aetius, and dismissed to his native country with splendid gifts and the strongest assurances of friendship and support During his absence his elder brother had solicited with equal ardour the formidable aid of Attila, and the king of the Huns embraced an alliance which facilitated the passage of the Rhine, and justified by a specious and honourable pretence the invasion of Gaul [27]

When Attila declared his resolution of supporting the cause of his allies the Vandals and the Franks, at the same time, and almost in the spirit of romantic chivalry, the savage monarch professed himself the lover and the champion of the princess Honoria The sister of Valentinian was educated in the palace of Ravenna, and as her marriage might be productive of some danger to the state, she was raised, by the title of Augusta,[28] above the hopes of the most presumptuous subject But the fair Honoria had no sooner attained the sixteenth year of her age than she detested the importunate greatness which must for ever exclude her from the comforts of honourable love in the midst of vain and unsatisfactory pomp Honoria sighed, yielded to the impulse of nature, and threw herself into the arms of her chamberlain Eugenius Her guilt and shame (such is the absurd language of imperious man) were soon betrayed by the appearances of pregnancy but the disgrace of the royal family was published to the world by the imprudence of the empress Placidia, who dismissed her daughter, after a strict and shameful confinement, to a remote exile at Constantinople The unhappy princess passed twelve or fourteen years in the irksome society of the sisters of Theodosius and their chosen virgins, to whose crown Honoria could no longer aspire, and whose monastic assiduity of prayer, fasting and vigils she reluctantly imitated Her impatience of long and hopeless celibacy urged her to embrace a strange and desperate resolution The name of Attila was familiar and formidable at Constantinople, and his frequent embassies

entertained a perpetual intercourse between his camp and the Imperial palace In the pursuit of love or rather of revenge the daughter of Placidia sacrificed every duty and every prejudice and offered to deliver her person into the arms of a barbarian of whose language she was ignorant whose figure was scarcely human and whose religion and manners she abhorred By the ministry of a faithful eunuch she transmitted to Attila a ring the pledge of her affection and earnestly conjured him to claim her as a lawful spouse to whom he had been secretly betrothed These indecent advances were received however with coldness and disdain and the king of the Huns continued to multiply the number of his wives till his love was awakened by the more forcible passions of ambition and avarice The invasion of Gaul was preceded and justified by a formal demand of the princess Honoria with a just and equal share of the Imperial patrimony His predecessors the ancient Tanjous had often addressed in the same hostile and peremptory manner the daughters of China and the pretensions of Attila were not less offensive to the majesty of Rome A firm but temperate refusal was communicated to his ambassadors The right of female succession though it might derive a specious argument from the recent examples of Placidia and Pulcheria was strenuously denied and the indissoluble engagements of Honoria were opposed to the claims of her Scythian lover [29] On the discovery of her connection with the king of the Huns the guilty princess had been sent away as an object of horror from Constantinople to Italy her life was spared but the ceremony of her marriage was performed with some obscure and nominal husband before she was immured in a perpetual prison to bewail those crimes and misfortunes which Honoria might have escaped had she not been born the daughter of an emperor [30]

A native of Gaul and a contemporary the learned and eloquent Sidonius who was afterwards bishop of Clermont had made a promise to one of his friends that he would compose a regular history of the war of Attila If the modesty of Sidonius had not discouraged him from the prosecution of this interesting work [31] the historian would have related with the simplicity of tru h tho^e memorable events to which the poet in vague and doubtful metaphors has cor isely alluded [3] The kings and nations of Germany and Scythia from the Volga perhaps to the Danube obeyed the warlike summons of Attila From the royal village in the plains of Hungary his standard moved towards the West, and after a march of seven or eight hundred miles he reached the conflux of the Rhine and the Neckar where he was joined by the Franks who adhered to his ally the elder of the sons of Clodion A troop of light barbarians who roamed in quest of plunder might choose the winter for the convenience of passing the river on the ice but the innumerable cavalry of the Huns required such plenty of forage and provisions as could be procured only in a milder season th Hercynian forest supplied materials for a bridge of boats and the hostile myriads were poured with resistless violence into the Belgic provinces [33] The consternation of Gaul was universal and the various fortunes of its cities have been adorned by tradition with martyrdoms and miracles [34] Troyes was saved by the merits of St Lupus St Servatius was removed from the world that he might not behold the ruin of Tongres and the prayers of St Genevieve diverted the march of Attila from the neighbourhood of Paris But as the greatest part of the Gallic cities were alike destitute of saints and soldiers they were besieged and stormed by the Huns who practised in the example of Metz [35] their customary maxims of war They involved in a promiscuous massacre the pries who served at the altar and the infants who i the hour of danger had been providently bap tised by the bishop the flourishing city wa delivered to the flames and a solitary chapel o St Stephen marked the place where it formerl stood From the Rhine and the Moselle Attil advanced into the heart of Gaul crossed th Seine at Auxerre and after a long and laborio march fixed his camp under the walls of Or leans He was desirous of securing his conques by the possession of an advantageous post whic commanded the passage of the Loire and h depended on the secret invitation of Sangibar king of the Alani who had promised to betra the city and to revolt from the service of th empire But th s treacherous conspiracy wa detected and disappointed Orleans had bee strengthened with recent fortifications and th assaults of the Huns were vigorously repelle by the faithful valour of the soldiers or citizen who defended the place The pastoral diligenc of Anianus a bishop of primitive sanctity an consummate prudence exhausted every art o religious policy to support their courage till th arrival of the expected succours After an ob stinate siege the walls were shaken by the bat tering rams the Huns had already occupie the suburbs and the people who were incapabl

of bearing arms lay prostrate in prayer Anianus, who anxiously counted the days and hours, despatched a trusty messenger to observe from the rampart the face of the distant country He returned twice without any intelligence that could inspire hope or comfort, but in his third report he mentioned a small cloud which he had faintly descried at the extremity of the horizon "It is the aid of God!" exclaimed the bishop in a tone of pious confidence, and the whole multitude repeated after him "It is the aid of God" The remote object, on which every eye was fixed, became each moment larger and more distinct, the Roman and Gothic banners were gradually perceived, and a favourable wind, blowing aside the dust, discovered in deep array, the impatient squadrons of Aëtius and Theodoric, who pressed forwards to the relief of Orleans

The facility with which Attila had penetrated into the heart of Gaul may be ascribed to his insidious policy as well as to the terror of his arms His public declarations were skilfully mitigated by his private assurances, he alternately soothed and threatened the Romans and the Goths, and the courts of Ravenna and Toulouse, mutually suspicious of each other's intentions, beheld with supine indifference the approach of their common enemy Aëtius was the sole guardian of the public safety, but his wisest measures were embarrassed by a faction which, since the death of Placidia, infested the Imperial palace the youth of Italy trembled at the sound of the trumpet, and the barbarians, who from fear or affection were inclined to the cause of Attila, awaited with doubtful and venal faith the event of the war The patrician passed the Alps at the head of some troops whose strength and numbers scarcely deserved the name of an army [36] But on his arrival at Arles or Lyons he was confounded by the intelligence that the Visigoths, refusing to embrace the defence of Gaul, had determined to expect within their own territories the formidable invader whom they professed to despise The senator Avitus, who after the honourable exercise of the Pretorian prefecture had retired to his estate in Auvergne, was persuaded to accept the important embassy, which he executed with ability and success He represented to Theodoric that an ambitious conqueror who aspired to the dominion of the earth could be resisted only by the firm and unanimous alliance of the powers whom he laboured to oppress The lively eloquence of Avitus inflamed the Gothic warriors by the description of the injuries which their ancestors had suffered from the Huns, whose implacable fury still pursued them from the Danube to the foot of the Pyrenees He strenuously urged that it was the duty of every Christian to save from sacrilegious violation the churches of God and the relics of the saints, that it was the interest of every barbarian who had acquired a settlement in Gaul to defend the fields and vineyards, which were cultivated for his use, against the desolation of the Scythian shepherds Theodoric yielded to the evidence of truth, adopted the measure at once the most prudent and the most honourable, and declared that as the faithful ally of Aëtius and the Romans he was ready to expose his life and kingdom for the common safety of Gaul [37] The Visigoths, who at that time were in the mature vigour of their fame and power, obeyed with alacrity the signal of war, prepared their arms and horses and assembled under the standard of their aged king, who was resolved, with his two eldest sons, Torismond and Theodoric, to command in person his numerous and valiant people The example of the Goths determined several tribes or nations that seemed to fluctuate between the Huns and the Romans The indefatigable diligence of the patrician gradually collected the troops of Gaul and Germany, who had formerly acknowledged themselves the subjects or soldiers of the republic, but who now claimed the rewards of voluntary service and the rank of independent allies the Læti, the Armoricans, the Breones, the Saxons, the Burgundians, the Sarmatians or Alani, the Ripuarians, and the Franks who followed Meroveus as their lawful prince Such was the various army which under the conduct of Aetius and Theodoric, advanced by rapid marches to relieve Orleans, and to give battle to the innumerable host of Attila [38]

On their approach the king of the Huns immediately raised the siege, and sounded a retreat to recall the foremost of his troops from the pillage of a city which they had already entered [39] The valour of Attila was always guided by his prudence, and as he foresaw the fatal consequences of a defeat in the heart of Gaul, he repassed the Seine, and expected the enemy in the plains of Châlons whose smooth and level surface was adapted to the operations of his Scythian cavalry But in this tumultuary retreat the vanguard of the Romans and their allies continually pressed and sometimes engaged, the troops whom Attila had posted in the rear, the hostile columns in the darkness of the night and the perplexity of the roads, might encounter each other without design and the bloody conflict of the Franks and Gepidæ in which fifteen thousand[40] barbarians were slain was a prelude to a more general and decisive action The Catalaunian fields[41] spread themselves round Châlons and extend according to the vague measurement of Jornandes to the length of one hundred and fifty and the breadth of one hundred miles over the whole province which is entitled to the appellation of a champaign country[42] This spacious plain was distinguished however by some inequalities of ground and the importance of an height which commanded the camp of Attila was understood and disputed by the two generals The young and valiant Torismond first occupied the summit the Goths rushed with irresistible weight on the Huns who laboured to ascend from the opposite side and the possession of this advantageous post inspired both the troops and their leaders with a fair assurance of victory The anxiety of Attila prompted him to consult his priests and haruspices It was reported that after scrutinising the entrails of victims and scraping their bones they revealed in mysterious language his own defeat with the death of his principal adversary and that the barbarian by accepting the equivalent expressed his involuntary esteem for the superior merit of Aetius But the unusual despondency which seemed to prevail among the Huns engaged Attila to use the expedient so familiar to the generals of antiquity of animating his troops by a military oration and his language was that of a king who had often fought and conquered at their head[43] He pressed them to consider their past glory their actual danger and their future hopes The same fortune which opened the deserts and morasses of Scythia to their unarmed valour which had laid so many warlike nations prostrate at their feet had reserved the joys of this memorable field for the consummation of their victories The cautious steps of their enemies their strict alliance and their advantageous posts he artfully represented as the effects not of prudence but of fear The Visigoths alone were the strength and nerves of the opposite army and the Huns might securely trample on the degenerate Romans whose close and compact order betrayed their apprehensions and who were equally incapable of supporting the dangers or the fatigues of a day of battle The doctrine of predestination so favourable to martial virtue was carefully inculcated by the king of the Huns who assured his subjects that the warriors protected by Heaven were safe and invulnerable amidst the darts of the enemy but that the unerring Fates would strike their victims in the bosom of inglorious peace I myself continued Attila ' will throw the first javelin and the wretch who refuses to imitate the example of his sovereign is devoted to inevitable death The spirit of the barbarians was rekindled by the presence the voice, and the example of their intrepid leader and Attila yielding to their impatience immediately formed his order of battle At the head of his brave and faithful Huns he occupied in person the centre of the line. The nations subject to his empire the Rugians the Heruli the Thuringians the Franks the Burgundians, were extended on either hand over the ample space of the Catalaunian fields the right wing was commanded by Ardaric, king of the Gepidæ and the three valiant brothers who reigned over the Ostrogoths were posted on the left to oppose the kindred tribes of the Visigoths The disposition of the allies was regulated by a different principle Sangiban the faithless king of the Alani was placed in the centre where his motions might be strictly watched and his treachery might be instantly punished Aëtius assumed the command of the left and Theodoric of the right wing while Torismond still continued to occupy the heights which appear to have stretched on the flank and perhaps the rear of the Scythian army The nations from the Volga to the Atlantic were assembled on the plain of Châlons but many of these nations had been divided by faction or conquest or emigration and the appearance of similar arms and ensigns, which threatened each other presented the image of a civil war

The discipline and tactics of the Greeks and Romans form an interesting part of their national manners The attentive study of the military operations of Xenophon or Cæsar or Frederic when they are described by the same genius which conceived and executed them may tend to improve (if such improvement can be wished) the art of destroying the human species But the battle of Châlons can only excite our curiosity by the magnitude of the object since it was decided by the blind impetuosity of barbarians and has been related by partial writers whose civil and ecclesiastical profession secluded them from the knowledge of military affairs Cassiodorus, however had familiarly conversed with many Gothic warriors who served in that memorable engagement a conflict as they informed him fierce various, obstinate and bloody such as could not be

paralleled either in the present or in past ages " The number of the slain amounted to one hundred and sixty two thousand, or, according to another account, three hundred thousand persons,[44] and these incredible exaggerations suppose a real and effective loss, sufficient to justify the historian's remark that whole generations may be swept away by the madness of kings in the space of a single hour After the mutual and repeated discharge of missile weapons, in which the archers of Scythia might signalise their superior dexterity, the cavalry and infantry of the two armies were furiously mingled in closer combat The Huns, who fought under the eyes of their king, pierced through the feeble and doubtful centre of the allies, separated their wings from each other, and wheeling, with a rapid effort, to the left, directed their whole force against the Visigoths As Theodoric rode along the ranks to animate his troops, he received a mortal stroke from the javelin of Andages, a noble Ostrogoth, and immediately fell from his horse The wounded king was oppressed in the general disorder and trampled under the feet of his own cavalry, and this important death served to explain the ambiguous prophecy of the haruspices Attila already exulted in the confidence of victory, when the valiant Torismond descended from the hills, and verified the remainder of the prediction The Visigoths, who had been thrown into confusion by the flight, or defection, of the Alani, gradually restored their order of battle, and the Huns were undoubtedly vanquished, since Attila was compelled to retreat He had exposed his person with the rashness of a private soldier, but the intrepid troops of the centre had pushed forwards beyond the rest of the line, their attack was faintly supported, their flanks were unguarded, and the conquerors of Scythia and Germany were saved by the approach of the night from a total defeat They retired within the circle of waggons that fortified their camp, and the dismounted squadrons prepared themselves for a defence to which neither their arms nor their temper were adapted The event was doubtful but Attila had secured a last and honourable resource The saddles and rich furniture of the cavalry were collected by his order into a funeral pile, and the magnanimous barbarian had resolved, if his entrenchments should be forced, to rush headlong into the flames, and to deprive his enemies of the glory which they might have acquired by the death or captivity of Attila [45]

But his enemies had passed the night in equal disorder and anxiety The inconsiderate courage of Torismond was tempted to urge the pursuit, till he unexpectedly found himself, with a few followers, in the midst of the Scythian waggons In the confusion of a nocturnal combat he was thrown from his horse, and the Gothic prince must have perished like his father, if his youthful strength and the intrepid zeal of his companions had not rescued him from this dangerous situation In the same manner, but on the left of the line, Aëtius himself, separated from his allies, ignorant of their victory, and anxious for their fate, encountered and escaped the hostile troops that were scattered over the plains of Châlons, and at length reached the camp of the Goths, which he could only fortify with a slight rampart of shields till the dawn of day The Imperial general was soon satisfied of the defeat of Attila, who still remained inactive within his entrenchments, and when he contemplated the bloody scene, he observed, with secret satisfaction, that the loss had principally fallen on the barbarians The body of Theodoric, pierced with honourable wounds, was discovered under a heap of the slain his subjects bewailed the death of their king and father, but their tears were mingled with songs and acclamations, and his funeral rites were performed in the face of a vanquished enemy The Goths, clashing their arms, elevated on a buckler his eldest son Torismond, to whom they justly ascribed the glory of their success, and the new king accepted the obligation of revenge as a sacred portion of his paternal inheritance Yet the Goths themselves were astonished by the fierce and undaunted aspect of their formidable antagonist, and their historian has compared Attila to a lion encompassed in his den and threatening his hunters with redoubled fury The kings and nations who might have deserted his standard in the hour of distress were made sensible that the displeasure of their monarch was the most imminent and inevitable danger All his instruments of martial music incessantly sounded a loud and animating strain of defiance, and the foremost troops, who advanced to the assault, were checked or destroyed by showers of arrows from every side of the entrenchments It was determined in a general council of war to besiege the king of the Huns in his camp, to intercept his provisions, and to reduce him to the alternative of a disgraceful treaty or an unequal combat But the impatience of the barbarians soon disdained these cautious and dilatory measures and the [illegible] policy of Aëtius was apprehensive that, after extirpation of the Huns the republic would be oppressed by the pride and power of the Gothic nation The patrician exerted the superior ascendant of authority and reason to calm the passions which the son of Theodoric considered as a duty represented with seeming affection and real truth the dangers of absence and delay and persuaded Torismond to disappoint by his speedy return the ambitious designs of his brothers who might occupy the throne and treasures of Toulouse [46] After the departure of the Goths and the separation of the allied army Attila was surprised at the vast silence that reigned over the plains of Châlons the suspicion of some hostile stratagem detained him several days within the circle of his waggons and his retreat beyond the Rhine confessed the last victory which was achieved in the name of the Western empire Meroveus and his Franks observing a prudent distance and magnifying the opinion of their strength by the numerous fires which they kindled every night continued to follow the rear of the Huns till they reached the confines of Thuringia. The Thuringians served in the army of Attila they traversed both in their march and in their return the territories of the Franks and it was perhaps in this war that they exercised the cruelties which about fourscore years afterwards were revenged by the son of Clovis They massacred their hostages as well as their captives two hundred young maidens were tortured with exquisite and unrelenting rage their bodies were torn asunder by wild horses or their bones were crushed under the weight of rolling waggons and their unburied limbs were abandoned on the public roads as a prey to dogs and vultures Such were those savage ancestors whose imaginary virtues have sometimes excited the praise and envy of civilised ages! [47]

Neither the spirit nor the forces nor the reputation of Attila were impaired by the failure of the Gallic expedition In the ensuing spring he repeated his demand of the princess Honoria and her patrimonial treasures The demand was again rejected or eluded and the indignant lover immediately took the field passed the Alps invaded Italy and besieged Aquileia with an innumerable host of barbarians Those barbarians were unskilled in the methods of conducting a regular siege which even among the ancients required some knowledge or at least some practice of the mechanic arts But the labour of many thousand provincials and captives whose lives were sacrificed without pity might execute the most painful and dangerous work The skill of the Roman artists might be corrupted to the destruction of their country The walls of Aquileia were assaulted by a formidable train of battering rams movable turrets and engines that threw stones darts, and fire [48] and the monarch of the Huns employed the forcible impulse of hope, fear emulation, and interest to subvert the only barrier which delayed the conquest of Italy Aquileia was at that period one of the richest the most populous and the strongest of the maritime cities of the Hadriatic coast The Gothic auxiliaries, who appear to have served under their native princes Alaric and Antala communicated their intrepid spirit and the citizens still remembered the glorious and successful resistance which their ancestors had opposed to a fierce inexorable barbarian who disgraced the majesty of the Roman purple Three months were consumed without effect in the siege of Aquileia till the want of provisions and the clamours of his army compelled Attila to relinquish the enterprise and reluctantly to issue his orders that the troops should strike their tents the next morning and begin their retreat But as he rode round the walls pensive angry and disappointed he observed a stork preparing to leave her nest in one of the towers and to fly with her infant family towards the country He seized with the ready penetration of a statesman this trifling incident which chance had offered to superstition and exclaimed in a loud and cheerful tone that such a domestic bird so constantly attached to human society would never have abandoned her ancient seats unless those towers had been devoted to impending ruin and solitude [49] The favourable omen inspired an assurance of victory the siege was renewed and prosecuted with fresh vigour a large breach was made in the part of the wall from whence the stork had taken her flight the Huns mounted to the assault with irresistible fury and the succeeding generation could scarcely discover the ruins of Aquileia [50] After this dreadful chastisement Attila pursued his march and as he passed the cities of Altinum Concordia and Padua were reduced into heaps of stones and ashes The inland towns Vicenza Verona and Bergamo were exposed to the rapacious cruelty of the Huns Milan and Pavia submitted without resistance to the loss of their wealth and applauded the unusual clemency which preserved from the flames the public as well as private buildings and spared the lives of the captive multitude The popular traditions of Comum Turin or Modena may justly be suspected, yet they concur with more authentic evidence to prove that Attila spread his ravages over the rich plains of modern Lombardy, which are divided by the Po, and bounded by the Alps and Apennine [51] When he took possession of the royal palace of Milan, he was surprised and offended at the sight of a picture which represented the Cæsars seated on their throne, and the princes of Scythia prostrate at their feet The revenge which Attila inflicted on this monument of Roman vanity was harmless and ingenious He commanded a painter to reverse the figures and the attitudes, and the emperors were delineated on the same canvas approaching in a suppliant posture to empty their bags of tributary gold before the throne of the Scythian monarch [52] The spectators must have confessed the truth and propriety of the alteration, and were perhaps tempted to apply, on this singular occasion, the well-known fable of the dispute between the lion and the man [53]

It is a saying worthy of the ferocious pride of Attila, that the grass never grew on the spot where his horse had trod Yet the savage destroyer undesignedly laid the foundations of a republic which revived, in the feudal state of Europe, the art and spirit of a commercial industry The celebrated name of Venice, or Venetia [54] was formerly diffused over a large and fertile province of Italy, from the confines of Pannonia to the river Addua, and from the Po to the Rhætian and the Julian Alps Before the irruption of the barbarians, fifty Venetian cities flourished in peace and prosperity Aquileia was placed in the most conspicuous station but the ancient dignity of Padua was supported by agriculture and manufactures, and the property of five hundred citizens, who were entitled to the equestrian rank, must have amounted, at the strictest computation, to one million seven hundred thousand pounds Many families of Aquileia, Padua, and the adjacent towns, who fled from the sword of the Huns, found a safe, though obscure, refuge in the neighbouring islands [55] At the extremity of the Gulf, where the Hadriatic feebly imitates the tides of the ocean, near an hundred small islands are separated by shallow water from the continent, and protected from the waves by several long slips of land, which admit the entrance of vessels through some secret and narrow channels [56] Till the middle of the fifth century these remote and sequestered spots remained without cultivation, with few inhabitants and almost without a name But the manners of the Venetian fugitives, their arts and their government, were gradually formed by their new situation, and one of the epistles of Cassiodorus,[57] which describes their condition about seventy years afterwards, may be considered as the primitive monument of the republic The minister of Theodoric compares them, in his quaint declamatory style, to waterfowl, who had fixed their nests on the bosom of the waves, and though he allows that the Venetian provinces had formerly contained many noble families, he insinuates that they were now reduced by misfortune to the same level of humble poverty Fish was the common, and almost the universal, food of every rank their only treasure consisted in the plenty of salt which they extracted from the sea and the exchange of that commodity, so essential to human life, was substituted in the neighbouring markets to the currency of gold and silver 'A people whose habitations might be doubtfully assigned to the earth or water soon became alike familiar with the two elements, and the demands of avarice succeeded to those of necessity The islanders, who, from Grado to Chiozza, were intimately connected with each other, penetrated into the heart of Italy, by the secure, though laborious, navigation of the rivers and inland canals Their vessels, which were continually increasing in size and number, visited all the harbours of the Gulf, and the marriage which Venice annually celebrates with the Hadriatic was contracted in her early infancy The epistle of Cassiodorus, the Prætorian præfect, is addressed to the maritime tribunes, and he exhorts them, in a mild tone of authority, to animate the zeal of their countrymen for the public service, which required their assistance to transport the magazines of wine and oil from the province of Istria to the royal city of Ravenna The ambiguous office of these magistrates is explained by the tradition, that, in the twelve principal islands, twelve tribunes, or judges, were created by an annual and popular election The existence of the Venetian republic under the Gothic kingdom of Italy is attested by the same authentic record which annihilates their lofty claim of original and perpetual independence [58]

The Italians who had long since renounced the exercise of arms were surprised, after forty years' peace, by the approach of a formidable barbarian, whom they abhorred as the enemy of their religion as well as of their republic Amidst the general consterna[illegible] Aetius al[illegible] was incapable of fear, but it was [illegible] that he should achieve alone [illegible] military exploits worth[illegible] of [illegible] former [illegible]

The barbarians who had defended Gaul refused to march to the relief of Italy and the succours promised by the Eastern emperor were distant and doubtful Since Aetius at the head of his domestic troops still maintained the field and harassed or retarded the march of Attila he never showed himself more truly great than at the time when his conduct was blamed by an ignorant and ungrateful people [59] If the mind of Valentinian had been susceptible of any generous sentiments he would have chosen such a general for his example and his guide But the timid grandson of Theodosius instead of sharing the dangers escaped from the sound of war and his hasty retreat from Ravenna to Rome from an impregnable fortress to an open capital betrayed his secret intention of abandoning Italy as soon as the danger should approach his Imperial person This shameful abdication was suspended however by the spirit of doubt and delay which commonly adheres to pusillanimous counsels and sometimes corrects their pernicious tendency The Western emperor with the senate and people of Rome embraced the more salutary resolution of deprecating by a solemn and suppliant embassy the wrath of Attila This important commission was accepted by Avienus who from his birth and riches his consular dignity the numerous train of his clients and his personal abilities held the first rank in the Roman senate The specious and artful character of Avienus[60] was admirably qualified to conduct a negotiation either of public or private interest his colleague Trigetius had exercised the Prætorian præfecture of Italy and Leo bishop of Rome consented to expose his life for the safety of his flock The genius of Leo [61] was exercised and displayed in the public misfortunes and he has deserved the appellation of Great by the successful zeal with which he laboured to establish his opinions and his authority under the venerable names of orthodox faith and ecclesiastical discipline The Roman ambassadors were introduced to the tent of Attila as he lay encamped at the place where the slow winding Mincius is lost in the foaming waves of the lake Benacus [62] and trampled with his Scythian cavalry the farms of Catullus and Virgil.[63] The barbarian monarch listened with favourable and even respectful attention and the deliverance of Italy was purchased by the immense ransom or dowry of the princess Honoria The state of his army might facilitate the treaty and hasten his retreat Their martial spirit was relaxed by the wealth and indolence of a warm climate. The shepherds of the North whose ordinary food consisted of milk and raw flesh indulged themselves too freely in the use of bread of wine and of meat prepared and seasoned by the arts of cookery and the progress of disease revenged in some measure the injuries of the Italians [64] When Attila declared his resolution of carrying his victorious arms to the gates of Rome he was admonished by his friends as well as by his enemies that Alaric had not long survived the conquest of the eternal city His mind superior to real danger was assaulted by imaginary terrors nor could he escape the influence of superstition which had so often been subservient to his designs [65] The pressing eloquence of Leo his majestic aspect and sacerdotal robes excited the veneration of Attila for the spiritual father of the Christians The apparition of the two apostles of St. Peter and St Paul who menaced the barbarian with instant death if he rejected the prayer of their successor is one of the noblest legends of ecclesiastical tradition The safety of Rome might deserve the interposition of celestial beings and some indulgence is due to a fable which has been represented by the pencil of Raphael and the chisel of Algardi [66]

Before the king of the Huns evacuated Italy he threatened to return more dreadful and more implacable, if his bride the princess Honoria were not delivered to his ambassadors within the term stipulated by the treaty Yet in the meanwhile Attila relieved his tender anxiety by adding a beautiful maid whose name was Ildico to the list of his innumerable wives [67] Their marriage was celebrated with barbaric pomp and festivity at his wooden palace beyond the Danube and the monarch oppressed with wine and sleep retired at a late hour from the banquet to the nuptial bed His attendants continued to respect his pleasures or his repose the greatest part of the ensuing day, till the unusual silence alarmed their fears and suspicions and after attempting to awaken Attila by loud and repeated cries they at length broke into the royal apartment. They found the trembling bride sitting by the bedside hiding her face with her veil and lamenting her own danger as well as the death of the king who had expired during the night [68] An artery had suddenly burst and as Attila lay in a supine posture he was suffocated by a torrent of blood which instead of finding a passage through the nostrils regurgitated into the lungs and stomach His body was solemnly exposed in the midst of the plain under a silken pavilion and the chosen squadrons of the Huns wheeling round in measured evolutions, chanted a funeral song to the memory of a hero, glorious in his life, invincible in his death, the father of his people, the scourge of his enemies, and the terror of the world According to their national custom, the barbarians cut off a part of their hair, gashed their faces with unseemly wounds, and bewailed their valiant leader as he deserved, not with the tears of women, but with the blood of warriors The remains of Attila were enclosed within three coffins of gold, of silver, and of iron, and privately buried in the night the spoils of nations were thrown into his grave the captives who had opened the ground were inhumanly massacred, and the same Huns, who had indulged such excessive grief, feasted, with dissolute and intemperate mirth, about the recent sepulchre of their king It was reported at Constantinople that, on the fortunate night in which he expired, Marcian beheld in a dream the bow of Attila broken asunder and the report may be allowed to prove how seldom the image of that formidable barbarian was absent from the mind of a Roman emperor [69]

The revolution which subverted the empire of the Huns established the fame of Attila, whose genius alone had sustained the huge and disjointed fabric After his death the boldest chieftains aspired to the rank of kings, the most powerful kings refused to acknowledge a superior, and the numerous sons whom so many various mothers bore to the deceased monarch divided and disputed like a private inheritance the sovereign command of the nations of Germany and Scythia The bold Ardaric felt and represented the disgrace of this servile partition, and his subjects, the warlike Gepidæ, with the Ostrogoths, under the conduct of three valiant brothers, encouraged their allies to vindicate the rights of freedom and royalty In a bloody and decisive conflict on the banks of the river Netad in Pannonia, the lance of the Gepidæ, the sword of the Goths, the arrows of the Huns, the Suevic infantry, the light arms of the Heruli, and the heavy weapons of the Alani, encountered or supported each other, and the victory of Ardaric was accompanied with the slaughter of thirty thousand of his enemies Ellac, the eldest son of Attila, lost his life and crown in the memorable battle of Netad, his early valour had raised him to the throne of the Acatzires, a Scythian people, whom he subdued, and his father, who loved the superior merit, would have envied the death, of Ellac.[70] His brother Dengisich, with an army of Huns still formidable in their flight and ruin, maintained his ground above fifteen years on the banks of the Danube The palace of Attila, with the old country of Dacia, from the Carpathian hills to the Euxine, became the seat of a new power which was erected by Ardaric, king of the Gepidæ The Pannonian conquests, from Vienna to Sirmium, were occupied by the Ostrogoths, and the settlements of the tribes who had so bravely asserted their native freedom were irregularly distributed according to the measure of their respective strength Surrounded and oppressed by the multitude of his father's slaves, the kingdom of Dengisich was confined to the circle of his waggons, his desperate courage urged him to invade the Eastern empire he fell in battle, and his head, ignominiously exposed in the Hippodrome, exhibited a grateful spectacle to the people of Constantinople Attila had fondly or superstitiously believed that Irnac, the youngest of his sons, was destined to perpetuate the glories of his race The character of that prince, who attempted to moderate the rashness of his brother Dengisich, was more suitable to the declining condition of the Huns, and Irnac, with his subject hordes, retired into the heart of the Lesser Scythia They were soon overwhelmed by a torrent of new barbarians, who followed the same road which their own ancestors had formerly discovered The Geougen, or Avares, whose residence is assigned by the Greek writers to the shores of the ocean, impelled the adjacent tribes, till at length the Igours of the North, issuing from the cold Siberian regions which produce the most valuable furs, spread themselves over the desert as far as the Borysthenes and the Caspian gates, and finally extinguished the empire of the Huns [71]

Such an event might contribute to the safety of the Eastern empire under the reign of a prince who conciliated the friendship, without forfeiting the esteem, of the barbarians But the emperor of the West, the feeble and dissolute Valentinian, who had reached his thirty-fifth year without attaining the age of reason or courage, abused this apparent security to undermine the foundations of his own throne by the murder of the patrician Aëtius From the instinct of a base and jealous mind, he hated the man who was universally celebrated as the terror of the barbarians and the support of the republic, and his new favourite, the eunuch Heraclius, awakened the emperor from the supine lethargy which might be disguised during the life of Placidia[72] by the excuse of filial piety The fame of Aëtius, his wealth and dignity, the numerous and martial train of barbarian followers his powerful dependents who filled the civil offices of the state and the hopes of his son Gaudentius who was already contracted to Eudoxia the emperor's daughter had raised him above the rank of a subject The ambitious designs of which he was secretly accused excited the fears as well as the resentment of Valentinian Aetius himself supported by the consciousness of his merit his services and perhaps his innocence seems to have maintained a haughty and indiscreet behaviour The patrician offended his sovereign by an hostile declaration he aggravated the offence by compelling him to ratify with a solemn oath a treaty of reconciliation and alliance he proclaimed his suspicions he neglected his safety and from a vain confidence that the enemy whom he despised was incapable even of a manly crime he rashly ventured his person in the palace of Rome Whilst he urged perhaps with intemperate vehemence the marriage of his son Valentinian drawing his sword—the first sword he had ever drawn—plunged it in the breast of a general who had saved his empire his courtiers and eunuchs ambitiously struggled to imitate their master and Aetius pierced with an hundred wounds fell dead in the royal presence Boethius the Prætorian præfect was killed at the same moment and before the event could be divulged the principal friends of the patrician were summoned to the palace and separately murdered The horrid deed palliated by the specious names of justice and necessity was immediately communicated by the emperor to his soldiers his subjects and his allies The nations who were strangers or enemies to Aetius generously deplored the unworthy fate of a hero the barbarians who had been attached to his service dissembled their grief and resentment and the public contempt which had been so long entertained for Valentinian was at once converted into deep and universal abhorrence Such sentiments seldom pervade the walls of a palace yet the emperor was confounded by the honest reply of a Roman whose approbation he had not disdained to solicit I am ignorant sir of your motives or provocations I only know that you have acted like a man who cuts off his right hand with his left [73]

The luxury of Rome seems to have attracted the long and frequent visits of Valentinian who was consequently more despised at Rome than in any other part of his dominions A republican spirit was insensibly revived in the senate as their authority and even their supplies became necessary for the support of his feeble government The stately demeanour of an hereditary monarch offended their pride and the pleasures of Valentinian were injurious to the peace and honour of noble families The birth of the empress Eudoxia was equal to his own and her charms and tender affection deserved those testimonies of love which her inconstant husband dissipated in vague and unlawful amours Petronius Maximus a wealthy senator of the Anician family who had been twice consul, was possessed of a chaste and beautiful wife her obstinate resistance served only to irritate the desires of Valentinian and he resolved to accomplish them either by stratagem or force. Deep gaming was one of the vices of the court the emperor who by chance or contrivance, had gained from Maximus a considerable sum, uncourteously exacted his ring as a security for the debt and sent it by a trusty messenger to his wife with an order in her husband's name that she should immediately attend the empress Eudoxia The unsuspecting wife of Maximus was conveyed in her litter to the Imperial palace the emissaries of her impatient lover conducted her to a remote and silent bed-chamber and Valentinian violated without remorse the laws of hospitality Her tears when she returned home her deep affliction and the bitter reproaches against a husband whom she considered as the accomplice of his own shame, excited Maximus to a just revenge the desire of revenge was stimulated by ambition and he might reasonably aspire by the free suffrage of the Roman senate to the throne of a detested and despicable rival Valentinian who supposed that every human breast was devoid like his own of friendship and gratitude had imprudently admitted among his guards several domestics and followers of Aetius Two of these of barbarian race were persuaded to execute a sacred and honourable duty by punishing with death the assassin of their patron and their intrepid courage did not long expect a favourable moment Whilst Valentinian amused himself in the field of Mars with the spectacle of some military sports they suddenly rushed upon him with drawn weapons despatched the guilty Heraclius and stabbed the emperor to the heart without the least opposition from his numerous train who seemed to rejoice in the tyrant's death. Such was the fate of Valentinian the Third [74] the last Roman emperor of the family of Theodosius He faithfully imitated the hereditary weakness of his cousin and his two uncles without inheriting the gentleness, the purity the innocence, which alleviate in their characters the want of spirit and ability Valentinian was less excusable, since he had passions without virtues even his religion was questionable, and though he never deviated into the paths of heresy, he scandalised the pious Christians by his attachment to the profane arts of magic and divination

As early as the time of Cicero and Varro it was the opinion of the Roman augurs that the twelve vultures which Romulus had seen, represented the twelve centuries assigned for the fatal period of his city [75] This prophecy, disregarded perhaps in the season of health and prosperity, inspired the people with gloomy apprehensions when the twelfth century, clouded with disgrace and misfortune, was almost elapsed,[76] and even posterity must acknowledge with some surprise that the arbitrary interpretation of an accidental or fabulous circumstance has been seriously verified in the downfall of the Western empire But its fall was announced by a clearer omen than the flight of vultures the Roman government appeared every day less formidable to its enemies, more odious and oppressive to its subjects [77] The taxes were multiplied with the public distress, economy was neglected in proportion as it became necessary, and the injustice of the rich shifted the unequal burden from themselves to the people, whom they defrauded of the indulgences that might sometimes have alleviated their misery The severe inquisition, which confiscated their goods and tortured their persons, compelled the subjects of Valentinian to prefer the more simple tyranny of the barbarians, to fly to the woods and mountains, or to embrace the vile and abject condition of mercenary servants They abjured and abhorred the name of Roman citizens, which had formerly excited the ambition of mankind The Armorican provinces of Gaul and the greatest part of Spain were thrown into a state of disorderly independence by the confederations of the Bagaudæ, and the Imperial ministers pursued with proscriptive laws and ineffectual arms the rebels whom they had made [78] If all the barbarian conquerors had been annihilated in the same hour, their total destruction would not have restored the empire of the West and if Rome still survived, she survived the loss of freedom, of virtue, and of honour

CHAPTER XXXVI

Sack of Rome by Genseric, King of the Vandals His Naval Depredations Succession of the last Emperors of the West, Maximus, Avitus, Majorian, Severus, Anthemius, Olybrius, Glycerius, Nepos, Augustulus Total Extinction of the Western Empire Reign of Odoacer, the first Barbarian King of Italy

THE loss or desolation of the provinces from the Ocean to the Alps impaired the glory and greatness of Rome her internal prosperity was irretrievably destroyed by the separation of Africa The rapacious Vandals confiscated the patrimonial estates of the senators, and intercepted the regular subsidies which relieved the poverty and encouraged the idleness of the plebeians The distress of the Romans was soon aggravated by an unexpected attack, and the province, so long cultivated for their use by industrious and obedient subjects, was armed against them by an ambitious barbarian The Vandals and Alani, who followed the successful standard of Genseric, had acquired a rich and fertile territory, which stretched along the coast above ninety days' journey from Tangier to Tripoli, but their narrow limits were pressed and confined, on either side, by the sandy desert and the Mediterranean The discovery and conquest of the Black nations, that might dwell beneath the torrid zone, could not tempt the rational ambition of Genseric, but he cast his eyes towards the sea, he resolved to create a naval power, and his bold resolution was executed with steady and active perseverance The woods of Mount Atlas afforded an inexhaustible nursery of timber, his new subjects were skilled in the arts of navigation and shipbuilding, he animated his daring Vandals to embrace a mode of warfare which would render every maritime country accessible to their arms, the Moors and Africans were allured by the hopes of plunder, and, after an interval of six centuries, the fleets that issued from the port of Carthage again claimed the empire of the Mediterranean The success of the Vandals, the conquest of Sicily, the sack of Palermo, and the frequent descents on the coast of Lucania, awakened and alarmed t

mother of Valentinian and the sister of Theodosius Alliances were formed and armaments expensive and ineffectual were prepared for the destruction of the common enemy who reserved his courage to encounter those dangers which his policy could not prevent or elude The designs of the Roman government were repeatedly baffled by his artful delays ambiguous promises and apparent concessions and the interposition of his formidable confederate the king of the Huns recalled the emperors from the conquest of Africa to the care of their domestic safety The revolutions of the palace which left the Western empire without a defender and without a lawful prince dispelled the apprehensions and stimulated the avarice of Genseric He immediately equipped a numerous fleet of Vandals and Moors and cast anchor at the mouth of the Tiber about three months after the death of Valentinian and the elevation of Maximus to the Imperial throne

The private life of the senator Petronius Maximus[1] was often alleged as a rare example of human felicity His birth was noble and illustrious since he descended from the Anician family his dignity was supported by an adequate patrimony in land and money and these advantages of fortune were accompanied with liberal arts and decent manners which adorn or imitate the inestimable gifts of genius and virtue The luxury of his palace and table was hospitable and elegant Whenever Maximus appeared in public he was surrounded by a train of grateful and obsequious clients[2] and it is possible that among these clients he might deserve and possess some real friend His merit was rewarded by the favour of the prince and senate he thrice exercised the office of Prætorian præfect of Italy he was twice invested with the consulship and he obtained the rank of patrician These civil honours were not incompatible with the enjoyment of leisure and tranquillity his hours according to the demands of pleasure or reason were accurately distributed by a water clock and this avarice of time may be allowed to prove the sense which Maximus entertained of his own happines The injury which he received from the emperor Valentinian appears to excuse the most bloody revenge Yet a philosopher might have reflected that if the resistance of his wife had been sincere, her chastity was still inviolate and that it could never be restored if she had consented to the will of the adulterer A patriot would have hesitated before he plunged himself and his country into those inevitable calamities which must follow the extinction of the royal house of Theodosius

The imprudent Maximus disregarded these salutary considerations he gratified his resentment and ambition he saw the bleeding corpse of Valentinian at his feet and he heard himself saluted Emperor by the unanimous voice of the senate and people But the day of his inauguration was the last day of his happiness He was imprisoned (such is the lively expression of Sidonius) in the palace and after passing a sleepless night he sighed that he had attained the summit of his wishes and aspired only to descend from the dangerous elevation Oppressed by the weight of the diadem he communicated his anxious thoughts to his friend and quæstor Fulgentius and when he looked back with unavailing regret on the secure pleasures of his former life the emperor exclaimed O fortunate Damocles thy reign began and ended with the same dinner a well known allusion which Fulgentius afterwards repeated as an instructive lesson for princes and subjects.[3]

The reign of Maximus continued about three months His hours of which he had lost the command were disturbed by remorse or guilt, or terror and his throne was shaken by the seditions of the soldiers the people and the confederate barbarians The marriage of his son Palladius with the eldest daughter of the late emperor might tend to establish the hereditary succession of his family but the violence which he offered to the empress Eudoxia could proceed only from the blind impulse of lust or revenge His own wife the cause of these tragic events had been seasonably removed by death and the widow of Valentinian was compelled to violate her decent mourning perhaps her real grief and to submit to the embraces of a presumptuous usurper whom she suspected as the assassin of her deceased husband These suspicions were soon justified by the indiscreet confession of Maximus himself and he wantonly provoked the hatred of his reluctant bride who was still conscious that she descended from a line of emperors From the East however Eudoxia could not hope to obtain any effectual assistance her father and her aunt Pulcheria were dead her mother languished at Jerusalem in disgrace and exile and the sceptre of Constantinople was in the hands of a stranger She directed her eyes towards Carthage secretly implored the aid of the king of the Vandals and persuaded Genseric to improve the fair opportunity of disguising his rapacious designs by the specious names of honour justice, and

[4] Whatever abilities Maximus ... have shown in a subordinate station, he was found incapable of administering an empire and though he might easily have been in... of the naval preparations which were made on the opposite shores of Africa, he expected with supine indifference the approach of the enemy, without adopting any measures of defence, of negotiation, or of a timely retreat When the Vandals disembarked at the mouth of the Tiber, the emperor was suddenly roused from his lethargy by the clamours of a trembling and exasperated multitude The only hope which presented itself to his astonished mind was that of a precipitate flight, and he exhorted the senators to imitate the example of their prince But no sooner did Maximus appear in the streets than he was assaulted by a shower of stones a Roman or a Burgundian soldier claimed the honour of the first wound, his mangled body was ignominiously cast into the Tiber, the Roman people rejoiced in the punishment which they had inflicted on the author of the public calamities, and the domestics of Eudoxia signalised their zeal in the service of their mistress [5]

On the third day after the tumult, Genseric boldly advanced from the port of Ostia to the gates of the defenceless city Instead of a sally of the Roman youth, there issued from the gates an unarmed and venerable procession of the bishop at the head of his clergy [6] The fearless spirit of Leo, his authority and eloquence, again mitigated the fierceness of a barbarian conqueror the king of the Vandals promised to spare the unresisting multitude, to protect the buildings from fire, and to exempt the captives from torture, and although such orders were neither seriously given, nor strictly obeyed, the mediation of Leo was glorious to himself, and in some degree beneficial to his country But Rome and its inhabitants were delivered to the licentiousness of the Vandals and Moors, whose blind passions revenged the injuries of Carthage The pillage lasted fourteen days and nights, and all that yet remained of public or private wealth, of sacred or profane treasure, was diligently transported to the vessels of Genseric. Among the spoils, the splendid relics of two temples, or rather of two religions, exhibited a memorable example of the vicissitudes of human and divine things Since the abolition of Paganism, the Capitol had been violated and abandoned, yet the statues of the gods and heroes were still respected, and the curious roof of gilt bronze was reserved for the rapacious hands of Genseric [7] The holy instruments of the Jewish worship,[8] the gold table, and the gold candlestick with seven branches, originally framed according to the particular instructions of God himself, and which were placed in the sanctuary of his temple, had been ostentatiously displayed to the Roman people in the triumph of Titus They were afterwards deposited in the temple of Peace, and at the end of four hundred years, the spoils of Jerusalem were transferred from Rome to Carthage, by a barbarian who derived his origin from the shores of the Baltic These ancient monuments might attract the notice of curiosity as well as of avarice But the Christian churches, enriched and adorned by the prevailing superstition of the times, afforded more plentiful materials for sacrilege, and the pious liberality of pope Leo, who melted six silver vases, the gift of Constantine each of an hundred pounds weight, is an evidence of the damage which he attempted to repair In the forty-five years that had elapsed since the Gothic invasion, the pomp and luxury of Rome were in some measure restored, and it was difficult either to escape, or to satisfy, the avarice of a conqueror who possessed leisure to collect, and ships to transport, the wealth of the capital The Imperial ornaments of the palace, the magnificent furniture and wardrobe, the sideboards of massy plate, were accumulated with disorderly rapine the gold and silver amounted to several thousand talents, yet even the brass and copper were laboriously removed Eudoxia herself, who advanced to meet her friend and deliverer, soon bewailed the imprudence of her own conduct She was rudely stripped of her jewels, and the unfortunate empress, with her two daughters, the only surviving remains of the great Theodosius, was compelled, as a captive, to follow the haughty Vandal, who immediately hoisted sail, and returned with a prosperous navigation to the port of Carthage [9] Many thousand Romans of both sexes, chosen for some useful or agreeable qualifications, reluctantly embarked on board the fleet of Genseric, and their distress was aggravated by the unfeeling barbarians, who, in the division of the booty, separated the wives from their husbands, and the children from their parents The charity of Deogratias, bishop of Carthage,[10] was their only consolation and support He generously sold the gold and silver plate of the church to purchase the freedom of some, to alleviate the slavery of others, and to assist the wants and infirmities of a captive multitude, whose health was impaired by the hardships which they h-

suffered in the passage from Italy to Africa By his order two spacious churches were converted into hospitals the sick were distributed in convenient beds and liberally supplied with food and medicines and the aged prelate repeated his visits both in the day and night with an assiduity that surpassed his strength and a tender sympathy which enhanced the value of his services Compare this scene with the field of Cannæ and judge between Hannibal and the successor of St Cyprian [11]

The deaths of Aetius and Valentinian had relaxed the ties which held the barbarians of Gaul in peace and subordination The sea-coast was infested by the Saxons the Alemanni and the Franks advanced from the Rhine to the Seine and the ambition of the Goths seemed to meditate more extensive and permanent conquests The emperor Maximus relieved himself by a judicious choice from the weight of these distant cares he silenced the solicitations of his friends listened to the voice of fame and promoted a stranger to the general command of the forces in Gaul Avitus [12] the stranger whose merit was so nobly rewarded descended from a wealthy and honourable family in the diocese of Auvergne The convulsions of the times urged him to embrace with the same ardour the civil and military professions and the indefatigable youth blended the studies of literature and jurisprudence with the exercise of arms and hunting Thirty years of his life were laudably spent in the public service he alternately displayed his talents in war and negotiation and the soldier of Aëtius after executing the most important embassies was raised to the station of Prætorian præfect of Gaul Either the merit of Avitus excited envy or his moderation was desirous of repose since he calmly retired to an estate which he possessed in the neighbourhood of Clermont A copious stream issuing from the mountain and falling headlong in many a loud and foaming cascade discharged its waters into a lake about two miles in length and the villa was pleasantly seated on the margin of the lake The baths the porticoes the summer and winter apartments were adapted to the purposes of luxury and use and the adjacent country afforded the various prospects of woods pastures and meadows [13] In this retreat where Avitus amused his leisure with books rural sports the practice of husbandry and the society of his friends [14] he received the Imperial diploma, which constituted him master general of the cavalry and infantry of Gaul He assumed the military command the barbarians suspended their fury and whatever means he might employ whatever concessions he might be forced to make the people enjoyed the benefits of actual tranquillity But the fate of Gaul depended on the Visigoths and the Roman general less attentive to his dignity than to the public interest did not disdain to visit Toulouse in the character of an ambassador He was received with courteous hospitality by Theodoric, the king of the Goths but while Avitus laid the foundations of a solid alliance with that powerful nation he was astonished by the intelligence that the emperor Maximus was slain and that Rome had been pillaged by the Vandals A vacant throne which he might ascend without guilt or danger tempted his ambition [15] and the Visigoths were easily persuaded to support his claim by their irresistible suffrage They loved the person of Avitus they respected his virtues and they were not insensible of the advantage as well as honour of giving an emperor to the West The season was now approaching in which the annual assembly of the seven provinces was held at Arles their deliberations might perhaps be influenced by the presence of Theodoric and his martial brothers but their choice would naturally incline to the most illustrious of their countrymen Avitus after a decent resistance accepted the Imperial diadem from the representatives of Gaul and his election was ratified by the acclamations of the barbarians and provincials The formal consent of Marcian emperor of the East was solicited and obtained but the senate Rome and Italy though humbled by their recent calamities, submitted with a secret murmur to the presumption of the Gallic usurper

Theodoric, to whom Avitus was indebted for the purple had acquired the Gothic sceptre by the murder of his elder brother Torismond and he justified this atrocious deed by the design which his predecessor had formed of violating his alliance with the empire [16] Such a crime might not be incompatible with the virtues of a barbarian but the manners of Theodoric were gentle and humane and posterity may contemplate without terror the original picture of a Gothic king whom Sidonius had intimately observed in the hours of peace and of social intercourse In an epistle dated from the court of Toulouse the orator satisfies the curiosity of one of his friends in the following description [17]

tion He is of a middle stature, his body appears rather plump than fat, and in his well proportioned limbs agility is united with muscular strength [18] If you examine his countenance, you will distinguish a high forehead, large shaggy eyebrows, an aquiline nose, thin lips, a regular set of white teeth, and a fair complexion, that blushes more frequently from modesty than from anger The ordinary distribution of his time, as far as it is exposed to the public view, may be concisely represented Before daybreak he repairs, with a small train, to his domestic chapel, where the service is performed by the Arian clergy, but those who presume to interpret his secret sentiments consider this assiduous devotion as the effect of habit and policy The rest of the morning is employed in the administration of his kingdom His chair is surrounded by some military officers of decent aspect and behaviour the noisy crowd of his barbarian guards occupies the hall of audience, but they are not permitted to stand within the veils or curtains that conceal the council-chamber from vulgar eyes The ambassadors of the nations are successively introduced Theodoric listens with attention, answers them with discreet brevity, and either announces or delays, according to the nature of their business, his final resolution About eight (the second hour) he rises from his throne, and visits either his treasury or his stables If he chooses to hunt, or at least to exercise himself on horseback, his bow is carried by a favourite youth, but when the game is marked, he bends it with his own hand, and seldom misses the object of his aim as a king, he disdains to bear arms in such ignoble warfare, but as a soldier he would blush to accept any military service which he could perform himself On common days his dinner is not different from the repast of a private citizen, but every Saturday many honourable guests are invited to the royal table, which, on these occasions, is served with the elegance of Greece, the plenty of Gaul, and the order and diligence of Italy [19] The gold or silver plate is less remarkable for its weight than for the brightness and curious workmanship the taste is gratified without the help of foreign and costly luxury, the size and number of the cups of wine are regulated with a strict regard to the laws of temperance, and the respectful silence that prevails is interrupted only by grave and instructive conversation After dinner Theodoric sometimes indulges himself in a short slumber, and as soon as he wakes he calls for the dice and tables, encourages his friends to forget the royal majesty, and is delighted when they freely express the passions which are excited by the incidents of play At this game, which he loves as the image of war, he alternately displays his eagerness, his skill, his patience, and his cheeerful temper If he loses he laughs he is modest and silent if he wins Yet, notwithstanding this seeming indifference, his courtiers choose to solicit any favour in the moments of victory, and I myself, in my applications to the king, have derived some benefit from my losses [20] About the ninth hour (three o'clock) the tide of business again returns, and flows incessantly till after sunset, when the signal of the royal supper dismisses the weary crowd of suppliants and pleaders At the supper, a more familiar repast, buffoons and pantomimes are sometimes introduced, to divert, not to offend, the company by their ridiculous wit but female singers, and the soft effeminate modes of music, are severely banished, and such martial tunes as animate the soul to deeds of valour are alone grateful to the ear of Theodoric. He retires from table, and the nocturnal guards are immediately posted at the entrance of the treasury, the palace, and the private apartments"

When the king of the Visigoths encouraged Avitus to assume the purple, he offered his person and his forces as a faithful soldier of the republic [21] The exploits of Theodoric soon convinced the world that he had not degenerated from the warlike virtues of his ancestors After the establishment of the Goths in Aquitain, and the passage of the Vandals into Africa, the Suevi, who had fixed their kingdom in Gallicia, aspired to the conquest of Spain, and threatened to extinguish the feeble remains of the Roman dominion The provincials of Carthagena and Tarragona, afflicted by an hostile invasion represented their injuries and their apprehensions Count Fronto was despatched, in the name of the emperor Avitus, with advantageous offers of peace and alliance, and Theodoric interposed his weighty mediation to declare that, unless his brother in law, the king of the Suevi, immediately retired, he should be obliged to arm in the cause of justice and of Rome "Tell him," replied the haughty Rechiarius, "that I despise his friendship and his arms, but that I shall soon try whether he will dare to expect my arrival under the walls of Toulouse" Such a challenge urged Theodoric to prevent the bold designs of his enemy he passed the Pyrenees at the head of the Visigoths, the Franks and Burgundians served under his standard, and though he professed himself the dutiful servant of Avi-

tus he privately stipulated for himself and his successors the absolute possession of his Spanish conquests The two armies or rather the two nations encountered each other on the banks of the river Urbicus about twelve miles from Astorga and the decisive victory of the Goths appeared for a while to have extirpated the name and kingdom of the Suevi From the field of battle Theodoric advanced to Braga their metropolis which still retained the splendid vestiges of its ancient commerce and dignity [22] His entrance was not polluted with blood and the Goths respected the chastity of their female captives more especially of the consecrated virgins but the greatest part of the clergy and people were made slaves and even the churches and altars were confounded in the universal pillage The unfortunate king of the Suevi had escaped to one of the ports of the ocean but the obstinacy of the winds opposed his flight he was delivered to his implacable rival and Rechiarius who neither desired nor expected mercy received with manly constancy the death which he would probably have inflicted After this bloody sacrifice to policy or resentment Theodoric carried his victorious arms as far as Merida the principal town of Lusitania without meeting any resistance except from the miraculous powers of St. Eulalia but he was stopped in the full career of success and recalled from Spain before he could provide for the security of his conquests In his retreat towards the Pyrenees he revenged his disappointment on the country through which he passed and in the sack of Polentia and Astorga he showed himself a faithless ally as well as a cruel enemy Whilst the king of the Visigoths fought and vanquished in the name of Avitus the reign of Avitus had expired and both the honour and interest of Theodoric were deeply wounded by the disgrace of a friend whom he had seated on the throne of the Western empire [23]

The pressing solicitations of the senate and people persuaded the emperor Avitus to fix his residence at Rome and to accept the consulship for the ensuing year On the first day of January his son in law Sidonius Apollinaris celebrated his praises in a panegyric of six hundred verses but this composition though it was rewarded with a brass statue [24] seems to contain a very moderate proportion either of genius or of truth The poet if we may degrade that sacred name exaggerates the merit of a sovereign and a father and his prophecy of a long and glorious reign was soon contradicted by the event Avitus at a time when the Imperial dignity was reduced to a pre-eminence of toil and danger indulged himself in the pleasures of Italian luxury age had not extinguished his amorous inclinations and he is accused of insulting with indiscreet and ungenerous raillery the husbands whose wives he had seduced or violated [25] But the Romans were not inclined either to excuse his faults or to acknowledge his virtues The several parts of the empire became every day more alienated from each other and the stranger of Gaul was the object of popular hatred and contempt The senate asserted their legitimate claim in the election of an emperor and their authority which had been originally derived from the old constitution was again fortified by the actual weakness of a declining monarchy Yet even such a monarchy might have resisted the votes of an unarmed senate if their discontent had not been supported or perhaps inflamed by Count Ricimer one of the principal commanders of the barbarian troops who formed the military defence of Italy The daughter of Wallia king of the Visigoths was the mother of Ricimer but he was descended, on the father s side from the nation of the Suevi [26] his pride or patriotism might be exasperated by the misfortunes of his countrymen and he obeyed with reluctance an emperor in whose elevation he had not been consulted His faithful and important services against the common enemy rendered him still more formidable [27] and after destroying on the coast of Corsica a fleet of Vandals which consisted of sixty galleys Ricimer returned in triumph with the appellation of the Deliverer of Italy He chose that moment to signify to Avitus that his reign was at an end and the feeble emperor at a distance from his Gothic allies was compelled after a short and unavailing struggle to abdicate the purple By the clemency however or the contempt of Ricimer [28] he was permitted to descend from the throne to the more desirable station of bishop of Placentia but the resentment of the senate was still unsatisfied and their inflexible severity pronounced the sentence of his death. He fled towards the Alps with the humble hope not of arming the Visigoths in his cause, but of securing his person and treasures in the sanctuary of Julian one of the tutelar saints of Auvergne [29] Disease or the hand of the executioner arrested him on the road yet his remains were decently transported to Brivas or Brioude in his native province and he reposed at the feet of his holy patron [30] Avitus left only one daughter the wife of Sidonius Apollinaris, who inherited the patrimony of his father-in-law, lamenting, at the same time, the disappointment of his public and private expectations His resentment prompted him to join, or at least to countenance, the measures of a rebellious faction in Gaul, and the poet had contracted some guilt, which it was incumbent on him to expiate by a new tribute of flattery to the succeeding emperor [31]

The successor of Avitus presents the welcome discovery of a great and heroic character, such as sometimes arise, in a degenerate age, to vindicate the honour of the human species The emperor Majorian has deserved the praises of his contemporaries and of posterity, and these praises may be strongly expressed in the words of a judicious and disinterested historian "That he was gentle to his subjects, that he was terrible to his enemies, and that he excelled in every virtue all his predecessors who had reigned over the Romans "[32] Such a testimony may justify at least the panegyric of Sidonius, and we may acquiesce in the assurance that, although the obsequious orator would have flattered with equal zeal the most worthless of princes, the extraordinary merit of his object confined him, on this occasion, within the bounds of truth [33] Majorian derived his name from his maternal grandfather, who, in the reign of the great Theodosius, had commanded the troops of the Illyrian frontier He gave his daughter in marriage to the father of Majorian, a respectable officer, who administered the revenues of Gaul with skill and integrity, and generously preferred the friendship of Aëtius to the tempting offers of an insidious court His son, the future emperor, who was educated in the profession of arms, displayed, from his early youth, intrepid courage, premature wisdom, and unbounded liberality in a scanty fortune He followed the standard of Aëtius, contributed to his success, shared, and sometimes eclipsed, his glory, and at last excited the jealousy of the patrician, or rather of his wife, who forced him to retire from the service [34] Majorian, after the death of Aëtius, was recalled and promoted and his intimate connection with Count Ricimer was the immediate step by which he ascended the throne of the Western empire During the vacancy that succeeded the abdication of Avitus, the ambitious barbarian, whose birth excluded him from the Imperial dignity, governed Italy, with the title of Patrician, resigned to his friend the conspicuous station of master-general of the cavalry and infantry, and, after an interval of some months, consented to the unanimous wish of the Romans, whose favour Majorian had solicited by a recent victory over the Alemanni [35] He was invested with the purple at Ravenna and the epistle which he addressed to the senate will best describe his situation and his sentiments "Your election, Conscript Fathers! and the ordinance of the most valiant army, have made me your emperor [36] May the propitious Deity direct and prosper the counsels and events of my administration to your advantage and to the public welfare! For my own part I did not aspire, I have submitted, to reign, nor should I have discharged the obligations of a citizen if I had refused, with base and selfish ingratitude, to support the weight of those labours which were imposed by the republic Assist, therefore, the prince whom you have made, partake the duties which you have enjoined, and may our common endeavours promote the happiness of an empire which I have accepted from your hands Be assured that, in our times, justice shall resume her ancient vigour, and that virtue shall become not only innocent but meritorious Let none, except the authors themselves, be apprehensive of delations,[37] which, as a subject, I have always condemned, and, as a prince, will severely punish Our own vigilance, and that of our father, the patrician Ricimer, shall regulate all military affairs and provide for the safety of the Roman world, which we have saved from foreign and domestic enemies [38] You now understand the maxims of my government you may confide in the faithful love and sincere assurances of a prince who has formerly been the companion of your life and dangers, who still glories in the name of senator, and who is anxious that you should never repent of the judgment which you have pronounced in his favour " The emperor, who, amidst the ruins of the Roman world, revived the ancient language of law and liberty, which Trajan would not have disclaimed, must have derived those generous sentiments from his own heart, since they were not suggested to his imitation by the customs of his age or the example of his predecessors [39]

The private and public actions of Majorian are very imperfectly known but his laws, remarkable for an original cast of thought and expression, faithfully represent the character of a sovereign who loved his people, who sympathised in their distress, who had studied the causes of the decline of the empire, and who was capable of applying (as far as such reformation was practicable) judicious and effectual remedies to the public disorders [40] His regulations concerning the finances manifestly tended to remove or at least to mitigate the most intolerable grievances I From the first hour of his reign he was solicitous (I translate his own words) to relieve the weary fortunes of the provincials oppressed by the accumulated weight of indictions and superindictions [41] With this view he granted an universal amnesty a final and absolute discharge of all arrears of tribute of all debts which, under any pretence the fiscal officers might demand from the people This wise dereliction of obsolete vexatious and unprofitable claims improved and purified the sources of the public revenue and the subject who could now look back without despair might labour with hope and gratitude for himself and for his country II In the assessment and collection of taxes Majorian restored the ordinary jurisdiction of the provincial magistrates and suppressed the extraordinary commissions which had been introduced in the name of the emperor himself or of the Prætorian præfects The favourite servants who obtained such irregular powers were insolent in their behaviour and arbitrary in their demands they affected to despise the subordinate tribunals, and they were discontented if their fees and profits did not twice exceed the sum which they condescended to pay into the treasury One instance of their extortion would appear incredible were it not authenticated by the legislator himself They exacted the whole payment in gold but they refused the current coin of the empire and would accept only such ancient pieces as were stamped with the names of Faustina or the Antonines The subject who was unprovided with these curious medals had recourse to the expedient of compounding with their rapacious demands or if he succeeded in the research his imposition was doubled according to the weight and value of the money of former times [42] III The municipal corporations (says the emperor) the lesser senates (so antiquity has justly styled them) deserve to be considered as the heart of the cities and the sinews of the republic. And yet so low are they now reduced by the injustice of magistrates and the venality of collectors that many of their members renouncing their dignity and their country have taken refuge in distant and obscure exile He urges and even compels their return to their respective cities but he removes the grievance which had forced them to desert the exercise of their municipal functions They are directed, under the authority of the provincial magistrates to resume their office of levying the tribute but instead of being made responsible for the whole sum assessed on their district they are only required to produce a regular account of the payments which they have actually received and of the defaulters who are still indebted to the public IV But Majorian was not ignorant that these corporate bodies were too much inclined to retaliate the injustice and oppression which they had suffered and he therefore revives the useful office of the defenders of cities He exhorts the people to elect in a full and free assembly some man of discretion and integrity who would dare to assert their privileges to represent their grievances to protect the poor from the tyranny of the rich and to inform the emperor of the abuses that were committed under the sanction of his name and authority

The spectator who casts a mournful view over the ruins of ancient Rome is tempted to accuse the memory of the Goths and Vandals for the mischief which they had neither leisure, nor power nor perhaps inclination to perpetrate The tempest of war might strike some lofty turrets to the ground but the destruction which undermined the foundations of those massy fabrics was prosecuted slowly and silently during a period of ten centuries and the motives of interest that afterwards operated without shame or control were severely checked by the taste and spirit of the emperor Majorian The decay of the city had gradually impaired the value of the public works The circus and theatres might still excite but they seldom gratified the desires of the people and the temples which had escaped the zeal of the Christians were no longer inhabited either by gods or men the diminished crowds of the Romans were lost in the immense space of their baths and porticoes and the stately libraries and halls of justice became useless to an indolent generation whose repose was seldom disturbed either by study or business The monuments of consular or Imperial greatness were no longer revered as the immortal glory of the capital they were only esteemed as an inexhaustible mine of materials cheaper and more convenient than the distant quarry Specious petitions were continually addressed to the easy magistrates of Rome which stated the want of stones or bricks for some necessary service the fairest forms of architecture were rudely defaced for the sake of some paltry or pretended repairs and the degenerate Romans who converted the spoil to their own emolument demolished with sacrilegious hands the labours of their ancestors Majorian who had often sighed over the desolation of the city, applied a severe remedy to the growing evil[43] He reserved to the prince and senate the sole cognisance of the extreme cases which might justify the destruction of an ancient edifice, imposed a fine of fifty pounds of gold (two thousand pounds sterling) on every magistrate who should presume to grant such illegal and scandalous licence, and threatened to chastise the criminal obedience of their subordinate officers by a severe whipping and the amputation of both their hands In the last instance the legislator might seem to forget the proportion of guilt and punishment, but his zeal arose from a generous principle, and Majorian was anxious to protect the monuments of those ages in which he would have desired and deserved to live The emperor conceived that it was his interest to increase the number of his subjects, that it was his duty to guard the purity of the marriage-bed; but the means which he employed to accomplish these salutary purposes are of an ambiguous, and perhaps exceptionable, kind The pious maids who consecrated their virginity to Christ were restrained from taking the veil till they had reached their fortieth year Widows under that age were compelled to form a second alliance within the term of five years, by the forfeiture of half their wealth to their nearest relations or to the state Unequal marriages were condemned or annulled The punishment of confiscation and exile was deemed so inadequate to the guilt of adultery, that, if the criminal returned to Italy, he might, by the express declaration of Majorian, be slain with impunity[44]

While the emperor Majorian assiduously laboured to restore the happiness and virtue of the Romans, he encountered the arms of Genseric, from his character and situation their most formidable enemy A fleet of Vandals and Moors landed at the mouth of the Liris or Garigliano, but the Imperial troops surprised and attacked the disorderly barbarians, who were encumbered with the spoils of Campania they were chased with slaughter to their ships, and their leader, the king's brother-in law, was found in the number of the slain[45] Such vigilance might announce the character of the new reign, but the strictest vigilance and the most numerous forces were insufficient to protect the long extended coast of Italy from the depredations of a naval war The public opinion had imposed a nobler and more arduous task on the genius of Majorian Rome expected from him alone the restitution of Africa, and the design which he formed of attacking the Vandals in their new settlements was the result of bold and judicious policy If the intrepid emperor could have infused his own spirit into the youth of Italy, if he could have revived in the field of Mars the manly exercises in which he had always surpassed his equals, he might have marched against Genseric at the head of a Roman army Such a reformation of national manners might be embraced by the rising generation, but it is the misfortune of those princes who laboriously sustain a declining monarchy, that, to obtain some immediate advantage, or to avert some impending danger, they are forced to countenance, and even to multiply, the most pernicious abuses Majorian, like the weakest of his predecessors, was reduced to the disgraceful expedient of substituting barbarian auxiliaries in the place of his unwarlike subjects and his superior abilities could only be displayed in the vigour and dexterity with which he wielded a dangerous instrument, so apt to recoil on the hand that used it Besides the confederates who were already engaged in the service of the empire, the fame of his liberality and valour attracted the nations of the Danube, the Borysthenes, and perhaps of the Tanais Many thousands of the bravest subjects of Attila, the Gepidæ, the Ostrogoths, the Rugians, the Burgundians, the Suevi, the Alani, assembled in the plains of Liguria, and their formidable strength was balanced by their mutual animosities[46] They passed the Alps in a severe winter The emperor led the way on foot and in complete armour, sounding with his long staff the depth of the ice or snow, and encouraging the Scythians, who complained of the extreme cold, by the cheerful assurance that they should be satisfied with the heat of Africa The citizens of Lyons had presumed to shut their gates they soon implored, and experienced, the clemency of Majorian He vanquished Theodoric in the field, and admitted to his friendship and alliance a king whom he had found not unworthy of his arms The beneficial though precarious reunion of the greatest part of Gaul and Spain was the effect of persuasion as well as of force,[47] and the independent Bagaudæ, who had escaped or resisted the oppression of former reigns, were disposed to confide in the virtues of Majorian His camp was filled with barbarian allies, his throne was supported by the zeal of an affectionate people, but the emperor had foreseen that it was impossible without a maritime power to achieve the conquest of Africa In the first Punic war the republic had exerted such incredible diligence that, within sixty days after the first

stroke of the axe had been given in the forest a fleet of one hundred and sixty galleys proudly rode at anchor in the sea [48] Under circumstances much less favourable Majorian equalled the spirit and perseverance of the ancient Romans The woods of the Apennine were felled the arsenals and manufactures of Ravenna and Misenum were restored Italy and Gaul vied with each other in liberal contributions to the public service and the Imperial navy of three hundred large galleys with an adequate proportion of transports and smaller vessels was collected in the secure and capacious harbour of Carthagena in Spain [49] The intrepid countenance of Majorian animated his troops with a confidence of victory and if we might credit the historian Procopius his courage sometimes hurried him beyond the bounds of prudence Anxious to explore with his own eyes the state of the Vandals he ventured after disguising the colour of his hair to visit Carthage in the character of his own ambassador and Genseric was afterwards mortified by the discovery that he had entertained and dismissed the emperor of the Romans Such an anecdote may be rejected as an improbable fiction but it is a fiction which would not have been imagined unless in the life of a hero [50]

Without the help of a personal interview, Genseric was sufficiently acquainted with the genius and designs of his adversary He practised his customary arts of fraud and delay but he practised them without success His applications for peace became each hour more submissive and perhaps more sincere but the inflexible Majorian had adopted the ancient maxim that Rome could not be safe as long as Carthage existed in a hostile state. The king of the Vandals distrusted the valour of his native subjects who were enervated by the luxury of the South [51] he suspected the fidelity of the vanquished people, who abhorred him as an Arian tyrant and the desperate measure which he executed of reducing Mauritania into a desert[52] could not defeat the operations of the Roman emperor who was at liberty to land his troops on any part of the African coast. But Genseric was saved from impending, and inevitable ruin by the treachery of some powerful subjects envious or apprehensive of their master's success Guided by their secret intelligence he surprised the unguarded fleet in the bay of Carthagena many of the ships were sunk or taken or burnt and the preparations of three years were destroyed in a single day [53] After this event the behaviour of the two antagonists showed them superior to their fortune. The Vandal instead of being elated by this accidental victory immediately renewed his solicitations for peace. The emperor of the West who was capable of formin great designs and of supporting heavy disappointments consented to a treaty or rather to a suspension of arms in the full assurance that before he could restore his navy he should be supplied with provocations to justify a second war Majorian returned to Italy to prosecute his labours for the public happiness and as he was conscious of his own integrity he might long remain ignorant of the dark conspiracy which threatened his throne and his life. The recent misfortune of Carthagena sullied the glory which had dazzled the eyes of the multitude almost every description of civil and military officers were exasperated against the Reformer since they all derived some advantage from the abuses which he endeavoured to suppress and the patrician Ricimer impelled the inconstant passions of the barbarians against a prince whom he esteemed and hated The virtues of Majorian could not protect him from the impetuous sedition which broke out in the camp near Tortona at the foot of the Alps He was compelled to abdicate the Imperial purple five days after his abdication it was reported that he died of a dysentery [54] and the humble tomb which covered his remains was consecrated by the respect and gratitude of succeeding generations [55] The private character of Majorian inspired love and respect Malicious calumny and satire excited his indignation or if he himself were the object his contempt but he protected the freedom of wit and in the hours which the emperor gave to the familiar society of his friends he could indulge his taste for pleasantry without degrading the majesty of his rank.[56]

It was not perhaps without some regret that Ricimer sacrificed his friend to the interest of his ambition but he resolved in a second choi to avoid the imprudent preference of superior virtue and merit At his command the obsequious senate of Rome bestowed the Imperial title on Libius Severus who ascended the throne of the West without emerging from the obscurity of a private condition History has scarcely deigned to notice his birth his elevation his character or his death Severus expired as soon as his life became inconvenient to his patron [57] and it would be useless to discriminate his nominal reign in the vacant interval of six years between the death of Majorian and the elevation of Anthemius During that period the government was in the hands of Ricimer alone and although the modest barbarian disclaimed the name of king, he accumulated treasures, formed a separate army, negotiated private alliances, and ruled Italy with the same independent and despotic authority which was afterwards exercised by Odoacer and Theodoric. But his dominions were bounded by the Alps, and two Roman generals, Marcellinus and Ægidius, maintained their allegiance to the republic, by rejecting with disdain the phantom which he styled an emperor. Marcellinus still adhered to the old religion, and the devout Pagans, who secretly disobeyed the laws of the church and state, applauded his profound skill in the science of divination. But he possessed the more valuable qualifications of learning, virtue, and courage,[58] the study of the Latin literature had improved his taste, and his military talents had recommended him to the esteem and confidence of the great Aëtius, in whose ruin he was involved. By a timely flight Marcellinus escaped the rage of Valentinian, and boldly asserted his liberty amidst the convulsions of the Western empire. His voluntary or reluctant submission to the authority of Majorian was rewarded by the government of Sicily and the command of an army stationed in that island to oppose or to attack the Vandals, but his barbarian mercenaries, after the emperor's death, were tempted to revolt by the artful liberality of Ricimer. At the head of a band of faithful followers the intrepid Marcellinus occupied the province of Dalmatia, assumed the title of patrician of the West, secured the love of his subjects by a mild and equitable reign, built a fleet which claimed the dominion of the Hadriatic, and alternately alarmed the coasts of Italy and of Africa.[59] Ægidius, the master-general of Gaul, who equalled, or at least who imitated, the heroes of ancient Rome,[60] proclaimed his immortal resentment against the assassins of his beloved master. A brave and numerous army was attached to his standard, and though he was prevented by the arts of Ricimer and the arms of the Visigoths from marching to the gates of Rome, he maintained his independent sovereignty beyond the Alps and rendered the name of Ægidius respectable both in peace and war. The Franks, who had punished with exile the youthful follies of Childeric, elected the Roman general for their king, his vanity rather than his ambition was gratified by that singular honour, and when the nation at the end of four years repented of the injury which they had offered to the Merovingian family, he patiently acquiesced in the restoration of the lawful prince. The authority of Ægidius ended only with his life, and the suspicions of poison and secret violence, which derived some countenance from the character of Ricimer, were eagerly entertained by the passionate credulity of the Gauls.[61]

The kingdom of Italy, a name to which the Western empire was gradually reduced, was afflicted under the reign of Ricimer, by the incessant depredations of the Vandal pirates.[62] In the spring of each year they equipped a formidable navy in the port of Carthage, and Genseric himself, though in a very advanced age, still commanded in person the most important expeditions. His designs were concealed with impenetrable secrecy till the moment that he hoisted sail. When he was asked by his pilot what course he should steer, "Leave the determination to the winds (replied the barbarian, with pious arrogance) they will transport us to the guilty coast whose inhabitants have provoked the divine justice", but if Genseric himself deigned to issue more precise orders, he judged the most wealthy to be the most criminal. The Vandals repeatedly visited the coasts of Spain, Liguria, Tuscany, Campania, Lucania, Bruttium, Apulia, Calabria, Venetia, Dalmatia, Epirus, Greece, and Sicily, they were tempted to subdue the island of Sardinia, so advantageously placed in the centre of the Mediterranean, and their arms spread desolation or terror from the Columns of Hercules to the mouth of the Nile. As they were more ambitious of spoil than of glory, they seldom attacked any fortified cities, or engaged any regular troops in the open field. But the celerity of their motions enabled them almost at the same time to threaten and to attack the most distant objects which attracted their desires, and as they always embarked a sufficient number of horses, they had no sooner landed than they swept the dismayed country with a body of light cavalry. Yet, notwithstanding the example of their king, the native Vandals and Alani insensibly declined this toilsome and perilous warfare, the hardy generation of the first conquerors was almost extinguished, and their sons, who were born in Africa, enjoyed the delicious baths and gardens which had been acquired by the valour of their fathers. Their place was readily supplied by a various multitude of Moors and Romans, of captives and outlaws, and those desperate wretches, who had already violated the laws of their country, were the most eager to promote the atrocious acts which disgraced the victories of Genseric. In the treatment of his unhappy prisoners he sometimes consulted his av and sometimes indulged his cruelty and the massacre of five hundred noble citizens of Zante or Zacynthus whose mangled bodies he cast in to the Ionian Sea was imputed by the public indignation to his latest posterity

Such crimes could not be excused by any provocations but the war which the king of the Vandals prosecuted against the Roman empire was justified by a specious and reasonable motive The widow of Valentinian Eudoxia whom he had led captive from Rome to Carthage was the sole heiress of the Theodosian house her eldest daughter Eudocia became the reluctant wife of Hunneric his eldest son and the stern father asserting a legal claim which could not easily be refuted or satisfied demanded a just proportion of the Imperial patrimony An adequate or at least a valuable compensation was offered by the Eastern emperor to purchase a necessary peace Eudoxia and her younger daughter Placidia were honourably restored and the fury of the Vandals was confined to the limits of the Western empire The Italians destitute of a naval force which alone was capable of protecting their coasts implored the aid of the more fortunate nations of the East who had formerly acknowledged in peace and war the supremacy of Rome But the perpetual division of the two empires had alienated their interest and their inclinations the faith of a recent treaty was alleged and the Western Romans instead of arms and ships could only obtain the assistance of a cold and ineffectual mediation The haughty Ricimer who had long struggled with the difficulties of his situation was at length reduced to address the throne of Constantinople in the humble language of a subject and Italy submitted as the price and security of the alliance to accept a master from the choice of the emperor of the East [63] It is not the purpose of the present chapter or even of the present volume to continue the distinct series of the Byzantine history but a concise view of the reign and character of the emperor Leo may explain the last efforts that were attempted to save the falling empire of the West [64]

Since the death of the younger Theodosius the domestic repose of Constantinople had never been interrupted by war or faction Pulcheria had bestowed her hand and the sceptre of the East on the modest virtue of Marcian he gratefully reverenced her august rank and virgin chastity and after her death he gave his people the example of the religious worship that was due to the memory of the Imperial saint [65] Attentive to the prosperity of his own dominions Marcian seemed to behold with indifference the misfortunes of Rome and the obstinate refusal of a brave and active prince to draw his sword against the Vandals was ascribed to a secret promise which had formerly been exacted from him when he was a captive in the power of Genseric [66] The death of Marcian after a reign of seven years would have exposed the East to the danger of a popular election, if the superior weight of a single family had not been able to incline the balance in favour of the candidate whose interest they supported. The patrician Aspar might have placed the diadem on his own head if he would have subscribed the Nicene creed [67] During three generations the armies of the East were successively commanded by his father by himself, and by his son Ardaburius his barbarian guards formed a military force that overawed the palace and the capital and the liberal distribution of his immense treasures rendered Aspar as popular as he was powerful. He recommended the obscure name of Leo of Thrace a military tribune and the principal steward of his household His nomination was unanimously ratified by the senate and the servant of Aspar received the Imperial crown from the hands of the patriarch or bishop who was permitted to express by this unusual ceremony the suffrage of the Deity [68] This emperor the first of the name of Leo has been distinguished by the title of the Great from a succession of princes who gradually fixed in the opinion of the Greeks a very humble standard of heroic or at least of royal perfection Yet the temperate firmness with which Leo resisted the oppression of his benefactor showed that he was conscious of his duty and of his prerogative Aspar was astonished to find that his influence could no longer appoint a præfect of Constantinople he presumed to reproach his sovereign with a breach of promise and insolently shaking his purple It is not proper (said he) that the man who is invested with this garment should be guilty of lying? Nor is it proper (replied Leo) that a prince should be compelled to resign his own judgment and the public interest to the will of a subject [69] After this extraordinary scene it was impossible that the reconciliation of the emperor and the patrician could be sincere or at least that it could be solid and permanent An army of Isaurians[70] was secretly levied and introduced into Constantinople and while Leo undermined the authority and prepared the disgrace of the family of Aspar his mild and cautious behaviour restrained them from any rash and desperate attempts which might have been fatal to themselves or their enemies The measures of peace and war were affected by this internal revolution As long as Aspar degraded the majesty of the throne, the secret correspondence of religion and interest engaged him to favour the cause of Genseric. When Leo had delivered himself from the ignominious servitude, he listened to the complaints of the Italians, resolved to extirpate the tyranny of the Vandals, and declared his alliance with his colleague Anthemius, whom he solemnly invested with the diadem and purple of the West

The virtues of Anthemius have perhaps been magnified, since the Imperial descent, which he could only deduce from the usurper Procopius, has been swelled into a line of emperors [71] But the merit of his immediate parents, their honours, and their riches, rendered Anthemius one of the most illustrious subjects of the East, His father, Procopius, obtained, after his Persian embassy, the rank of general and patrician, and the name of Anthemius was derived from his maternal grandfather, the celebrated præfect, who protected, with so much ability and success, the infant reign of Theodosius The grandson of the præfect was raised above the condition of a private subject by his marriage with Euphemia, the daughter of the emperor Marcian This splendid alliance, which might supersede the necessity of merit, hastened the promotion of Anthemius to the successive dignities of count, of master-general, of consul, and of patrician, and his merit or fortune claimed the honours of a victory which was obtained on the banks of the Danube over the Huns Without indulging an extravagant ambition, the son-in law of Marcian might hope to be his successor, but Anthemius supported the disappointment with courage and patience, and his subsequent elevation was universally approved by the public, who esteemed him worthy to reign till he ascended the throne [72] The emperor of the West marched from Constantinople, attended by several counts of high distinction, and a body of guards almost equal to the strength and numbers of a regular army he entered Rome in triumph, and the choice of Leo was confirmed by the senate, the people, and the barbarian confederates of Italy [73] The solemn inauguration of Anthemius was followed by the nuptials of his daughter and the patrician Ricimer, a fortunate event, which was considered as the firmest security of the union and happiness of the state The wealth of two empires was ostentatiously displayed, and many senators completed their ruin, by an expensive effort to disguise their poverty All serious business was suspended during this festival, the courts of justice were shut, the streets of Rome, the theatres, the places of public and private resort, resounded with hymenæal song and dances and the royal bride, clothed in silken robes, with a crown on her head, was conducted to the palace of Ricimer, who had changed his military dress for the habit of a consul and a senator On this memorable occasion, Sidonius, whose early ambition had been so fatally blasted, appeared as the orator of Auvergne, among the provincial deputies who addressed the throne with congratulations or complaints [74] The calends of January were now approaching, and the venal poet, who had loved Avitus and esteemed Majorian, was persuaded by his friends to celebrate, in heroic verse, the merit, the felicity, the second consulship, and the future triumphs of the emperor Anthemius Sidonius pronounced, with assurance and success, a panegyric which is still extant, and whatever might be the imperfections, either of the subject or of the composition, the welcome flatterer was immediately rewarded with the præfecture of Rome, a dignity which placed him among the illustrious personages of the empire, till he wisely preferred the more respectable character of a bishop, and a saint [75]

The Greeks ambitiously commend the piety and catholic faith of the emperor whom they gave to the West, nor do they forget to observe that, when he left Constantinople, he converted his palace into the pious foundation of a public bath, a church, and an hospital for old men [76] Yet some suspicious appearances are found to sully the theological fame of Anthemius From the conversation of Philotheus, a Macedonian sectary, he had imbibed the spirit of religious toleration, and the heretics of Rome would have assembled with impunity, if the bold and vehement censure which pope Hilary pronounced in the church of St Peter had not obliged him to abjure the unpopular indulgence [77] Even the Pagans, a feeble and obscure remnant, conceived some vain hopes, from the indifference, or partiality, of Anthemius, and his singular friendship for the philosopher Severus, whom he promoted to the consulship, was ascribed to a secret project of reviving the ancient worship of the gods [78] These idols were crumbled into dust and the mythology which had once been the creed of nations was so universally disbelieved, that it might be employed without scandal, or at least without suspicion, by Christian poets [79] Yet the vestiges of

stition were not absolutely obliterated and the festival of the Lupercalia whose origin had preceded the foundation of Rome, was still celebrated under the reign of Anthemius The savage and simple rites were expressive of an early state of society before the invention of arts and agriculture The rustic deities who presided over the toils and pleasures of the pastoral life Pan Faunus and their train of satyrs were such as the fancy of shepherds might create sportive, petulant and lascivious whose power was limited and whose malice was inoffensive A goat was the offering the best adapted to their character and attributes the flesh of the victim was roasted on willow spits and the riotous youths who crowded to the feast ran naked about the fields with leather thongs in their hands communicating as it was supposed, the blessing of fecundity to the women whom they touched [80] The altar of Pan was erected perhaps by Evander the Arcadian in a dark recess in the side of the Palatine hill watered by a perpetual fountain and shaded by a hanging grove A tradition that in the same place Romulus and Remus were suckled by the wolf rendered it still more sacred and venerable in the eyes of the Romans and this sylvan spot was gradually surrounded by the stately edifices of the Forum [81] After the conversion of the Imperial city the Christians still continued in the month of February the annual celebration of the Lupercalia to which they ascribed a secret and mysterious influence on the genial powers of the animal and vegetable world The bishops of Rome were solicitous to abolish a profane custom so repugnant to the spirit of Christianity but their zeal was not supported by the authority of the civil magistrate the inveterate abuse subsisted till the end of the fifth century and pope Gelasius who purified the capital from the last stain of idolatry appeased by a formal apology the murmurs of the senate and people [82]

In all his public declarations the emperor Leo assumes the authority and professes the affection of a father for his son Anthemius with whom he had divided the administration of the universe [83] The situation and perhaps the character of Leo dissuaded him from exposing his person to the toils and dangers of an African war But the powers of the Eastern empire were strenuously exerted to deliver Italy and the Mediterranean from the Vandals and Genseric who had so long oppressed both the land and sea was threatened from every side with a formidable invasion The campaign was opened by a bold and successful enterprise of the præfect Heraclius [84] The troops of Egypt Thebais, and Libya were embarked under his command and the Arabs with a train of horses and camels, opened the roads of the desert Heraclius landed on the coast of Tripoli surprised and subdued the cities of that province and prepared by a laborious march which Cato had formerly executed [85] to join the Imperial army under the walls of Carthage The intelligence of this loss extorted from Genseric some insidious and ineffectual propositions of peace but he was still more seriously alarmed by the reconciliation of Marcellinus with the two empires The independent patrician had been persuaded to acknowledge the legitimate title of Anthemius, whom he accompanied in his journey to Rome the Dalmatian fleet was received into the harbours of Italy the active valour of Marcellinus expelled the Vandals from the island of Sardinia and the languid efforts of the West added some weight to the immense preparations of the Eastern Romans The expense of the naval armament which Leo sent against the Vandals has been distinctly ascertained and the curious and instructive account displays the wealth of the declining empire. The Royal demesnes, or private patrimony of the prince supplied seventeen thousand pounds of gold forty seven thousand pounds of gold and seven hundred thousand of silver were levied and paid into the treasury by the Prætorian præfects But the cities were reduced to extreme poverty and the diligent calculation of fines and forfeitures, as a valuable object of the revenue does not suggest the idea of a just or merciful administration The whole expense by whatsoever means it was defrayed of the African campaign amounted to the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds of gold about five millions two hundred thousand pounds sterling at a time when the value of money appears from the comparative price of corn to have been somewhat higher than in the present age [86] The fleet that sailed from Constantinople to Carthage consisted of eleven hundred and thirteen ships and the number of soldiers and mariners exceeded one hundred thousand men Basiliscus the brother of the empress Verina was intrusted with this important command His sister the wife of Leo had exaggerated the merit of his former exploits against the Scythians But the discovery of his guilt or incapacity was reserved for the African war and his friends could only save his military reputation by asserting that he had conspired with Aspar to spare Genseric and to betray the last hope of the Western empire

Experience has shown that the success of an invader most commonly depends on the vigour and celerity of his operations The strength and sharpness of the first impression are blunted by delay, the health and spirit of the troops insensibly languish in a distant climate, the naval and military force, a mighty effort which perhaps can never be repeated, is silently consumed, and every hour that is wasted in negotiation accustoms the enemy to contemplate and examine those hostile terrors which, on their first appearance, he deemed irresistible The formidable navy of Basiliscus pursued its prosperous navigation from the Thracian Bosphorus to the coast of Africa He landed his troops at Cape Bona, or the promontory of Mercury, about forty miles from Carthage [87] The army of Heraclius, and the fleet of Marcellinus, either joined or seconded the Imperial lieutenant, and the Vandals who opposed his progress by sea or land were successively vanquished [88] If Basiliscus had seized the moment of consternation, and boldly advanced to the capital, Carthage must have surrendered, and the kingdom of the Vandals was extinguished Genseric beheld the danger with firmness, and eluded it with his veteran dexterity He protested, in the most respectful language, that he was ready to submit his person and his dominions to the will of the emperor, but he requested a truce of five days to regulate the terms of his submission, and it was universally believed that his secret liberality contributed to the success of this public negotiation Instead of obstinately refusing whatever indulgence his enemy so earnestly solicited, the guilty, or the credulous, Basiliscus consented to the fatal truce, and his imprudent security seemed to proclaim that he already considered himself as the conqueror of Africa During this short interval the wind became favourable to the designs of Genseric He manned his largest ships of war with the bravest of the Moors and Vandals, and they towed after them many large barks filled with combustible materials In the obscurity of the night, these destructive vessels were impelled against the unguarded and unsuspecting fleet of the Romans, who were awakened by the sense of their instant danger Their close and crowded order assisted the progress of the fire, which was communicated with rapid and irresistible violence, and the noise of the wind, the crackling of the flames, the dissonant cries of the soldiers and mariners, who could neither command nor obey, increased the horror of the nocturnal tumult Whilst they laboured to extricate themselves from the fire-ships, and to save at least a part of the navy, the galleys of Genseric assaulted them with temperate and disciplined valour, and many of the Romans, who escaped the fury of the flames, were destroyed or taken by the victorious Vandals Among the events of that disastrous night, the heroic, or rather desperate, courage of John, one of the principal officers of Basiliscus, has rescued his name from oblivion When the ship which he had bravely defended was almost consumed, he threw himself in his armour into the sea, disdainfully rejected the esteem and pity of Genso, the son of Genseric, who pressed him to accept honourable quarter, and sunk under the waves, exclaiming, with his last breath, that he would never fall alive into the hands of those impious dogs Actuated by a far different spirit, Basiliscus, whose station was the most remote from danger, disgracefully fled in the beginning of the engagement, returned to Constantinople with the loss of more than half of his fleet and army, and sheltered his guilty head in the sanctuary of St Sophia, till his sister, by her tears and entreaties, could obtain his pardon from the indignant emperor Heraclius effected his retreat through the desert, Marcellinus retired to Sicily, where he was assassinated, perhaps at the instigation of Ricimer, by one of his own captains, and the king of the Vandals expressed his surprise and satisfaction that the Romans themselves should remove from the world his most formidable antagonists [89] After the failure of this great expedition, Genseric again became the tyrant of the sea the coasts of Italy, Greece, and Asia, were again exposed to his revenge and avarice, Tripoli and Sardinia returned to his obedience, he added Sicily to the number of his provinces, and, before he died, in the fulness of years and of glory, he beheld the final extinction of the empire of the West [90]

During his long and active reign the African monarch had studiously cultivated the friendship of the barbarians of Europe, whose arms he might employ in a seasonable and effectual diversion against the two empires After the death of Attila he renewed his alliance with the Visigoths of Gaul, and the sons of the elder Theodoric, who successively reigned over that warlike nation, were easily persuaded, by the sense of interest, to forget the cruel affront which Genseric had inflicted on their sister [91] The death of the emperor Majorian delivered Theodoric the Second from the restraint of fear, and perhaps of honour, he violated his recent [illegible] with the Romans, and the ample [illegible]

Narbonne which he firmly united to his dominions became the immediate reward of his perfidy The selfish policy of Ricimer encouraged him to invade the provinces which were in the possession of Ægidius his rival but the active count by the defence of Arles and the victory of Orleans saved Gaul and checked during his lifetime the progress of the Visigoths Their ambition was soon rekindled and the design of extinguishing the Roman empire in Spain and Gaul was conceived and almost completed in the reign of Euric, who assassinated his brother Theodoric and displayed with a more savage temper superior abilities both in peace and war He passed the Pyrenees at the head of a numerous army subdued the cities of Saragossa and Pampeluna vanquished in battle the martial nobles of the Tarragonese province carried his victorious arms into the heart of Lusitania and permitted the Suevi to hold the kingdom of Gallicia under the Gothic monarchy of Spain [92] The efforts of Euric were not less vigorous or less successful in Gaul and throughout the country that extends from the Pyrenees to the Rhône and the Loire Berry and Auvergne were the only cities or dioceses which refused to acknowledge him as their master [93] In the defence of Clermont their principal town the inhabitants of Auvergne sustained with inflexible resolution the miseries of war, pestilence and famine and the Visigoths relinquishing the fruitless siege suspended the hopes of that important conquest The youth of the province were animated by the heroic and almost incredible valour of Ecdicius the son of the emperor Avitus [94] who made a desperate sally with only eighteen horsemen boldly attacked the Gothic army and after maintaining a flying skirmish retired safe and victorious within the walls of Clermont His charity was equal to his courage in a time of extreme scarcity four thousand poor were fed at his expense and his private influence levied an army of Burgundians for the deliverance of Auvergne From his virtues alone the faithful citizens of Gaul derived any hopes of safety or freedom and even such virtues were insufficient to avert the impending ruin of their country since they were anxious to learn from his authority and example whether they should prefer the alternative of exile or servitude [95] The public confidence was lost the resources of the state were exhausted and the Gauls had too much reason to believe that Anthemius who reigned in Italy was incapable of protecting his distressed subjects beyond the Alps The feeble emperor could only procure for their defence the service of twelve thousand British auxiliaries. Riothamus, one of the independent kings or chieftains of the island was persuaded to transport his troops to the continent of Gaul he sailed up the Loire, and established his quarters in Berry where the people complained of these oppressive allies, till they were destroyed or dispersed by the arms of the Visigoths [96]

One of the last acts of jurisdiction which the Roman senate exercised over their subjects of Gaul was the trial and condemnation of Arvandus the Prætorian præfect Sidonius, who rejoices that he lived under a reign in which he might pity and assist a state-criminal has expressed with tenderness and freedom, the faults of his indiscreet and unfortunate friend.[97] From the perils which he had escaped Arvandus imbibed confidence rather than wisdom and such was the various though uniform imprudence of his behaviour that his prosperity must appear much more surprising than his downfall. The second præfecture which he obtained within the term of five years abolished the merit and popularity of his preceding administration His easy temper was corrupted by flattery and exasperated by opposition he was forced to satisfy his importunate creditors with the spoils of the province his capricious insolence offended the nobles of Gaul and he sunk under the weight of the public hatred. The mandate of his disgrace summoned him to justify his conduct before the senate and he passed the sea of Tuscany with a favourable wind the presage as he vainly imagined of his future fortunes A decent respect was still observed for the Præfectorian rank and on his arrival at Rome Arvandus was committed to the hospitality rather than to the custody of Flavius Asellus, the count of the sacred largesses who resided in the Capitol [98] He was eagerly pursued by his accusers the four deputies of Gaul who were all distinguished by their birth their dignities, or their eloquence In the name of a great province and according to the forms of Roman jurisprudence they instituted a civil and criminal action requiring such restitution as might compensate the losses of individuals and such punishment as might satisfy the justice of the state Their charges of corrupt oppression were numerous and weighty but they placed their secret dependence on a letter which they had intercepted and which they could prove by the evidence of his secretary to have been dictated by Arvandus himself The author of this letter seemed to dissuade the king of the Goths from a peace with the Greek emperor he suggested the attack of the Britons on the Loire, and he recommended a division of Gaul, according to the law of nations, between the Visigoths and the Burgundians[99] These pernicious schemes, which a friend could only palliate by the reproaches of vanity and indiscretion, were susceptible of a treasonable interpretation, and the deputies had artfully resolved not to produce their most formidable weapons till the decisive moment of the contest But their intentions were discovered by the zeal of Sidonius He immediately apprised the unsuspecting criminal of his danger, and sincerely lamented, without any mixture of anger, the haughty presumption of Arvandus, who rejected, and even resented, the salutary advice of his friends Ignorant of his real situation, Arvandus showed himself in the Capitol in the white robe of a candidate, accepted indiscriminate salutations and offers of service, examined the shops of the merchants, the silks, and gems, sometimes with the indifference of a spectator and sometimes with the attention of a purchaser, and complained of the times, of the senate, of the prince, and of the delays of justice His complaints were soon removed An early day was fixed for his trial, and Arvandus appeared, with his accusers, before a numerous assembly of the Roman senate The mournful garb which they affected excited the compassion of the judges, who were scandalised by the gay and splendid dress of their adversary and when the præfect Arvandus, with the first of the Gallic deputies, were directed to take their places on the senatorial benches, the same contrast of pride and modesty was observed in their behaviour In this memorable judgment, which presented a lively image of the old republic, the Gauls exposed, with force and freedom, the grievances of the province, and as soon as the minds of the audience were sufficiently inflamed, they recited the fatal epistle The obstinacy of Arvandus was founded on the strange supposition that a subject could not be convicted of treason, unless he had actually conspired to assume the purple As the paper was read, he repeatedly, and with a loud voice, acknowledged it for his genuine composition, and his astonishment was equal to his dismay when the unanimous voice of the senate declared him guilty of a capital offence By their decree he was degraded from the rank of a præfect to the obscure condition of a plebeian, and ignominiously dragged by servile hands to the public prison After a fortnight's adjournment the senate was again convened to pronounce the sentence of his death but while he expected, in the island of Æsculapius, the expiration of the thirty days allowed by an ancient law to the vilest malefactors,[100] his friends interposed, the emperor Anthemius relented, and the præfect of Gaul obtained the milder punishment of exile and confiscation The faults of Arvandus might deserve compassion, but the impunity of Seronatus accused the justice of the republic, till he was condemned and executed on the complaint of the people of Auvergne That flagitious minister, the Catiline of his age and country, held a secret correspondence with the Visigoths to betray the province which he oppressed his industry was continually exercised in the discovery of new taxes and obsolete offences, and his extravagant vices would have inspired contempt if they had not excited fear and abhorrence[101]

Such criminals were not beyond the reach of justice, but whatever might be the guilt of Ricimer, that powerful barbarian was able to contend or to negotiate with the prince whose alliance he had condescended to accept The peaceful and prosperous reign which Anthemius had promised to the West was soon clouded by misfortune and discord Ricimer, apprehensive or impatient of a superior, retired from Rome and fixed his residence at Milan, an advantageous situation, either to invite or to repel the warlike tribes that were seated between the Alps and the Danube[102] Italy was gradually divided into two independent and hostile kingdoms, and the nobles of Liguria, who trembled at the near approach of a civil war, fell prostrate at the feet of the patrician, and conjured him to spare their unhappy country "For my own part," replied Ricimer, in a tone of insolent moderation, "I am still inclined to embrace the friendship of the Galatian,[103] but who will undertake to appease his anger, or to mitigate the pride which always rises in proportion to our submission?" They informed him that Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia,[104] united the wisdom of the serpent with the innocence of the dove, and appeared confident that the eloquence of such an ambassador must prevail against the strongest opposition, either of interest or passion Their recommendation was approved, and Epiphanius, assuming the benevolent office of mediation, proceeded without delay to Rome where he was received with the honours due to his merit and reputation The oration of a bishop in favour of peace may be easily supposed he argued that, in all possible circumstances, the forgiveness of injuries must be an act of mercy or magnanimity or prudence and he seriously admonished the emperor to avoid a contest with a fierce barbarian which might be fatal to himself and must be ruinous to his dominions Anthemius acknowledged the truth of his maxims but he deeply felt with grief and indignation the behaviour of Ricimer and his passion gave eloquence and energy to his discourse What favours ' he warmly exclaimed have we refused to this ungrateful man? What provocations have we not endured? Regardless of the majesty of the purple I gave my daughter to a Goth I sacrificed my own blood to the safety of the republic The liberality which ought to have secured the eternal attachment of Ricimer has exasperated him against his benefactor What wars has he not excited against the empire? How often has he instigated and assisted the fury of hostile nations? Shall I now accept his perfidious friendship? Can I hope that he will respect the engagements of a treaty who has already violated the duties of a son? But the anger of Anthemius evaporated in these passionate exclamations he insensibly yielded to the proposals of Epiphanius and the bishop returned to his diocese with the satisfaction of restoring the peace of Italy by a reconciliation [105] of which the sincerity and continuance might be reasonably suspected The clemency of the emperor was extorted from his weakness and Ricimer suspended his ambitious designs till he had secretly prepared the engines with which he resolved to subvert the throne of Anthemius The mask of peace and moderation was then thrown aside The army of Ricimer was fortified by a numerous reinforcement of Burgundians and Oriental Suevi he disclaimed all allegiance to the Greek emperor marched from Milan to the gates of Rome and fixing his camp on the banks of the Anio impatiently expected the arrival of Olybrius his Imperial candidate

The senator Olybrius of the Anician family might esteem himself the lawful heir of the Western empire He had married Placidia the younger daughter of Valentinian after she was restored by Genseric who still detained her sister Eudoxia as the wife or rather as the captive of his son The king of the Vandals supported by threats and solicitations the fair pretensions of his Roman ally and assigned as one of the motives of the war the refusal of the senate and people to acknowledge their lawful prince, and the unworthy preference which they had given to a stranger [106] The friendship of the public enemy might render Olybrius still more unpopular to the Italians but when Ricimer meditated the ruin of the emperor Anthemius he tempted with the offer of a diadem the candidate who could justify his rebellion by an illustrious name and a royal alliance The husband of Placidia who like most of his ancestors had been invested with the consular dignity might have continued to enjoy a secure and splendid fortune in the peaceful residence of Constantinople nor does he appear to have been tormented by such a genius as cannot be amused or occupied unless by the administration of an empire Yet Olybrius yielded to the importunities of his friends perhaps of his wife rashly plunged into the dangers and calamities of a civil war and with the secret connivance of the emperor Leo accepted the Italian purple which was bestowed and resumed at the capricious will of a barbarian He landed without obstacle (for Genseric was master of the sea) either at Ravenna or the port of Ostia and immediately proceeded to the camp of Ricimer where he was received as the sovereign of the Western world [107]

The patrician who had extended his posts from the Anio to the Milvian bridge already possessed two quarters of Rome the Vatican and the Janiculum which are separated by the Tiber from the rest of the city [108] and it may be conjectured that an assembly of seceding senators imitated in the choice of Olybrius the forms of a legal election But the body of the senate and people firmly adhered to the cause of Anthemius and the more effectual support of a Gothic army enabled him to prolong his reign and the public distress by a resistance of three months which produced the concomitant evils of famine and pestilence At length Ricimer made a furious assault on the bridge of Hadrian or St Angelo and the narrow pass was defended with equal valour by the Goths till the death of Gilimer their leader The victorious troops breaking down every barrier rushed with irresistible violence into the heart of the city and Rome (if we may use the language of a contemporary pope) was subverted by the civil fury of Anthemius and Ricimer [109] The unfortunate Anthemius was dragged from his concealment and inhumanly massacred by the command of his son in law who thus added a third or perhaps a fourth emperor to the number of his victims The soldiers who united the rage of factious citizens with the savage manners of barbarians were indulged without control in the licence of rapine and murder the crowd of slaves and plebeians who were unconcerned in the event, could only gain by the indiscriminate pillage, and the face of the city exhibited the strange contrast of stern cruelty and dissolute intemperance[110] Forty days after this calamitous event, the subject, not of glory, but of guilt, Italy was delivered, by a painful disease, from the tyrant Ricimer, who bequeathed the command of his army to his nephew Gundobald, one of the princes of the Burgundians In the same year all the principal actors in this great revolution were removed from the stage, and the whole reign of Olybrius, whose death does not betray any symptoms of violence, is included within the term of seven months He left one daughter, the offspring of his marriage with Placidia, and the family of the great Theodosius, transplanted from Spain to Constantinople, was propagated in the female line as far as the eighth generation[111]

Whilst the vacant throne of Italy was abandoned to lawless barbarians,[112] the election of a new colleague was seriously agitated in the council of Leo The empress Verina, studious to promote the greatness of her own family, had married one of her nieces to Julius Nepos, who succeeded his uncle Marcellinus in the sovereignty of Dalmatia, a more solid possession than the title which he was persuaded to accept of Emperor of the West But the measures of the Byzantine court were so languid and irresolute, that many months elapsed after the death of Anthemius, and even of Olybrius, before their destined successor could show himself, with a respectable force, to his Italian subjects During that interval, Glycerius, an obscure soldier, was invested with the purple by his patron Gundobald, but the Burgundian prince was unable or unwilling to support his nomination by a civil war the pursuits of domestic ambition recalled him beyond the Alps,[113] and his client was permitted to exchange the Roman sceptre for the bishopric of Salona After extinguishing such a competitor, the emperor Nepos was acknowledged by the senate, by the Italians, and by the provincials of Gaul, his moral virtues and military talents were loudly celebrated, and those who derived any private benefit from his government announced in prophetic strains the restoration of the public felicity[114] Their hopes (if such hopes had been entertained) were confounded within the term of a single year, and the treaty of peace, which ceded Auvergne to the Visigoths, is the only event of his short and inglorious reign The most faithful subjects of Gaul were sacrificed by the Italian emperor to the hope of domestic security,[11] but his repose was soon invaded by a furious sedition of the barbarian confederates, who, under the command of Orestes, their general, were in full march from Rome to Ravenna Nepos trembled at their approach, and, instead of placing a just confidence in the strength of Ravenna, he hastily escaped to his ships, and retired to his Dalmatian principality, on the opposite coast of the Hadriatic By this shameful abdication he protracted his life about five years, in a very ambiguous state between an emperor and an exile, till he was assassinated at Salona by the ungrateful Glycerius, who was translated, perhaps as the reward of his crime, to the archbishopric of Milan[116]

The nations who had asserted their independence after the death of Attila were established, by the right of possession or conquest, in the boundless countries to the north of the Danube, or in the Roman provinces between the river and the Alps But the bravest of their youth enlisted in the army of confederates, who formed the defence and the terror of Italy,[117] and in this promiscuous multitude, the names of the Heruli, the Scirri, the Alani, the Turcilingi, and the Rugians, appear to have predominated The example of these warriors was imitated by Orestes,[118] the son of Tatullus, and the father of the last Roman emperor of the West Orestes, who has been already mentioned in this history, had never deserted his country His birth and fortunes rendered him one of the most illustrious subjects of Pannonia When that province was ceded to the Huns, he entered into the service of Attila, his lawful sovereign, obtained the office of his secretary, and was repeatedly sent ambassador to Constantinople, to represent the person and signify the commands of the imperious monarch. The death of that conqueror restored him to his freedom, and Orestes might honourably refuse either to follow the sons of Attila into the Scythian desert, or to obey the Ostrogoths, who had usurped the dominion of Pannonia He preferred the service of the Italian princes, the successors of Valentinian, and, as he possessed the qualifications of courage, industry, and experience, he advanced with rapid steps in the military profession, till he was elevated, by the favour of Nepos himself, to the dignities of patrician and master general of the troops These troops had been long accustomed to reverence the character and authority of Orestes, who affected their manners, conversed with them in their own language, and was intimately connected with their national chieftains by long habits of familiarity and friendship At his solicitation they rose in arms against the obscure Greek who presumed to claim their obedience and when Orestes from some secret motive declined the purple they consented with the same facility to acknowledge his son Augustulus as the emperor of the West By the abdication of Nepos Orestes had now attained the summit of his ambitious hopes but he soon discovered before the end of the first year that the lessons of perjury and ingratitude which a rebel must inculcate will be retorted against himself and that the precarious sovereign of Italy was only permitted to choose whether he would be the slave or the victim of his barbarian mercenaries The dangerous alliance of these strangers had oppressed and insulted the last remains of Roman freedom and dignity At each revolution their pay and privileges were augmented but their insolence increased in a still more extravagant degree they envied the fortune of their brethren in Gaul Spain and Africa whose victorious arms had acquired an independent and perpetual inheritance and they insisted on their peremptory demand that a third part of the lands of Italy should be immediately divided among them Orestes with a spirit which in another situation might be entitled to our esteem chose rather to encounter the rage of an armed multitude than to subscribe the ruin of an innocent people He rejected the audacious demand and his refusal was favourable to the ambition of Odoacer a bold barbarian who assured his fellow soldiers that if they dared to associate under his command they might soon extort the justice which had been denied to their dutiful petitions From all the camps and garrisons of Italy the confederates actuated by the same resentment and the same hopes impatiently flocked to the standard of this popular leader and the unfortunate patrician overwhelmed by the torrent, hastily retreated to the strong city of Pavia the episcopal seat of the holy Epiphanites Pavia was immediately besieged the fortifications were stormed the town was pillaged and although the bishop might labour with much zeal and some success to save the property of the church and the chastity of female captives the tumult could only be appeased by the execution of Orestes[119] His brother Paul was slain in an action near Ravenna and the helpless Augustulus who could no longer command the respect was reduced to implore the clemency of Odoacer

That successful barbarian was the son of Edecon who in some remarkable transactions particularly described in a preceding chapter had been the colleague of Orestes himself The honour of an ambassador should be exempt from suspicion and Edecon had listened to a conspiracy against the life of his sovereign. But this apparent guilt was expiated by his merit or repentance his rank was eminent and conspicuous he enjoyed the favour of Attila and the troops under his command who guarded in their turn the royal village consisted of a tribe of Sciri his immediate and hereditary subjects. In the revolt of the nations they still adhered to the Huns and more than twelve years afterwards the name of Edecon is honourably mentioned in their unequal contest with the Ostrogoths which was terminated after two bloody battles by the defeat and dispersion of the Sciri[120] Their gallant leader who did not survive this national calamity, left two sons Onulf and Odoacer to struggle with adversity and to maintain as they might by rapine or service, the faithful followers of their exile Onulf directed his steps towards Constantinople where he sullied by the assassination of a generous benefactor the fame which he had acquired in arms His brother Odoacer led a wandering life among the barbarians of Noricum with a mind and a fortune suited to the most desperate adventures and when he had fixed his choice he piously visited the cell of Severinus the popular saint of the country to solicit his approbation and blessing The lowness of the door would not admit the lofty stature of Odoacer he was obliged to stoop but in that humble attitude the saint could discern the symptoms of his future greatness and addressing him in a prophetic tone Pursue (said he) your design proceed to Italy you will soon cast away this coarse garment of skins and your wealth will be adequate to the liberality of your mind [121] The barbarian whose daring spirit accepted and ratified the prediction was admitted into the service of the Western empire and soon obtained an honourable rank in the guards His manners were gradually polished his military skill was improved and the confederates of Italy would not have elected him for their general unless the exploits of Odoacer had established a high opinion of his courage and capacity[122] Their military acclamations saluted him with the title of king but he abstained during his whole reign from the use of the purple and diadem[123] lest he should offend those princes whose subjects by their accidental mixture had formed the victorious army which time and policy might insensibly unite into a great nation.

Royalty was familiar to the barbarians, and the submissive people of Italy was prepared to obey, without a murmur, the authority which he should condescend to exercise as the vicegerent of the emperor of the West But Odoacer had resolved to abolish that useless and expensive office, and such is the weight of antique prejudice, that it required some boldness and penetration to discover the extreme facility of the enterprise The unfortunate Augustulus was made the instrument of his own disgrace, he signified his resignation to the senate, and that assembly, in their last act of obedience to a Roman prince, still affected the spirit of freedom and the forms of the constitution An epistle was addressed, by their unanimous decree, to the emperor Zeno, the son in-law and successor of Leo, who had lately been restored, after a short rebellion, to the Byzantine throne They solemnly "disclaim the necessity, or even the wish, of continuing any longer the Imperial succession in Italy, since, in their opinion, the majesty of a sole monarch is sufficient to pervade and protect, at the same time, both the East and the West In their own name, and in the name of the people, they consent that the seat of universal empire shall be transferred from Rome to Constantinople, and they basely renounce the right of choosing their master, the only vestige that yet remained of the authority which had given laws to the world The republic (they repeat that name without a blush) might safely confide in the civil and military virtues of Odoacer, and they humbly request that the emperor would invest him with the title of Patrician, and the administration of the diocese of Italy " The deputies of the senate were received at Constantinople with some mark of displeasure and indignation and when they were admitted to the audience of Zeno, he sternly reproached them with their treatment of the two emperors, Anthemius and Nepos, whom the East had successively granted to the prayers of Italy "The first (continued he) you have murdered, the second you have expelled but the second is still alive, and whilst he lives he is your lawful sovereign " But the prudent Zeno soon deserted the hopeless cause of his abdicated colleague His vanity was gratified by the title of sole emperor, and by the statues erected to his honour in the several quarters of Rome, he entertained a friendly, though ambiguous, correspondence with the patrician Odoacer, and he gratefully accepted the Imperial ensigns, the sacred ornaments of the throne and palace, which the barbarian was not unwilling to remove from the sight of the people [124]

In the space of twenty years since the death of Valentinian, nine emperors had successively disappeared, and the son of Orestes, a youth recommended only by his beauty, would be the least entitled to the notice of posterity, if his reign, which was marked by the extinction of the Roman empire in the West, did not leave a memorable era in the history of mankind [125] The patrician Orestes had married the daughter of Count Romulus, of Petovio in Noricum, the name of Augustus, notwithstanding the jealousy of power, was known at Aquileia as a familiar surname, and the appellations of the two great founders, of the city and of the monarchy, were thus strangely united in the last of their successors [126] The son or Orestes assumed and disgraced the names of Romulus Augustus but the first was corrupted into Momyllus by the Greeks, and the second has been changed by the Latins into the contemptible diminutive Augustulus The life of this inoffensive youth was spared by the generous clemency of Odoacer, who dismissed him, with his whole family, from the Imperial palace, fixed his annual allowance at six thousand pieces of gold, and assigned the castle of Lucullus, in Campania, for the place of his exile or retirement [127] As soon as the Romans breathed from the toils of the Punic war, they were attracted by the beauties and the pleasures of Campania, and the country house of the elder Scipio at Liternum exhibited a lasting model of their rustic simplicity [128] The delicious shores of the bay of Naples were crowded with villas, and Sylla applauded the masterly skill of his rival, who had seated himself on the lofy promontory of Misenum, that commands, on every side, the sea and land, as far as the boundaries of the horizon [129] The villa of Marius was purchased within a few years, by Lucullus, and the price had increased from two thousand five hundred, to more than fourscore thousand, pounds sterling [130] It was adorned by the new proprietor with Grecian arts and Asiatic treasures, and the houses and gardens of Lucullus obtained a distinguished rank in the list of Imperial palaces [131] When the Vandals became formidable to the sea coast, the Lucullan villa, on the promontory of Misenum, gradually assumed the strength and appellation of a strong castle, the obscure retreat of the last emperor of the West About twenty years after that great revolution it was converted into a church and monastery, to receive the bones of S

phies of Cimbric and Armenian victories till the beginning of the tenth century when the fortifications which might afford a dangerous shelter to the Saracens were demolished by the people of Naples [132]

Odoacer was the first barbarian who reigned in Italy over a people who had once asserted their just superiority above the rest of mankind The disgrace of the Romans still excites our respectful compassion and we fondly sympathise with the imaginary grief and indignation of their degenerate posterity But the calamities of Italy had gradually subdued the proud consciousness of freedom and glory In the age of Roman virtue the provinces were subject to the arms and the citizens to the laws of the republic till those laws were subverted by civil discord and both the city and the provinces became the servile property of a tyrant The forms of the constitution which alleviated or disguised their abject slavery were abolished by time and violence the Italians alternately lamented the presence or the absence of the sovereigns whom they detested or despised and the succession of five centuries inflicted the various evils of military licence capricious despotism and elaborate oppression During the same period the barbarians had emerged from obscurity and contempt and the warriors of Germany and Scythia were introduced into the provinces as the servants the allies and at length the masters of the Romans whom they insulted or protected The hatred of the people was suppressed by fear they respected the spirit and splendour of the martial chiefs who were invested with the honours of the empire and the fate of Rome had long depended on the sword of those formidable strangers The stern Ricimer who trampled on the ruins of Italy had exercised the power without assuming the title of a king and the patient Romans were insensibly prepared to acknowledge the royalty of Odoacer and his barbaric successors

The king of Italy was not unworthy of the high station to which his valour and fortune had exalted him his savage manners were polished by the habits of conversation and he respected though a conqueror and a barbarian the institutions, and even the prejudices of his subjects After an interval of seven years Odoacer restored the consulship of the West For himself he modestly or proudly declined an honour which was still accepted by the emperors of the East but the curule chair was successively filled by eleven of the most illustrious senators [133] and the list is adorned by the respectable name of Basilius whose virtues claimed the friendship and grateful applause of Sidonius his client [134] The laws of the emperors were strictly enforced and the civil administration of Italy was still exercised by the Prætorian præfect and his subordinate officers Odoacer devolved on the Roman magistrates the odious and oppressive task of collecting the public revenue but he reserved for himself the merit of seasonable and popular indulgence [135] Like the rest of the barbarians he had been instructed in the Arian heresy but he revered the monastic and episcopal characters and the silence of the catholics attests the toleration which they enjoyed The peace of the city required the interposition of his præfect Basilius in the choice of a Roman pontiff the decree which restrained the clergy from alienating their lands was ultimately designed for the benefit of the people whose devotion would have been taxed to repair the dilapidations of the church [136] Italy was protected by the arms of its conqueror and its frontiers were respected by the barbarians of Gaul and Germany who had so long insulted the feeble race of Theodosius Odoacer passed the Hadriatic to chastise the assassins of the emperor Nepos and to acquire the maritime province of Dalmatia He passed the Alps to rescue the remains of Noricum from Fava or Feletheus king of the Rugians who held his residence beyond the Danube The king was vanquished in battle and led away prisoner a numerous colony of captives and subjects was transplanted into Italy and Rome after a long period of defeat and disgrace might claim the triumph of her barbarian master [137]

Notwithstanding the prudence and success of Odoacer his kingdom exhibited the sad prospect of misery and desolation Since the age of Tiberius the decay of agriculture had been felt in Italy and it was a just subject of complaint that the life of the Roman people depended on the accidents of the winds and waves [138] In the division and the decline of the empire the tributary harvests of Egypt and Africa were withdrawn the numbers of the inhabitants continually diminished with the means of subsistence and the country was exhausted by the irretrievable losses of war famine [139] and pestilence St Ambrose has deplored the ruin of a populous district which had been once adorned with the flourishing cities of Bologna Modena Rhegium and Placentia [140] Pope Gelasius was a subject of Odoacer and he affirms with strong exaggeration that in Æmilia Tuscany and the adjacent provinces the human species was almost extirpated[141] The plebians of Rome, who were fed by the hand of their master, perished or disappeared as soon as his liberality was suppressed, the decline of the arts reduced the industrious mechanic to idleness and want, and the senators, who might support with patience the ruin of their country, bewailed their private loss of wealth and luxury One third of those ample estates, to which the ruin of Italy is originally imputed,[142] was extorted for the use of the conquerors Injuries were aggravated by insults, the sense of actual sufferings was embittered by the fear of more dreadful evils, and as new lands were allotted to new swarms of barbarians, each senator was apprehensive lest the arbitrary surveyors should approach his favourite villa, or his most profitable farm The least unfortunate were those who submitted without a murmur to the power which it was impossible to resist Since they desired to live, they owed some gratitude to the tyrant who had spared their lives, and since he was the absolute master of their fortunes, the portion which he left must be accepted as his pure and voluntary gift[143] The distress of Italy was mitigated by the prudence and humanity of Odoacer, who had bound himself, as the price of his elevation, to satisfy the demands of a licentious and turbulent multitude The kings of the barbarians were frequently resisted, deposed, or murdered, by their native subjects, and the various bands of Italian mercenaries, who associated under the standard of an elective general, claimed a larger privilege of freedom and rapine A monarchy destitute of national union and hereditary right hastened to its dissolution After a reign of fourteen years Odoacer was oppressed by the superior genius of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, a hero alike excellent in the arts of war and of government, who restored an age of peace and prosperity, and whose name still excites and deserves the attention of mankind

CHAPTER XXXVII

Origin, Progress, and Effects of the Monastic Life Conversion of the Barbarians to Christianity and Arianism Persecution of the Vandals in Africa Extinction of Arianism among the Barbarians

The indissoluble connection of civil and ecclesiastical affairs has compelled and encouraged me to relate the progress, the persecutions, the establishment, the divisions, the final triumph, and the gradual corruption of Christianity I have purposely delayed the consideration of two religious events interesting in the study of human nature, and important in the decline and fall of the Roman empire I The institution of the monastic life,[1] and II The conversion of the northern barbarians

I Prosperity and peace introduced the distinction of the vulgar and the Ascetic Christians[2] The loose and imperfect practice of religion satisfied the conscience of the multitude The prince or magistrate, the soldier or merchant, reconciled their fervent zeal and implicit faith with the exercise of their profession, the pursuit of their interest, and the indulgence of their passions but the Ascetics, who obeyed and abused the rigid precepts of the Gospel, were inspired by the savage enthusiasm which represents man as a criminal, and God as a tyrant They seriously renounced the business and the pleasures of the age, abjured the use of wine, of flesh, and of marriage, chastised their body, mortified their affections, and embraced a life of misery, as the price of eternal happiness In the reign of Constantine the Ascetics fled from a profane and degenerate world to perpetual solitude or religious society Like the first Christians of Jerusalem,[3] they resigned the use or the property of their temporal possessions, established regular communities of the same sex and a similar disposition, and assumed the names of Hermits, Monks, and Anachorets, expressive of their lonely retreat in a natural or artificial desert They soon acquired the respect of the world, which they despised, and the loudest applause was bestowed on this Divine Philosophy,[4] which surpassed, without the aid of science or reason, the laborious virtues of the Grecian schools The monks might indeed contend with the Stoics in the contempt of fortune, of pain, and of death the Pythagorean silence and submission were revived in their servile discipline, and they disdained as firmly as the Cynics themselves all the forms and decencies of civil society But the votaries of this Divine Philosophy aspired to imitate a purer and more perfect model They trod in the footsteps of the prophets, who had retired to the desert,[5] and stored the devout and contemplative life which had been instituted by the Essenians in Palestine and Egypt The philosophic eye of Pliny had surveyed with astonishment a solitary people who dwelt among the palm trees near the Dead Sea who subsisted without money who were propagated without women and who derived from the disgust and repentance of mankind a perpetual supply of voluntary associates [6]

Egypt the fruitful parent of superstition afforded the first example of the monastic life. Antony [7] an illiterate[8] youth of the lower parts of Thebais distributed his patrimony [9] deserted his family and native home and executed his monastic penance with original and intrepid fanaticism After a long and painful noviciate among the tombs and in a ruined tower he boldly advanced into the desert three days journey to the eastward of the Nile discovered a lonely spot which possessed the advantages of shade and water and fixed his last residence on Mount Colzim near the Red Sea where an ancient monastery still preserves the name and memory of the saint [10] The curious devotion of the Christians pursued him to the desert and when he was obliged to appear at Alexandria, in the face of mankind he supported his fame with discretion and dignity He enjoyed the friendship of Athanasius whose doctrine he approved and the Egyptian peasant respectfully declined a respectful invitation from the emperor Constantine The venerable patriarch (for Antony attained the age of one hundred and five years) beheld the numerous progeny which had been formed by his example and his lessons The prolific colonies of monks multiplied with rapid increase on the sands of Libya upon the rocks of Thebais and in the cities of the Nile To the south of Alexandria the mountain and adjacent desert of Nitria was peopled by five thousand anachorets and the traveller may still investigate the ruins of fifty monasteries which were planted in that barren soil by the disciples of Antony [11] In the Upper Thebais the vacant island of Tabenne [12] was occupied by Pachomius and fourteen hundred of his brethren That holy abbot successively founded nine monasteries of men and one of women and the festival of Easter sometimes collected fifty thousand religious persons who followed his angelic rule of discipline [13] The stately and populous city of Oxyrinchus the seat of Christian orthodoxy had devoted the temples the public edifices and even the ramparts to pious and charitable uses and the bishop who might preach in twelve churches computed ten thousand females and twenty thousand males, of the monastic profession [14] The Egyptians who gloried in this marvellous revolution were disposed to hope and to believe that the number of the monks was equal to the remainder of the people [15] and posterity might repeat the saying which had formerly been applied to the sacred animals of the same country that in Egypt it was less difficult to find a god than a man.

Athanasius introduced into Rome the knowledge and practice of the monastic life and a school of this new philosophy was opened by the disciples of Antony who accompanied their primate to the holy threshold of the Vatican. The strange and savage appearance of these Egyptians excited at first horror and contempt and, at length applause and zealous imitation The senators and more especially the matrons, transformed their palaces and villas into religious houses and the narrow institution of six Vestals was eclipsed by the frequent monasteries, which were seated on the ruins of ancient temples and in the midst of the Roman Forum [16] Inflamed by the example of Antony a Syrian youth, whose name was Hilarion [17] fixed his dreary abode on a sandy beach between the sea and a morass about seven miles from Gaza The austere penance in which he persisted forty-eight years, diffused a similar enthusiasm, and the holy man was followed by a train of two or three thousand anachorets whenever he visited the innumerable monasteries of Palestine The fame of Basil[18] is immortal in the monastic history of the East With a mind that had tasted the learning and eloquence of Athens with an ambition scarcely to be satisfied by the archbishopric of Caesarea Basil retired to a savage solitude in Pontus and deigned for a while to give laws to the spiritual colonies which he profusely scattered along the coast of the Black Sea In the West Martin of Tours [19] a soldier a hermit, a bishop and a saint established the monasteries of Gaul two thousand of his disciples followed him to the grave and his eloquent historian challenges the deserts of Thebais to produce in a more favourable climate a champion of equal virtue The progress of the monks was not less rapid or universal than that of Christianity itself Every province and at last, every city of the empire was filled with their increasing multitudes and the bleak and barren isles, from Lerins to Lipari that arise out of the Tuscan Sea were chosen by the anachorets for the place of their voluntary exile An easy and perpetual intercourse by sea and land connected the provinces of the Roman world and the life of Hilarion displays the facility with which an indigent hermit of Palestine might traverse Egypt, embark for Sicily, escape to Epirus, and finally settle in the island of Cyprus [20] The Latin Christians embraced the religious institutions of Rome The pilgrims who visited Jerusalem eagerly copied, in the most distant climates of the earth, the faithful model of the monastic life The disciples of Antony spread themselves beyond the tropic, over the Christian empire of Æthiopia [1] The monastery of Banchor,[22] in Flintshire, which contained above two thousand brethren, dispersed a numerous colony among the barbarians of Ireland,[23] and Iona, one of the Hebrides, which was planted by the Irish monks, diffused over the northern regions a doubtful ray of science and superstition [24]

These unhappy exiles from social life were impelled by the dark and implacable genius of superstition Their mutual resolution was supported by the example of millions, of either sex, of every age, and of every rank, and each proselyte who entered the gates of a monastery was persuaded that he trod the steep and thorny path of eternal happiness [25] But the operation of these religious motives was variously determined by the temper and situation of mankind Reason might subdue, or passion might suspend, their influence, but they acted most forcibly on the infirm minds of children and females, they were strengthened by secret remorse or accidental misfortune, and they might derive some aid from the temporal considerations of vanity or interest It was naturally supposed that the pious and humble monks, who had renounced the world to accomplish the work of their salvation, were the best qualified for the spiritual government of the Christians The reluctant hermit was torn from his cell, and seated amidst the acclamations of the people, on the episcopal throne the monasteries of Egypt, of Gaul, and of the East, supplied a regular succession of saints and bishops, and ambition soon discovered the secret road which led to the possession of wealth and honours [26] The popular monks, whose reputation was connected with the fame and success of the order, assiduously laboured to multiply the number of their fellow captives They insinuated themselves into noble and opulent families, and the specious arts of flattery and seduction were employed to secure those proselytes who might bestow wealth or dignity on the monastic profession The indignant father bewailed the loss, perhaps, of an only son,[27] the credulous maid was betrayed by vanity to violate the laws of nature, and the matron aspired to imaginary perfection by renouncing the virtues of domestic life Paula yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Jerom,[28] and the profane title of mother-in-law of God[29] tempted that illustrious widow to consecrate the virginity of her daughter Eustochium By the advice, and in the company, of her spiritual guide, Paula abandoned Rome and her infant son, retired to the holy village of Bethlem, founded an hospital and four monasteries, and acquired, by her alms and penance, an eminent and conspicuous station in the Catholic church Such rare and illustrious penitents were celebrated as the glory and example of their age, but the monasteries were filled by a crowd of obscure and abject plebeians,[30] who gained in the cloister much more than they had sacrificed in the world Peasants, slaves, and mechanics might escape from poverty and contempt to a safe and honourable profession, whose apparent hardships were mitigated by custom, by popular applause, and by the secret relaxation of discipline [31] The subjects of Rome, whose persons and fortunes were made responsible for unequal and exorbitant tributes, retired from the oppression of the Imperial government, and the pusillanimous youth preferred the penance of a monastic, to the dangers of a military, life The affrighted provincials of every rank, who fled before the barbarians, found shelter and subsistence, whole legions were buried in these religious sanctuaries, and the same cause which relieved the distress of individuals impaired the strength and fortitude of the empire [32]

The monastic profession of the ancients[33] was an act of voluntary devotion The inconstant fanatic was threatened with the eternal vengeance of the God whom he deserted, but the doors of the monastery were still open for repentance Those monks whose conscience was fortified by reason or passion were at liberty to resume the character of men and citizens, and even the spouses of Christ might accept the legal embraces of an earthly lover [34] The examples of scandal, and the progress of superstition, suggested the propriety of more forcible restraints After a sufficient trial, the fidelity of the novice was secured by a solemn and perpetual vow, and his irrevocable engagement was ratified by the laws of the church and state A guilty fugitive was pursued, arrested, and restored to his perpetual prison, and the interposition of the magistrate oppressed the freedom and merit which had alleviated, in some degree, the abject slavery of the monastic discipline [35] The actions of a monk his words and even his thoughts were determined by an inflexible rule[36] or a capricious superior the slightest offences were corrected by disgrace or confinement extraordinary fasts or bloody flagellation and disobedience murmur or delay were ranked in the catalogue of the most heinous sins [37] A blind submission to the commands of the abbot however absurd or even criminal they might seem was the ruling principle the first virtue of the Egyptian monks and their patience was frequently exercised by the most extravagant trials They were directed to remove an enormous rock assiduously to water a barren staff that was planted in the ground till at the end of three years it should vegetate and blossom like a tree to walk into a fiery furnace or to cast their infant into a deep pond and several saints or madmen have been immortalised in monastic story by their thoughtless and fearless obedience [38] The freedom of the mind the source of every generous and rational sentiment, was destroyed by the habits of credulity and submission and the monk contracting the vices of a slave devoutly followed the faith and passions of his ecclesiastical tyrant The peace of the Eastern church was invaded by a swarm of fanatics incapable of fear or reason or humanity and the Imperial troops acknowledged without shame that they were much less apprehensive of an encounter with the fiercest barbarians [39]

Superstition has often framed and consecrated the fantastic garment of the monks [40] but their apparent singularity sometimes proceeds from their uniform attachment to a simple and primitive model which the revolutions of fashion have made ridiculous in the eyes of mankind The father of the Benedictines expressly disclaims all idea of choice or merit and soberly exhorts his disciples to adopt the coarse and convenient dress of the countries which they may inhabit [41] The monastic habits of the ancients varied with the climate and their mode of life and they assumed with the same indifference the sheepskin of the Egyptian peasants or the cloak of the Grecian philosophers They allowed themselves the use of linen in Egypt where it was a cheap and domestic manufacture but in the West they rejected such an expensive article of foreign luxury [42] It was the practice of the monks either to cut or shave their hair they wrapped their heads in a cowl to escape the sight of profane objects their legs and feet were naked except in the extreme cold of winter and their slow and feeble steps were supported by a long staff The aspect of a genuine anachoret was horrid and disgusting every sensation that is offensive to man was thought acceptable to God and the angelic rule of Tabenne condemned the salutary custom of bathing the limbs in water and of anointing them with oil [43] The austere monks slept on the ground on a hard mat or a rough blanket and the same bundle of palm leaves served them as a seat in the day and a pillow in the night Their original cells were low narrow huts, built of the slightest materials which formed by the regular distribution of the streets a large and populous village enclosing within the common wall, a church a hospital perhaps a library some necessary offices a garden and a fountain or reservoir of fresh water Thirty or forty brethren composed a family of separate discipline and diet and the great monasteries of Egypt consisted of thirty or forty families

Pleasure and guilt are synonymous terms in the language of the monks and they had discovered by experience that rigid fasts and abstemious diet are the most effectual preservatives against the impure desires of the flesh.[44] The rules of abstinence which they imposed or practised were not uniform or perpetual the cheerful festival of the Pentecost was balanced by the extraordinary mortification of Lent the fervour of new monasteries was insensibly relaxed and the voracious appetite of the Gauls could not imitate the patient and temperate virtue of the Egyptians [45] The disciples of Antony and Pachomius were satisfied with their daily pittance[46] of twelve ounces of bread or rather biscuit [47] which they divided into two frugal repasts of the afternoon and of the evening It was esteemed a merit and almost a duty to abstain from the boiled vegetables which were provided for the refectory but the extraordinary bounty of the abbot sometimes indulged them with the luxury of cheese fruit, salad and the small dried fish of the Nile [48] A more ample latitude of sea and river fish was gradually allowed or assumed but the use of flesh was long confined to the sick or travellers and when it gradually prevailed in the less rigid monasteries of Europe a singular distinction was introduced as if birds whether wild or domestic had been less profane than the grosser animals of the field Water was the pure and innocent beverage of the primitive monks and the founder of the Benedictines regrets the daily portion of half a pint of wine which had been extorted from him by the intemperance of the age [49] Such an allowance might be easily r p

plied by the vineyards of Italy, and his victorious disciples, who passed the Alps, the Rhine, and the Baltic, required, in the place of wine, an adequate compensation of strong beer or cider

The candidate who aspired to the virtue of evangelical poverty, abjured, at his first entrance into a regular community, the idea, and even the name, of all separate or exclusive possession [50] The brethren were supported by their manual labour, and the duty of labour was strenuously recommended as a penance, as an exercise, and as the most laudable means of securing their daily subsistence [51] The garden and fields, which the industry of the monks had often rescued from the forest or the morass, were diligently cultivated by their hands They performed, without reluctance, the menial offices of slaves and domestics, and the several trades that were necessary to provide their habits, their utensils, and their lodging, were exercised within the precincts of the great monasteries The monastic studies have tended, for the most part, to darken, rather than to dispel, the cloud of superstition Yet the curiosity or zeal of some learned solitaries has cultivated the ecclesiastical and even the profane sciences and posterity must gratefully acknowledge that the monuments of Greek and Roman literature have been preserved and multiplied by their indefatigable pens [52] But the more humble industry of the monks, especially in Egypt, was contented with the silent, sedentary occupation of making wooden sandals, or of twisting the leaves of the palm tree into mats and baskets The superfluous stock, which was not consumed in domestic use, supplied, by trade, the wants of the community the boats of Tabenne, and the other monasteries of Thebais, descended the Nile as far as Alexandria, and, in a Christian market, the sanctity of the workmen might enhance the intrinsic value of the work.

But the necessity of manual labour was insensibly superseded The novice was tempted to bestow his fortune on the saints in whose society he was resolved to spend the remainder of his life, and the pernicious indulgence of the laws permitted him to receive, for their use, any future accessions of legacy or inheritance [53] Melania contributed her plate, three hundred pounds' weight of silver, and Paula contracted an immense debt for the relief of their favourite monks, who kindly imparted the merits of their prayers and penance to a rich and liberal sinner [54] Time continually increased, and accidents could seldom diminish, the estates of the popular monasteries, which spread over the adjacent country and cities and, in the first century of their institution, the infidel Zosimus has maliciously observed, that, for the benefit of the poor, the Christian monks had reduced a great part of mankind to a state of beggary [55] As long as they maintained their original fervour, they approved themselves, however, the faithful and benevolent stewards of the charity which was intrusted to their care But their discipline was corrupted by prosperity they gradually assumed the pride of wealth, and at last indulged the luxury of expense Their public luxury might be excused by the magnificence of religious worship, and the decent motive of erecting durable habitations for an immortal society But every age of the church has accused the licentiousness of the degenerate monks, who no longer remembered the object of their institution, embraced the vain and sensual pleasures of the world which they had renounced,[56] and scandalously abused the riches which had been acquired by the austere virtues of their founders [57] Their natural descent, from such painful and dangerous virtue, to the common vices of humanity, will not, perhaps, excite much grief or indignation in the mind of a philosopher

The lives of the primitive monks were consumed in penance and solitude, undisturbed by the various occupations which fill the time, and exercise the faculties, of reasonable, active, and social beings Whenever they were permitted to step beyond the precincts of the monastery, two jealous companions were the mutual guards and spies of each other's actions, and, after their return, they were condemned to forget, or, at least, to suppress, whatever they had seen or heard in the world Strangers, who professed the orthodox faith, were hospitably entertained in a separate apartment, but their dangerous conversation was restricted to some chosen elders of approved discretion and fidelity Except in their presence, the monastic slave might not receive the visits of his friends or kindred, and it was deemed highly meritorious, if he afflicted a tender sister, or an aged parent, by the obstinate refusal of a word or look [58] The monks themselves passed their lives, without personal attachments, among a crowd which had been formed by accident, and was detained, in the same prison, by force or prejudice Recluse fanatics have few ideas or sentiments to communicate a special licence of the abbot regulated the time and duration of their familiar visits, and at their silent meals, they were enveloped in their cowls, inaccessible and a

invisible to each other [59] Study is the resource of solitude but education had not prepared and qualified for any liberal studies the mechanics and peasants who filled the monastic communities They might work but the vanity of spiritual perfection was tempted to disdain the exercise of manual labour and the industry must be faint and languid which is not excited by the sense of personal interest

According to their faith and zeal they might employ the day which they passed in their cells either in vocal or mental prayer they assembled in the evening and they were awakened in the night for the public worship of the monastery The precise moment was determined by the stars which are seldom clouded in the serene sky of Egypt and a rustic horn or trumpet the signal of devotion twice interrupted the vast silence of the desert [60] Even sleep the last refuge of the unhappy was rigorously measured the vacant hours of the monk heavily rolled along without business or pleasure and before the close of each day he had repeatedly accused the tedious progress of the sun [61] In this comfortless state superstition still pursued and tormented her wretched votaries [62] The repose which they had sought in the cloister was disturbed by tardy repentance profane doubts and guilty desires and while they considered each natural impulse as an unpardonable sin they perpetually trembled on the edge of a flaming and bottomless abyss From the painful struggles of disease and despair these unhappy victims were sometimes relieved by madness or death and in the sixth century a hospital was founded at Jerusalem for a small portion of the austere penitents who were deprived of their senses [63] Their visions before they attained this extreme and acknowledged term of frenzy have afforded ample materials of supernatural history It was their firm persuasion that the air which they breathed was peopled with invisible enemies with innumerable demons who watched every occasion and assumed every form to terrify and above all to tempt, their unguarded virtue The imagination and even the senses were deceived by the illusions of distempered fanaticism and the hermit whose midnight prayer was oppressed by involuntary slumber might easily confound the phantoms of horror or delight which had occupied his sleeping and his waking dreams [64]

The monks were divided into two classes the Coenobites who lived under a common and regular discipline and the Anachorets who indulged their unsocial independent fanaticism [65] The most devout or the most ambitious, of the spiritual brethren renounced the convent, as they had renounced the world. The fervent monasteries of Egypt Palestine and Syria were surrounded by a Laura [66] a distant circle of solitary cells and the extravagant penance of the Hermits was stimulated by applause and emulation [67] They sunk under the painful weight of crosses and chains and their emaciated limbs were confined by collars bracelets gauntlets, and greaves of massy and rigid iron. All superfluous incumbrance of dress they contemptuously cast away and some savage saints of both sexes have been admired whose naked bodies were only covered by their long hair They aspired to reduce themselves to the rude and miserable state in which the human brute is scarcely distinguished above his kindred animals and the numerous sect of Anachorets derived their name from their humble practice of grazing in the fields of Mesopotamia with the common herd [68] They often usurped the den of some wild beast whom they affected to resemble they buried themselves in some gloomy cavern which art or nature had scooped out of the rock and the marble quarries of Thebais are still inscribed with the monuments of their penance [69] The most perfect Hermits are supposed to have passed many days without food, many nights without sleep and many years without speaking and glorious was the man (I abuse that name) who contrived any cell, or seat of a peculiar construction which might expose him in the most inconvenient posture to the inclemency of the seasons

Among these heroes of the monastic life the name and genius of Simeon Stylites [70] have been immortalised by the singular invention of an aerial penance. At the age of thirteen the young Syrian deserted the profession of a shepherd, and threw himself into an austere monastery After a long and painful noviciate in which Simeon was repeatedly saved from pious suicide he established his residence on a mountain about thirty or forty miles to the east of Antioch. Within the space of a mandra or circle of stones, to which he had attached himself by a ponderous chain he ascended a column which was successively raised from the height of nine, to that of sixty feet from the ground [71] In this last and lofty station the Syrian Anachoret resisted the heat of thirty summers and the cold of as many winters Habit and exercise instructed him to maintain his dangerous situation without fear or giddiness and successively to assume the different postures of devotion. He sometimes prayed in an erect attitude, with his outstretched arms in the figure of a cross, but his most familiar practice was that of bending his meagre skeleton from the forehead to the feet, and a curious spectator, after numbering twelve hundred and forty-four repetitions, at length desisted from the endless account The progress of an ulcer in his thigh[7] might shorten, but it could not disturb, this celestial life, and the patient Hermit expired without descending from his column. A prince, who should capriciously inflict such tortures, would be deemed a tyrant, but it would surpass the power of a tyrant to impose a long and miserable existence on the reluctant victims of his cruelty This voluntary martyrdom must have gradually destroyed the sensibility both of the mind and body, nor can it be presumed that the fanatics who torment themselves are susceptible of any lively affection for the rest of mankind A cruel, unfeeling temper has distinguished the monks of every age and country their stern indifference, which is seldom mollified by personal friendship, is inflamed by religious hatred, and their merciless zeal has strenuously administered the holy office of the Inquisition

The monastic saints, who excite only the contempt and pity of a philosopher, were respected and almost adored by the prince and people Successive crowds of pilgrims from Gaul and India saluted the divine pillar of Simeon, the tribes of Saracens disputed in arms the honour of his benediction, the queens of Arabia and Persia gratefully confessed his supernatural virtue, and the angelic Hermit was consulted by the younger Theodosius in the most important concerns of the church and state His remains were transported from the mountain of Telemissa, by a solemn procession of the patriarch, the master-general of the East, six bishops, twenty-one counts or tribunes, and six thousand soldiers, and Antioch revered his bones as her glorious ornament and impregnable defence The fame of the apostles and martyrs was gradually eclipsed by these recent and popular Anachorets, the Christian world fell prostrate before their shrines and the miracles ascribed to their relics exceeded, at least in number and duration, the spiritual exploits of their lives But the golden legend of their lives [8] was embellished by the artful credulity of their interested brethren, and a believing age was easily persuaded that the slightest caprice of an Egyptian or a Syrian monk had been sufficient to interrupt the eternal laws of the universe The favourites of Heaven were accustomed to cure inveterate diseases with a touch, a word, or a distant message, and to expel the most obstinate demons from the souls or bodies which they possessed They familiarly accosted, or imperiously commanded, the lions and serpents of the desert, infused vegetation into a sapless trunk, suspended iron on the surface of the water, passed the Nile on the back of a crocodile, and refreshed themselves in a fiery furnace These extravagant tales, which display the fiction, without the genius, of poetry, have seriously affected the reason, the faith, and the morals of the Christians Their credulity debased and vitiated the faculties of the mind they corrupted the evidence of history, and superstition gradually extinguished the hostile light of philosophy and science Every mode of religious worship which had been practised by the saints every mysterious doctrine which they believed, was fortified by the sanction of divine revelation, and all the manly virtues were oppressed by the servile and pusillanimous reign of the monks If it be possible to measure the interval between the philosophic writings of Cicero and the sacred legend of Theodoret, between the character of Cato and that of Simeon, we may appreciate the memorable revolution which was accomplished in the Roman empire within a period of five hundred years

II The progress of Christianity has been marked by two glorious and decisive victories over the learned and luxurious citizens of the Roman empire, and over the warlike barbarians of Scythia and Germany, who subverted the empire and embraced the religion of the Romans The Goths were the foremost of these savage proselytes, and the nation was indebted for its conversion to a countryman, or at least to a subject, worthy to be ranked among the inventors of useful arts who have deserved the remembrance and gratitude of posterity A great number of Roman provincials had been led away into captivity by the Gothic bands who ravaged Asia in the time of Gallienus, and of these captives many were Christians and several belonged to the ecclesiastical order Those involuntary missionaries, dispersed as slaves in the villages of Dacia successively laboured for the salvation of their masters The seeds which they planted of the evangelic doctrine were gradually propagated, and before the end of a century the pious work was achieved by the labours of Ulphilas whose ancestors had been transported beyond the Danube from a small town of Cappadocia

Goths [74] acquired their love and reverence by his blameless life and indefatigable zeal and they received with implicit confidence the doctrines of truth and virtue which he preached and practi ed He executed the arduous task of translating the Scriptures into their native tongue a dialect of the German or Teutonic language but he prudently suppressed the four books of Kings as they might tend to irritate the fierce and sanguinary spirit of the barbarians The rude, imperfect idiom of soldiers and shepherds so ill qualified to communicate any spiritual ideas was improved and modulated by his genius and Ulphilas before he could frame his version was obliged to compose a new alphabet of twenty four letters four of which he invented to express the peculiar sounds that were unknown to the Greek and Latin pronunciation [75] But the prosperous state of the Gothic church was soon afflicted by war and intestine discord and the chieftains were divided by religion as well as by interest Fritigern the friend of the Romans became the proselyte of Ulphilas while the haughty soul of Athanaric disdained the yoke of the empire and of the Gospel The faith of the new converts was tried by the persecution which he excited A waggon bearing aloft the shapeless image of Thor perhaps or of Woden was conducted in solemn procession through the streets of the camp and the rebels who refused to worship the god of their fathers were immediately burnt with their tents and families The character of Ulphilas recommended him to the esteem of the Eastern court where he twice appeared as the minister of peace he pleaded the cause of the distressed Goths who implored the protection of Valens and the name of Moses was applied to this spiritual guide who conducted his people through the deep waters of the Danube to the Land of Promise [76] The devout shepherds who were attached to his person and tractable to his voice acquiesced in their settlement at the foot of the Mæsian mountains in a country of woodlands and pastures which supported their flocks and herds and enabled them to purchase the corn and wine of the more plentiful provinces These harmless barbarians multiplied in obscure peace and the profession of Christianity [77]

Their fiercer brethren the formidable Visigoths universally adopted the religion of the Romans with whom they maintained a perpetual intercourse of war of friendship or of conquest In their long and victorious march from the Danube to the Atlantic Ocean they converted their allies they educated the rising generation and the devotion which reigned in the camp of Alaric or the court of Toulouse might edify or disgrace the palaces of Rome and Constantinople [78] During the same period Christianity was embraced by almost all th barbarians who established their kingdoms on the ruins of the Western empire the Burgundians in Gaul the Suevi in Spain the Vandals in Africa the Ostrogoths in Pannonia and the various bands of mercenaries that raised Odoacer to the throne of Italy The Franks and the Saxons still persevered in the errors of Pa anism but the Franks obtained the monarchy of Gaul by their submission to the example of Clovis and the Saxon conquerors of Britain were reclaimed from their savage superstition by the missionaries of Rome These barbarian proselytes displayed an ardent and successful zeal in the propagation of the faith The Merovingian kings and their successors Charlemagne and the Othos extended by their laws and victories the dominion of the cross England produced the apostle of Germany and the evangelic light was gradually diffused from the neighbourhood of the Rhine to the nations of the Elbe the Vistula and the Baltic [79]

The different motives which influenced the reason or the passions of the barbarian converts cannot easily be ascertained They were often capricious and accidental a dream an omen the report of a miracle the example of some priest or hero the charms of a believing wife and above all the fortunate event of a prayer or vow which in a moment of danger they had addressed to the God of the Christians [80] The early prejudices of education were insensibly erased by the habits of frequent and familiar society the moral precepts of the Gospel were protected by the extravagant virtues of the monks and a spiritual theology was supported by the visible power of relics and the pomp of religious worship But the rational and ingenious mode of persuasion which a Saxon bishop[81] suggested to a popular saint might sometimes be employed by the missionaries who laboured for the conversion of infidels Admit says the sagacious disputant whatever they are pleased to assert of the fabulous and carnal genealogy of their gods and goddesses who are propagated from each other From this principle deduce their imperfect nature and human infirmities the assurance they were born and the probability that they will die At what time by what means from what cause were the e d est of the gods or goddesses produced? Do they still continue or have they ceased to propa gate? If they have ceased, summon your antagonist to declare the reason of this strange alteration If they still continue, the number of the gods must become infinite, and shall we not risk, by the indiscreet worship of some impotent deity, to excite the resentment of his jealous superior? The visible heavens and earth, the whole system of the universe, which may be conceived by the mind, is it created or eternal? If created, how or where could the gods themselves exist before the creation? If eternal, how could they assume the empire of an independent and pre-existing world? Urge these arguments with temper and moderation, insinuate, at seasonable intervals, the truth and beauty of the Christian revelation, and endeavour to make the unbelievers ashamed without making them angry" This metaphysical reasoning, too refined perhaps for the barbarians of Germany, was fortified by the grosser weight of authority and popular consent The advantage of temporal prosperity had deserted the Pagan cause and passed over to the service of Christianity The Romans themselves, the most powerful and enlightened nation of the globe, had renounced their ancient superstition, and if the ruin of their empire seemed to accuse the efficacy of the new faith, the disgrace was already retrieved by the conversion of the victorious Goths The valiant and fortunate barbarians who subdued the provinces of the West successively received and reflected the same edifying example Before the age of Charlemagne, the Christian nations of Europe might exult in the exclusive possession of the temperate climates, of the fertile lands which produced corn, wine, and oil, while the savage idolaters and their helpless idols were confined to the extremities of the earth, the dark and frozen regions of the North [8]

Christianity, which opened the gates of Heaven to the barbarians, introduced an important change in their moral and political condition They received, at the same time, the use of letters, so essential to a religion whose doctrines are contained in a sacred book, and while they studied the divine truth, their minds were insensibly enlarged by the distant view of history, of nature, of the arts, and of society The version of the Sciptures into their native tongue, which had facilitated their conversion, must excite, among their clergy, some curiosity to read the original text, to understand the sacred liturgy of the church, and to examine in the writings of the fathers, the chain of ecclesiastical tradition These spiritual gifts were preserved in the Greek and Latin languages, which concealed the inestimable monuments of ancient learning The immortal productions of Virgil, Cicero, and Livy, which were accessible to the Christian barbarians, maintained a silent intercourse between the reign of Augustus and the times of Clovis and Charlemagne The emulation of mankind was encouraged by the remembrance of a more perfect state, and the flame of science was secretly kept alive, to warm and enlighten the mature age of the Western world In the most corrupt state of Christianity the barbarians might learn justice from the law, and mercy from the gospel, and if the knowledge of their duty was insufficient to guide their actions or to regulate their passions, they were sometimes restrained by conscience, and frequently punished by remorse But the direct authority of religion was less effectual than the holy communion, which united them with their Christian brethren in spiritual friendship The influence of these sentiments contributed to secure their fidelity in the service or the alliance of the Romans, to alleviate the horrors of war, to moderate the insolence of conquest, and to preserve, in the downfall of the empire, a permanent respect for the name and institutions of Rome In the days of Paganism the priests of Gaul and Germany reigned over the people, and controlled the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and the zealous proselytes transferred an equal, or more ample, measure of devout obedience to the pontiffs of the Christian faith The sacred character of the bishops was supported by their temporal possessions, they obtained an honourable seat in the legislative assemblies of soldiers and freemen, and it was their interest, as well as their duty, to mollify by peaceful counsels the fierce spirit of the barbarians The perpetual correspondence of the Latin clergy, the frequent pilgrimages to Rome and Jerusalem, and the growing authority of the popes, cemented the union of the Christian republic, and gradually produced the similar manners and common jurisprudence which have distinguished from the rest of mankind the independent, and even hostile, nations of modern Europe

But the operation of these causes was checked and retarded by the unfortunate accident which infused a deadly poison into the cup of salvation Whatever might be the early sentiments of Ulphilas his connections with the empire and the church were formed during the reign of Arianism The apostle of the Goths subscribed the creed of Rimini, professed with freedom and perhaps with sincerity, that the Son was not equal or consubstantial to the FATHER, [10] communicated these errors to the clergy and people and infected the barbaric world with an heresy[84] which the great Theodosius proscribed and extinguished among the Romans The temper and understanding of the new proselytes were not adapted to metaphysical subtleties but they strenuously maintained what they had piously received as the pure and genuine doctrines of Christianity The advantage of preaching and expounding the Scriptures in the Teutonic language promoted the apostolic labours of Ulphilas and his successors and they ordained a competent number of bishops and presbyters for the instruction of the kindred tribes The Ostrogoths the Burgundians the Suevi and the Vandals who had listened to the eloquence of the Latin clergy[85] preferred the more intelligible lessons of their domestic teachers and Arianism was adopted as the national faith of the warlike converts who were seated on the ruins of the Western empire This irreconcilable difference of religion was a perpetual source of jealousy and hatred and the reproach of Barbarian was embittered by the more odious epithet of Heretic The heroes of the North who had submitted with some reluctance to believe that all their ancestors were in hell[86] were astonished and exasperated to learn that they themselves had only changed the mode of their eternal condemnation Instead of the smooth applause which Christian kings are accustomed to expect from their loyal prelates the orthodox bishops and their clergy were in a state of opposition to the Arian courts and their indiscreet opposition frequently became criminal and might sometimes be dangerous[87] The pulpit that safe and sacred organ of sedition resounded with the names of Pharaoh and Holofernes[88] the public discontent was inflamed by the hope or promise of a glorious deliverance and the seditious saints were tempted to promote the accomplishment of their own predictions Notwithstanding these provocations the catholics of Gaul Spain and Italy enjoyed under the reign of the Arians the free and peaceful exercise of their religion Their haughty masters respected the zeal of a numerous people resolved to die at the foot of their altars and the example of their devout constancy was admired and imitated by the barbarians themselves The conquerors evaded however the disgraceful reproach or confession of fear by attributing their toleration to the liberal motives of reason and humanity and while they affected the language they imperceptibly imbibed the spirit, of genuine Christianity

The peace of the church was sometimes interrupted The catholics were indiscreet, the barbarians were impatient and the partial acts of severity or injustice which had been recommended by the Arian clergy, were exaggerated by the orthodox writers The guilt of persecution may be imputed to Euric, king of the Visigoths who suspended the exercise of ecclesiastical or at least of episcopal functions and punished the popular bishops of Aquitain with imprisonment exile and confiscation[89] But the cruel and absurd enterprise of subduing the minds of a whole people was undertaken by the Vandals alone Genseric himself in his early youth had renounced the orthodox communion and the apostate could neither grant nor expect a sincere forgiveness He was exasperated to find that the Africans who had fled before him in the field still presumed to dispute his will in synods and churches, and his ferocious mind was incapable of fear or of compassion His catholic subjects were oppressed by intolerant laws and arbitrary punishments The language of Genseric was furious and formidable the knowledge of his intentions might justify the most unfavourable interpretation of his actions and the Arians were reproached with the frequent executions which stained the palace and the dominions of the tyrant. Arms and ambition were, however the ruling passions of the monarch of the sea But Hunneric his inglorious son who seemed to inherit only his vices tormented the catholics with the same unrelenting fury which had been fatal to his brother his nephews and the friends and favourites of his father and even to the Arian patriarch who was inhumanly burnt alive in the midst of Carthage The religious war was preceded and prepared by an insidious truce persecution was made the serious and important business of the Vandal court and the loathsome disease which hastened the death of Hunneric revenged the injuries without contributing to the deliverance of the church The throne of Africa was successively filled by the two nephews of Hunneric by Gundamund who reigned about twelve and by Thrasimund who governed the nation above twenty-seven years Their administration was hostile and oppressive to the orthodox party Gundamund appeared to emulate or even to surpass the cruelty of his uncle and if at length he relented if he recalled the bishops and restored the freedom of Athanasian worship a premature death intercepted the benefits of his tardy clemency His brother Thrasimund was the greatest and most accomplished of the Vandal kings, whom he excelled in beauty, prudence, and magnanimity of soul But this magnanimous character was degraded by his intolerant zeal and deceitful clemency Instead of threats and tortures, he employed the gentle, but efficacious, powers of seduction Wealth, dignity, and the royal favour were the liberal rewards of apostacy, the catholics who had violated the laws might purchase their pardon by the renunciation of their faith, and whenever Thrasimund mediated any rigorous measure, he patiently waited till the indiscretion of his adversaries furnished him with a specious opportunity Bigotry was his last sentiment in the hour of death, and he exacted from his successor a solemn oath that he would never tolerate the sectaries of Athanasius But his successor, Hilderic, the gentle son of the savage Hunneric, preferred the duties of humanity and justice to the vain obligation of an impious oath, and his accession was gloriously marked by the restoration of peace and universal freedom The throne of that virtuous, though feeble, monarch was usurped by his cousin Gelimer, a zealous Arian but the Vandal kingdom, before he could enjoy or abuse his power, was subverted by the arms of Belisarius, and the orthodox party retaliated the injuries which they had endured [90]

The passionate declamations of the catholics, the sole historians of this persecution, cannot afford any distinct series of causes and events, any impartial view of characters or counsels, but the most remarkable circumstances that deserve either credit or notice may be referred to the following heads I In the original law, which is still extant,[91] Hunneric expressly declares, and the declaration appears to be correct, that he had faithfully transcribed the regulations and penalties of the Imperial edicts against the heretical congregations, the clergy, and the people, who dissented from the established religion If the rights of conscience had been understood, the catholics must have condemned their past conduct, or acquiesced in their actual sufferings But they still persisted to refuse the indulgence which they claimed While they trembled under the lash of persecution, they praised the laudable severity of Hunneric himself, who burnt or banished great numbers of Manichæans,[92] and they rejected with horror the ignominious compromise that the disciples of Arius and of Athanasius should enjoy a reciprocal and similar toleration in the territories of the Romans and in those of the Vandals [93] II The practice of a conference, which the catholics had so frequently used to insult and punish their obstinate antagonists, was retorted against themselves [94] At the command of Hunneric, four hundred and sixty-six orthodox bishops assembled at Carthage, but when they were admitted into the hall of audience, they had the mortification of beholding the Arian Cyrila, exalted on the patriarchal throne The disputants were separated, after the mutual and ordinary reproaches of noise and silence, of delay and precipitation, of military force and of popular clamour One martyr and one confessor were selected among the catholic bishops, twenty-eight escaped by flight, and eighty-eight by conformity, forty six were sent into Corsica to cut timber for the royal navy, and three hundred and two were banished to the different parts of Africa, exposed to the insults of their enemies, and carefully deprived of all the temporal and spiritual comforts of life [95] The hardships of ten years' exile must have reduced their numbers, and if they had complied with the law of Thrasimund, which prohibited any episcopal consecrations, the orthodox church of Africa must have expired with the lives of its actual members They disobeyed, and their disobedience was punished by a second exile of two hundred and twenty bishops into Sardinia, where they languished fifteen years, till the accession of the gracious Hilderic [96] The two islands were judiciously chosen by the malice of their Arian tyrants Seneca, from his own experience, has deplored and exaggerated the miserable state of Corsica,[97] and the plenty of Sardinia was overbalanced by the unwholesome quality of the air [98] III The zeal of Genseric and his successors for the conversion of the catholics must have rendered them still more jealous to guard the purity of the Vandal faith Before the churches were finally shut, it was a crime to appear in a barbarian dress, and those who presumed to neglect the royal mandate were rudely dragged backwards by their long hair [99] The palatine officers, who refused to profess the religion of their prince, were ignominiously stripped of their honours and employments, banished to Sardinia and Sicily, or condemned to the servile labours of slaves and peasants in the fields of Utica In the districts which had been peculiarly allotted to the Vandals, the exercise of the catholic worship was more strictly prohibited, and severe penalties were denounced against the guilt both of the missionary and the proselyte By these arts the faith of the barbarians was preserved, and their zeal was inflamed

they discharged with devout fury the office of spies informers or executioners and whenever their cavalry took the field it was the favourite amusement of the march to defile the churches and to insult the clergy of the adverse faction [100] IV The citizens who had been educated in the luxury of the Roman province were delivered with exquisite cruelty to the Moors of the desert A venerable train of bishops presbyters and deacons with a faithful crowd of four thousand and ninety six persons whose guilt is not precisely ascertained were torn from their native homes by the command of Hunneric During the night they were confined like a herd of cattle amidst their own ordure during the day they pursued their march over the burning sands and if they fainted under the heat and fatigue they were goaded or dragged along till they expired in the hands of their tormentors [101] These unhappy exiles when they reached the Moorish huts might excite the compassion of a people whose native humanity was neither improved by reason nor corrupted by fanaticism but if they escaped the dangers they were condemned to share the distress of a savage life V It is incumbent on the authors of persecution previously to reflect whether they are determined to support it in the last extreme They excite the flame which they strive to extinguish and it soon becomes necessary to chastise the contumacy as well as the crime of the offender The fine which he is unable or unwilling to discharge exposes his person to the severity of the law and his contempt of lighter penalties suggests the use and propriety of capital punishment Through the veil of fiction and declamation we may clearly perceive that the catholics more especially under the reign of Hunneric endured the most cruel and ignominious treatment.[102] Respectable citizens noble matrons and consecrated virgins were stripped naked and raised in the air by pulleys with a weight suspended at their feet In this painful attitude their naked bodies were torn with scourges or burnt in the most tender parts with red hot plates of iron The amputation of the ears the nose the tongue and the right hand was inflicted by the Arians and although the precise number cannot be defined it is evident that many persons among whom a bishop [103] and a proconsul [104] may be named were entitled to the crown of martyrdom The same honour has been ascribed to the memory of Count Sebastian who professed the Nicene creed with unshaken constancy and Genseric might detest as an heretic the brave and ambitious fugitive whom he dreaded as a rival [105] VI A new mode of conversion which might subdue the feeble and alarm the timorous was employed by the Arian ministers They imposed by fraud or violence the rites of baptism and punished the apostacy of the catholics if they disclaimed this odious and profane ceremony which scandalously violated the freedom of the will and the unity of the sacrament [106] The hostile sects had formerly allowed the validity of each other's baptism and the innovation so fiercely maintained by the Vandals can be imputed only to the example and advice of the Donatists VII The Arian clergy surpassed in religious cruelty the king and his Vandals but they were incapable of cultivating the spiritual vineyard which they were so desirous to possess A patriarch[107] might seat himself on the throne of Carthage some bishops in the principal cities might usurp the place of their rivals but the smallness of their numbers and their ignorance of the Latin language [108] disqualified the barbarians for the ecclesiastical ministry of a great church and the Africans, after the loss of their orthodox pastors were deprived of the public exercise of Christianity VIII The emperors were the natural protectors of the Homoousian doctrine and the faithful people of Africa both as Romans and as catholics preferred their lawful sovereignty to the usurpation of the barbarous heretics. During an interval of peace and friendship Hunneric restored the cathedral of Carthage at the intercession of Zeno who reigned in the East, and of Placidia the daughter and relict of emperors and the sister of the queen of the Vandals [109] But this decent regard was of short duration and the haughty tyrant displayed his contempt for the religion of the empire by studiously arranging the bloody images of persecution in all the principal streets through which the Roman ambassador must pass in his way to the palace [110] An oath was required from the bishops who were assembled at Carthage that they would support the succession of his son Hilderic and that they would renounce all foreign or transmarine correspondence This engagement consistent as it should seem with their moral and religious duties was refused by the more sagacious members[111] of the assembly Their refusal faintly coloured by the pretence that it is unlawful for a Christian to swear must provoke the suspicions of a jealous tyrant

ons which the Greek[112] and Latin fathers had already provided for the Arian controversy, they repeatedly silenced or vanquished the fierce and illiterate successors of Ulphilas The consciousness of their own superiority might have raised them above the arts and passions of religious warfare Yet, instead of assuming such honourable pride, the orthodox theologians were tempted, by the assurance of impunity, to compose fictions which must be stigmatised with the epithets of fraud and forgery They ascribed their own polemical works to the most venerable names of Christian antiquity, the characters of Athanasius and Augustin were awkwardly personated by Vigilius and his disciples,[113] and the famous creed, which so clearly expounds the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation, is deduced, with strong probability, from this African school [114] Even the Scriptures themselves were profaned by their rash and sacrilegious hands The memorable text which asserts the unity of the THREE who bear witness in heaven[115] is condemned by the universal silence of the orthodox fathers, ancient versions, and authentic manuscripts [116] It was first alleged by the catholic bishops whom Hunneric summoned to the conference of Carthage [117] An allegorical interpretation, in the form perhaps of a marginal note, invaded the text of the Latin Bibles which were renewed and corrected in a dark period of ten centuries [118] After the invention of printing,[119] the editors of the Greek Testament yielded to their own prejudices, or those of the times,[120] and the pious fraud, which was embraced with equal zeal at Rome and at Geneva, has been infinitely multiplied in every country and every language of modern Europe

The example of fraud must excite suspicion and the specious miracles by which the African catholics have defended the truth and justice of their cause may be ascribed, with more reason, to their own industry than to the visible protection of Heaven Yet the historian who views this religious conflict with an impartial eye may condescend to mention one preternatural event, which will edify the devout and surprise the incredulous Tipasa,[121] a maritime colony of Mauritania, sixteen miles to the east of Cæsarea, had been distinguished in every age by the orthodox zeal of its inhabitants They had braved the fury of the Donatists,[122] they resisted or eluded the tyranny of the Arians The town was deserted on the approach of an heretical bishop most of the inhabitants who could procure ships passed over to the coast of Spain, and the unhappy remnant, refusing all communion with the usurper, still presumed to hold their pious, but illegal, assemblies Their disobedience exasperated the cruelty of Hunneric A military count was despatched from Carthage to Tipasa he collected the catholics in the Forum, and, in the presence of the whole province, deprived the guilty of their right hands and their tongues But the holy confessors continued to speak without tongues, and this miracle is attested by Victor, an African bishop, who published an history of the persecution within two years after the event [123] "If any one," says Victor, "should doubt of the truth, let him repair to Constantinople, and listen to the clear and perfect language of Restitutus, the subdeacon, one of these glorious sufferers, who is now lodged in the palace of the emperor Zeno, and is respected by the devout empress " At Constantinople we are astonished to find a cool, a learned, and unexceptionable witness, without interest, and without passion Æneas of Gaza, a Platonic philosopher, has accurately described his own observations on these African sufferers "I saw them myself I heard them speak I diligently inquired by what means such an articulate voice could be formed without any organ of speech I used my eyes to examine the report of my ears I opened their mouth, and saw that the whole tongue had been completely torn away by the roots, an operation which the physicians generally suppose to be mortal "[124] The testimony of Æneas of Gaza might be confirmed by the superfluous evidence of the emperor Justinian, in a perpetual edict, of Count Marcellinus, in his Chronicle of the times, and of pope Gregory the First, who had resided at Constantinople as the minister of the Roman pontiff [125] They all lived within the compass of a century, and they all appeal to their personal knowledge or the public notoriety for the truth of a miracle which was repeated in several instances, displayed on the greatest theatre of the world, and submitted during a series of years to the calm examination of the senses This supernatural gift of the African confessors, who spoke without tongues, will command the assent of those, and of those only, who already believe that their language was pure and orthodox But the stubborn mind of an infidel is guarded by secret, incurable suspicion, and the Arian, or Socinian, who has seriously rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, will not be shaken by the most plausible evidence of an Athanasian miracle.

in the profession of Arianism till the final ruin of the kingdoms which they had founded in Africa and Italy The barbarians of Gaul submitted to the orthodox dominion of the Franks and Spain was restored to the catholic church by the voluntary conversion of the Visigoths

This salutary revolution[126] was hastened by the example of a royal martyr whom our calmer reason may style an ungrateful rebel Leovigild the Gothic monarch of Spain deserved the respect of his enemies and the love of his subjects the catholics enjoyed a free toleration and his Arian synods attempted without much success to reconcile their scruples by abolishing the unpopular rite of a second baptism His eldest son Hermenegild who was invested by his father with the royal diadem and the fair principality of Bætica contracted an honourable and orthodox alliance with a Merovingian princess the daughter of Sigebert king of Austrasia and of the famous Brunechild The beauteous Ingundis who was no more than thirteen years of age was received beloved and persecuted in the Arian court of Toledo and her religious constancy was alternately assaulted with blandishments and violence by Goisvintha the Gothic queen who abused the double claim of maternal authority[127] Incensed by her resistance Goisvintha seized the catholic princess by her long hair inhumanly dashed her against the ground kicked her till she was covered with blood and at last gave orders that she should be stripped and thrown into a basin or fishpond[128] Love and honour might excite Hermenegild to resent this injurious treatment of his bride and he was gradually persuaded that Ingundis suffered for the cause of divine truth Her tender complaints and the weighty arguments of Leander archbishop of Seville accomplished his conversion and the heir of the Gothic monarchy was initiated in the Nicene faith by the solemn rites of confirmation[129] The rash youth inflamed by zeal and perhaps by ambition was tempted to violate the duties of a son and a subject and the catholics of Spain although they could not complain of persecution applauded his pious rebellion against an heretical father The civil war was protracted by the long and obstinate sieges of Merida Cordova and Seville which had strenuously espoused the party of Hermenegild He invited the orthodox barbarians the Suevi and the Franks to the destruction of his native land he solicited the dangerous aid of the Romans who possessed Africa and a part of the Spanish coast and his holy ambassador the archbishop Leander effectually negotiated in person with the Byzantine court But the hopes of the catholics were crushed by the active diligence of a monarch who commanded the troops and treasures of Spain and the guilty Hermenegild, after his vain attempts to resist or to escape was compelled to surrender himself into the hands of an incensed father Leovigild was still mindful of that sacred character and the rebel despoiled of the regal ornaments was still permitted in a decent exile to profess the catholic religion His repeated and unsuccessful treasons at length provoked the indignation of the Gothic king and the sentence of death which he pronounced with apparent reluctance was privately executed in the tower of Seville The inflexible constancy with which he refused to accept the Arian communion as the price of his safety, may excuse the honours that have been paid to the memory of St Hermenegild His wife and infant son were detained by the Romans in ignominious captivity and this domestic misfortune tarnished the glories of Leovigild and embittered the last moments of his life

His son and successor Recared the first catholic king of Spain had imbibed the faith of his unfortunate brother which he supported with more prudence and success Instead of revolting against his father Recared patiently expected the hour of his death. Instead of condemning his memory he piously supposed that the dying monarch had abjured the errors of Arianism and recommended to his son the conversion of the Gothic nation To accomplish that salutary end Recared convened an assembly of the Arian clergy and nobles declared himself a catholic, and exhorted them to imitate the example of their prince The laborious interpretation of doubtful texts or the curious pursuit of metaphysical arguments would have excited an endless controversy and the monarch discreetly proposed to his illiterate audience two substantial and visible arguments—the testimony of Earth and of Heaven The Earth had submitted to the Nicene synod the Romans the barbarians and the inhabitants of Spain unanimously professed the same orthodox creed and the Visigoths resisted almost alone the consent of the Christian world A superstitious age was prepared to reverence as the testimony of Heaven the preternatural cures which were performed by the skill or virtue of the catholic clergy the baptismal fonts of Osset in Bætica[130] which were spontaneously replenished each year on the vigil of Easter[131] and the miraculous shrine of St Martin of

Tours, which had already converted the Suevic prince and people of Gallicia[132] The catholic king encountered some difficulties on this important change of the national religion A conspiracy, secretly fomented by the queen-dowager, was formed against his life, and two counts excited a dangerous revolt in the Narbonnese Gaul But Recared disarmed the conspirators, defeated the rebels, and executed severe justice, which the Arians, in their turn, might brand with the reproach of persecution Eight bishops, whose names betray their barbaric origin, abjured their errors, and all the books of Arian theology were reduced to ashes, with the house in which they had been purposely collected The whole body of the Visigoths and Suevi were allured or driven into the pale of the catholic communion, the faith, at least of the rising generation, was fervent and sincere, and the devout liberality of the barbarians enriched the churches and monasteries of Spain Seventy bishops, assembled in the council of Toledo, received the submission of their conquerors, and the zeal of the Spaniards improved the Nicene creed, by declaring the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, as well as from the Father, a weighty point of doctrine, which produced, long afterwards, the schism of the Greek and Latin churches[133] The royal proselyte immediately saluted and consulted pope Gregory, surnamed the Great, a learned and holy prelate whose reign was distinguished by the conversion of heretics and infidels The ambassadors of Recared respectfully offered on the threshold of the Vatican his rich presents of gold and gems, they accepted, as a lucrative exchange, the hairs of St John the Baptist, a cross which enclosed a small piece of the true wood, and a key that contained some particles of iron which had been scraped from the chains of St Peter[134]

The same Gregory, the spiritual conqueror of Britain, encouraged the pious Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, to propagate the Nicene faith among the victorious savages, whose recent Christianity was polluted by the Arian heresy Her devout labours still left room for the industry and success of future missionaries, and many cities of Italy were still disputed by hostile bishops But the cause of Arianism was gradually suppressed by the weight of truth, of interest, and of example, and the controversy, which Egypt had derived from the Platonic school, was terminated, after a war of three hundred years, by the final conversion of the Lombards of Italy[135]

The first missionaries who preached the Gospel to the barbarians appealed to the evidence of reason, and claimed the benefit of toleration[136] But no sooner had they established their spiritual dominion than they exhorted the Christian kings to extirpate, without mercy, the remains of Roman or barbaric superstition The successors of Clovis inflicted one hundred lashes on the peasants who refused to destroy their idols, the crime of sacrificing to the demons was punished by the Anglo-Saxon laws with the heavier penalties of imprisonment and confiscation, and even the wise Alfred adopted, as an indispensable duty, the extreme rigour of the Mosaic institutions[137] But the punishment and the crime were gradually abolished among a Christian people, the theological disputes of the schools were suspended by propitious ignorance, and the intolerant spirit which could find neither idolaters nor heretics, was reduced to the persecution of the Jews That exiled nation had founded some synagogues in the cities of Gaul, but Spain, since the time of Hadrian, was filled with their numerous colonies[138] The wealth which they accumulated by trade and the management of the finances invited the pious avarice of their masters, and they might be oppressed without danger, as they had lost the use, and even the remembrance, of arms Sisebut, a Gothic king who reigned in the beginning of the seventh century, proceeded at once to the last extremes of persecution[139] Ninety thousand Jews were compelled to receive the sacrament of baptism, the fortunes of the obstinate infidels were confiscated, their bodies were tortured, and it seems doubtful whether they were permitted to abandon their native country The excessive zeal of the catholic king was moderated even by the clergy of Spain, who solemnly pronounced an inconsistent sentence that the sacraments should not be forcibly imposed, but that the Jews who had been baptised should be constrained, for the honour of the church, to persevere in the external practice of a religion which they disbelieved and detested. Their frequent relapses provoked one of the successors of Sisebut to banish the whole nation from his dominions, and a council of Toledo published a decree that every Gothic king should swear to maintain this salutary edict But the tyrants were unwilling to dismiss the victims whom they delighted to torture, or to deprive themselves of the industrious slaves over whom they might exercise a lucrative oppression The Jews still continued in Spain, under the weight of the civil and ecclesiastical laws, which in the same country have been faithfully transcribed in

Code of the Inquisition The Gothic kings and bishops at length discovered that injuries will produce hatred and that hatred will find the opportunity of revenge A nation the secret or professed enemies of Christianity still multiplied in servitude and distress and the intrigues of the Jews promoted the rapid success of the Arabian conquerors [140]

As soon as the barbarians withdrew their powerful support the unpopular heresy of Arius sunk into contempt and oblivion But the Greeks still retained their subtle and loquacious disposition the establishment of an obscure doctrine suggested new questions and new disputes and it was always in the power of an ambitious prelate or a fanatic monk to violate the peace of the church and perhaps of the empire The historian of the empire may overlook those disputes which were confined to the obscurity of schools and synods The Manichæans who laboured to reconcile the religions of Christ and of Zoroaster had secretly introduced themselves into the provinces but these foreign sectaries were involved in the common disgrace of the Gnostics and the Imperial laws were executed by the public hatred The rational opinions of the Pelagians were propagated from Britain to Rome Africa and Palestine, and silently expired in a superstitious age But the East was distracted by the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies which attempted to explain the mystery of the incarnation and hastened the ruin of Christianity in her native land These controversies were first agitated under the reign of the younger Theodosius but their important consequences extend far beyond the limits of the present volume The metaphysical chain of argument the contests of ecclesiastical ambition and their political influence on the decline of the Byzantine empire, may afford an interesting and instructive series of history from the general councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon to the conquest of the East by the successors of Mahomet

CHAPTER XXXVIII

Reign and Conversion of Clovis His Victories over the Alemanni, Burgundians, and Visigoths Establishment of the French Monarchy in Gaul Laws of the Barbarians State of the Romans The Visigoths of Spain Conquest of Britain by the Saxons

The Gauls [1] who impatiently supported the Roman yoke received a memorable lesson from one of the lieutenants of Vespasian whose weighty sense has been refined and expressed by the genius of Tacitus [2] The protection of the republic has delivered Gaul from internal discord and foreign invasions By the loss of national independence you have acquired the name and privileges of Roman citizens You enjoy in common with ourselves the permanent benefits of civil government and your remote situation is less exposed to the accidental mischiefs of tyranny Instead of exercising the rights of conquest we have been contented to impose such tributes as are requisite for your own preservation Peace cannot be secured without armies and armies must be supported at the expense of the people It is for your sake not for our own that we guard the barrier of the Rhine against the ferocious Germans who have so often attempted and who will always desire to exchange the solitude of their woods and morasses for the wealth and fertility of Gaul The fall of Rome would be fatal to the provinces and you would be buried in the ruins of that mighty fabric which has been raised by the valour and wisdom of eight hundred years Your imaginary freedom would be insulted and oppressed by a savage master and the expulsion of the Romans would be succeeded by the eternal hostilities of the barbarian conquerors [3] This salutary advice was accepted and this strange prediction was accomplished In the space of four hundred years the hardy Gauls who had encountered the arms of Cæsar were imperceptibly melted into the general mass of citizens and subjects the Western empire was dissolved and the Germans who had passed the Rhine fiercely contended for the possession of Gaul and excited the contempt or abhorrence of its peaceful and polished inhabitants With that conscious pride which the preeminence of knowledge and luxury seldom fails to inspire they derided the hairy and gigantic savages of the North their rustic manners dissonant joy voracious appetite and their horrid appearance, equally disgusting to the sight and to the smell The liberal studies were still cultivated in the schools of Autun and Bordeaux, and the language of Cicero and Virgil was familiar to the Gallic youth Their ears were astonished by the harsh and unknown sounds of the Germanic dialect, and they ingeniously lamented that the trembling muses fled from the harmony of a Burgundian lyre The Gauls were endowed with all the advantages of art and nature, but, as they wanted courage to defend them, they were justly condemned to obey, and even to flatter, the victorious barbarians by whose clemency they held their precarious fortunes and their lives [4]

As soon as Odoacer had extinguished the Western empire, he sought the friendship of the most powerful of the barbarians The new sovereign of Italy resigned to Euric, king of the Visigoths, all the Roman conquests beyond the Alps, as far as the Rhine and the Ocean,[5] and the senate might confirm this liberal gift with some ostentation of power, and without any real loss of revenue or dominion The lawful pretensions of Euric were justified by ambition and success, and the Gothic nation might aspire under his command to the monarchy of Spain and Gaul Arles and Marseilles surrendered to his arms he oppressed the freedom of Auvergne, and the bishop condescended to purchase his recall from exile by a tribute of just but reluctant praise Sidonius waited before the gates of the palace among a crowd of ambassadors and suppliants, and their various business at the court of Bordeaux attested the power and the renown of the king of the Visigoths The Heruli of the distant ocean, who painted their naked bodies with its cærulean colour, implored his protection, and the Saxons respected the maritime provinces of a prince who was destitute of any naval force The tall Burgundians submitted to his authority, nor did he restore the captive Franks till he had imposed on that fierce nation the terms of an unequal peace The Vandals of Africa cultivated his useful friendship, and the Ostrogoths of Pannonia were supported by his powerful aid against the oppression of the neighbouring Huns The North (such are the lofty strains of the poet) was agitated or appeased by the nod of Euric, the great king of Persia consulted the oracle of the West, and the aged god of the Tiber was protected by the swelling genius of the Garonne [6] The fortune of nations has often depended on accidents, and France may ascribe her greatness to the premature death of the Gothic king at a time when his son Alaric was a helpless infant, and his adversary Clovis[7] an ambitious and valiant youth

While Childeric, the father of Clovis, lived an exile in Germany, he was hospitably entertained by the queen as well as by the king of the Thuringians After his restoration Basina escaped from her husband's bed to the arms of her lover, freely declaring that, if she had known a man wiser, stronger, or more beautiful than Childeric, that man should have been the object of her preference [8] Clovis was the offspring of this voluntary union, and when he was no more than fifteen years of age he succeeded, by his father's death, to the command of the Salian tribe The narrow limits of his kingdom[9] were confined to the island of the Batavians, with the ancient dioceses of Tournay and Arras,[10] and at the baptism of Clovis the number of his warriors could not exceed five thousand The kindred tribes of the Franks who had seated themselves along the Belgic rivers, the Scheldt, the Meuse, the Moselle, and the Rhine, were governed by their independent kings of the Merovingian race—the equals, the allies, and sometimes the enemies, of the Salic prince But the Germans, who obeyed in peace the hereditary jurisdiction of their chiefs, were free to follow the standard of a popular and victorious general, and the superior merit of Clovis attracted the respect and allegiance of the national confederacy When he first took the field, he had neither gold and silver in his coffers, nor wine and corn in his magazines,[11] but he imitated the example of Cæsar, who in the same country had acquired wealth by the sword, and purchased soldiers with the fruits of conquest After each successful battle or expedition the spoils were accumulated in one common mass, every warrior received his proportionable share, and the royal prerogative submitted to the equal regulations of military law The untamed spirit of the barbarians was taught to acknowledge the advantages of regular discipline [12] At the annual review of the month of March their arms were diligently inspected, and when they traversed a peaceful territory they were prohibited from touching a blade of grass The justice of Clovis was inexorable, and his careless or disobedient soldiers were punished with instant death It would be superfluous to praise the valour of a Frank, but the valour of Clovis was directed by cool and consummate prudence [13] In all his transactions with mankind he calculated the weight of interest, of passion, and of opinion, and his measures were sometimes adapted the sanguinary manners of the Germans, sometimes moderated by the milder genius of Rome and Christianity He was intercepted in the career of victory since he died in the forty fifth year of his age but he had already accomplished in a reign of thirty years the establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul

The first exploit of Clovis was the defeat of Syagrius the son of Ægidius and the public quarrel might on this occasion be inflamed by private resentment The glory of the father still insulted the Merovingian race the power of the son might excite the jealous ambition of the king of the Franks Syagrius inherited as a patrimonial estate the city and diocese of Soissons the desolate remnant of the second Belgic Rheims and Troyes Beauvais and Amiens would naturally submit to the count or patrician [14] and after the dissolution of the Western empire he might reign with the title or at least with the authority of king of the Romans [15] As a Roman he had been educated in the liberal studies of rhetoric and jurisprudence but he was engaged by accident and policy in the familiar use of the Germanic idiom The independent barbarians resorted to the tribunal of a stranger who possessed the singular talent of explaining in their native tongue the dictates of reason and equity The diligence and affability of their judge rendered him popular the impartial wisdom of his decrees obtained their voluntary obedience and the reign of Syagrius over the Franks and Burgundians seemed to revive the original institution of civil society [16] In the midst of these peaceful occupations Syagrius received and boldly accepted the hostile defiance of Clovis who challenged his rival in the spirit and almost in the language of chivalry to appoint the day and the field[17] of battle In the time of Cæsar Soissons would have poured forth a body of fifty thousand horse and such an army might have been plentifully supplied with shields cuirasses and military engines from the three arsenals or manufactures of the city [18] But the courage and numbers of the Gallic youth were long since exhausted and the loose bands of volunteers or mercenaries who marched under the standard of Syagrius were incapable of contending with the national valour of the Franks It would be ungenerous, without some more accurate knowledge of his strength and resources to condemn the rapid flight of Syagrius who escaped after the loss of a battle to the distant court of Toulouse The feeble minority of Alaric could not assist or protect an unfortunate fugitive the pusillanimous[19] Goths were intimidated by the menaces of Clovis and the Roman king after a short confinement was delivered into the hands of the executioner The Belgic cities surrendered to the king of the Franks and his dominions were enlarged towards the east by the ample diocese of Tongres [20] which Clovis subdued in the tenth year of his reign

The name of the Alemanni has been absurdly derived from their imaginary settlement on the banks of the Leman lake [21] That fortunate district from the lake to Avenche and Mount Jura, was occupied by the Burgundians [22] The northern parts of Helvetia had indeed been subdued by the ferocious Alemanni who destroyed with their own hands the fruits of their conquest A province improved and adorned by the arts of Rome was again reduced to a savage wilderness and some vestige of the stately Vindonissa may still be discovered in the fertile and populous valley of the Aar [23] From the source of the Rhine to its conflux with the Main and the Moselle the formidable swarms of the Alemanni commanded either side of the river by the right of ancient possession or recent victory They had spread themselves into Gaul over the modern provinces of Alsace and Lorraine and their bold invasion of the kingdom of Cologne summoned the Salic prince to the defence of his Ripuarian allies Clovis encountered the invaders of Gaul in the plain of Tolbiac, about twenty four miles from Cologne and the two fiercest nations of Germany were mutually animated by the memory of past exploits and the prospect of future greatness The Franks after an obstinate struggle gave way and the Alemanni raising a shout of victory impetuously pressed their retreat But the battle was restored by the valour the conduct and perhaps by the piety of Clovis and the event of the bloody day decided for ever the alternative of empire or servitude The last king of the Alemanni was slain in the field and his people were slaughtered and pursued till they threw down their arms and yielded to the mercy of the conqueror Without discipline it was impossible for them to rally they had contemptuously demolished the walls and fortifications which might have protected their distress and they were followed into the heart of their forests by an enemy not less active or intrepid than themselves The great Theodoric congratulated the victory of Clovis whose sister Albofleda the king of Italy had lately married but he mildly interceded with his brother in favour of the suppliants and fugitives who had implored his protection. The Gallic territories which were possessed by the Alemanni became the prize of their conqueror, and the haughty nation, invincible or rebellious to the arms of Rome, acknowledged the sovereignty of the Merovingian kings, who graciously permitted them to enjoy their peculiar manners and institutions under the government of official, and, at length, of hereditary dukes After the conquest of the Western provinces, the Franks alone maintained their ancient habitations beyond the Rhine They gradually subdued and civilised the exhausted countries as far as the Elbe and the mountains of Bohemia, and the peace of Europe was secured by the obedience of Germany [24]

Till the thirtieth year of his age Clovis continued to worship the gods of his ancestors [25] His disbelief, or rather disregard of Christianity, might encourage him to pillage with less remorse the churches of an hostile territory but his subjects of Gaul enjoyed the free exercise of religious worship, and the bishops entertained a more favourable hope of the idolater than of the heretics The Merovingian prince had contracted a fortunate alliance with the fair Clotilda, the niece of the king of Burgundy, who in the midst of an Arian court was educated in the profession of the catholic faith It was her interest as well as her duty to achieve the conversion [6] of a Pagan husband, and Clovis insensibly listened to the voice of love and religion He consented (perhaps such terms had been previously stipulated) to the baptism of his eldest son, and though the sudden death of the infant excited some superstitious fears, he was persuaded a second time to repeat the dangerous experiment In the distress of the battle of Tolbiac, Clovis loudly invoked the God of Clotilda and the Christians, and victory disposed him to hear with respectful gratitude the eloquent [7] Remigius,[28] bishop of Rheims, who forcibly displayed the temporal and spiritual advantages of his conversion The king declared himself satisfied of the truth of the catholic faith, and the political reasons which might have suspended his public profession were removed by the devout or loyal acclamations of the Franks, who showed themselves alike prepared to follow their heroic leader to the field of battle or to the baptismal font The important ceremony was performed in the cathedral of Rheims with every circumstance of magnificence and solemnity that could impress an awful sense of religion on the minds of its rude proselytes [29] The new Constantine was immediately baptised with three thousand of his warlike subjects, and their example was imitated by the remainder of the gentle barbarians, who, in obedience to the victorious prelate, adored the cross which they had burnt, and burnt the idols which they had formerly adored [30] The mind of Clovis was susceptible of transient fervour he was exasperated by the pathetic tale of the passion and death of Christ, and instead of weighing the salutary consequences of that mysterious sacrifice, he exclaimed with indiscreet fury, "Had I been present at the head of my valiant Franks, I would have revenged his injuries "[31] But the savage conqueror of Gaul was incapable of examining the proofs of a religion which depends on the laborious investigation of historic evidence and speculative theology He was still more incapable of feeling the mild influence of the Gospel, which persuades and purifies the heart of a genuine convert His ambitious reign was a perpetual violation of moral and Christian duties his hands were stained with blood in peace as well as in war, and, as soon as Clovis had dismissed a synod of the Gallican church, he calmly assassinated all the princes of the Merovingian race [32] Yet the king of the Franks might sincerely worship the Christian God as a Being more excellent and powerful than his national deities, and the signal deliverance and victory of Tolbiac encouraged Clovis to confide in the future protection of the Lord of Hosts Martin, the most popular of the saints, had filled the Western world with the fame of those miracles which were incessantly performed at his holy sepulchre of Tours His visible or invisible aid promoted the cause of a liberal and orthodox prince, and the profane remark of Clovis himself, that St Martin was an expensive friend,[33] need not be interpreted as the symptom of any permanent or rational scepticism But earth as well as heaven rejoiced in the conversion of the Franks On the memorable day when Clovis ascended from the baptismal font, he alone in the Christian world deserved the name and prerogatives of a catholic king The emperor Anastasius entertained some dangerous errors concerning the nature of the divine incarnation, and the barbarians of Italy, Africa, Spain, and Gaul were involved in the Arian heresy The eldest, or rather the only son of the church, was acknowledged by the clergy as their lawful sovereign or glorious deliverer, and the arms of Clovis were strenuously supported by the zeal and favour of the catholic faction [34]

pendents, popular eloquence and provincial assemblies had rendered them always respectable and sometimes dangerous Their influence was augmented with the progress of superstition and the establishment of the French monarchy may in some degree be ascribed to the firm alliance of an hundred prelates who reigned in the discontented or independent cities of Gaul The slight foundations of the Armorican republic had been repeatedly shaken or overthrown but the same people still guarded their domestic freedom asserted the dignity of the Roman name and bravely resisted the predatory inroads and regular attacks of Clovis who laboured to extend his conquests from the Seine to the Loire Their successful opposition introduced an equal and honourable union The Franks esteemed the valour of the Armoricans [35] and the Armoricans were reconciled by the religion of the Franks The military force which had been stationed for the defence of Gaul consisted of one hundred different bands of cavalry or infantry and these troops while they assumed the title and privileges of Roman soldiers were renewed by an incessant supply of the barbarian youth The extreme fortifications and scattered fragments of the empire were still defended by their hopeless courage But their retreat was intercepted and their communication was impracticable they were abandoned by the Greek princes of Constantinople and they piously disclaimed all connection with the Arian usurpers of Gaul They accepted without shame or reluctance the generous capitulation which was proposed by a catholic hero and the spurious or legitimate progeny of the Roman legions was distinguished in the succeeding age by their arms their ensigns and their peculiar dress and institutions But the national strength was increased by these powerful and voluntary accessions and the neighbouring kingdoms dreaded the numbers as well as the spirit of the Franks The reduction of the northern provinces of Gaul instead of being decided by the chance of a single battle appears to have been slowly effected by the gradual operation of war and treaty and Clovis acquired each object of his ambition by such efforts or such concessions as were adequate to its real value His savage character and the virtues of Henry IV suggest the most opposite ideas of human nature yet some resemblance may be found in the situation of two princes who conquered France by their valour their policy and the merits of a seasonable conversion.[36]

The kingdom of the Burgundians which was defined by the course of two Gallic rivers, the Saone and the Rhône, extended from the forest of Vosges to the Alps and the sea of Marseilles.[37] The sceptre was in the hands of Gundobald. That valiant and ambitious prince had reduced the number of royal candidates by the death of two brothers one of whom was the father of Clotilda [38] but his imperfect prudence still permitted Godegesil the youngest of his brothers to possess the dependent principality of Geneva The Arian monarch was justly alarmed by the satisfaction and the hopes which seemed to animate his clergy and people after the conversion of Clovis and Gundobald convened at Lyons an assembly of his bishops, to reconcile, if it were possible their religious and political discontents A vain conference was agitated between the two factions The Arians upbraided the catholics with the worship of three Gods the catholics defended their cause by theological distinctions and the usual arguments, objections and replies were reverberated with obstinate clamour till the king revealed his secret apprehensions by an abrupt but decisive question which he addressed to the orthodox bishops If you truly profess the Christian religion why do you not restrain the king of the Franks? He has declared war against me, and forms alliances with my enemies for my destruction A sanguinary and covetous mind is not the symptom of a sincere conversion let him show his faith by his works The answer of Avitus, bishop of Vienne who spoke in the name of his brethren was delivered with the voice and countenance of an angel We are ignorant of the motives and intentions of the king of the Franks but we are taught by Scripture that the kingdoms which abandon the divine laws are frequently subverted and that enemies will arise on every side against those who have made God their enemy Return with thy people to the law of God and he will give peace and security to thy dominions The king of Burgundy who was not prepared to accept the condition which the catholics considered as essential to the treaty delayed and dismissed the ecclesiastical conference, after reproaching his bishops that Clovis their friend and proselyte, had privately tempted the allegiance of his brother [39]

The allegiance of his brother was already seduced and the obedience of Godegesil, who joined the royal standard with the troops of Geneva more effectually promoted the success of the conspiracy While the Franks and Burgundians contended with equal valour his seasonable desertion decided the event of the battle and as Gundobald was faintly supported by the disaffected Gauls, he yielded to the arms of Clovis, and hastily retreated from the field, which appears to have been situate between Langres and Dijon He distrusted the strength of Dijon, a quadrangular fortress, encompassed by two rivers and by a wall thirty feet high and fifteen thick, with four gates and thirty-three towers [40] he abandoned to the pursuit of Clovis the important cities of Lyons and Vienne, and Gundobald still fled with precipitation till he had reached Avignon, at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles from the field of battle A long siege and an artful negotiation admonished the king of the Franks of the danger and difficulty of his enterprise He imposed a tribute on the Burgundian prince, compelled him to pardon and reward his brother's treachery, and proudly returned to his own dominions with the spoils and captives of the southern provinces This splendid triumph was soon clouded by the intelligence that Gundobald had violated his recent obligations, and that the unfortunate Godegesil, who was left at Vienne with a garrison of five thousand Franks,[41] had been besieged, surprised, and massacred by his inhuman brother Such an outrage might have exasperated the patience of the most peaceful sovereign, yet the conqueror of Gaul dissembled the injury, released the tribute, and accepted the alliance and military service of the king of Burgundy Clovis no longer possessed those advantages which had assured the success of the preceding war, and his rival, instructed by adversity, had found new resources in the affections of his people The Gauls or Romans applauded the mild and impartial laws of Gundobald, which almost raised them to the same level with their conquerors The bishops were reconciled and flattered by the hopes which he artfully suggested of his approaching conversion, and though he eluded their accomplishment to the last moment of his life, his moderation secured the peace and suspended the ruin of the kingdom of Burgundy [42]

I am impatient to pursue the final ruin of that kingdom, which was accomplished under the reign of Sigismond, the son of Gundobald The catholic Sigismond has acquired the honours of a saint and martyr,[43] but the hands of the royal saint were stained with the blood of his innocent son, whom he inhumanly sacrificed to the pride and resentment of a stepmother He soon discovered his error, and bewailed the irreparable loss While Sigismond embraced the corpse of the unfortunate youth, he received a severe admonition from one of his attendants "It is not his situation, O king! it is thine which deserves pity and lamentation " The reproaches of a guilty conscience were alleviated, however, by his liberal donations to the monastery of Agaunum, or St Maurice, in Vallais, which he himself had founded in honour of the imaginary martyrs of the Thebæan legion [44] A full chorus of perpetual psalmody was instituted by the pious king, he assiduously practised the austere devotion of the monks, and it was his humble prayer that Heaven would inflict in this world the punishment of his sins His prayer was heard the avengers were at hand, and the provinces of Burgundy were overwhelmed by an army of victorious Franks After the event of an unsuccessful battle, Sigismond, who wished to protract his life that he might prolong his penance, concealed himself in the desert in a religious habit till he was discovered and betrayed by his subjects, who solicited the favour of their new masters The captive monarch, with his wife and two children, was transported to Orleans, and buried alive in a deep well by the stern command of the sons of Clovis, whose cruelty might derive some excuse from the maxims and examples of their barbarous age Their ambition, which urged them to achieve the conquest of Burgundy, was inflamed or disguised by filial piety and Clotilda, whose sanctity did not consist in the forgiveness of injuries, pressed them to revenge her father's death on the family of his assassin The rebellious Burgundians, for they attempted to break their chains, were still permitted to enjoy their national laws under the obligation of tribute and military service, and the Merovingian princes peaceably reigned over a kingdom whose glory and greatness had been first overthrown by the arms of Clovis [45]

The first victory of Clovis had insulted the honour of the Goths They viewed his rapid progress with jealousy and terror, and the youthful fame of Alaric was oppressed by the more potent genius of his rival Some disputes inevitably arose on the edge of their contiguous dominions, and after the delays of fruitless negotiation a personal interview of the two kings was proposed and accepted This conference of Clovis and Alaric was held in a small island of the Loire, near Amboise They embraced, familiarly conversed, and feasted together, and separated with the warmest professions of peace and brotherly love But their apparent confidence concealed a dark suspicion of hostile and treacherous designs, and their mutual complaints solicited, eluded, and disclaimed a final arbitration At Paris which he already considered as his royal seat Clovis declared to an assembly of the princes and warriors the pretence and the motive of a Gothic war It grieves me to see that the Arians still possess the fairest portion of Gaul Let us march against them with the aid of God and having vanquished the heretics we will possess and divide their fertile provinces [46] The Franks who were inspired by hereditary valour and recent zeal applauded the generous design of their monarch expressed their resolution to conquer or die since death and conquest would be equally profitable and solemnly protested that they would never shave their beards till victory should absolve them from that inconvenient vow The enterprise was promoted by the public or private exhortations of Clotilda She reminded her husband how effectually some pious foundation would propitiate the Deity and his servants and the Christian hero darting his battle axe with a skilful and nervous hand There (said he) on that spot where my Francisca[47] shall fall will I erect a church in honour of the holy apostles This ostentatious piety confirmed and justified the attachment of the catholics with whom he secretly corresponded and their devout wishes were gradually ripened into a formidable conspiracy The people of Aquitain was alarmed by the indiscreet reproaches of their Gothic tyrants who justly accused them of preferring the dominion of the Franks and their zealous adherent Quintianus bishop of Rodez [48] preached more forcibly in his exile than in his diocese To resist these foreign and domestic enemies who were fortified by the alliance of the Burgundians Alaric collected his troops far more numerous than the military powers of Clovis The Visigoths resumed the exercise of arms which they had neglected in a long and luxurious peace [49] a select band of valiant and robust slaves attended their masters to the field [50] and the cities of Gaul were compelled to furnish their doubtful and reluctant aid. Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths who reigned in Italy had laboured to maintain the tranquillity of Gaul and he assumed or affected for that purpose the impartial character of a mediator But the sagacious monarch dreaded the rising empire of Clovis and he was firmly engaged to support the national and religious cause of the Goths

The accidental or artificial prodigies which adorned the expedition of Clovis were accepted by a superstitious age, as the manifest declaration of the Divine favour He marched from Paris and as he proceeded with decent reverence through the holy diocese of Tours his anxiety tempted him to consult the shrine of St. Martin the sanctuary, and the oracle of Gaul. His messengers were instructed to remark the words of the Psalm which should happen to be chanted at the precise moment when they entered the church Those words most fortuna ely expressed the valour and victory of the champions of Heaven and the application was easily transferred to the new Joshua the new Gideon, who went forth to battle against the enemies of the Lord [51] Orleans secured to the Franks a bridge on the Loire but at the distance of forty miles from Poitiers their progress was intercepted by an extraordinary swell of the river Vigenna or Vienne and the opposite banks were covered by the encampment of the Visi oths Delay must be always dangerous to barbarians who consume the country through which they march and had Clovis possessed leisure and materials it might have been impracticable to construct a bridge or to force a passage in the face of a superior enemy But the affectionate peasants who were impatient to welcome their deliverer could easily betray some unknown or unguarded ford the merit of the discovery was enhanced by the useful interposition of fraud or fiction and a white hart of singular size and beauty appeared to guide and animate the march of the catholic army The counsels of the Visigoths were irresolute and distracted. A crowd of impatient warriors presumptuous in their strength and disdaining to fly before the robbers of Germany excited Alaric to assert in arms the name and blood of the conqueror o Rome The advice of the graver chieftain pressed him to elude the first ardour of th Franks and to expect in the southern provinces of Gaul the veteran and victorious Ostrogoths whom the king of Italy had already se to his assistance The decisive moments we wasted in idle deliberation the Goths too hast ly abandoned perhaps an advantageous pos and the opportunity of a secure retreat was lo by their slow and disorderly motions After Clovis had passed the ford as it is still named the Hart he advanced with bold and hasty ste to prevent the escape of the enemy His nocturnal march was directed by a flaming meteor suspended in the air above the cathedral of Poitiers and this signal which might be previously concerted with the orthodox successor of St Hilary was compared to the column of fire that guided the Israelites in the desert At the third hour of the day about ten miles beyond

Poitiers, Clovis overtook, and instantly attacked, the Gothic army, whose defeat was already prepared by terror and confusion Yet they rallied in their extreme distress, and the martial youths, who had clamorously demanded the battle, refused to survive the ignominy of flight The two kings encountered each other in single combat Alaric fell by the hand of his rival, and the victorious Frank was saved, by the goodness of his cuirass and the vigour of his horse, from the spears of two desperate Goths, who furiously rode against him to revenge the death of their sovereign The vague expression of a mountain of the slain serves to indicate a cruel, though indefinite, slaughter, but Gregory has carefully observed that his valiant countryman Apollinaris, the son of Sidonius, lost his life at the head of the nobles of Auvergne Perhaps these suspected catholics had been maliciously exposed to the blind assault of the enemy, and perhaps the influence of religion was superseded by personal attachment or military honour [52]

Such is the empire of Fortune (if we may still disguise our ignorance under that popular name), that it is almost equally difficult to foresee the events of war, or to explain their various consequences A bloody and complete victory has sometimes yielded no more than the possession of the field, and the loss of ten thousand men has sometimes been sufficient to destroy, in a single day, the work of ages The decisive battle of Poitiers was followed by the conquest of Aquitain Alaric had left behind him an infant son, a bastard competitor, factious nobles, and a disloyal people, and the remaining forces of the Goths were oppressed by the general consternation, or opposed to each other in civil discord The victorious king of the Franks proceeded without delay to the siege of Angouleme. At the sound of his trumpets the walls of the city imitated the example of Jericho, and instantly fell to the ground, a splendid miracle, which may be reduced to the supposition that some clerical engineers had secretly undermined the foundations of the rampart [53] At Bordeaux, which had submitted without resistance, Clovis established his winter quarters, and his prudent economy transported from Toulouse the royal treasures, which were deposited in the capital of the monarchy The conqueror penetrated as far as the confines of Spain,[54] restored the honours of the catholic church, fixed in Aquitain a colony of Franks,[55] and delegated to his lieutenants the easy task of subduing or extirpating the nation of the Visigoths But the Visigoths were protected by the wise and powerful monarch of Italy While the balance was still equal, Theodoric had perhaps delayed the march of the Ostrogoths, but their strenuous efforts successfully resisted the ambition of Clovis, and the army of the Franks, and their Burgundian allies, was compelled to raise the siege of Arles, with the loss, as it is said, of thirty thousand men These vicissitudes inclined the fierce spirit of Clovis to acquiesce in an advantageous treaty of peace The Visigoths were suffered to retain the possession of Septimania, a narrow tract of sea coast, from the Rhône to the Pyrenees, but the ample province of Aquitain, from those mountains to the Loire, was indissolubly united to the kingdom of France [56]

After the success of the Gothic war, Clovis accepted the honours of the Roman consulship The emperor Anastasius ambitiously bestowed on the most powerful rival of Theodoric the title and ensigns of that eminent dignity, yet, from some unknown cause, the name of Clovis has not been inscribed in the Fasti either of the East or West [57] On the solemn day, the monarch of Gaul, placing a diadem on his head, was invested, in the church of St Martin, with a purple tunic and mantle From thence he proceeded on horseback to the cathedral of Tours, and, as he passed through the streets, profusely scattered, with his own hand, a donative of gold and silver to the joyful multitude, who incessantly repeated their acclamations of Consul and Augustus The actual or legal authority of Clovis could not receive any new accessions from the consular dignity It was a name, a shadow, an empty pageant, and if the conqueror had been instructed to claim the ancient prerogatives of that high office, they must have expired with the period of its annual duration But the Romans were disposed to revere, in the person of their master, that antique title which the emperors condescended to assume the barbarian himself seemed to contract a sacred obligation to respect the majesty of the republic, and the successors of Theodosius, by soliciting his friendship, tacitly forgave, and almost ratified, the usurpation of Gaul

Twenty five years after the death of Clovis this important concession was more formally declared in a treaty between his sons and the emperor Justinian The Ostrogoths of Italy, unable to defend their distant acquisitions, had resigned to the Franks the cities of Arles and Marseilles of Arles, still adorned with the seat of a Prætorian præfect, and of Marseilles, enriched by the advantages of trade and navigation [58] This transaction was confirmed by

Imperial authority and Justinian generously yielding to the Franks the sovereignty of the countries beyond the Alps which they already possessed absolved the provincials from their allegiance and established on a more lawful though not more solid foundation the throne of the Merovingians [59] From that era they enjoyed the right of celebrating at Arles the games of the circus and by a singular privilege which was denied even to the Persian monarch the gold coin impressed with their name and image obtained a legal currency in the empire [60] A Greek historian of that age has praised the private and public virtues of the Franks with a partial enthusiasm which cannot be sufficiently justified by their domestic annals [61] He celebrates their politeness and urbanity their regular government and orthodox religion and boldly asserts that these barbarians could be distinguished only by their dress and language from the subjects of Rome Perhaps the Franks already displayed the social disposition and lively graces which in every age have disguised their vices and sometimes concealed their intrinsic merit Perhaps Agathias and the Greeks were dazzled by the rapid progress of their arms and the splendour of their empire Since the conquest of Burgundy Gaul except the Gothic province of Septimania was subject in its whole extent to the sons of Clovis They had extinguished the German kingdom of Thuringia and their vague dominion penetrated beyond the Rhine into the heart of their native forests The Alemanni and Bavarians who had occupied the Roman provinces of Rhætia and Noricum to the south of the Danube confessed themselves the humble vassals of the Franks and the feeble barrier of the Alps was incapable of resisting their ambition When the last survivor of the sons of Clovis united the inheritance and conquests of the Merovingians his kingdom extended far beyond the limits of modern France Yet modern France such has been the progress of arts and policy far surpasses in wealth populousness and power the spacious but savage realms of Clotaire or Dagobert [62]

The Franks or French are the only people of Europe who can deduce a perpetual succession from the conquerors of the Western empire But their conquest of Gaul was followed by ten centuries of anarchy and ignorance On the revival of learning the students who had been formed in the schools of Athens and Rome disdained their barbarian ancestors and a long period elapsed before patient labour could provide the requisite materials to satisfy or rather to excite the curiosity of more enlightened times [63] At length the eye of criticism and philosophy was directed to the antiquities of France but even philosophers have been tainted by the contagion of prejudice and passion The most extreme and exclusive systems of the personal servitude of the Gauls or of their voluntary and equal alliance with the Franks have been rashly conceived and obstinately defended and the intemperate disputants have accused each other of conspiring against the prerogative of the crown the dignity of the nobles or the freedom of the people Yet the sharp conflict has usefully exercised the adverse powers of learning and genius and each antagonist alternately vanquished and victorious has extirpated some ancient errors and established some interesting truths An impartial stranger instructed by their discoveries their disputes and even their faults may describe from the same original materials the state of the Roman provincials, after Gaul had submitted to the arms and laws of the Merovingian kings [64]

The rudest or the most servile condition of human society is regulated however by some fixed and general rules When Tacitus surveyed the primitive simplicity of the Germans he discovered some permanent maxims or customs, of public and private life which were preserved by faithful tradition till the introduction of the art of writing and of the Latin tongue.[65] Before the election of the Merovingian kings, the most powerful tribe or nation, of the Franks appointed four venerable chieftains to compose the Salic laws [66] and their labours were examined and approved in three successive assemblies of the people After the baptism of Clovis, he reformed several articles that appeared incompatible with Christianity the Salic law was again amended by his sons and at length, under the reign of Dagobert the code was revised and promulgated in its actual form one hundred years after the establishment of the French monarchy Within the same period the customs of the Ripuarians were transcribed and published and Charlemagne himself the legislator of his age and country had accurately studied the two national laws which still prevailed among the Franks [67] The same care was extended to their vassals and the rude institutions of the Alemanni and Bavarians were diligently compiled and ratified by the supreme authority of the Merovingian kings The Visigoths and Burgundians whose conquests in Gaul preceded those of the Franks showed less impatience to attain

one of the principal benefits of civilised society Euric was the first of the Gothic princes who expressed in writing the manners and customs of his people, and the composition of the Burgundian laws was a measure of policy rather than of justice, to alleviate the yoke and regain the affections of their Gallic subjects [68] Thus, by a singular coincidence, the Germans framed their artless institutions at a time when the elaborate system of Roman jurisprudence was finally consummated In the Salic laws, and the Pandects of Justinian, we may compare the first rudiments, and the full maturity, of civil wisdom, and whatever prejudices may be suggested in favour of barbarism, our calmer reflections will ascribe to the Romans the superior advantages, not only of science and reason, but of humanity and justice Yet the laws of the barbarians were adapted to their wants and desires, their occupations and their capacity, and they all contributed to preserve the peace, and promote the improvements, of the society for whose use they were originally established The Merovingians, instead of imposing a uniform rule of conduct on their various subjects, permitted each people, and each family, of their empire freely to enjoy their domestic institutions,[69] nor were the Romans excluded from the common benefits of this legal toleration [70] The children embraced the law of their parents, the wife that of her husband, the freedman that of his patron, and in all causes where the parties were of different nations, the plaintiff or accuser was obliged to follow the tribunal of the defendant, who may always plead a judicial presumption of right or innocence A more ample latitude was allowed, if every citizen, in the presence of the judge, might declare the law under which he desired to live, and the national society to which he chose to belong Such an indulgence would abolish the partial distinctions of victory and the Roman provincials might patiently acquiesce in the hardships of their condition, since it depended on themselves to assume the privilege, if they dared to assert the character, of free and warlike barbarians [71]

When justice inexorably requires the death of a murderer, each private citizen is fortified by the assurance that the laws, the magistrate, and the whole community, are the guardians of his personal safety But in the loose society of the Germans, revenge was always honourable, and often meritorious the independent warrior chastised, or vindicated, with his own hand, the injuries which he had offered or received, and he had only to dread the resentment of the sons and kinsmen of the enemy whom he had sacrificed to his selfish or angry passions The magistrate, conscious of his weakness, interposed, not to punish, but to reconcile, and he was satisfied if he could persuade or compel the contending parties to pay and to accept the moderate fine which had been ascertained as the price of blood [72] The fierce spirit of the Franks would have opposed a more rigorous sentence, the same fierceness despised these ineffectual restraints, and, when their simple manners had been corrupted by the wealth of Gaul, the public peace was continually violated by acts of hasty or deliberate guilt In every just government the same penalty is inflicted, or at least is imposed, for the murder of a peasant or a prince But the national inequality established by the Franks in their criminal proceedings was the last insult and abuse of conquest [73] In the calm moments of legislation they solemnly pronounced that the life of a Roman was of smaller value than that of a barbarian The Antrustion,[74] a name expressive of the most illustrious birth or dignity among the Franks, was appreciated at the sum of six hundred pieces of gold, while the noble provincial, who was admitted to the king's table, might be legally murdered at the expense of three hundred pieces Two hundred were deemed sufficient for a Frank of ordinary condition, but the meaner Romans were exposed to disgrace and danger by a trifling compensation of one hundred, or even fifty, pieces of gold Had these laws been regulated by any principle of equity or reason, the public protection should have supplied, in just proportion, the want of personal strength But the legislator had weighed in the scale, not of justice, but of policy, the loss of a soldier against that of a slave the head of an insolent and rapacious barbarian was guarded by a heavy fine, and the slightest aid was afforded to the most defenceless subjects Time insensibly abated the pride of the conquerors, and the patience of the vanquished, and the boldest citizen was taught by experience that he might suffer more injuries than he could inflict. As the manners of the Franks became less ferocious, their laws were rendered more severe, and the Merovingian kings attempted to imitate the impartial rigour of the Visigoths and Burgundians [75] Under the empire of Charlemagne murder was universally punished with death, and the use of capital punishments has been liberally multiplied in the jurisprudence of modern Europe.[76]

united by the barbarians The harsh sound of the Teutonic appellations was mollified into the Latin titles of Duke of Count or of Præfect and the same officer assumed within his district the command of the troops and the administration of justice [77] But the fierce and illiterate chieftain was seldom qualified to discharge the duties of a judge, which require all of the faculties of a philosophic mind laboriously cultivated by experience and study and his rude ignorance was compelled to embrace some simple and visible methods of ascertaining the cause of justice In every religion the Deity has been invoked to confirm the truth or to punish the falsehood of human testimony but this powerful instrument was misapplied and abused by the simplicity of the German legislators The party accused might justify his innocence by producing before their tribunal a number of friendly witnesses who solemnly declared their belief or assurance that he was not guilty According to the weight of the charge this legal number of compurgators was multiplied seventy two voices were required to absolve an incendiary or assassin and when the chastity of a queen of France was suspected three hundred gallant nobles swore without hesitation that the infant prince had been actually begotten by her deceased husband [78] The sin and scandal of manifest and frequent perjuries engaged the magistrates to remove these dangerous temptations and to supply the defects of human testimony by the famous experiments of fire and water These extraordinary trials were so capriciously contrived that in some cases guilt and innocence in others could not be proved without the interposition of a miracle. Such miracles were readily provided by fraud and credulity the most intricate causes were determined by this easy and infallible method and the turbulent barbarians who might have disdained the sentence of the magistrate submissively acquiesced in the judgment of God [79]

But the trials by single combat gradually obtained superior credit and authority among a warlike people who could not believe that a brave man deserved to suffer or that a coward deserved to live [80] Both in civil and criminal proceedings the plaintiff or accuser the defendant or even the witness were exposed to mortal challenge from the antagonist who was destitute of legal proofs and it was incumbent on them either to desert their cause or publicly to maintain their honour in the lists of battle They fought either on foot or on horseback according to the custom of their nation [81] and the decision of the sword or lance was ratified by the sanction of Heaven of the judge and of the people This sanguinary law was introduced into Gaul by the Burgundians and their legislator Gundobald[8] condescended to answer the complaints and objections of his subject Avitus

Is it not true said the king of Burgundy to the bishop that the event of national wars and private combats is directed by the judgment of God and that his providence awards the victory to the juster cause? By such prevailing arguments the absurd and cruel practice of judicial duels which had been peculiar to some tribes of Germany was propagated and established in all the monarchies of Europe from Sicily to the Baltic At the end of ten centuries the reign of legal violence was not totally extinguished and the ineffectual censures of saints, of popes and of synods may seem to prove that the influence of superstition is weakened by its unnatural alliance with reason and humanity The tribunals were stained with the blood perhaps of innocent and respectable citizens the law which now favours the rich then yielded to the strong and the old the feeble, and the infirm were condemned either to renounce their fairest claims and possessions to sustain the dangers of an unequal conflict [83] or to trust the doubtful aid of a mercenary champion. This oppressive jurisprudence was imposed on the provincials of Gaul who complained of any injuries in their persons and property Whatever might be the strength or courage of individuals the victorious barbarians excelled in the love and exercise of arms and the vanquished Roman was unjustly summoned to repeat in his own person the bloody contest which had been already decided against his country [84]

A devouring host of one hundred and twenty thousand Germans had formerly passed the Rhine under the command of Ariovistus One third part of the fertile lands of the Sequani was appropriated to their use and the conqueror soon repeated his oppressive demand of another third for the accommodation of a new colony of twenty four thousand barbarians whom he had invited to share the rich harvest of Gaul [85] At the distance of five hundred years the Visigoths and Burgundians who revenged the defeat of Ariovistus usurped the same unequal proportion of two thirds of the subject lands But this distribution instead of spreading over the province may be reasonably confined to the peculiar districts where the victorious people had been planted by their own choice or by the policy of their leader In these districts each barbarian was connected by the ties of hospitality with some Roman provincial To this unwelcome guest the proprietor was compelled to abandon two-thirds of his patrimony but the German, a shepherd and a hunter, might sometimes content himself with a spacious range of wood and pasture, and resign the smallest, though most valuable, portion to the toil of the industrious husbandman [86] The silence of ancient and authentic testimony has encouraged an opinion that the rapine of the Franks was not moderated or disguised by the forms of a legal division, that they dispersed themselves over the provinces of Gaul without order or control, and that each victorious robber, according to his wants, his avarice, and his strength, measured with his sword the extent of his new inheritance At a distance from their sovereign the barbarians might indeed be tempted to exercise such arbitrary depredation, but the firm and artful policy of Clovis must curb a licentious spirit which would aggravate the misery of the vanquished whilst it corrupted the union and discipline of the conquerors The memorable vase of Soissons is a monument and a pledge of the regular distribution of the Gallic spoils It was the duty and the interest of Clovis to provide rewards for a successful army, and settlements for a numerous people, without inflicting any wanton or superfluous injuries on the loyal catholics of Gaul The ample fund which he might lawfully acquire of the Imperial patrimony, vacant lands, and Gothic usurpations, would diminish the cruel necessity of seizure and confiscation, and the humble provincials would more patiently acquiesce in the equal and regular distribution of their loss [87]

The wealth of the Merovingian princes consisted in their extensive domain After the conquest of Gaul they still delighted in the rustic simplicity of their ancestors, the cities were abandoned to solitude and decay, and their coins, their charters, and their synods, are still inscribed with the names of the villas or rural palaces in which they successively resided One hundred and sixty of these palaces, a title which need not excite any unseasonable ideas of art or luxury, were scattered through the provinces of their kingdom, and if some might claim the honours of a fortress, the far greater part could be esteemed only in the light of profitable farms The mansion of the long haired kings was surrounded with convenient yards and stables for the cattle and the poultry, the garden was planted with useful vegetables, the various trades, the labours of agriculture, and even the arts of hunting and fishing, were exercised by servile hands for the emolument of the sovereign, his magazines were filled with corn and wine, either for sale or consumption, and the whole administration was conducted by the strictest maxims of private economy [88] This ample patrimony was appropriated to supply the hospitable plenty of Clovis and his successors, and to reward the fidelity of their brave companions, who, both in peace and war, were devoted to their personal service Instead of a horse or a suit of armour, each companion, according to his rank, or merit, or favour, was invested with a benefice, the primitive name and most simple form of the feudal possessions These gifts might be resumed at the pleasure of the sovereign, and his feeble prerogative derived some support from the influence of his liberality But this dependent tenure was gradually abolished[89] by the independent and rapacious nobles of France, who established the perpetual property and hereditary succession of their benefices, a revolution salutary to the earth, which had been injured or neglected by its precarious masters [90] Besides these royal and beneficiary estates, a large proportion had been assigned, in the division of Gaul, of allodial and Salic lands they were exempt from tribute, and the Salic lands were equally shared among the male descendants of the Franks [91]

In the bloody discord and silent decay of the Merovingian line a new order of tyrants arose in the provinces, who, under the appellation of Seniors or Lords, usurped a right to govern and a licence to oppress the subjects of their peculiar territory Their ambition might be checked by the hostile resistance of an equal but the laws were extinguished, and the sacrilegious barbarians, who dared to provoke the vengeance of a saint or bishop,[92] would seldom respect the landmarks of a profane and defenceless neighbour The common or public rights of nature, such as they had always been deemed by the Roman jurisprudence,[93] were severely restrained by the German conquerors, whose amusement, or rather passion, was the exercise of hunting The vague domin on which MAN has assumed over the wild inhabitants of the earth, the air, and the waters, was confined to some fortunate individuals of the human species Gaul was again overspread with woods, and the animals, who were reserved for the use or pleasure of the lord, might ravage with impunity the fields of his industrious vassals The chase was the sacred privilege of the nobles and their domestic servants Plebeian transgressors were legally chastised with stripes and imprisonment [94] but in an age which admitted a slight composition for the life of a citizen it was a capital crime to destroy a stag or a wild bull within the precincts of the royal forests [95]

According to the maxims of ancient war the conqueror became the lawful master of the enemy whom he had subdued and spared [96] and the fruitful cause of personal slavery which had been almost suppressed by the peaceful sovereignty of Rome was again revived and multiplied by the perpetual hostilities of the independent barbarians The Goth the Burgundian or the Frank who returned from a successful expedition dragged after him a long train of sheep of oxen and of human captives whom he treated with the same brutal contempt The youths of an elegant form and ingenuous aspect were set apart for the domestic service a doubtful situation which alternately exposed them to the favourable or cruel impulse of passion The useful mechanics and servants (smiths carpenters tailors shoemakers cooks gardeners dyers and workmen in gold and silver etc.) employed their skill for the use or profit of their master But the Roman captives who were destitute of art but capable of labour were condemned without regard to their former rank to tend the cattle and cultivate the lands of the barbarians The number of the hereditary bondsmen who were attached to the Gallic estates was continually increased by new supplies and the servile people according to the situation and temper of their lords was sometimes raised by precarious indulgence and more frequently depressed by capricious despotism [97] An absolute power of life and death was exercised by these lords and when they married their daughters a train of useful servants chained on the waggons to prevent their escape was sent as a nuptial present into a distant country [98] The majesty of the Roman laws protected the liberty of each citizen against the rash effects of his own distress or despair But the subjects of the Merovingian kings might alienate their personal freedom and this act of legal suicide which was familiarly practised is expressed in terms most disgraceful and afflicting to the dignity of human nature [99] The example of the poor who purchased life by the sacrifice of all that can render life desirable was gradually imitated by the feeble and the devout who in times of public disorder pusillanimously crowded to shelter themselves under the battlements of a powerful chief and around the shrine of a popular saint Their submission was accepted by these temporal or spiritual patrons and the hasty transaction irrecoverably fixed their own condition and that of their latest posterity From the reign of Clovis during five successive centuries, the laws and manners of Gaul uniformly tended to promote the increase and to confirm the duration of personal servitude Time and violence almost obliterated the intermediate ranks of society and left an obscure and narrow interval between the noble and the slave This arbitrary and recent division has been transformed by pride and prejudice into a national distinction, universally established by the arms and the laws of the Merovingians The nobles who claimed their genuine or fabulous descent from the independent and victorious Franks, have asserted and abused the indefeasible right of conquest over a prostrate crowd of slaves and plebeians, to whom they imputed the imaginary disgrace of a Gallic or Roman extraction

The general state and revolutions of France a name which was imposed by the conquerors, may be illustrated by the particular example of a province a diocese or a senatorial family Auvergne had formerly maintained a just pre-eminence among the independent states and cities of Gaul The brave and numerous inhabitants displayed a singular trophy—the sword of Cæsar himself which he had lost when he was repulsed before the walls of Gergovia [100] As the common offspring of Troy they claimed a fraternal alliance with the Romans [101] and if each province had imitated the courage and loyalty of Auvergne the fall of the Western empire might have been prevented or delayed They firmly maintained the fidelity which they had reluctantly sworn to the Visigoths but when their bravest nobles had fallen in the battle of Poitiers they accepted without resistance a victorious and catholic sovereign. This easy and valuable conquest was achieved and possessed by Theodoric the eldest son of Clovis but the remote province was separated from his Austrasian dominions by the intermediate kingdoms of Soissons Paris and Orleans which formed after their father s death the inheritance of his three brothers The king of Paris, Childebert was tempted by the neighbourhood and beauty of Auvergne [102] The upper country which rises towards the south into the mountains of the Cevennes presented a rich and various prospect of woods and pastures the sides of the hills were clothed with vines and each eminence was crowned with a villa or castle In the Lower Auvergne the river Allier flows through the fair and spacious plain of Limagne, and the inexhaustible fertility of the soil supplied, and still supplies, without any interval of repose, the constant repetition of the same harvests[103] On the false report that their lawful sovereign had been slain in Germany, the city and diocese of Auvergne were betrayed by the grandson of Sidonius Apollinaris Childebert enjoyed this clandestine victory, and the free subjects of Theodoric threatened to desert his standard if he indulged his private resentment while the nation was engaged in the Burgundian war But the Franks of Austrasia soon yielded to the persuasive eloquence of their king "Follow me," said Theodoric, "into Auvergne, I will lead you into a province where you may acquire gold, silver, slaves, cattle, and precious apparel, to the full extent of your wishes I repeat my promise, I give you the people and their wealth as your prey, and you may transport them at pleasure into your own country" By the execution of this promise Theodoric justly forfeited the allegiance of a people whom he devoted to destruction His troops, reinforced by the fiercest barbarians of Germany,[104] spread desolation over the fruitful face of Auvergne, and two places only, a strong castle and a holy shrine, were saved or redeemed from their licentious fury The castle of Meroliac[105] was seated on a lofty rock, which rose an hundred feet above the surface of the plain, and a large reservoir of fresh water was enclosed with some arable lands within the circle of its fortifications The Franks beheld with envy and despair this impregnable fortress but they surprised a party of fifty stragglers, and, as they were oppressed by the number of their captives, they fixed at a trifling ransom the alternative of life or death for these wretched victims, whom the cruel barbarians were prepared to massacre on the refusal of the garrison Another detachment penetrated as far as Brivas, or Brioude, where the inhabitants, with their valuable effects, had taken refuge in the sanctuary of St Julian The doors of the church resisted the assault, but a daring soldier entered through a window of the choir and opened a passage to his companions The clergy and people, the sacred and the profane spoils, were rudely torn from the altar, and the sacrilegious division was made at a small distance from the town of Brioude But this act of impiety was severely chastised by the devout son of Clovis He punished with death the most atrocious offenders, left their secret accomplices to the vengeance of St Julian, released the captives, restored the plunder, and extended the rights of sanctuary five miles round the sepulchre of the holy martyr[106]

Before the Austrasian army retreated from Auvergne, Theodoric exacted some pledges of the future loyalty of a people whose just hatred could be restrained only by their fear A select band of noble youths, the sons of the principal senators, was delivered to the conqueror as the hostages of the faith of Childebert and of their countrymen On the first rumour of war or conspiracy these guiltless youths were reduced to a state of servitude, and one of them, Attalus,[107] whose adventures are more particularly related, kept his master's horses in the diocese of Treves After a painful search he was discovered in this unworthy occupation, by the emissaries of his grandfather, Gregory bishop of Langres, but his offers of ransom were sternly rejected by the avarice of the barbarian, who required an exorbitant sum of ten pounds of gold for the freedom of his noble captive His deliverance was effected by the hardy stratagem of Leo, a slave belonging to the kitchens of the bishop of Langres[108] An unknown agent easily introduced him into the same family The barbarian purchased Leo for the price of twelve pieces of gold, and was pleased to learn that he was deeply skilled in the luxury of an episcopal table "Next Sunday," said the Frank, "I shall invite my neighbours and kinsmen Exert thy art, and force them to confess that they have never seen or tasted such an entertainment, even in the king's house" Leo assured him that, if he would provide a sufficient quantity of poultry, his wishes should be satisfied The master, who already aspired to the merit of elegant hospitality, assumed as his own the praise which the voracious guests unanimously bestowed on his cook, and the dexterous Leo insensibly acquired the trust and management of his household After the patient expectation of a whole year, he cautiously whispered his design to Attalus, and exhorted him to prepare for flight in the ensuing night At the hour of midnight the intemperate guests retired from table, and the Frank's son-in law, whom Leo attended to his apartment with a nocturnal potation, condescended to jest on the facility with which he might betray his trust The intrepid slave, after sustaining this dangerous raillery, entered his master's bed-chamber, removed his spear and shield, silently drew the fleetest horses from the stable, unbarred the ponderous gates, and excited Attalus to save his life and liberty by incessant diligence Their apprehensions urged them to leave their horses on the banks of the Meuse,[109]

they swam the river wandered three days in the adjacent forest and subsisted only by the accidental discovery of a wild plum tree As they lay concealed in a dark thicket they heard the noise of horses they were terrified by the angry countenance of their master and they anxiously listened to his declaration that if he could seize the guilty fugitives one of them he would cut in pieces with his sword and would expose the other on a gibbet At length Attalus and his faithful Leo reached the friendly habitation of a presbyter of Rheims who recruited their fainting strength with bread and wine concealed them from the search of their enemy and safely conducted them beyond the limits of the Austrasian kingdom to the episcopal palace of Langres Gregory embraced his grandson with tears of joy gratefully delivered Leo with his whole family from the yoke of servitude and bestowed on him the property of a farm where he might end his days in happiness and freedom Perhaps this singular adventure which is marked with so many circumstances of truth and nature was related by Attalus himself to his cousin or nephew the first historian of the Franks Gregory of Tours[110] was born about sixty years after the death of Sidonius Apollinaris and their situation was almost similar since each of them was a native of Auvergne a senator and a bishop The difference of their style and sentiments may therefore express the decay of Gaul and clearly ascertain how much in so short a space the human mind had lost of its energy and refinement [111]

We are now qualified to despise the opposite and perhaps artful misrepresentations which have softened or exaggerated the oppression of the Romans of Gaul under the reign of the Merovingians The conquerors never promulgated any universal edict of servitude or confiscation but a degenerate people who excused their weakness by the specious names of politeness and peace was exposed to the arms and laws of the ferocious barbarians who contemptuously insulted their possessions their freedom and their safety Their personal injuries were partial and irregular but the great body of the Romans survived the revolution and still preserved the property and privileges of citizens A large portion of their lands was exacted for the use of the Franks but they enjoyed the remainder exempt from tribute [112] and the same irresistible violence which swept away the arts and manufactures of Gaul destroyed the elaborate and expensive system of Imperial despotism The provincials must frequently deplore the savage jurisprudence of the Salic or Ripuarian laws but their private life in the important concerns of marriage testaments or inheritance was still regulated by the Theodosian Code and a discontented Roman might freely aspire or descend to the title and character of a barbarian. The honours of the state were accessible to his ambition the education and temper of the Romans more peculiarly qualified them for the offices of civil government and as soon as emulation had rekindled their military ardour they were permitted to march in the ranks or even at the head of the victorious Germans I shall not attempt to enumerate the generals and magistrates whose names[113] attest the liberal policy of the Merovingians The supreme command of Burgundy with the title of Patrician, was successively intrusted to three Romans and the last and most powerful Mummolus [114] who alternately saved and disturbed the monarchy had supplanted his father in the station of count of Autun and left a treasure of thirty talents of gold and two hundred and fifty talents of silver The fierce and illiterate barbarians were excluded during several generations from the dignities and even from the orders, of the church [115] The clergy of Gaul consisted almost entirely of native provincials the haughty Franks fell prostrate at the feet of their subjects who were dignified with the episcopal character and the power and riches which had been lost in war were insensibly recovered by superstition [116] In all temporal affairs the Theodosian Code was the universal law of the clergy but the barbaric jurisprudence had liberally provided for their personal safety a subdeacon was equivalent to two Franks the antrustion and priest were held in similar estimation and the life of a bishop was appreciated far above the common standard at the price of nine hundred pieces of gold [117] The Romans communicated to their conquerors the use of the Christian religion and Latin language [118] but their language and their religion had alike degenerated from the simple purity of the Augustan and Apostolic age The progress of superstition and barbarism was rapid and universal the worship of the saints concealed from vulgar eyes the God of the Christians and the rustic dialect of peasants and soldiers was corrupted by a Teutonic idiom and pronunciation Yet such intercourse of sacred and social communion eradicated the distinctions of birth and victory and the nations of Gaul were gradually confounded under the name and government of the Franks

Gallic subjects, might have imparted the most valuable of human gifts, a spirit and system of constitutional liberty Under a king, hereditary but limited, the chiefs and counsellors might have debated at Paris in the palace of the Cæsars the adjacent field, where the emperors reviewed their mercenary legions, would have admitted the legislative assembly of freemen and warriors, and the rude model which had been sketched in the woods of Germany[119] might have been polished and improved by the civil wisdom of the Romans But the careless barbarians, secure of their personal independence, disdained the labour of government the annual assemblies of the month of March were silently abolished, and the nation was separated and almost dissolved by the conquest of Gaul [120] The monarchy was left without any regular establishment of justice, of arms, or of revenue The successors of Clovis wanted resolution to assume, or strength to exercise, the legislative and executive powers which the people had abdicated the royal prerogative was distinguished only by a more ample privilege of rapine and murder, and the love of freedom, so often invigorated and disgraced by private ambition, was reduced among the licentious Franks to the contempt of order and the desire of impunity Seventy five years after the death of Clovis, his grandson Gontran, king of Burgundy, sent an army to invade the Gothic possessions of Septimania, or Languedoc The troops of Burgundy, Berry, Auvergne, and the adjacent territories were excited by the hopes of spoil They marched without discipline under the banners of German or Gallic counts their attack was feeble and unsuccessful, but the friendly and hostile provinces were desolated with indiscriminate rage The cornfields, the villages, the churches themselves, were consumed by fire, the inhabitants were massacred or dragged into captivity, and, in the disorderly retreat, five thousand of these inhuman savages were destroyed by hunger or intestine discord When the pious Gontran reproached the guilt or neglect of their leaders, and threatened to inflict, not a legal sentence, but instant and arbitrary execution, they accused the universal and incurable corruption of the people "No one," they said, "any longer fears or respects his king, his duke, or his count Each man loves to do evil, and freely indulges his criminal inclinations The most gentle correction provokes an immediate tumult, and the rash magistrate who presumes to censure or restrain his seditious subjects seldom escapes alive from their revenge."[121] It has been reserved for the same nation to expose, by their intemperate vices, the most odious abuse of freedom, and to supply its loss by the spirit of honour and humanity which now alleviates and dignifies their obedience to an absolute sovereign

The Visigoths had resigned to Clovis the greatest part of their Gallic possessions, but their loss was amply compensated by the easy conquest and secure enjoyment of the provinces of Spain From the monarchy of the Goths, which soon involved the Suevic kingdom of Gallicia, the modern Spaniards still derive some national vanity, but the historian of the Roman empire is neither invited nor compelled to pursue the obscure and barren series of their annals [122] The Goths of Spain were separated from the rest of mankind by the lofty ridge of the Pyrenæan mountains their manners and institutions, as far as they were common to the Germanic tribes, have been already explained I have anticipated in the preceding chapter the most important of their ecclesiastical events—the fall of Arianism and the persecution of the Jews and it only remains to observe some interesting circumstances which relate to the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the Spanish kingdom

After their conversion from idolatry or heresy, the Franks and the Visigoths were disposed to embrace, with equal submission, the inherent evils and the accidental benefits of superstition But the prelates of France, long before the extinction of the Merovingian race, had degenerated into fighting and hunting barbarians They disdained the use of synods, forgot the laws of temperance and chastity, and preferred the indulgence of private ambition and luxury to the general interest of the sacerdotal profession [123] The bishops of Spain respected themselves, and were respected by the public their indissoluble union disguised their vices, and confirmed their authority, and the regular discipline of the church introduced peace, order, and stability into the government of the state From the reign of Recared, the first catholic king, to that of Witiza, the immediate predecessor of the unfortunate Roderic, sixteen national councils were successively convened The six metropolitans, Toledo, Seville, Merida, Braga, Tarragona, and Narbonne, presided according to their respective seniority, the assembly was composed of their suffragan bishops, who appeared in person or by their proxies, and a place was assigned to the most holy or opulent of the Spanish abbots During the first three days of the convocation, as long as they agitated the ecclesiastical questions of doctrine and discipline the profane laity was excluded from their debates which were conducted however with decent solemnity But on the morning of the fourth day the doors were thrown open for the entrance of the great officers of the palace the dukes and counts of the provinces the judges of the cities and the Gothic nobles and the decrees of Heaven were ratified by the consent of the people The same rules were observed in the provincial assemblies the annual synods which were empowered to hear complaints and to redress grievances and a legal government was supported by the prevailing influence of the Spanish clergy The bishops who in each revolution were prepared to flatter the victorious and to insult the prostrate laboured with diligence and success to kindle the flames of persecution and to exalt the mitre above the crown Yet the national councils of Toledo in which the free spirit of the barbarians was tempered and guided by episcopal policy have established some prudent laws for the common benefit of the king and people The vacancy of the throne was supplied by the choice of the bishops and palatines and after the failure of the line of Alaric the regal dignity was still limited to the pure and noble blood of the Goths The clergy who anointed their lawful prince always recommended and sometimes practised the duty of allegiance and the spiritual censures were denounced on the heads of the impious subjects who should resist his authority conspire against his life or violate by an indecent union the chastity even of his widow But the monarch himself when he ascended the throne was bound by a reciprocal oath to God and his people that he would faithfully execute his important trust The real or imaginary faults of his administration were subject to the control of a powerful aristocracy and the bishops and palatines were guarded by a fundamental privilege that they should not be degraded imprisoned tortured nor punished with death exile or confiscation unless by the free and public judgment of their peers [124]

One of these legislative councils of Toledo examined and ratified the code of laws which had been compiled by a succession of Gothic kings from the fierce Euric to the devout Egica As long as the Visigoths themselves were satisfied with the rude customs of their ancestors they indulged their subjects of Aquitain and Spain in the enjoyment of the Roman law Their gradual improvement in arts in policy and at length in religion encouraged them to imitate and to supersede these foreign institutions and to compose a code of civil and criminal jurisprudence for the use of a great and united people The same obligations and the same privileges were communicated to the nations of the Spanish monarchy and the conquerors insensibly renouncing the Teutonic idiom submitted to the restraints of equity and exalted the Romans to the participation of freedom. The merit of this impartial policy was enhanced by the situation of Spain under the reign of the Visigoths The provincials were long separated from their Arian masters by the irreconcilable difference of religion After the conversion of Recared had removed the prejudices of the catholics, the coasts both of the Ocean and Mediterranean were still possessed by the Eastern emperors, who secretly excited a discontented people to reject the yoke of the barbarians, and to assert the name and dignity of Roman citizens The allegiance of doubtful subjects is indeed most effectually secured by their own persuasion that they hazard more in a revolt than they can hope to obtain by a revolution but it has appeared so natural to oppress those whom we have and fear that the contrary system well deserves the praise of wisdom and moderation [125]

While the kingdoms of the Franks and Visigoths were established in Gaul and Spain the Saxons achieved the conquest of Britain the third great diocese of the præfecture of the West Since Britain was already separated from the Roman empire I might without reproach decline a story familiar to the most illiterate and obscure to the most learned of my readers The Saxons who excelled in the use of the oar or the battle axe were ignorant of the art which could alone perpetuate the fame of their exploits the provincials relapsing into barbarism neglected to describe the ruin of their country and the doubtful tradition was almost extinguished before the missionaries of Rome restored the light of science and Christianity The declamations of Gildas the fragments or fables of Nennius, the obscure hints of the Saxon laws and chronicles and the ecclesiastical tales of the venerable Bede [126] have been illustrated by the diligence, and sometimes embellished by the fancy of succeeding writers whose works I am not ambitious either to censure or to transcribe [127] Yet the historian of the empire may be tempted to pursue the revolutions of a Roman province till it vanishes from his sight and an Englishman may curiously trace the establishment of the barbarians from whom he derives his name his laws and perhaps his origin.

About forty years after the dissolution of the Roman government Vortigern appears to have obtained the supreme, though precarious, command of the princes and cities of Britain That unfortunate monarch has been almost unanimously condemned for the weak and mischievous policy of inviting[128] a formidable stranger to repel the vexatious inroads of a domestic foe His ambassadors are despatched by the gravest historians to the coast of Germany they address a pathetic oration to the general assembly of the Saxons, and those warlike barbarians resolve to assist with a fleet and army the suppliants of a distant and unknown island If Britain had indeed been unknown to the Saxons, the measure of its calamities would have been less complete But the strength of the Roman government could not always guard the maritime province against the pirates of Germany the independent and divided states were exposed to their attacks, and the Saxons might sometimes join the Scots and the Picts in a tacit or express confederacy of rapine and destruction Vortigern could only balance the various perils which assaulted on every side his throne and his people, and his policy may deserve either praise or excuse if he preferred the alliance of those barbarians whose naval power rendered them the most dangerous enemies, and the most serviceable allies Hengist and Horsa, as they ranged along the eastern coast with three ships, were engaged by the promise of an ample stipend to embrace the defence of Britain, and their intrepid valour soon delivered the country from the Caledonian invaders The Isle of Thanet, a secure and fertile district, was alloted for the residence of these German auxiliaries, and they were supplied according to the treaty with a plentiful allowance of clothing and provisions This favourable reception encouraged five thousand warriors to embark with their families in seventeen vessels, and the infant power of Hengist was fortified by this strong and seasonable reinforcement The crafty barbarian suggested to Vortigern the obvious advantage of fixing, in the neighbourhood of the Picts, a colony of faithful allies a third fleet, of forty ships, under the command of his son and nephew, sailed from Germany, ravaged the Orkneys, and disembarked a new army on the coast of Northumberland or Lothian, at the opposite extremity of the devoted land It was easy to foresee, but it was impossible to prevent, the impending evils The two nations were soon divided and exasperated by mutual jealousies The Saxons magnified all that they had done and suffered in the cause of an ungrateful people, while the Britons regretted the liberal rewards which could not satisfy the avarice of those haughty mercenaries The causes of fear and hatred were inflamed into an irreconcilable quarrel The Saxons flew to arms, and if they perpetrated a treacherous massacre during the security of a feast, they destroyed the reciprocal confidence which sustains the intercourse of peace and war[129]

Hengist, who boldly aspired to the conquest of Britain, exhorted his countrymen to embrace the glorious opportunity he painted in lively colours the fertility of the soil, the wealth of the cities, the pusillanimous temper of the natives, and the convenient situation of a spacious solitary island, accessible on all sides to the Saxon fleets The successive colonies which issued in the period of a century from the mouths of the Elbe, the Weser, and the Rhine, were principally composed of three valiant tribes or nations of Germany, the Jutes, the old Saxons, and the Angles The Jutes, who fought under the peculiar banner of Hengist, assumed the merit of leading their countrymen in the paths of glory, and of erecting in Kent the first independent kingdom The fame of the enterprise was attributed to the primitive Saxons, and the common laws and language of the conquerors are described by the national appellation of a people which, at the end of four hundred years, produced the first monarchs of South Britain The Angles were distinguished by their numbers and their success, and they claimed the honour of fixing a perpetual name on the country of which they occupied the most ample portion The barbarians, who followed the hopes of rapine either on the land or sea, were insensibly blended with this triple confederacy, the Frisians, who had been tempted by their vicinity to the British shores, might balance during a short space the strength and reputation of the native Saxons, the Danes, the Prussians, the Rugians, are faintly described, and some adventurous Huns, who had wandered as far as the Baltic, might embark on board the German vessels for the conquest of a new world[130] But this arduous achievement was not prepared or executed by the union of national powers Each intrepid chieftain, according to the measure of his fame and fortunes, assembled his followers, equipped a fleet of three or perhaps of sixty vessels, chose the place of the attack, and conducted his subsequent operations according to the events of the war and the dictates of his private interest In the invasion of Britain many heroes vanquished and fell, but only seven victorious leaders assumed, or at least maintained, the title of kings.

Seven independent thrones the Saxon Heptarchy were founded by the conquerors and seven families one of which has been continued by female succession to our present sovereign derived their equal and sacred lineage from Woden the god of war It has been pretended that this republic of kings was moderated by a general council and a supreme magistrate But such an artificial scheme of policy is repugnant to the rude and turbulent spirit of the Saxons their laws are silent and their imperfect annals afford only a dark and bloody prospect of intestine discord [131]

A monk who in the profound ignorance of human life has presumed to exercise the office of historian strangely disfigures the state of Britain at the time of its separation from the Western empire Gildas[132] describes in florid language the improvements of agriculture the foreign trade which flowed with every tide into the Thames and the Severn the solid and lofty construction of public and private edifices he accuses the sinful luxury of the British people of a people according to the same writer ignorant of the most simple arts and incapable without the aid of the Romans of providing walls of stone or weapons of iron for the defence of their native land [133] Under the long dominion of the emperors Britain had been insensibly moulded into the elegant and servile form of a Roman province whose safety was intrusted to a foreign power The subjects of Honorius contemplated their new freedom with surprise and terror they were left destitute of any civil or military constitution and their uncertain rulers wanted either skill or courage or authority to direct the public force against the common enemy The introduction of the Saxons betrayed their internal weakness and degraded the character both of the prince and people Their consternation magnified the danger the want of union diminished their resources and the madness of civil factions was more solicitous to accuse than to remedy the evils which they imputed to the misconduct of their adversaries Yet the Britons were not ignorant they could not be ignorant of the manufacture or the use of arms the successive and disorderly attacks of the Saxons allowed them to recover from their amazement and the prosperous or adverse events of the war added discipline and experience to their native valour

While the continent of Europe and Africa yielded without resistance to the barbarians the British island alone and unaided maintained a long vigorous though an unsuccessful struggle against the formidable pirates who, almost at the same instant assaulted the northern the eastern and the southern coasts The cities which had been fortified with skill were defended with resolution the advantages of ground hills forests and morasses, were diligently improved by the inhabitants the conquest of each district was purchased with blood and the defeats of the Saxons are strongly attested by the discreet silence of their annalist. Hengist might hope to achieve the conquest of Britain but his ambition in an active reign of thirty five years was confined to the possession of Kent and the numerous colony which he had planted in the North was extirpated by the sword of the Britons The monarchy of the West Saxons was laboriously founded by the persevering efforts of three martial generations The life of Cerdic, one of the bravest of the children of Woden was consumed in the conquest of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight and the loss which he sustained in the battle of Mount Badon reduced him to a state of inglorious repose. Kenric his valiant son advanced into Wiltshire besieged Salisbury at that time seated on a commanding eminence and vanquished an army which advanced to the relief of the city In the subsequent battle of Marlborough [134] his British enemies displayed their military science. Their troops were formed in three lines each line consisted of three distinct bodies and the cavalry the archers and the pikemen were distributed according to the principles of Roman tactics The Saxons charged in one weighty column boldly encountered with their short swords the long lances of the Britons and maintained an equal conflict till the approach of ni ht. Two decisive victories the death of three British kings and the reduction of Cirencester Bath, and Gloucester established the fame and power of Ceaulin the grandson of Cerdic who carried his victorious arms to the banks of the Severn.

After a war of an hundred years the independent Britons still occupied the whole extent of the western coast from the wall of Antoninus to the extreme promontory of Cornwall and the principal cities of the inland country still opposed the arms of the barbarians Resistance became more languid as the number and boldness of the assailants continually increased. Winning their way by slow and painful efforts, the Saxons the Angles and their various confederates advanced from the North, from the East and from the South till their victorious banners were united in the centre of the island. Beyond the Severn the Britons still asserted their national freedom, which survived the heptarchy, and even the monarchy of the Saxons The bravest warriors, who preferred exile to slavery, found a secure refuge in the mountains of Wales the reluctant submission of Cornwall was delayed for some ages,[135] and a band of fugitives acquired a settlement in Gaul, by their own valour, or the liberality of the Merovingian kings[136] The western angle of Armorica acquired the new appellations of Cornwall and the Lesser Britain, and the vacant lands of the Osismii were filled by a strange people, who, under the authority of their counts and bishops, preserved the laws and language of their ancestors To the feeble descendants of Clovis and Charlemagne, the Britons of Armorica refused the customary tribute, subdued the neighbouring dioceses of Vannes, Rennes, and Nantes, and formed a powerful, though vassal, state, which has been united to the crown of France[137]

In a century of perpetual, or at least implacable, war, much courage, and some skill, must have been exerted for the defence of Britain Yet if the memory of its champions is almost buried in oblivion, we need not repine, since every age, however destitute of science or virtue, sufficiently abounds with acts of blood and military renown The tomb of Vortimer, the son of Vortigern, was erected on the margin of the sea shore, as a landmark formidable to the Saxons, whom he had thrice vanquished in the fields of Kent Ambrosius Aurelian was descended from a noble family of Romans,[138] his modesty was equal to his valour, and his valour, till the last fatal action,[139] was crowned with splendid success But every British name is effaced by the illustrious name of ARTHUR,[140] the hereditary prince of the Silures, in South Wales, and the elective king or general of the nation According to the most rational account, he defeated, in twelve successive battles, the Angles of the North and the Saxons of the West but the declining age of the hero was embittered by popular ingratitude and domestic misfortunes The events of his life are less interesting than the singular revolutions of his fame During a period of five hundred years the tradition of his exploits was preserved, and rudely embellished, by the obscure bards of Wales and Armorica, who were odious to the Saxons, and unknown to the rest of mankind The pride and curiosity of the Norman conquerors prompted them to inquire into the ancient history of Britain they listened with fond credulity to the tale of Arthur, and eagerly applauded the merit of a prince who had triumphed over the Saxons, their common enemies His romance, transcribed in the Latin of Jeffrey of Monmouth, and afterwards translated into the fashionable idiom of the times, was enriched with the various, though incoherent, ornaments which were familiar to the experience, the learning, or the fancy of the twelfth century The progress of a Phrygian colony, from the Tiber to the Thames, was easily engrafted on the fable of the Æneid, and the royal ancestors of Arthur derived their origin from Troy, and claimed their alliance with the Cæsars His trophies were decorated with captive provinces and Imperial titles, and his Danish victories avenged the recent injuries of his country The gallantry and superstition of the British hero, his feasts and tournaments, and the memorable institution of his Knights of the Round Table, were faithfully copied from the reigning manners of chivalry, and the fabulous exploits of Uther's son appear less incredible than the adventures which were achieved by the enterprising valour of the Normans Pilgrimage, and the holy wars, introduced into Europe the specious miracles of Arabian magic Fairies and giants, flying dragons and enchanted palaces, were blended with the more simple fictions of the West, and the fate of Britain depended on the art, or the predictions, of Merlin Every nation embraced and adorned the popular romance of Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table their names were celebrated in Greece and Italy, and the voluminous tales of Sir Lancelot and Sir Tristram were devoutly studied by the princes and nobles who disregarded the genuine heroes and historians of antiquity At length the light of science and reason was rekindled, the talisman was broken, the visionary fabric melted into air, and by a natural, though unjust, reverse of the public opinion, the severity of the present age is inclined to question the existence of Arthur[141]

Resistance, if it cannot avert, must increase the miseries of conquest, and conquest has never appeared more dreadful and destructive than in the hands of the Saxons, who hated the valour of their enemies, disdained the faith of treaties, and violated, without remorse, the most sacred objects of the Christian worship The fields of battle might be traced, almost in every district, by monuments of bones, the fragments of falling towers were stained with blood, the last of the Britons, without distinction of age or sex, was massacred,[142] in the ruins of Anderida,[143] and the repetition of such calamities was frequent and familiar under the Saxon heptarchy The arts and religion, the laws and language, which the Romans had so carefully planted in Britain were extirpated by their barbarous successors After the destruction of the principal churches the bishops who had declined the crown of martyrdom retired with the holy relics into Wales and Armorica the remains of their flocks were left destitute of any spiritual food the practice and even the remembrance of Christianity were abolished and the British clergy might obtain some comfort from the damnation of the idolatrous strangers The kings of France maintained the privileges of their Roman subjects, but the ferocious Saxons trampled on the laws of Rome and of the emperors The proceedings of civil and criminal jurisdiction the titles of honour the forms of office the ranks of society and even the domestic rights of marriage testament and inheritance were finally suppressed and the indiscriminate crowd of noble and plebeian slaves was governed by the traditionary customs which had been coarsely framed for the shepherds and pirates of Germany The language of science of business and of conversation which had been introduced by the Romans was lost in the general desolation. A sufficient number of Latin or Celtic words might be assumed by the Germans to express their new wants and ideas [144] but those illiterate Pagans preserved and established the use of their national dialect [145] Almost every name conspicuous either in the church or state reveals its Teutonic origin [146] and the geography of England was universally inscribed with foreign characters and appellations The example of a revolution so rapid and so complete may not easily be found but it will excite a probable suspicion that the arts of Rome were less deeply rooted in Britain than in Gaul or Spain and that the native rudeness of the country and its inhabitants was covered by a thin varnish of Italian manners

This strange alteration has persuaded historians and even philosophers that the provincials of Britain were totally exterminated and that the vacant land was again peopled by the perpetual influx and rapid increase of the German colonies Three hundred thousand Saxons are said to have obeyed the summons of Hengist [147] the entire emigration of the Angles was attested in the age of Bede by the solitude of their native country [148] and our experience has shown the free propagation of the human race if they are cast on a fruitful wilderness where their steps are unconfined and their subsistence is plentiful The Saxon kingdoms displayed the face of recent discovery and cultivation the towns were small the villages were distant the husbandry was languid and unskilful four sheep were equivalent to an acre of the best land [149] an ample space of wood and morass was resigned to the vague dominion of nature and the modern bishopric of Durham the whole territory from the Tyne to the Tees had returned to its primitive state of a savage and solitary forest [150] Such imperfect population might have been supplied in some generations by the English colonies but neither reason nor facts can justify the unnatural supposition that the Saxons of Britain remained alone in the desert which they had subdued. After the sanguinary barbarians had secured their dominion and gratified their revenge it was their interest to preserve the peasants, as well as the cattle of the unresisting country In each successive revolution the patient herd becomes the property of its new masters and the salutary compact of food and labour is silently ratified by their mutual necessities Wilfrid the apostle of Sussex [151] accepted from his royal convert the gift of the peninsula of Selsey near Chichester with the persons and property of its inhabitants who then amounted to eighty seven families He released them at once from spiritual and temporal bondage and two hundred and fifty slaves of both sexes were baptised by their indulgent master The kingdom of Sussex which spread from the sea to the Thames contained seven thousand families twelve hundred were ascribed to the Isle of Wight and if we multiply this vague computation it may seem probable that England was cultivated by a million of servants or villains who were attached to the estates of their arbitrary landlords The indigent barbarians were often tempted to sell their children or themselves into perpetual and even foreign, bondage [152] yet the special exemptions which were granted to national slaves[153] sufficiently declare that they were much less numerous than the strangers and captives who had lost their liberty or changed their masters by the accidents of war When time and religion had mitigated the fierce spirit of the Anglo Saxons the laws encouraged the frequent practice of manumission and their subjects of Welsh or Cambrian extraction assumed the respectable station of inferior freemen possessed of lands, and entitled to the rights of civil society [154] Such gentle treatment might secure the allegiance of a fierce people who had been recently subdued on the confines of Wales and Cornwall The sage Ina, the legislator of Wessex united the two nations in the bands of domestic alliance and four British lords of Somersetshire may be honourably

The independent Britons appear to have relapsed into the state of original barbarism from whence they had been imperfectly reclaimed Separated by their enemies from the rest of mankind, they soon became an object of scandal and abhorrence to the catholic world [156] Christianity was still professed in the mountains of Wales, but the rude schismatics, in the form of the clerical tonsure, and in the day of the celebration of Easter, obstinately resisted the imperious mandates of the Roman pontiffs The use of the Latin language was insensibly abolished, and the Britons were deprived of the arts and learning which Italy communicated to her Saxon proselytes In Wales and Armorica, the Celtic tongue, the native idiom of the West, was preserved and propagated, and the Bards, who had been the companions of the Druids, were still protected, in the sixteenth century, by the laws of Elizabeth Their chief, a respectable officer of the courts of Pengwern, or Aberfraw, or Caermarthen, accompanied the king's servants to war the monarchy of the Britons, which he sung in the front of battle, excited their courage, and justified their depredations, and the songster claimed for his legitimate prize the fairest heifer of the spoil His subordinate ministers, the masters and disciples of vocal and instrumental music, visited, in their respective circuits, the royal, the noble, and the plebeian houses, and the public poverty, almost exhausted by the clergy, was oppressed by the importunate demands of the bards Their rank and merit were ascertained by solemn trials, and the strong belief of supernatural inspiration exalted the fancy of the poet and of his audience [157] The last retreats of Celtic freedom, the extreme territories of Gaul and Britain, were less adapted to agriculture than to pasturage the wealth of the Britons consisted in their flocks and herds, milk and flesh were their ordinary food, and bread was sometimes esteemed, or rejected as a foreign luxury Liberty had peopled the mountains of Wales and the morasses of Armorica but their populousness has been maliciously ascribed to the loose practice of polygamy and the houses of these licentious barbarians have been supposed to contain ten wives, and perhaps fifty children [158] Their disposition was rash and choleric they were bold in action and in speech,[159] and as they were ignorant of the arts of peace, they alternately indulged their passions in foreign and domestic war The cavalry of Armorica, the spearmen of Gwent, and the archers of Merioneth, were equally formidable, but their poverty could seldom procure either shields or helmets, and the inconvenient weight would have retarded the speed and agility of their desultory operations One of the greatest of the English monarchs was requested to satisfy the curiosity of a Greek emperor concerning the state of Britain, and Henry II could assert, from his personal experience, that Wales was inhabited by a race of naked warriors, who encountered, without fear, the defensive armour of their enemies [160]

By the revolution of Britain the limits of science as well as of empire were contracted The dark cloud which had been cleared by the Phœnician discoveries, and finally dispelled by the arms of Cæsar, again settled on the shores of the Atlantic, and a Roman province was again lost among the fabulous Islands of the Ocean One hundred and fifty years after the reign of Honorius the gravest historian of the times[161] describes the wonders of a remote isle, whose eastern and western parts are divided by an antique wall, the boundary of life and death, or, more properly, of truth and fiction The east is a fair country, inhabited by a civilised people the air is healthy, the waters are pure and plentiful, and the earth yields her regular and fruitful increase In the west, beyond the wall, the air is infectious and mortal, the ground is covered with serpents, and this dreary solitude is the region of departed spirits, who are transported from the opposite shores in substantial boats and by living rowers Some families of fishermen, the subjects of the Franks, are excused from tribute, in consideration of the mysterious office which is performed by these Charons of the ocean Each in his turn is summoned, at the hour of midnight, to hear the voices, and even the names, of the ghosts he is sensible of their weight, and he feels himself impelled by an unknown, but irresistible, power After this dream of fancy, we read with astonishment that the name of this island is Brittia that it lies in the ocean, against the mouth of the Rhine, and less than thirty miles from the continent, that it is possessed by three nations, the Frisians, the Angles and the Britons, and that some Angles had appeared at Constantinople in the train of the French ambassadors From these ambassadors Procopius might be informed of a singular, though not improbable, adventure, which announces the spirit, rather than the delicacy, of an English heroine She had been betrothed to Radiger, king of the Varni, a tribe of Germans who touched the ocean and the Rhine, but the perfidious lover was tempted, by motives of policy to prefer his father's widow the sister of Theodebert king of the Franks [162] The forsaken princess of the Angles instead of bewailing revenged her disgrace Her warlike subjects are said to have been ignorant of the use and even of the form of a horse but she boldly sailed from Britain to the mouth of the Rhine with a fleet of four hundred ships and an army of one hundred thousand men After the loss of a battle the captive Radiger implored the mercy of his victorious bride who generously pardoned his offence dismissed her rival and compelled the king of the Varni to discharge with honour and fidelity the duties of a husband [163] This gallant exploit appears to be the last naval enterprise of the Anglo Saxons The arts of navigation by which they had acquired the empire of Britain and of the sea were soon neglected by the indolent barbarians who supinely renounced all the commercial advantages of their insular situation Seven independent kingdoms were agitated by perpetual discord and the British world was seldom connected either in peace or war, with the nations of the continent [164]

I have now accomplished the laborious narrative of the decline and fall of the Roman empire from the fortunate age of Trajan and the Antonines to its total extinction in the West about five centuries after the Christian era At that unhappy period the Saxons fiercely struggled with the natives for the possession of Britain Gaul and Spain were divided between the powerful monarchies of the Franks and Visigoths and the dependent kingdoms of the Suevi and Burgundians Africa was exposed to the cruel persecution of the Vandals and the savage insults of the Moors Pome and Italy as far as the banks of the Danube were afflicted by an army of barbarian mercenaries whose lawless tyranny was succeeded by the reign of Theodoric the Ostrogoth All the subjects of the empire who by the use of the Latin language, more particularly deserved the name and privileges of Romans were oppressed by the disgrace and calamities of foreign conquest and the victorious nations of Germany established a new system of manners and government in the western countries of Europe The majesty of Rome was faintly represented by the princes of Constantinople the feeble and imaginary successors of Augustus Yet they continued to reign over the East from the Danube to the Nile a d Tigris the Gothic and Vandal kingdoms of Italy and Africa were subverted by the arms of Justinian and the history of the Greek emperors may still afford a long series of instructive lessons and interesting revolutions

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE IN THE WEST

THE Greeks after their country had been reduced into a province imputed the triumphs of Rome not to the merit but to the FORTUNE of the republic The inconstant goddess who so blindly distributes and resumes her favours had now consented (such was the language of envious flattery) to resign her wings to descend from her globe and to fix her firm and immutable throne on the banks of the Tiber [1] A wiser Greek who has composed with a philosophic spirit the memorable history of his own times deprived his countrymen of this vain and delusive comfort by opening to their view the deep foundations of the greatness of Rome [2] The fidelity of the citizens to each other and to the state was confirmed by the habits of education and the prejudices of religion Honour as well as virtue was the principle of the republic the ambitious citizens laboured to deserve the solemn glories of a triumph and the ardour of the Roman youth was kindled into active emulation as often as they beheld the domestic images of their ancestors [3] The temperate struggles of the patricians and plebeians had finally established the firm and equal balance of the constitution which united the freedom of popular assemblies with the authority and wisdom of a senate and the executive powers of a regal magistrate When the consul displayed the standard of the republic each citizen bound himself by the obligation of an oath to draw his sword in the cause of his country till he had discharged the sacred duty by a military service of ten years. This wise institution continually poured into the field the rising generations of freemen and soldiers and their numbers were reinforced by the warlike and populous states of Italy who after a brave resistance had yielded to the valour and embraced the alliance of the Romans The sage historian who excited the virtue of the younger Scipio and beheld the ruin of Carthage,[4] has accurately described their military system their levies, arms, exercises, subordination, marches, encampments, and the invincible legion, superior in active strength to the Macedonian phalanx of Philip and Alexander From these institutions of peace and war Polybius has deduced the spirit and success of a people incapable of fear and impatient of repose The ambitious design of conquest, which might have been defeated by the seasonable conspiracy of mankind, was attempted and achieved, and the perpetual violation of justice was maintained by the political virtues of prudence and courage The arms of the republic, sometimes vanquished in battle, always victorious in war, advanced with rapid steps to the Euphrates, the Danube, the Rhine, and the Ocean, and the images of gold, or silver, or brass, that might serve to represent the nations and their kings, were successively broken by the iron monarchy of Rome.[6]

The rise of a city, which swelled into an empire, may deserve, as a singular prodigy, the reflection of a philosophic mind But the decline of Rome was the natural and inevitable effect of immoderate greatness Prosperity ripened the principle of decay, the causes of destruction multiplied with the extent of conquest, and as soon as time or accident had removed the artificial supports, the stupendous fabric yielded to the pressure of its own weight The story of its ruin is simple and obvious, and instead of inquiring why the Roman empire was destroyed, we should rather be surprised that it had subsisted so long The victorious legions, who, in distant wars, acquired the vices of strangers and mercenaries, first oppressed the freedom of the republic, and afterwards violated the majesty of the purple The emperors, anxious for their personal safety and the public peace, were reduced to the base expedient of corrupting the discipline which rendered them alike formidable to their sovereign and to the enemy, the vigour of the military government was relaxed and finally dissolved by the partial institutions of Constantine, and the Roman world was overwhelmed by a deluge of barbarians

The decay of Rome has been frequently ascribed to the translation of the seat of empire, but this history has already shown that the powers of Government were divided rather than removed The throne of Constantinople was erected in the East, while the West was still possessed by a series of emperors who held their residence in Italy, and claimed their equal inheritance of the legions and provinces This dangerous novelty impaired the strength and fomented the vices of a double reign the instruments of an oppressive and arbitrary system were multiplied, and a vain emulation of luxury, not of merit, was introduced and supported between the degenerate successors of Theodosius Extreme distress, which unites the virtue of a free people, embitters the factions of a declining monarchy The hostile favourites of Arcadius and Honorius betrayed the republic to its common enemies, and the Byzantine court beheld with indifference, perhaps with pleasure, the disgrace of Rome, the misfortunes of Italy, and the loss of the West Under the succeeding reigns the alliance of the two empires was restored, but the aid of the Oriental Romans was tardy, doubtful, and ineffectual, and the national schism of the Greeks and Latins was enlarged by the perpetual difference of language and manners, of interests, and even of religion Yet the salutary event approved in some measure the judgment of Constantine During a long period of decay his impregnable city repelled the victorious armies of barbarians, protected the wealth of Asia, and commanded, both in peace and war, the important straits which connect the Euxine and Mediterranean seas The foundation of Constantinople more essentially contributed to the preservation of the East than to the ruin of the West

As the happiness of a future life is the great object of religion, we may hear without surprise or scandal that the introduction, or at least the abuse of Christianity, had some influence on the decline and fall of the Roman empire. The clergy successfully preached the doctrines of patience and pusillanimity, the active virtues of society were discouraged, and the last remains of military spirit were buried in the cloister a large portion of public and private wealth was consecrated to the specious demands of charity and devotion, and the soldiers' pay was lavished on the useless multitudes of both sexes who could only plead the merits of abstinence and chastity Faith, zeal, curiosity, and more earthly passions of malice and ambition, kindled the flame of theological discord, the church, and even the state, were distracted by religious factions, whose conflicts were sometimes bloody and always implacable, the attention of the emperors was diverted from camps to synods, the Roman world was oppressed by a new species of tyranny, and the persecuted sects became the secret enemies of their country Yet party-spirit, however pernicious or absurd, is a principle of union as well as of dissension The bishops, from eighteen hundred pulpits, inculcated the duty of passive obedience to a lawful and orthodox sovereign their frequent assemblies and perpetual correspondence maintained the communion of distant churches and the benevolent temper of the Gospel was strengthened though confirmed by the spiritual alliance of the catholics The sacred indolence of the monks was devoutly embraced by a servile and effeminate age but if superstition had not afforded a decent retreat the same vices would have tempted the unworthy Romans to desert from baser motives the standard of the republic. Religious precepts are easily obeyed which indulge and sanctify the natural inclinations of their votaries but the pure and genuine influence of Christianity may be traced in its beneficial though imperfect effects on the barbarian proselytes of the North. If the decline of the Roman empire was hastened by the conversion of Constantine his victorious religion broke the violence of the fall and mollified the ferocious temper of the conquerors

This awful revolution may be usefully applied to the instruction of the present age It is the duty of a patriot to prefer and promote the exclusive interest and glory of his native country but a philosopher may be permitted to enlarge his views and to consider Europe as one great republic whose various inhabitants have attained almost the same level of politeness and cultivation The balance of power will continue to fluctuate and the prosperity of our own or the neighbouring kingdoms may be alternately exalted or depressed but these partial events cannot essentially injure our general state of happiness the system of arts and laws and manners which so advantageously distinguish above the rest of mankind the Europeans and their colonies The savage nations of the globe are the common enemies of civilised society and we may inquire with anxious curiosity whether Europe is still threatened with a repetition of those calamities which formerly oppressed the arms and institutions of Rome Perhaps the same reflections will illustrate the fall of that mighty empire and explain the probable causes of our actual security

I The Romans were ignorant of the extent of their dangers and the number of their enemies Beyond the Rhine and Danube the northern countries of Europe and Asia were filled with innumerable tribes of hunters and shepherds poor voracious and turbulent bold in arms and impatient to ravish the fruits of industry The barbarian world was agitated by the rapid impulse of war and the peace of Gaul or Italy was shaken by the distant revolutions of China The Huns who fled before a victorious enemy directed their march towards the West and the torrent was swelled by the gradual accession of captives and allies The flying tribes who yielded to the Huns assumed in their turn the spirit of conquest the endless column of barbarians pressed on the Roman empire with accumulated weight and if the foremost were destroyed, the vacant space was instantly replenished by new assailants Such formidable emigrations no longer issue from the North and the long repose which has been imputed to the decrease of population is the happy consequence of the progress of arts and agriculture Instead of some rude villages thinly scattered among its woods and morasses Germany now produces a list of two thousand three hundred walled towns the Christian kingdoms of Denmark Sweden and Poland have been successively established and the Hanse merchants with the Teutonic knights, have extended their colonies along the coast of the Baltic as far as the Gulf of Finland. From the Gulf of Finland to the Eastern Ocean Russia now assumes the form of a powerful and civilised empire The plough the loom and the forge are introduced on the banks of the Volga, the Oby and the Lena and the fiercest of the Tartar hordes have been taught to tremble and obey The reign of independent barbarism is now contracted to a narrow span and the remnant of Calmucks or Uzbecks whose forces may be almost numbered cannot seriously excite the apprehensions of the great republic of Europe.[1] Yet this apparent security should not tempt us to forget that new enemies and unknown dangers may possibly arise from some obscure people scarcely visible in the map of the world. The Arabs or Saracens who spread their conquests from India to Spain had languished in poverty and contempt till Mahomet breathed into those savage bodies the soul of enthusiasm.

II The empire of Rome was firmly established by the singular and perfect coalition of its members The subject nations resigning the hope and even the wish of independence embraced the character of Roman citizens and the provinces of the West were reluctantly torn by the barbarians from the bosom of their mother country [7] But this union was purchased by the loss of national freedom and military spirit and the servile provinces destitute of life and motion expected their safety from the mercenary troops and governors who were directed by the orders of a distant court The happiness of an hundred millions depended on the personal merit of one or two men perhaps children whose minds were corrupted by education, luxury, and despotic power The deepest wounds were inflicted on the empire during the minorities of the sons and grandsons of Theodosius, and, after those incapable princes seemed to attain the age of manhood, they abandoned the church to the bishops, the state to the eunuchs, and the provinces to the barbarians Europe is now divided into twelve powerful, though unequal kingdoms, three respectable commonwealths, and a variety of smaller, though independent states the chances of royal and ministerial talent are multiplied, at least, with the number of its rulers, and a Julian, or Semiramis, may reign in the North, while Arcadius and Honorius again slumber on the thrones of the South The abuses of tyranny are restrained by the mutual influence of fear and shame, republics have acquired order and stability, monarchies have imbibed the principles of freedom, or, at least, of moderation, and some sense of honour and justice is introduced into the most defective constitutions by the general manners of the times In peace, the progress of knowledge and industry is accelerated by the emulation of so many active rivals in war, the European forces are exercised by temperate and undecisive contests If a savage conqueror should issue from the deserts of Tartary, he must repeatedly vanquish the robust peasants of Russia, the numerous armies of Germany, the gallant nobles of France, and the intrepid freemen of Britain, who, perhaps, might confederate for their common defence Should the victorious barbarians carry slavery and desolation as far as the Atlantic Ocean, ten thousand vessels would transport beyond their pursuit the remains of civilised society, and Europe would revive and flourish in the American world, which is already filled with her colonies and institutions [8]

III Cold, poverty, and a life of danger and fatigue fortify the strength and courage of barbarians In every age they have oppressed the polite and peaceful nations of China, India, and Persia, who neglected, and still neglect, to counterbalance these natural powers by the resources of military art The warlike states of antiquity, Greece, Macedonia, and Rome, educated a race of soldiers, exercised their bodies, disciplined their courage, multiplied their forces by regular evolutions, and converted the iron which they possessed into strong and serviceable weapons But this superiority insensibly declined with their laws and manners and the feeble policy of Constantine and his successors armed and instructed, for the ruin of the empire, the rude valour of the barbarian mercenaries The military art has been changed by the invention of gunpowder, which enables man to command the two most powerful agents of nature, air and fire Mathematics, chemistry, mechanics, architecture, have been applied to the service of war, and the adverse parties oppose to each other the most elaborate modes of attack and of defence Historians may indignantly observe that the preparations of a siege would found and maintain a flourishing colony,[9] yet we cannot be displeased that the subversion of a city should be a work of cost and difficulty, or that an industrious people should be protected by those arts which survive and supply the decay of military virtue Cannon and fortifications now form an impregnable barrier against the Tartar horse, and Europe is secure from any future irruption of barbarians, since, before they can conquer, they must cease to be barbarous Their gradual advances in the science of war would always be accompanied, as we may learn from the example of Russia, with a proportionable improvement in the arts of peace and civil policy, and they themselves must deserve a place among the polished nations whom they subdue.

Should these speculations be found doubtful or fallacious, there still remains a more humble source of comfort and hope The discoveries of ancient and modern navigators, and the domestic history or tradition of the most enlightened nations, represent the human savage naked both in mind and body, and destitute of laws, of arts, of ideas, and almost of language [10] From this abject condition, perhaps the primitive and universal state of man, he has gradually arisen to command the animals, to fertilise the earth, to traverse the ocean, and to measure the heavens His progress in the improvement and exercise of his mental and corporeal faculties[11] has been irregular and various, infinitely slow in the beginning, and increasing by degrees with redoubled velocity ages of laborious ascent have been followed by a moment of rapid downfall, and the several climates of the globe have felt the vicissitudes of light and darkness Yet the experience of four thousand years should enlarge our hopes and diminish our apprehensions we cannot determine to what height the human species may aspire in their advance towards perfection, but it may safely be presumed that no people, unless the face of nature is changed, will relapse into their original barbarism The improvements of society may be viewed under a threefold aspect 1 The poet or philosopher illustrates his age and country by the efforts

single mind but these superior powers of reason or fancy are rare and spontaneous productions and the genius of Homer or Cicero or Newton would excite less admiration if they could be created by the will of a prince or the lessons of a preceptor 2 The benefits of law and policy of trade and manufactures of arts and sciences are more solid and permanent and many individuals may be qualified by education and discipline to promote in their respective stations the interest of the community But this general order is the effect of skill and labour and the complex machinery may be decayed by time or injured by violence 3 Fortunately for mankind the more useful or at least more necessary arts can be performed without superior talents or national subordination without powers of one or the union of many Each village each family, each individual must always possess both ability and inclination to perpetuate the use of fire[12] and of metals the propagation and service of domestic animals the methods of hunting and fishing the rudiments of navigation the imperfect cultivation of corn or other nutritive grain and the simple practice of the mechanic trades Private genius and public industry may be extirpated but these hardy plants survive the tempest and strike an everlasting root into the most unfavourable soil The splendid days of Augustus and Trajan were eclipsed by a cloud of ignorance and the barbarians subverted the laws and palaces of Rome But the scythe the invention or emblem of Saturn [13] still continued annually to mow the harvests of Italy and the human feasts of the Læstrigons[14] have never been renewed on the coast of Campania

Since the first discovery of the arts war commerce and religious zeal have diffused among the savages of the Old and New World these inestimable gifts they have been successively propagated they can never be lost We may therefore acquiesce in the pleasing conclusion that every age of the world has increased and still increases the real wealth the happiness, the knowledge and perhaps the virtue of the human race [15]

CHAPTER XXXIX

Zeno and Anastasius, Emperors of the East Birth, Education, and First Exploits of Theodoric the Ostrogoth His Invasion and Conquest of Italy The Gothic Kingdom of Italy State of the West Military and Civil Government The Senator Boethius Last Acts and Death of Theodoric

AFTER the fall of the Roman empire in the West, an interval of fifty years till the memorable reign of Justinian is faintly marked by the obscure names and imperfect annals of Zeno Anastasius and Justin who successively ascended the throne of Constantinople. During the same period Italy revived and flourished under the government of a Gothic king who might have deserved a statue among the best and bravest of the ancient Romans

Theodoric the Ostrogoth, the fourteenth in lineal descent of the royal line of the Amali [1] was born in the neighbourhood of Vienna[2] two years after the death of Attila. A recent victory had restored the independence of the Ostgoths and the three brothers Walamir Theodemir and Widimir who ruled that warlike nation with united counsels had separately pitched their habitations in the fertile t igh desolate province of Pannonia. The threatened their revolted subjects hasty attack was repelled by the sing

Walamir and the news of his victory reached the distant camp of his brother in the same auspicious moment that the favourite concubine of Theodemir was delivered of a son and heir In the eighth year of his age Theodoric was reluctantly yielded by his father to the public interest as the pledge of an alliance which Leo emperor of the East had consented to purchase by an annual subsidy of three hundred pounds of gold The royal hostage was educated at Constantinople with care and ness His body was formed to all the ex var his mind by the ha l conversa- ted the e most disd lected so l ie that e te n e th

dence Walamir had fallen in battle, the youngest of the brothers, Widimir, had led away into Italy and Gaul an army of barbarians, and the whole nation acknowledged for their king the father of Theodoric His ferocious subjects admired the strength and stature of their young prince,[4] and he soon convinced them that he had not degenerated from the valour of his ancestors At the head of six thousand volunteers he secretly left the camp in quest of adventures, descended the Danube as far as Singidunum or Belgrade, and soon returned to his father with the spoils of a Sarmatian king whom he had vanquished and slain Such triumphs, however, were productive only of fame, and the invincible Ostrogoths were reduced to extreme distress by the want of clothing and food They unanimously resolved to desert their Pannonian encampments, and boldly to advance into the warm and wealthy neighbourhood of the Byzantine court, which already maintained in pride and luxury so many bands of confederate Goths After proving, by some acts of hostility, that they could be dangerous, or at least troublesome, enemies, the Ostrogoths sold at a high price their reconciliation and fidelity, accepted a donative of lands and money, and were intrusted with the defence of the lower Danube under the command of Theodoric, who succeeded after his father's death to the hereditary throne of the Amali [5]

An hero, descended from a race of kings, must have despised the base Isaurian who was invested with the Roman purple, without any endowments of mind or body, without any advantages of royal birth or superior qualifications After the failure of the Theodosian line, the choice of Pulcheria and of the senate might be justified in some measure by the characters of Marcian and Leo, but the latter of these princes confirmed and dishonoured his reign by the perfidious murder of Aspar and his sons, who too rigorously exacted the debt of gratitude and obedience The inheritance of Leo and of the East was peaceably devolved on his infant grandson, the son of his daughter Ariadne, and her Isaurian husband, the fortunate Trascalisseus, exchanged that barbarous sound for the Grecian appellation of Zeno After the decease of the elder Leo, he approached with unnatural respect the throne of his son, humbly received as a gift the second rank in the empire, and soon excited the public suspicion on the sudden and premature death of his young colleague, whose life could no longer promote the success of his ambition But the palace of Constantinople was ruled by female influence, and agitated by female passions, and Verina, the widow of Leo, claiming his empire as her own, pronounced a sentence of deposition against the worthless and ungrateful servant on whom she alone had bestowed the sceptre of the East [6] As soon as she sounded a revolt in the ears of Zeno, he fled with precipitation into the mountains of Isauria, and her brother Basiliscus, already infamous by his African expedition,[7] was unanimously proclaimed by the servile senate But the reign of the usurper was short and turbulent Basiliscus presumed to assassinate the lover of his sister, he dared to offend the lover of his wife, the vain and insolent Harmatius, who, in the midst of Asiatic luxury, affected the dress, the demeanour, and the surname of Achilles [8] By the conspiracy of the malcontents, Zeno was recalled from exile, the armies, the capital, the person of Basiliscus, were betrayed, and his whole family was condemned to the long agony of cold and hunger by the inhuman conqueror, who wanted courage to encounter or to forgive his enemies The haughty spirit of Verina was still incapable of submission or repose She provoked the enmity of a favourite general, embraced his cause as soon as he was disgraced, created a new emperor in Syria and Egypt, raised an army of seventy thousand men, and persisted to the last moment of her life in a fruitless rebellion, which, according to the fashion of the age, had been predicted by Christian hermits and Pagan magicians While the East was afflicted by the passions of Verina, her daughter Ariadne was distinguished by the female virtues of mildness and fidelity, she followed her husband in his exile, and after his restoration she implored his clemency in favour of her mother On the decease of Zeno, Ariadne, the daughter, the mother, and the widow of an emperor, gave her hand and the Imperial title to Anastasius, an aged domestic of the palace, who survived his elevation above twenty-seven years, and whose character is attested by the acclamation of the people, "Reign as you have lived!"[9]

Whatever fear or affection could bestow was profusely lavished by Zeno on the king of the Ostrogoths, the rank of patrician and consul the command of the Palatine troops, an equestrian statue, a treasure in gold and silver of many thousand pounds, the name of son, and the promise of a rich and honourable wife As long as Theodoric condescended to serve he supported with courage and fidelity the cause of his benefactor, his rapid march contributed to the restoration of Zeno, and in the second reof human affairs had granted to one of the descendants of Attila Sabinian a general illustrious by his own and father's merit advanced at the head of ten thousand Romans and the provisions and arms which filled a long train of waggons were distributed to the fiercest of the Bulgarian tribes But in the fields of Margus the Eastern powers were defeated by the inferior forces of the Goths and Huns the flower and even the hope of the Roman armies was irretrievably destroyed and such was the temperance with which Theodoric had inspired his victorious troops that as their leader had not given the signal of pillage the rich spoils of the enemy lay untouched at their feet [45] Exasperated by this disgrace the Byzantine court despatched two hundred ships and eight thousand men to plunder the sea coast of Calabria and Apulia they assaulted the ancient city of Tarentum interrupted the trade and agriculture of a happy country and sailed back to the Hellespont proud of their piratical victory over a people whom they still presumed to consider as their Roman brethren [46] Their retreat was possibly hastened by the activity of Theodoric Italy was covered by a fleet of a thousand light vessels [47] which he constructed with incredible despatch and his firm moderation was soon rewarded by a solid and honourable peace He maintained with a powerful hand the balance of the West till it was at length overthrown by the ambition of Clovis and although unable to assist his rash and unfortunate kinsman the king of the Visigoths he saved the remains of his family and people and checked the Franks in the midst of their victorious career I am not desirous to prolong or repeat[48] this narrative of military events the least interesting of the reign of Theodoric and shall be content to add that the Alemanni were protected [49] that an inroad of the Burgundians was severely chastised and that the conquest of Arles and Marseilles opened a free communication with the Visigoths who revered him both as their national protector and as the guardian of his grandchild the infant son of Alaric. Under this respectable character the king of Italy restored the Prætorian præfecture of the Gauls reformed some abuses in the civil government of Spain and accepted the annual tribute and apparent submission of its military governor who wisely refu ed to trust his person in the palace of Ravenna [50] The Gothic sovereignty was established from Sicily to the Danube from Sirmium or Belgrade to the Atlantic Ocean and the Greeks themselves have acknowledged that Theodoric reigned over the fairest portion of the Western empire.[51]

The union of the Goths and Romans might have fixed for ages the transient happiness of Italy and the first of nations a new people of free subjects and enlightened soldiers might have gradually arisen from the mutual emulation of their respective virtues But the sublime merit of guiding or seconding such a revolution was not reserved for the reign of Theodoric h wanted either the genius or the opportunities of a legislator [52] and while he indulged the Goths in the enjoyment of rude liberty he servilely copied the institutions and even the abuses, of the political system which had been framed by Constantine and his successors From a tender regard to the expiring prejudices of Rome the barbarian declined the name the purple and the diadem of the emperors but he assumed under the hereditary title of king the whole substance and plenitude of Imperial prerogative [53] His addresses to the Eastern throne were respectful and ambiguous he celebrated in pompous style the harmony of the two republics applauded his own government as the perfect similitude of a sole and undivided empire, and claimed above the kings of the earth the same pre eminence which he modestly allowed to the person or rank of Anastasius The alliance of the East and West was annually declared by the unanimous choice of two consuls but it should seem that the Italian candidate who was named by Theodoric accepted a formal confirmation from the sovereign of Constantinople [54] The Gothic palace of Ravenna reflected the image of the court of Theodosius or Valentinian The Prætorian præfect, the præfect of Rome the quæstor the master of the offices with the public and patrimonial treasurers whose functions are painted in gaudy colours by the rhetoric of Cassiodorus still continued to act as the ministers of state. And the subordinate care of justice and the revenue was delegated to seven consulars three correctors, and five presidents who governed the fifteen regions of Italy according to the principles and even the forms of Roman jurisprudence [55] The violence of the conquerors was abated or eluded by the slow artifice of judicial proceedings the civil administration with its honours and emoluments was confined to the Italians and the people still preserved their dress and language their laws and customs their personal freedom, and two thirds of their landed property It had been the object of Augustus to conceal the introduction of monarchy it wa the policy of Theodoric to disguise the reign of a barbarian.[56]

If his subjects were sometimes awakened from this pleasing vision of a Roman government, they derived more substantial comfort from the character of a Gothic prince who had penetration to discern, and firmness to pursue, his own and the public interest Theodoric loved the virtues which he possessed, and the talents of which he was destitute Liberius was promoted to the office of Prætorian præfect for his unshaken fidelity to the unfortunate cause of Odoacer The ministers of Theodoric, Cassiodorus,[57] and Boethius, have reflected on his reign the lustre of their genius and learning More prudent or more fortunate than his colleague, Cassiodorus preserved his own esteem without forfeiting the royal favour, and after passing thirty years in the honours of the world, he was blessed with an equal term of repose in the devout and studious solitude of Squillace

As the patron of the republic, it was the interest and duty of the Gothic king to cultivate the affections of the senate[58] and people The nobles of Rome were flattered by sonorous epithets and formal professions of respect, which had been more justly applied to the merit and authority of their ancestors The people enjoyed, without fear or danger, the three blessings of a capital, order, plenty, and public amusements A visible diminution of their numbers may be found even in the measure of liberality,[59] yet Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily poured their tribute of corn into the granaries of Rome, an allowance of bread and meat was distributed to the indigent citizens, and every office was deemed honourable which was consecrated to the care of their health and happiness The public games, such as a Greek ambassador might politely applaud, exhibited a faint and feeble copy of the magnificence of the Cæsars, yet the musical, the gymnastic, and the pantomime arts, had not totally sunk in oblivion, the wild beasts of Africa still exercised in the amphitheatre the courage and dexterity of the hunters, and the indulgent Goth either patiently tolerated or gently restrained the blue and green factions, whose contests so often filled the circus with clamour, and even with blood [60] In the seventh year of his peaceful reign, Theodoric visited the old capital of the world, the senate and people advanced in solemn procession to salute a second Trajan, a new Valentinian, and he nobly supported that character, by the assurance of a just and legal government,[61] in a discourse which he was not afraid to pronounce in public and to inscribe on a tablet of brass Rome, in this august ceremony, shot a last ray of declining glory, and a saint, the spectator of this pompous scene, could only hope, in his pious fancy, that it was excelled by the celestial splendour of the New Jerusalem [62] During a residence of six months, the fame, the person, and the courteous demeanour of the Gothic king excited the admiration of the Romans, and he contemplated, with equal curiosity and surprise, the monuments that remained of their ancient greatness He imprinted the footsteps of a conqueror on the Capitoline hill, and frankly confessed that each day he viewed with fresh wonder the Forum of Trajan and his lofty column The theatre of Pompey appeared, even in its decay, as a huge mountain, artificially hollowed and polished, and adorned by human industry, and he vaguely computed that a river of gold must have been drained to erect the colossal amphitheatre of Titus [63] From the mouths of fourteen aqueducts a pure and copious stream was diffused into every part of the city, among these the Claudian water, which arose at the distance of thirty-eight miles in the Sabine mountains, was conveyed along a gentle though constant declivity of solid arches till it descended on the summit of the Aventine hill The long and spacious vaults which had been constructed for the purpose of common sewers subsisted after twelve centuries in their pristine strength, and these subterraneous channels have been preferred to all the visible wonders of Rome [64] The Gothic kings, so injuriously accused of the ruin of antiquity, were anxious to preserve the monuments of the nation whom they had subdued [65] The royal edicts were framed to prevent the abuses, the neglect, or the depredations of the citizens themselves, and a professed architect, the annual sum of two hundred pounds of gold, twenty five thousand tiles, and the receipt of customs from the Lucrine port, were assigned for the ordinary repairs of the walls and public edifices A similar care was extended to the statues of metal or marble of men or animals The spirit of the horses which have given a modern name to the Quirinal was applauded by the barbarians [66] the brazen elephants of the Via sacra were diligently restored,[67] the famous heifer of Myron deceived the cattle, as they were driven through the forum of peace,[68] and an officer was created to protect those works of art, which Theodoric considered as the noblest ornament of his kingdom

After the example of the last emperors Theodoric preferred the residence of Ravenna, where he cultivated an orchard with his own hands [69] As often as the peace of his kingdom was threat-

who already meditated the extirpation of heresy and the conquest of Italy and Africa A rigorous law which was published at Constantinople to reduce the Arians by the dread of punishment within the pale of the church awakened the just resentment of Theodoric who claimed for his distressed brethren of the East the same indulgence which he had so long granted to the catholics of his dominions At his stern command the Roman pontiff with four illustrious senators embarked on an embassy of which he must have alike dreaded the failure or the success The singular veneration shown to the first pope who had visited Constantinople was punished as a crime by this jealous monarch the artful or peremptory refusal of the Byzantine court might excuse an equal and would provoke a larger measure of retaliation and a mandate was prepared in Italy to prohibit after a stated day the exercise of the catholic worship By the bigotry of his subjects and enemies the most tolerant of princes was driven to the brink of persecution and the life of Theodoric was too long since he lived to condemn the virtue of Boethius and Symmachus [88]

The senator Boethius[89] is the last of the Romans whom Cato or Tully could have acknowledged for their countrymen As a wealthy orphan he inherited the patrimony and honours of the Anician family a name ambitiously assumed by the kings and emperors of the age and the appellation of Manlius asserted his genuine or fabulous descent from a race of consuls and dictators who had repulsed the Gauls from the Capitol and sacrificed their sons to the discipline of the republic In the youth of a Boethius the studies of Rome were not totally abandoned a Virgil[90] is now extant corrected by the hand of a consul and the professors of grammar rhetoric and jurisprudence were maintained in their privileges and pensions by the liberality of the Goths But the erudition of the Latin language was insufficient to satiate his ardent curiosity and Boethius is said to have employed eighteen laborious years in the schools of Athens [91] which were supported by the zeal the learning and the diligence of Proclus and his disciples The reason and piety of their Roman pupil were fortunately saved from the contagion of mystery and magic which polluted the groves of the Academy but he imbibed the spirit and imitated the method of his dead and living masters who attempted to reconcile the strong and subtle sense of Aristotle with the devout contemplation and sublime fancy of Plato After his return to Rome and his marriage with the daughter of his friend the patrician Symmachus Boethius still continued in a palace of ivory and marble to prosecute the same studies [92] The church was edified by his profound defence of the orthodox creed against the Arian, the Eutychian and the Nestorian heresies and the catholic unity was explained or exposed in a formal treatise by the indifference of three distinct though consubstantial persons For the benefit of his Latin readers his genius submitted to teach the first elements of the arts and sciences of Greece The geometry of Euclid the music of Pythagoras the arithmetic of Nicomachus the mechanics of Archimedes the astronomy of Ptolemy the theology of Plato and the logic of Aristotle with the commentary of Porphyry were translated and illustrated by the indefatigable pen of the Roman senator And he alone was esteemed capable of describing the wonders of art a sun-dial a water clock or a sphere which represented the motions of the planets. From these abstruse speculations Boethius stooped—or to speak more truly he rose—to the social duties of public and private life the indigent were relieved by his liberality and his eloquence which flattery might compare to the voice of Demosthenes of Cicero was uniformly exerted in the cause of innocence and humanity Such conspicuous merit was felt and rewarded by a discerning prince the dignity of Boethius was adorned with the titles of consul and patrician and his talents were usefully employed in the important station of master of the offices Notwithstanding the equal claims of the East and West his two sons were created in their tender youth the consuls of the same year [93] On the memorable day of their inauguration they proceeded in solemn pomp from their palace to the Forum amidst the applause of the senate and people and their joyful father the true consul of Rome after pronouncing an oration in the praise of his royal benefactor distributed a triumphal largess in the games of the circus Prosperous in his fame and fortunes in his public honours and private alliances in the cultivation of science and consciousness of virtue Boethius might have been styled happy if that precarious epithet could be safely applied before the last term of the life of man

A philosopher liberal of his wealth and parsimonious of his time might be insensible to the common allurements of ambition the thirst of gold and employment And some credit may be due to the asseveration of Boethius that he had reluctantly obeyed the divine Plato who enjoins every virtuous citizen to rescue the state from the usurpation of vice and ignorance For the integrity of his public conduct he appeals to the memory of his country His authority has restrained the pride and oppression of the royal officers, and his eloquence had delivered Paulianus from the dogs of the palace He had always pitied, and often relieved, the distress of the provincials, whose fortunes were exhausted by public and private rapine, and Boethius alone had courage to oppose the tyranny of the barbarians, elated by conquest, excited by avarice, and, as he complains, encouraged by impunity In these honourable contests his spirit soared above the consideration of danger, and perhaps of prudence, and we may learn from the example of Cato that a character of pure and inflexible virtue is the most apt to be misled by prejudice, to be heated by enthusiasm, and to confound private enmities with public justice The disciple of Plato might exaggerate the infirmities of nature and the imperfections of society, and the mildest form of a Gothic kingdom, even the weight of allegiance and gratitude, must be insupportable to the free spirit of a Roman patriot But the favour and fidelity of Boethius declined in just proportion with the public happiness, and an unworthy colleague was imposed to divide and control the power of the master of the offices In the last gloomy season of Theodoric he indignantly felt that he was a slave, but as his master had only power over his life, he stood, without arms and without fear, against the face of an angry barbarian, who had been provoked to believe that the safety of the senate was incompatible with his own The senator Albinus was accused and already convicted on the presumption of hoping, as it was said, the liberty of Rome "If Albinus be criminal," exclaimed the orator, ' the senate and myself are all guilty of the same crime If we are innocent, Albinus is equally entitled to the protection of the laws " These laws might not have punished the simple and barren wish of an unattainable blessing, but they would have shown less indulgence to the rash confession of Boethius, that, had he known of a conspiracy, the tyrant never should [94] The advocate of Albinus was soon involved in the danger and perhaps the guilt of his client, their signature (which they denied as a forgery) was affixed to the original address inviting the emperor to deliver Italy from the Goths, and three witnesses of honourable rank, perhaps of infamous reputation, attested the treasonable designs of the Roman patrician [95] Yet his innocence must be presumed, since he was deprived by Theodoric of the means of justification, and rigorously confined in the tower of Pavia, while the senate, at the distance of five hundred miles, pronounced a sentence of confiscation and death against the most illustrious of its members At the command of the barbarians, the occult science of a philosopher was stigmatised with the names of sacrilege and magic [96] A devout and dutiful attachment to the senate was condemned as criminal by the trembling voices of the senators themselves, and their ingratitude deserved the wish or prediction of Boethius, that, after him, none should be found guilty of the same offence [97]

While Boethius, oppressed with fetters, expected each moment the sentence or the stroke of death, he composed in the tower of Pavia the Consolation of Philosophy, a golden volume not unworthy of the leisure of Plato or Tully, but which claims incomparable merit from the barbarism of the times and the situation of the author The celestial guide whom he had so long invoked at Rome and Athens now condescended to illumine his dungeon, to revive his courage, and to pour into his wounds her salutary balm She taught him to compare his long prosperity and his recent distress, and to conceive new hopes from the inconstancy of fortune Reason had informed him of the precarious condition of her gifts, experience had satisfied him of their real value, he had enjoyed them without guilt, he might resign them without a sigh, and calmly disdain the impotent malice of his enemies, who had left him happiness, since they had left him virtue From the earth Boethius ascended to heaven in search of the SUPREME GOOD, explored the metaphysical labyrinth of chance and destiny, of prescience and free will, of time and eternity, and generously attempted to reconcile the perfect attributes of the Deity with the apparent disorders of his moral and physical government Such topics of consolation, so obvious, so vague, or so abstruse, are ineffectual to subdue the feelings of human nature Yet the sense of misfortune may be diverted by the labour of thought and the sage who could artfully combine in the same work the various riches of philosophy, poetry, and eloquence, must already have possessed the intrepid calmness which he affected to seek Suspense, the worst of evils, was at length determined by the ministers of death, who executed, and perhaps exceeded the inhuman mandate of Theodoric. A strong cord was fastened round the head of Boethius, and forcibly tightened till his eyes most started from their sockets, and may be discovered in the milder torture of beating him with clubs till he expired [98] But his genius survived to diffuse a ray of knowledge over the darkest ages of the Latin world the writings of the philosopher were translated by the most glorious of the English kings [99] and the third emperor of the name of Otho removed to a more honourable tomb the bones of a catholic saint who from his Arian persecutors had acquired the honours of martyrdom and the fame of miracles [100] In the last hours of Boethius he derived some comfort from the safety of his two sons of his wife and of his father in law the venerable Symmachus But the grief of Symmachus was indiscreet and perhaps disrespectful he had presumed to lament he might dare to revenge the death of an injured friend He was dragged in chains from Rome to the palace of Ravenna and the suspicions of Theodoric could only be appeased by the blood of an innocent and aged senator [101]

Humanity will be disposed to encourage any report which testifies the jurisdiction of conscience and the remorse of kings and philosophy is not ignorant that the most horrid spectres are sometimes created by the powers of a disordered fancy and the weakness of a distempered body After a life of virtue and glory, Theodoric was now descending with shame and guilt into the grave his mind was humbled by the contrast of the past and justly alarmed by the invisible terrors of futurity One evening as it is related when the head of a large fish was served on the royal table [102] he uddenly exclaimed that he beheld the angry countenance of Symmachus his eyes glaring fury and revenge and his mouth armed with long sharp teeth which threatened to devour him The monarch instantly retired to his chamber and as he lay trembling with aguish cold under a weight of bed clothes he expressed in broken murmurs to his physician Elpidius his deep repentance for the murders of Boethius and Symmachus [103] His malady increased and after a dysentery which continued three days he expired in the palace of Ravenna in the thirty third or if we compute from the invasion of Italy in the thirty seventh year of his reign Conscious of his approaching end, he divided his treasures and provinces between his two grandsons and fixed the Rhône as their common boundary [104] Amalaric was restored to the throne of Spain. Italy with all the conquests of the Ostrogoths, was bequeathed to Athalaric whose age did not exceed ten years but who was cherished as the last male offspring of the line of Amali, by the short lived marriage of his mother Amalasuntha with a royal fugitive of the same blood [105] In the presence of the dying monarch the Gothic chiefs and Italian magistrates mutually engaged their faith and loyalty to the young prince and to his guardian mother and received in the same awful moment his last salutary advice to maintain the laws to love the senate and people of Rome and to cultivate with decent reverence the friendship of the emperor [106] The monument of Theodoric was erected by his daughter Amalasuntha in a conspicuous situation which commanded the city of Ravenna, the harbour and the adjacent coast A chapel of a circular form thirty feet in diameter is crowned by a dome of one entire piece of granite from the centre of the dome four columns arose which supported in a vase of porphyry the remains of the Gothic king surrounded by the brazen statues of the twelve apostles [107] His spirit after some previous expiation might have been permitted to mingle with the benefactors of mankind if an Italian hermit had not been witness in a vision to the damnation of Theodoric [108] whose soul was plunged by the ministers of divine vengeance into the volcano of Lipari one of the flaming mouths of the infernal world [109]

Elevation of Justin the Elder Reign of Justinian I The Empress Theodora II Factions of the Circus, and Sedition of Constantinople III Trade and Manufacture of Silk IV Finances and Taxes V Edifices of Justinian Church of St Sophia Fortifications and Frontiers of the Eastern Empire VI Abolition of the Schools of Athens and the Consulship of Rome

THE emperor Justinian was born[1] near the ruins of Sardica (the modern Sophia), of an obscure race[2] of barbarians,[3] the inhabitants of a wild and desolate country, to which the names of Dardania, of Dacia, and of Bulgaria have been successively applied His elevation was prepared by the adventurous spirit of his uncle Justin, who, with two other peasants of the same village, deserted for the profession of arms the more useful employment of husbandmen or shepherds [4] On foot, with a scanty provision of biscuit in their knapsacks, the three youths followed the high road of Constantinople, and were soon enrolled, for their strength and stature, among the guards of the emperor Leo Under the two succeeding reigns, the fortunate peasant emerged to wealth and honours, and his escape from some dangers which threatened his life was afterwards ascribed to the guardian angel who watches over the fate of kings His long and laudable service in the Isaurian and Persian wars would not have preserved from oblivion the name of Justin, yet they might warrant the military promotion which, in the course of fifty years, he gradually obtained—the rank of tribune, of count, and of general, the dignity of senator, and the command of the guards, who obeyed him as their chief at the important crisis when the emperor Anastasius was removed from the world The powerful kinsmen whom he had raised and enriched were excluded from the throne, and the eunuch Amantius, who reigned in the palace, had secretly resolved to fix the diadem on the head of the most obsequious of his creatures A liberal donative, to conciliate the suffrage of the guards, was intrusted for that purpose in the hands of their commander But these weighty arguments were treacherously employed by Justin in his own favour, and as no competitor presumed to appear, the Dacian peasant was invested with the purple by the unanimous consent of the soldiers, who knew him to be brave and gentle, of the clergy and people, who believed him to be orthodox, and of the provincials, who yielded a blind and implicit submission to the will of the capital The elder Justin, as he is distinguished from another emperor of the same family and name, ascended the Byzantine throne at the age of sixty-eight years, and, had he been left to his own guidance, every moment of a nine-years' reign must have exposed to his subjects the impropriety of their choice His ignorance was similar to that of Theodoric, and it is remarkable that, in an age not destitute of learning, two contemporary monarchs had never been instructed in the knowledge of the alphabet But the genius of Justin was far inferior to that of the Gothic king the experience of a soldier had not qualified him for the government of an empire, and though personally brave, the consciousness of his own weakness was naturally attended with doubt, distrust, and political apprehension But the official business of the state was diligently and faithfully transacted by the quæstor Proclus,[5] and the aged emperor adopted the talents and ambition of his nephew Justinian, an aspiring youth, whom his uncle had drawn from the rustic solitude of Dacia, and educated at Constantinople as the heir of his private fortune, and at length of the Eastern empire

Since the eunuch Amantius had been defrauded of his money, it became necessary to deprive him of his life. The task was easily accomplished by the charge of a real or fictitious conspiracy, and the judges were informed, as an accumulation of guilt, that he was secretly addicted to the Manichæan heresy [6] Amantius lost his head, three of his companions, the first domestics of the palace, were punished either with death or exile, and their unfortunate candidate for the purple was cast into a deep dungeon, overwhelmed with stones, and ignominiously thrown without burial into the sea The ruin of Vitalian was a work of more difficulty and danger That Gothic chief had rendered himself popular by the civil war which he boldly waged against Anastasius for the defence of the orthodox faith, and after the conclusion of an advantageous treaty he still remained in the neighbourhood of Constantinople at the head of a formidable and victorious army of barbarians By the frail security of oaths he was tempted to relinquish this advantageous situation and to trust his person within the walls of a city whose inhabitants particularly the blue faction were artfully incensed against him by the remembrance even of his pious hostilities The emperor and his nephew embraced him as the faithful and worthy champion of the church and state and gratefully adorned their favourite with the titles of consul and general but in the seventh month of his consulship Vitalian was stabbed with seventeen wounds at the royal banquet [7] and Justinian who inherited the spoil was accused as the assassin of a spiritual brother to whom he had recently pledged his faith in the participation of the Christian mysteries [8] After the fall of his rival he was promoted without any claim of military service to the office of master general of the Eastern armies whom it was his duty to lead into the field against the public enemy But in the pursuit of fame Justinian might have lost his present dominion over the age and weakness of his uncle and instead of acquiring by Scythian or Persian trophies the applause of his countrymen [9] the prudent warrior solicited their favour in the churches the circus and the senate of Constantinople The catholics were attached to the nephew of Justin who between the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies trod the narrow path of inflexible and intolerant orthodoxy [10] In the first days of the new reign he prompted and gratified the popular enthusiasm against the memory of the deceased emperor After a schism of thirty four years he reconciled the proud and angry spirit of the Roman pontiff and spread among the Latins a favourable report of his pious respect for the apostolic see The thrones of the East were filled with catholic bishops devoted to his interest the clergy and the monks were gained by his liberality and the people were taught to pray for their future sovereign the hope and pillar of the true religion. The magnificence of Justinian was displayed in the superior pomp of his public spectacles an object not less sacred and important in the eyes of the multitude than the creed of Nice of Chalcedon the expense of his consulship was esteemed at two hundred and eighty-eight thousand pieces of gold twenty lions and thirty leopards were produced at the same time in the amphitheatre and a numerous train of horses with their rich trappings was bestowed as an extraordinary gift on the victorious charioteers of the circus While he indulged the people of Constantinople and received the addresses of foreign kings the nephew of Justin assiduously cultivated the friendship of the senate That venerable name seemed to qualify its members to declare the sense of the nation and to regulate the succession of the Imperial throne The feeble Anastasius had permitted the vigour of government to degenerate into the form or substance of an aristocracy and the military officers who had obtained the senatorial rank were followed by their domestic guards a band of veterans whose arms or acclamations might fix in a tumultuous moment the diadem of the East The treasures of the state were lavished to procure the voices of the senators and their unanimous wish that he would be pleased to adopt Justinian for his colleague was communicated to the emperor But this request which too clearly admonished him of his approaching end was unwelcome to the jealous temper of an aged monarch desirous to retain the power which he was incapable of exercising and Justin holding his purple with both his hands advised them to prefer since an election was so profitable some older candidate Notwithstanding this reproach the senate proceeded to decorate Justinian with the royal epithet of nobilissimus and their decree was ratified by the affection or the fears of his uncle After some time the languor of mind and body to which he was reduced by an incurable wound in his thigh indispensably required the aid of a guardian He summoned the patriarch and senators and in their presence solemnly placed the diadem on the head of his nephew who was conducted from the palace to the circus and saluted by the loud and joyful applause of the people The life of Justin was prolonged about four months but from the instant of this ceremony he was considered as dead to the empire which acknowledged Justinian in the forty fifth year of his age for the lawful sovereign of the East [11]

From his elevation to his death Justinian governed the Roman empire thirty eight years, seven months and thirteen days The events of his reign which excite our curious attention by their number variety and importance are diligently related by the secretary of Belisarius, a rhetorician whom eloquence had promoted to the rank of senator and præfect of Constantinople According to the vicissitudes of courage or servitude of favour or disgrace Procopius successively composed the history the panegyric and the satire of his own times The eight books of the Persian, Vandalic, and Gothic wars,[13] which are continued in the five books of Agathias, deserve our esteem as a laborious and successful imitation of the Attic, or at least of the Asiatic, writers of ancient Greece His facts are collected from the personal experience and free conversation of a soldier, a statesman, and a traveller, his style continually aspires, and often attains, to the merit of strength and elegance, his reflections, more especially in the speeches, which he too frequently inserts, contain a rich fund of political knowledge, and the historian, excited by the generous ambition of pleasing and instructing posterity, appears to disdain the prejudices of the people and the flattery of courts The writings of Procopius[14] were read and applauded by his contemporaries [15] but, although he respectfully laid them at the foot of the throne, the pride of Justinian must have been wounded by the praise of a hero who perpetually eclipses the glory of his inactive sovereign The conscious dignity of independence was subdued by the hopes and fears of a slave, and the secretary of Belisarius laboured for pardon and reward in the six books of the Imperial edifices He had dexterously chosen a subject of apparent splendour, in which he could loudly celebrate the genius, the magnificence, and the piety of a prince who, both as a conqueror and legislator, had surpassed the puerile virtues of Themistocles and Cyrus [16] Disappointment might urge the flatterer to secret revenge, and the first glance of favour might again tempt him to suspend and suppress a libel[17] in which the Roman Cyrus is degraded into an odious and contemptible tyrant, in which both the emperor and his consort Theodora are seriously represented as two dæmons who had assumed a human form for the destruction of mankind [18] Such base inconsistency must doubtless sully the reputation, and detract from the credit, of Procopius yet, after the venom of his malignity has been suffered to exhale, the residue of the anecdotes, even the most disgraceful facts, some of which had been tenderly hinted in his public history, are established by their internal evidence, or the authentic monuments of the times [19] From these various materials I shall now proceed to describe the reign of Justinian, which will deserve and occupy an ample space The present chapter will explain the elevation and character of Theodora, the factions of the circus and the peaceful administration of the sovereign of the East. In the three succeeding chapters I shall relate the wars of Justinian, which achieved the conquest of Africa and Italy, and I shall follow the victories of Belisarius and Narses, without disguising the vanity of their triumphs, or the hostile virtue of the Persian and Gothic heroes The series of this volume will embrace the jurisprudence and theology of the emperor, the controversies and sects which still divide the Oriental church, the reformation of the Roman law which is obeyed or respected by the nations of modern Europe

I In the exercise of supreme power, the first act of Justinian was to divide it with the woman whom he loved, the famous Theodora,[20] whose strange elevation cannot be applauded as the triumph of female virtue Under the reign of Anastasius, the care of the wild beasts maintained by the green faction at Constantinople was intrusted to Acacius, a native of the isle of Cyprus, who, from his employment, was surnamed the master of the bears This honourable office was given after his death to another candidate, notwithstanding the diligence of his widow, who had already provided a husband and a successor Acacius had left three daughters, Comito,[21] THEODORA, and Anastasia, the eldest of whom did not then exceed the age of seven years On a solemn festival, these helpless orphans were sent by their distressed and indignant mother, in the garb of suppliants, into the midst of the theatre the green faction received them with contempt, the blues with compassion, and this difference, which sunk deep into the mind of Theodora, was felt long afterwards in the administration of the empire As they improved in age and beauty, the three sisters were successively devoted to the public and private pleasures of the Byzantine people, and Theodora, after following Comito on the stage, in the dress of a slave, with a stool on her head, was at length permitted to exercise her independent talents She neither danced, nor sung, nor played on the flute, her skill was confined to the pantomime art, she excelled in buffoon characters, and as often as the comedian swelled her cheeks, and complained with a ridiculous tone and gesture of the blows that were inflicted, the whole theatre of Constantinople resounded with laughter and applause The beauty of Theodora[22] was the subject of more flattering praise, and the source of more exquisite delight Her features were delicate and regular, her complexion, though somewhat pale, was tinged with a natural colour, every sensation was instantly expressed by the vivacity of her eyes, her easy motions displayed the graces of a small but elegant figure and either love or adulation might proclaim that painting and poetry were incapable of delineating the matchless excellence of her form But this form was degraded by the facility with which it was exposed to the public eye and prostituted to licentious desire Her venal charms were abandoned to a promiscuous crowd of citizens and strangers of every rank and of every profession the fortunate lover who had been promised a night of enjoyment was often driven from her bed by a stronger or more wealthy favourite and when she passed through the streets her presence was avoided by all who wished to escape either the scandal or the temptation The satirical historian has not blushed [3] to describe the naked scenes which Theodora was not ashamed to exhibit in the theatre [24] After exhausting the arts of sensual pleasure [25] she most ungratefully murmured against the parsimony of Nature [26] but her murmurs her pleasures and her arts must be veiled in the obscurity of a learned language After reigning for some time the delight and contempt of the capital she condescended to accompany Ecebolus a native of Tyre who had obtained the government of the African Pentapolis But this union was frail and transient Ecebolus soon rejected an expensive or faithless concubine she was reduced at Alexandria to extreme distress and in her laborious return to Constantinople every city of the East admired and enjoyed the fair Cyprian whose merit appeared to justify her descent from the peculiar island of Venus The vague commerce of Theodora and the most detestable precautions preserved her from the danger which she feared yet once and once only she became a mother The infant was saved and educated in Arabia by his father who imparted to him on his death bed that he was the son of an empress Filled with ambitious hopes the unsuspecting youth immediately hastened to the palace of Constantinople and was admitted to the presence of his mother As he was never more seen even after the decease of Theodora she deserves the foul imputation of extinguishing with his life a secret so offensive to her imperial virtue

In the most abject state of her fortune and reputation some vision either of sleep or of fancy had whispered to Theodora the pleasing assurance that she was destined to become the spouse of a potent monarch Conscious of her approaching greatness she returned from Paphlagonia to Constantinople assumed like a skilful actress, a more decent character relieved her poverty by the laudable industry of spinning wool, and affected a life of chastity and solitude in a small house which she afterwards changed into a magnificent temple [27] Her beauty assisted by art or accident soon attracted captivated and fixed the patrician Justinian who already reigned with absolu e s ay under the name of his uncle Perhaps she contrived to enhance the value of a gift which she had so often lavished on the meanest of mankind perhaps she inflamed at first by modest delays and at last by sensual allurements, the desires of a lover who from nature or devotion was addicted to long vigils and abstemious diet. When his first transports had subsided she still maintained the same ascendant over his mind by the more solid merit of temper and understanding Justinian delighted to ennoble and enrich the object of his affection the treasures of the East were poured at her feet and the nephew of Justin was determined perhaps by religious scruples to bestow on his concubine the sacred and legal character of a wife But the laws of Rome expressly prohibited the marriage of a senator with any female who had been dishonoured by a servile origin or theatrical profession the empress Lupicina or Euphemia, a barbarian of rustic manners but of irreproachable virtue refused to accept a prostitute for her niece and even Vigilantia the superstitious mother of Justinian though she acknowledged the wit and beauty of Theodora was seriously apprehensive lest the levity and arrogance of that artful paramour might corrupt the piety and happiness of her son These obstacles were removed by the inflexible constancy of Justinian He patiently expected the death of the empress he despised the tears of his mother who soon sunk under the weight of her affliction and a law was promulgated in the name of the emperor Justin which abolished the rigid jurisprudence of antiquity A glorious repentance (the words of the edict) was left open for the unhappy females who had prostituted their persons on the theatre and they were permitted to contract a legal union with the most illustrious of the Romans [28] This indulgence was speedily followed by the solemn nuptials of Justinian and Theodora her dignity was gradually exalted with that of her lover and as soon as Justin had invested his nephew with the purple, the patriarch of Constantinople placed the diadem on the heads of the emperor and empress of the East But the usual honours which the severity of Roman manners had allowed to the wives of princes could not satisfy either the ambition of

Theodora or the fondness of Justinian He seated her on the throne as an equal and independent colleague in the sovereignty of the empire, and an oath of allegiance was imposed on the governors of the provinces in the joint names of Justinian and Theodora [29] The Eastern world fell prostrate before the genius and fortune of the daughter of Acacius The prostitute who, in the presence of innumerable spectators, had polluted the theatre of Constantinople, was adored as a queen in the same city, by grave magistrates, orthodox bishops, victorious generals, and captive monarchs [30]

Those who believe that the female mind is totally depraved by the loss of chastity will eagerly listen to all the invectives of private envy or popular resentment, which have dissembled the virtues of Theodora, exaggerated her vices, and condemned with rigour the venal or voluntary sins of the youthful harlot From a motive of shame or contempt, she often declined the servile homage of the multitude, escaped from the odious light of the capital, and passed the greatest part of the year in the palaces and gardens which were pleasantly seated on the sea coast of the Propontis and the Bosphorus Her private hours were devoted to the prudent as well as grateful care of her beauty, the luxury of the bath and table, and the long slumber of the evening and the morning Her secret apartments were occupied by the favourite women and eunuchs, whose interests and passions she indulged at the expense of justice the most illustrious personages of the state were crowded into a dark and sultry antechamber, and when at last, after tedious attendance, they were admitted to kiss the feet of Theodora, they experienced, as her humour might suggest, the silent arrogance of an empress or the capricious levity of a comedian Her rapacious avarice to accumulate an immense treasure may be excused by the apprehension of her husband's death, which could leave no alternative between ruin and the throne, and fear as well as ambition might exasperate Theodora against two generals who, during a malady of the emperor, had rashly declared that they were not disposed to acquiesce in the choice of the capital But the reproach of cruelty, so repugnant even to her softer vices, has left an indelible stain on the memory of Theodora Her numerous spies observed and zealously reported every action, or word, or look, injurious to their royal mistress Whomsoever they accused were cast into her peculiar prisons,[31] inaccessible to the inquiries of justice, and it was rumoured that the torture of the rack or scourge had been inflicted in the presence of a female tyrant, insensible to the voice of prayer or of pity [32] Some of these unhappy victims perished in deep unwholesome dungeons, while others were permitted, after the loss of their limbs, their reason, or their fortune, to appear in the world, the living monuments of her vengeance, which was commonly extended to the children of those whom she had suspected or injured The senator or bishop whose death or exile Theodora had pronounced, was delivered to a trusty messenger, and his diligence was quickened by a menace from her own mouth "If you fail in the execution of my commands, I swear by him who liveth for ever that your skin shall be flayed from your body "[33]

If the creed of Theodora had not been tainted with heresy, her exemplary devotion might have atoned, in the opinion of her contemporaries, for pride, avarice, and cruelty, but if she employed her influence to assuage the intolerant fury of the emperor, the present age will allow some merit to her religion, and much indulgence to her speculative errors [34] The name of Theodora was introduced, with equal honour, in all the pious and charitable foundations of Justinian, and the most benevolent institution of his reign may be ascribed to the sympathy of the empress for her less fortunate sisters, who had been seduced or compelled to embrace the trade of prostitution A palace, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, was converted into a stately and spacious monastery, and a liberal maintenance was assigned to five hundred women who had been collected from the streets and brothels of Constantinople In this safe and holy retreat they were devoted to perpetual confinement, and the despair of some, who threw themselves headlong into the sea, was lost in the gratitude of the penitents who had been delivered from sin and misery by their generous benefactress [35] The prudence of Theodora is celebrated by Justinian himself, and his laws are attributed to the sage counsels of his most reverend wife, whom he had received as the gift of the Deity [36] Her courage was displayed amidst the tumult of the people and the terrors of the court Her chastity, from the moment of her union with Justinian, is founded on the silence of her implacable enemies, and although the daughter of Acacius might be satiated with love, yet some applause is due to the firmness of a mind which could sacrifice pleasure and habit to the stronger sense either of duty or interest The wishes and prayers of Theodora could never obtain the blessing of a lawful son and she buried an infant daughter the sole offspring of her marriage [37] Notwithstanding this disappointment her dominion was permanent and absolute she preserved by art or merit the affections of Justinian and their seeming dissensions were always fatal to the courtiers who believed them to be sincere Perhaps her health had been impaired by the licentiousness of her youth but it was always delicate and she was directed by her physicians to use the Pythian warm baths In this journey the empress was followed by the Prætorian præfect the great treasurer several counts and patricians and a splendid train of four thousand attendants the highways were repaired at her approach a palace was erected for her reception and as she passed through Bithynia she distributed liberal alms to the churches the monasteries and the hospitals that they might implore Heaven for the restoration of her health [38] At length in the twenty fourth year of her marriage and the twenty second of her reign she was consumed by a cancer [39] and the irreparable loss was deplored by her husband who in the room of a theatrical prostitute might have selected the purest and most noble virgin of the East [40]

II A material difference may be observed in the games of antiquity the most eminent of the Greeks were actors the Romans were merely spectators The Olympic stadium was open to wealth merit and ambition and if the candidates could depend on their personal skill and activity they might pursue the footsteps of Diomede and Menelaus and conduct their own horses in the rapid career [41] Ten twenty forty chariots were allowed to start at the same instant a crown of leaves was the reward of the victor and his fame with that of his family and country was chanted in lyric strains more durable than monuments of brass and marble But a senator or even a citizen conscious of his dignity would have blushed to expose his person or his horses in the circus of Rome The games were exhibited at the expense of the republic, the magistrates or the emperors but the reins were abandoned to servile hands and if the profits of a favourite charioteer sometimes exceeded those of an advocate they must be considered as the effects of popular extravagance and the high wages of a disgraceful profession The race in its first institution was a simple contest of two chariots whose drivers were distinguished by white and red liveries two additional colours a light green and a cærulean blue were afterwards introduced and as the races were repeated twenty five times one hundred chariots contributed in the same day to the pomp of the circus The four factions soon acquired a legal establishment and a mysterious origin and their fanciful colours were derived from the various appearances of nature in the four seasons of the year the red dog-star of summer the snows of winter the deep shades of autumn and the cheerful verdure of the spring [42] Another interpretation preferred the elements to the seasons and the struggle of the green and blue was supposed to represent the conflict of the earth and sea Their respective victories announced either a plentiful harvest or a prosperous navigation and the hostility of the husbandmen and mariners was somewhat less absurd than the blind ardour of the Roman people who devoted their lives and fortunes to the colour which they had espoused Such folly was disdained and indulged by the wisest princes but the names of Caligula Nero Vitellius Verus Commodus Caracalla and Elagabalus were enrolled in the blue or green factions of the circus they frequented their stables applauded their favourites chastised their antagonists and deserved the esteem of the populace by the natural or affected imitation of their manners The bloody and tumultuous contest continued to disturb the public festivity till the last age of the spectacles of Rome and Theodoric from a motive of justice or affection interposed his authority to protect the greens against the violence of a consul and a patrician who were passionately addicted to the blue faction of the circus [43]

Constantinople adopted the follies, though not the virtues of ancient Rome and the same factions which had agitated the circus raged with redoubled fury in the hippodrome Under the reign of Anastasius this popular frenzy was inflamed by religious zeal and the greens, who had treacherously concealed stones and daggers under baskets of fruit massacred at a solemn festival three thousand of their blue adversaries [44] From the capital this pestilence was diffused into the provinces and cities of the East and the sportive distinction of two colours produced two strong and irreconcilable factions which shook the foundations of a feeble government [45] The popular dissensions founded on the most serious interest or holy pretence, have scarcely equalled the obstinacy of this wanton discord which invaded the peace of families divided friends and brothers and tempted the female sex though seldom seen in the circus to espouse the inclinations of their

lovers, or to contradict the wishes of their husbands Every law, either human or divine, was trampled under foot, and as long as the party was successful, its deluded followers appeared careless of private distress or public calamity The licence, without the freedom, of democracy, was revived at Antioch and Constantinople, and the support of a faction became necessary to every candidate for civil or ecclesiastical honours A secret attachment to the family or sect of Anastasius was imputed to the greens, the blues were zealously devoted to the cause of orthodoxy and Justinian,[46] and their grateful patron protected, about five years, the disorders of a faction whose seasonable tumults overawed the palace, the senate, and the capitals of the East Insolent with royal favour, the blues affected to strike terror by a peculiar and barbaric dress—the long hair of the Huns, their close sleeves and ample garments, a lofty step, and a sonorous voice In the day they concealed their two edged poniards, but in the night they boldly assembled in arms and in numerous bands, prepared for every act of violence and rapine. Their adversaries of the green faction, or even inoffensive citizens, were stripped and often murdered by these nocturnal robbers, and it became dangerous to wear any gold buttons or girdles, or to appear at a late hour in the streets of a peaceful capital A daring spirit, rising with impunity, proceeded to violate the safeguard of private houses, and fire was employed to facilitate the attack, or to conceal the crimes, of these factious rioters No place was safe or sacred from their depredations, to gratify either avarice or revenge they profusely spilt the blood of the innocent, churches and altars were polluted by atrocious murders, and it was the boast of the assassins that their dexterity could always inflict a mortal wound with a single stroke of their dagger The dissolute youth of Constantinople adopted the blue livery of disorder, the laws were silent, and the bonds of society were relaxed, creditors were compelled to resign their obligations, judges to reverse their sentence, masters to enfranchise their slaves, fathers to supply the extravagance of their children, noble matrons were prostituted to the lust of their servants, beautiful boys were torn from the arms of their parents, and wives, unless they preferred a voluntary death, were ravished in the presence of their husbands [47] The despair of the greens, who were persecuted by their enemies and deserted by the magistrate, assumed the privilege of defence, perhaps of retaliation, but those who survived the combat were dragged to execution, and the unhappy fugitives, escaping to woods and caverns, preyed without mercy on the society from whence they were expelled Those ministers of justice who had courage to punish the crimes and to brave the resentment of the blues became the victims of their indiscreet zeal a præfect of Constantinople fled for refuge to the holy sepulchre, a count of the East was ignominiously whipped, and a governor of Cilicia was hanged, by the order of Theodora, on the tomb of two assassins whom he had condemned for the murder of his groom, and a daring attack upon his own life [48] An aspiring candidate may be tempted to build his greatness on the public confusion, but it is the interest as well as duty of a sovereign to maintain the authority of the laws The first edict of Justinian, which was often repeated and sometimes executed, announced his firm resolution to support the innocent, and to chastise the guilty, of every denomination and colour Yet the balance of justice was still inclined in favour of the blue faction, by the secret affection, the habits, and the fears of the emperor, his equity, after an apparent struggle, submitted without reluctance to the implacable passions of Theodora, and the empress never forgot or forgave the injuries of the comedian At the accession of the younger Justin, the proclamation of equal and rigorous justice indirectly condemned the partiality of the former reign "Ye blues, Justinian is no more! ye greens, he is still alive!"[49]

A sedition, which almost laid Constantinople in ashes, was excited by the mutual hatred and momentary reconciliation of the two factions In the fifth year of his reign Justinian celebrated the festival of the ides of January the games were incessantly disturbed by the clamorous discontent of the greens, till the twenty-second race the emperor maintained his silent gravity, at length, yielding to his impatience, he condescended to hold, in abrupt sentences, and by the voice of a crier, the most singular dialogue[50] that ever passed between a prince and his subjects Their first complaints were respectful and modest, they accused the subordinate ministers of oppression, and proclaimed their wishes for the long life and victory of the emperor "Be patient and attentive, ye insolent railers!" exclaimed Justinian, "be mute, ye Jews Samaritans, and Manichæans!" The greens still attempted to awaken his compassion "We are poor, we are innocent, we are injured we dare not pass through the streets a general persecution is exercised against our name and colour

Let us die O emperor! but let us die by your command and for your service! But the repetition of partial and passionate invectives degraded in their eyes the majesty of the purple they renounced allegiance to the prince who refused justice to his people lamented that the father of Justinian had been born and branded his son with the opprobrious names of a homicide an ass and a perjured tyrant Do you despise your lives?' cried the indignant monarch The blues rose with fury from their seats their hostile clamours thundered in the hippodrome and their adversaries deserting the unequal contest spread terror and despair through the streets of Constantinople At this dangerous moment seven notorious assassins of both factions who had been condemned by the præfect were carried round the city and afterwards transported to the place of execution in the suburb of Pera Four were immediately beheaded a fifth was hanged but when the same punishment was inflicted on the remaining two the rope broke they fell alive to the ground the populace applauded their escape and the monks of St Conon, issuing from the neighbouring convent conveyed them in a boat to the sanctuary of the church [61] As one of these criminals was of the blue and the other of the green livery the two factions were equally provoked by the cruelty of their oppressor or the ingratitude of their patron and a short truce was concluded till they had delivered their prisoners and satisfied their revenge The palace of the præfect who withstood the seditious torrent was instantly burnt his officers and guards were massacred the prisons were forced open and freedom was restored to those who could only use it for the public destruction. A military force which had been despatched to the aid of the civil magistrate was fiercely encountered by an armed multitude whose numbers and boldness continually increased and the Heruli the wildest barbarians in the service of the empire overturned the priests and their relics which from a pious motive had been rashly interposed to separate the bloody conflict. The tumult was exasperated by this sacrilege the people fought with enthusiasm in the cause of God the women from the roofs and windows showered stones on the heads of the soldiers who darted firebrands against the houses and the various flames which had been kindled by the hands of citizens and strangers spread without control over the face of the city The conflagration involved the cathedral of St Sophia the baths of Zeuxippus a part of the palace from the first entrance to the altar of Mars and the long portico from the palace to the forum of Constantine a large hospital with the sick patients, was consumed many churches and stately edifices were destroyed and an immense treasure of gold and silver was either melted or lost. From such scenes of horror and distress the wise and wealthy citizens escaped over the Bosphorus to the Asiatic side and during five days Constantinople was abandoned to the factions, whose watchword NIKA vanquish! has given a name to this memorable sedition [62]

As long as the factions were divided the triumphant blues and desponding greens appeared to behold with the same indifference the disorders of the state They agreed to censure the corrupt management of justice and the finance and the two responsible ministers, the artful Tribonian and the rapacious John of Cappadocia were loudly arraigned as the authors of the public misery The peaceful murmurs of the people would have been disregarded they were heard with respect when the city was in flames the quæstor and the præfect were instantly removed and their offices were filled by two senators of blameless integrity After this popular concession Justinian proceeded to the hippodrome to confess his own errors and to accept the repentance of his grateful subjects but they distrusted his assurances though solemnly pronounced in the presence of the holy gospels and the emperor alarmed by their distrust retreated with precipitation to the strong fortress of the palace The obstinacy of the tumult was now imputed to a secret and ambitious conspiracy and a suspicion was entertained that the insurgents, more especially the green faction had been supplied with arms and money by Hypatius and Pompey two patricians who could neither forget with honour nor remember with safety that th y were the nephews of the emperor Anastasius Capriciously trusted disgraced and pardoned by the jealous levity of the monarch, they had appeared as loyal servants before the throne and during five days of the tumult, they were detained as important hostages till at length the fears of Justinian prevailing over his prudence he viewed the two brothers in the light of spies perhaps of assassins, and sternly commanded them to depart from the palace. After a fruitless representation that obedience might lead to involuntary treason, they retired to their houses and in the morning of the sixth day Hypatius was surrounded and seized by the people, who regardless of his virtuous resistance and the tears of his wife, transported their favourite to the Forum of Constantine, and, instead of a diadem, placed a rich collar on his head. If the usurper, who afterwards pleaded the merit of his delay, had complied with the advice of his senate, and urged the fury of the multitude, their first irresistible effort might have oppressed or expelled his trembling competitor. The Byzantine palace enjoyed a free communication with the sea, vessels lay ready at the garden stairs, and a secret resolution was already formed to convey the emperor with his family and treasures to a safe retreat at some distance from the capital.

Justinian was lost, if the prostitute whom he raised from the theatre had not renounced the timidity as well as the virtues of her sex. In the midst of a council where Belisarius was present, Theodora alone displayed the spirit of a hero, and she alone, without apprehending his future hatred, could save the emperor from the imminent danger and his unworthy fears. "If flight," said the consort of Justinian, "were the only means of safety, yet I should disdain to fly. Death is the condition of our birth, but they who have reigned should never survive the loss of dignity and dominion. I implore Heaven that I may never be seen, not a day, without my diadem and purple, that I may no longer behold the light when I cease to be saluted with the name of queen. If you resolve, O Cæsar! to fly, you have treasures, behold the sea, you have ships, but tremble lest the desire of life should expose you to wretched exile and ignominious death. For my own part, I adhere to the maxim of antiquity, that the throne is a glorious sepulchre." The firmness of a woman restored the courage to deliberate and act, and courage soon discovers the resources of the most desperate situation. It was an easy and a decisive measure to revive the animosity of the factions, the blues were astonished at their own guilt and folly, that a trifling injury should provoke them to conspire with their implacable enemies against a gracious and liberal benefactor, they again proclaimed the majesty of Justinian, and the greens, with their upstart emperor, were left alone in the hippodrome. The fidelity of the guards was doubtful, but the military force of Justinian consisted in three thousand veterans, who had been trained to valour and discipline in the Persian and Illyrian wars. Under the command of Belisarius and Mundus they silently marched in two divisions from the palace, forced their obscure way through narrow passages, expiring flames and falling edifices, and burst open at the same moment the two opposite gates of the hippodrome. In this narrow space the disorderly and affrighted crowd was incapable of resisting on either side a firm and regular attack, the blues signalised the fury of their repentance, and it is computed that above thirty thousand persons were slain in the merciless and promiscuous carnage of the day. Hypatius was dragged from his throne, and conducted with his brother Pompey to the feet of the emperor, they implored his clemency, but their crime was manifest, their innocence uncertain, and Justinian had been too much terrified to forgive. The next morning the two nephews of Anastasius, with eighteen illustrious accomplices, of patrician or consular rank, were privately executed by the soldiers, their bodies were thrown into the sea, their palaces razed, and their fortunes confiscated. The hippodrome itself was condemned, during several years, to a mournful silence, with the restoration of the games the same disorders revived, and the blue and green factions continued to afflict the reign of Justinian, and to disturb the tranquillity of the Eastern empire.[53]

III. That empire, after Rome was barbarous, still embraced the nations whom she had conquered beyond the Hadriatic, and as far as the frontiers of Æthiopia and Persia. Justinian reigned over sixty-four provinces and nine hundred and thirty-five cities,[54] his dominions were blessed by nature with the advantages of soil, situation, and climate, and the improvements of human art had been perpetually diffused along the coast of the Mediterranean and the banks of the Nile from ancient Troy to the Egyptian Thebes. Abraham[55] had been relieved by the well known plenty of Egypt, the same country, a small and populous tract, was still capable of exporting each year two hundred and sixty thousand quarters of wheat for the use of Constantinople,[56] and the capital of Justinian was supplied with the manufactures of Sidon fifteen centuries after they had been celebrated in the poems of Homer.[57] The annual powers of vegetation, instead of being exhausted by two thousand harvests, were renewed and invigorated by skilful husbandry, rich manure, and seasonable repose. The breed of domestic animals was infinitely multiplied. Plantations, buildings, and the instruments of labour and luxury, which are more durable than the tenure of human life, were accumulated by the care successive generations. Tradition preserved experience simplified, the humble

the arts society was enriched by the division of labour and the facility of exchange and every Roman was lodged clothed and subsisted by the industry of a thousand hands The invention of the loom and distaff has been piously ascribed to the gods In every age a variety of animal and vegetable productions hair skins wool flax cotton and at length silk have been skilfully manufactured to hide or adorn the human body they were stained with an infusion of permanent colours and the pencil was successfully employed to improve the labours of the loom In the choice of those colours[58] which imitate the beauties of nature the freedom of taste and fashion was indulged but the deep purple[59] which the Phœnicians extracted from a shell fish was restrained to the sacred person and palace of the emperor and the penalties of treason were denounced against the ambitious subjects who dared to usurp the prerogative of the throne [60]

I need not explain that silk[61] is originally spun from the bowels of a caterpillar and that it composes the golden tomb from whence a worm emerges in the form of a butterfly Till the reign of Justinian the silkworms who feed on the leaves of the white mulberry tree were confined to China those of the pine the oak and the ash were common in the forests both of Asia and Europe but as their education is more difficult and their produce more uncertain they were generally neglected except in the little island of Ceos near the coast of Attica A thin gauze was procured from their webs and this Cean manufacture the invention of a woman for female use was long admired both in the East and at Rome Whatever suspicions may be raised by the garments of the Medes and Assyrians Virgil is the most ancient writer who expressly mentions the soft wool which was combed from the trees of the Seres or Chinese [62] and this natural error less marvellous than the truth was slowly corrected by the knowledge of a valuable insect the first artificer of the luxury of nations That rare and elegant luxury was censured in the reign of Tiberius by the gravest of the Romans and Pliny in affected though forcible language has condemned the thirst of gain which explored the last confines of the earth for the pernicious purpose of exposing to the public eye naked draperies and transparent matrons [63] A dress which showed the turn of the limbs and colour of the skin might gratify vanity or provoke desire the silks which had been closely woven in China were sometimes unravelled by the Phœnician women and the precious materials were multiplied by a looser texture and the intermixture of linen threads [64] Two hundred years after the age of Pliny the use of pure or even of mixed silks was confined to the female sex till the opulent citizens of Rome and the provinces were insensibly familiarised with the example of Elagabalus the first who by this effeminate habit had sullied the dignity of an emperor and a man Aurelian complained that a pound of silk was sold at Rome for twelve ounces of gold but the supply increased with the demand and the price diminished with the supply If accident or monopoly sometimes raised the value even above the standard of Aurelian the manufacturers of Tyre and Berytus were sometimes compelled by the operation of the same causes, to content themselves with a ninth part of that extravagant rate [65] A law was thought necessary to discriminate the dress of comedians from that of senators and of the silk exported from its native country the far greater part was consumed by the subjects of Justinian They were still more intimately acquainted with a shell fish of the Mediterranean surnamed the silkworm of the sea the fine wool or hair by which the mother of pearl affixes itself to the rock is now manufactured for curiosity rather than use and a robe obtained from the same singular materials was the gift of the Roman emperor to the satraps of Armenia [66]

A valuable merchandise of small bulk is capable of defraying the expense of land-carriage and the caravans traversed the whole latitude of Asia in two hundred and forty three days from the Chinese ocean to the sea-coast of Syria Silk was immediately delivered to the Romans by the Persian merchants [67] who frequented the fairs of Armenia and Nisibis but this trade which in the intervals of truce was oppressed by avarice and jealousy was totally interrupted by the long wars of the rival monarchies The Great King might proudly number Sogdiana and even Serica among the provinces of his empire but his real dominion was bounded by the Oxus and his useful intercourse with the Sogdoites beyond the river depended on the pleasure of their conquerors the white Huns and the Turks who successively reigned over that industrious people Yet the most savage dominion has not extirpated the seeds of agriculture and commerce in a region which is celebrated as one of the four gardens of Asia the cities of Samarcand and Bochara are advantageously seated for the exchange of its various productions and their merchants pur chased from the Chinese[68] the raw or manufactured silk which they transported into Persia for the use of the Roman empire In the vain capital of China the Sogdian caravans were entertained as the suppliant embassies of tributary kingdoms, and, if they returned in safety, the bold adventure was rewarded with exorbitant gain But the difficult and perilous march from Samarcand to the first town of Shensi could not be performed in less than sixty, eighty, or one hundred days, as soon as they had passed the Jaxartes they entered the desert, and the wandering hordes, unless they are restrained by armies and garrisons, have always considered the citizen and the traveller as the objects of lawful rapine To escape the Tartar robbers and the tyrants of Persia, the silk-caravans explored a more southern road they traversed the mountains of Thibet, descended the streams of the Ganges or the Indus, and patiently expected, in the ports of Guzerat and Malabar, the annual fleets of the West[69] But the dangers of the desert were found less intolerable than toil, hunger, and the loss of time, the attempt was seldom renewed, and the only European who has passed that unfrequented way applauds his own diligence that, in nine months after his departure from Pekin, he reached the mouth of the Indus The ocean, however, was open to the free communication of mankind From the great river to the tropic of Cancer the provinces of China were subdued and civilised by the emperors of the North, they were filled about the time of the Christian era with cities and men, mulberry-trees and their precious inhabitants, and if the Chinese, with the knowledge of the compass, had possessed the genius of the Greeks or Phœnicians, they might have spread their discoveries over the southern hemisphere I am not qualified to examine, and I am not disposed to believe, their distant voyages to the Persian Gulf or the Cape of Good Hope, but their ancestors might equal the labours and success of the present race, and the sphere of their navigation might extend from the isles of Japan to the straits of Malacca, the Pillars, if we may apply that name, of an Oriental Hercules[70] Without losing sight of land, they might sail along the coast to the extreme promóntory of Achin, which is annually visited by ten or twelve ships laden with the productions, the manufactures, and even the artificers of China, the island of Sumatra and the opposite peninsula are faintly delineated[1] as the regions of gold and silver, and the trading cities named in the geography of Ptolemy may indicate that this wealth was not solely derived from the mines The direct interval between Sumatra and Ceylon is about three hundred leagues, the Chinese and Indian navigators were conducted by the flight of birds and periodical winds, and the ocean might be securely traversed in square-built ships, which, instead of iron, were sewed together with the strong thread of the cocoanut Ceylon, Serendib, or Taprobana was divided between two hostile princes, one of whom possessed the mountains, the elephants, and the luminous carbuncle, and the other enjoyed the more solid riches of domestic industry, foreign trade, and the capacious harbour of Trinquemale, which received and dismissed the fleets of the East and West In this hospitable isle, at an equal distance (as it was computed) from their respective countries, the silk merchants of China, who had collected in their voyages aloes, cloves, nutmeg, and sandal wood, maintained a free and beneficial commerce with the inhabitants of the Persian Gulf The subjects of the Great King exalted, without a rival, his power and magnificence, and the Roman, who confounded their vanity by comparing his paltry coin with a gold medal of the emperor Anastasius, had sailed to Ceylon, in an Æthiopian ship, as a simple passenger[72]

As silk became of indispensable use, the emperor Justinian saw with concern that the Persians had occupied by land and sea the monopoly of this important supply, and that the wealth of his subjects was continually drained by a nation of enemies and idolators An active government would have restored the trade of Egypt and the navigation of the Red Sea, which had decayed with the prosperity of the empire, and the Roman vessels might have sailed for the purchase of silk to the ports of Ceylon, of Malacca, or even of China Justinian embraced a more humble expedient, and solicited the aid of his Christian allies, the Æthiopians of Abyssinia, who had recently acquired the arts of navigation the spirit of trade, and the seaport of Adulis,[73] still decorated with the trophies of a Grecian conqueror Along the African coast they penetrated to the equator in search of gold emeralds, and aromatics, but they wisely declined an unequal competition, in which they must be always prevented by the vicinity of the Persians to the markets of India and the emperor submitted to the disappointment till his wishes were gratified by an unexpected event The Gospel had been preached to the Indians a bishop already governed

Christians of St Thomas on the pepper-coast of Malabar a church was planted in Ceylon and the missionaries pursued the footsteps of commerce to the extremities of Asia.[74] Two Persian monks had long resided in China perhaps in the royal city of Nankin the seat of a monarch addicted to foreign superstitions and who actually received an embassy from the isle of Ceylon Amidst their pious occupations they viewed with a curious eye the common dress of the Chinese the manufactures of silk and the myriads of silkworms whose education (either on trees or in houses) had once been considered as the labour of queens[75] They soon discovered that it was impracticable to transport the short lived insect but that in the eggs a numerous progeny might be preserved and multiplied in a distant climate Religion or interest had more power over the Persian monks than the love of their country after a long journey they arrived at Constantinople imparted their project to the emperor and were liberally encouraged by the gifts and promises of Justinian To the historians of that prince a campaign at the foot of Mount Caucasus has seemed more deserving of a minute relation than the labours of these missionaries of commerce who again entered China deceived a jealous people by concealing the eggs of the silkworm in a hollow cane and returned in triumph with the spoils of the East. Under their direction the eggs were hatched at the proper season by the artificial heat of dung the worms were fed with mulberry leaves they lived and laboured in a foreign climate a sufficient number of butterflies was saved to propagate the race and trees were planted to supply the nourishment of the rising generations Experience and reflection corrected the errors of a new attempt and the Sogdoite ambassadors acknowledged in the succeeding reign that the Romans were not inferior to the natives of China in the education of the insects and the manufactures of silk,[76] in which both China and Constantinople have been surpassed by the industry of modern Europe I am not insensible of the benefits of elegant luxury yet I reflect with some pain that if the importers of silk had introduced the art of printing already practised by the Chinese the comedies of Menander and the entire decads of Livy would have been perpetuated in the editions of the sixth century A larger view of the globe might at least have promoted the improvement of speculative science but the Christian geography was forcibly extracted from texts of Scripture and the study of nature was the surest symptom of an unbelieving mind The orthodox faith confined the habitable world to one temperate zone, and represented the earth as an oblong surface, four hundred days' journey in length, two hundred in breadth encompassed by the ocean and covered by the solid crystal of the firmament.[77]

IV The subjects of Justinian were dissatisfied with the times and with the government. Europe was overrun by the barbarians and Asia by the monks the poverty of the West discouraged the trade and manufactures of the East the produce of labour was consumed by the unprofitable servants of the church the state and the army and a rapid decrease was felt in the fixed and circulating capitals which constitute the national wealth. The public distress had been alleviated by the economy of Anastasius and that prudent emperor accumulated an immense treasure while he delivered his people from the most odious or oppressive taxes Their gratitude universally applauded the abolition of the gold of affliction, a personal tribute on the industry of the poor,[78] but more intolerable as it should seem in the form than in the substance since the flourishing city of Edessa paid only one hundred and forty pounds of gold, which was collected in four years from ten thousand artificers[79] Yet such was the parsimony which supported this liberal disposition that, in a reign of twenty seven years Anastasius saved from his annual revenue the enormous sum of thirteen millions sterling or three hundred and twenty thousand pounds of gold[80] His example was neglected and his treasure was abused by the nephew of Justin The riches of Justinian were speedily exhausted by alms and buildings by ambitious wars and ignominious treaties His revenues were found inadequate to his expenses Every art was tried to extort from the people the gold and silver which he scattered with a lavish hand from Persia to France[81] his reign was marked by the vicissitudes or rather by the combat of rapaciousness and avarice of splendour and poverty he lived with the reputation of hidden treasures,[82] and bequeathed to his successor the payment of his debts[83] Such a character has been justly accused by the voice of the people and of posterity but public discontent is credulous private malice is bold and a lover of truth will peruse with a suspicious eye the instructive anecdotes of Procopius The secret historian represents only the vices of Justinian and those vices are darkened by his malevolent pencil. Ambiguous actions are imputed to the worst motives error is confounded with guilt accident with design, and laws with abuses, the partial injustice of a moment is dexterously applied as the general maxim of a reign of thirty two years the emperor alone is made responsible for the faults of his officers, the disorders of the times, and the corruption of his subjects, and even the calamities of nature, plagues, earthquakes, and inundations, are imputed to the prince of the dæmons, who had mischieviously assumed the form of Justinian [84]

After this precaution I shall briefly relate the anecdotes of avarice and rapine under the following heads I Justinian was so profuse that he could not be liberal The civil and military officers, when they were admitted into the service of the palace, obtained a humble rank and a moderate stipend, they ascended by seniority to a station of affluence and repose, the annual pensions, of which the most honourable class was abolished by Justinian, amounted to four hundred thousand pounds, and this domestic economy was deplored by the venal or indigent courtiers as the last outrage on the majesty of the empire The posts, the salaries of physicians, and the nocturnal illuminations were objects of more general concern, and the cities might justly complain that he usurped the municipal revenues which had been appropriated to these useful institutions Even the soldiers were injured, and such was the decay of military spirit, that they were injured with impunity The emperor refused at the return of each fifth year the customary donative of five pieces of gold, reduced his veterans to beg their bread, and suffered unpaid armies to melt away in the wars of Italy and Persia. II The humanity of his predecessors had always remitted, in some auspicious circumstance of their reign, the arrears of the public tribute, and they dexterously assumed the merit of resigning those claims which it was impracticable to enforce "Justinian, in the space of thirty-two years, has never granted a similar indulgence, and many of his subjects have renounced the possession of those lands whose value is insufficient to satisfy the demands of the treasury To the cities which had suffered by hostile inroads Anastasius promised a general exemption of seven years the provinces of Justinian have been ravaged by the Persians and Arabs, the Huns and Sclavonians, but his vain and ridiculous dispensation of a single year has been confined to those places which were actually taken by the enemy" Such is the language of the secret historian, who expressly denies that any indulgence was granted to Palestine after the revolt of the Samaritans, a false and odious charge, confuted by the authentic record which attests a relief of thirteen centenaries of gold (fifty-two thousand pounds) obtained for that desolate province by the intercession of St Sabas [85] III Procopius has not condescended to explain the system of taxation, which fell like a hailstorm upon the land, like a devouring pestilence on its inhabitants but we should become the accomplices of his malignity if we imputed to Justinian alone the ancient, though rigorous principle, that a whole district should be condemned to sustain the partial loss of the persons or property of individuals The Annona, or supply of corn for the use of the army and capital, was a grievous and arbitrary exaction, which exceeded, perhaps in a tenfold proportion, the ability of the farmer, and his distress was aggravated by the partial injustice of weights and measures, and the expense and labour of distant carriage In a time of scarcity an extraordinary requisition was made to the adjacent provinces of Thrace, Bithynia, and Phrygia but the proprietors, after a wearisome journey and a perilous navigation, received so inadequate a compensation, that they would have chosen the alternative of delivering both the corn and price at the doors of their granaries These precautions might indicate a tender solicitude for the welfare of the capital, yet Constantinople did not escape the rapacious despotism of Justinian Till his reign the straits of the Bosphorus and Hellespont were open to the freedom of trade, and nothing was prohibited except the exportation of arms for the service of the barbarians At each of these gates of the city a prætor was stationed, the minister of Imperial avarice, heavy customs were imposed on the vessels and their merchandise, the oppression was retaliated on the helpless consumer, the poor were afflicted by the artificial scarcity and exorbitant price of the market, and a people accustomed to depend on the liberality of their prince might sometimes complain of the deficiency of water and bread [86] The aërial tribute, without a name, a law, or a definite object, was an annual gift of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, which the emperor accepted from his Prætorian præfect, and the means of payment were abandoned to the discretion of that powerful magistrate. IV Even such a tax was less intolerable than the privilege of monopolies, which checked the fair competition of industry, and, for the sake of a small and dishonest gain, imposed an arbitrary burden on the wants and luxury of the subject "As soon (I transcribe the Anecdotes) as the exclusive sale of silk was usurped by the Imperial treasurer a whole people the manufacturers of Tyre and Berytus was reduced to extreme misery and either perished with hunger or fled to the hostile dominions of Persia A province might suffer by the decay of its manufactures but in this example of silk Procopius has partially overlooked the inestimable and lasting benefit which the empire received from the curiosity of Justinian His addition of one seventh to the ordinary price of copper money may be interpreted with the same candour and the alteration which might be wise appears to have been innocent since he neither alloyed the purity nor enhanced the value of the gold coin [87] the legal measure of public and private payments V The ample jurisdiction required by the farmers of the revenue to accomplish their engagements might be placed in an odious light as if they had purchased from the emperor the lives and fortunes of their fellow citizens And a more direct sale of honours and offices was transacted in the palace with the permission or at least with the connivance of Justinian and Theodora The claims of merit even those of favour, were disregarded and it was almost reasonable to expect that the bold adventurer who had undertaken the trade of a magistrate should find a rich compensation for infamy labour danger the debts which he had contracted and the heavy interest which he paid A sense of the disgrace and mischief of this venal practice at length awakened the slumbering virtue of Justinian and he attempted by the sanction of oaths[88] and penalties to guard the integrity of his government but at the end of a year of perjury his rigorous edict was suspended and corruption licentiously abused her triumph over the impotence of the laws VI The testament of Eulalius count of the domestics declared the emperor his sole heir on condition however that he should discharge his debts and legacies allow to his three daughters a decent maintenance and bestow each of them in marriage with a portion of ten pounds of gold But the splendid fortune of Eulalius had been consumed by fire and the inventory of his goods did not exceed the trifling sum of five hundred and sixty four pieces of gold A similar instance in Grecian history admonished the emperor of the honourable part prescribed for his imitation He checked the selfish murmurs of the treasury applauded the confidence of his friend discharged the legacies and debts educated the three virgins under the eye of the empress Theodora and doubled the marriage portion which had satisfied the tenderness of their father [89] The humanity of a prince (for princes cannot be generous) is entitled to some praise yet even in this act of virtue we may discover the inveterate custom of supplanting the legal or natural heirs which Procopius imputes to the reign of Justinian His charge is supported by eminent names and scandalous examples neither widows nor orphans were spared and the art of soliciting or extorting or supposing testaments was beneficially practised by the agents of the palace This base and mischievous tyranny invades the security of private life and the monarch who has indulged an appetite for gain will soon be tempted to anticipate the moment of succession to interpret wealth as an evidence of guilt and to proceed, from the claim of inheritance to the power of confiscation VII Among the forms of rapine a philosopher may be permitted to name the conversion of Pagan or heretical riches to the use of the faithful but in the time of Justinian this holy plunder was condemned by the sectaries alone who became the victims of his orthodox avarice [90]

Dishonour might be ultimately reflected on the character of Justinian but much of the guilt and still more of the profit was intercepted by the ministers who were seldom promoted for their virtues and not always selected for their talents [91] The merits of Tribonian the quæstor will hereafter be weighed in the reformation of the Roman law but the economy of the East was subordinate to the Prætorian præfect and Procopius has justified his anecdotes by the portrait which he exposes in his public history of the notorious vices of John of Cappadocia [92] His knowledge was not borrowed from the schools [93] and his style was scarcely legible but he excelled in the powers of native genius, to suggest the wisest counsels and to find expedients in the most desperate situations The corruption of his heart was equal to the vigour of his understanding Although he was suspected of magic and Pagan superstition he appeared insensible to the fear of God or the reproaches of man and his aspiring fortune was raised on the death of thousands the poverty of millions, the ruin of cities and the desolation of provinces From the dawn of light to the moment of dinner he assiduously laboured to enrich his master and himself at the expense of the Roman world the remainder of the day was spent in sensual and obscene pleasures and the silent hours of the night were interrupted by the perpetual dread of the justice of an assassin. His abilities, perhaps his vices, recommended him to the lasting friendship of Justinian the emperor yielded with reluctance to the fury of the people, his victory was displayed by the immediate restoration of their enemy, and they felt above ten years, under his oppressive administration, that he was stimulated by revenge rather than instructed by misfortune Their murmurs served only to fortify the resolution of Justinian, but the præfect, in the insolence of favour, provoked the resentment of Theodora, disdained a power before which every knee was bent, and attempted to sow the seeds of discord between the emperor and his beloved consort. Even Theodora herself was constrained to dissemble, to wait a favourable moment, and, by an artful conspiracy, to render John of Cappadocia the accomplice of his own destruction At a time when Belisarius, unless he had been a hero, must have shown himself a rebel, his wife Antonina, who enjoyed the secret confidence of the empress, communicated his feigned discontent to Euphemia, the daughter of the præfect, the credulous virgin imparted to her father the dangerous project, and John, who might have known the value of oaths and promises, was tempted to accept a nocturnal, and almost treasonable, interview with the wife of Belisarius An ambuscade of guards and eunuchs had been posted by the command of Theodora, they rushed with drawn swords to seize or to punish the guilty minister he was saved by the fidelity of his attendants, but, instead of appealing to a gracious sovereign who had privately warned him of his danger, he pusillanimously fled to the sanctuary of the church The favourite of Justinian was sacrificed to conjugal tenderness or domestic tranquillity, the conversion of a præfect into a priest extinguished his ambitious hopes, but the friendship of the emperor alleviated his disgrace, and he retained in the mild exile of Cyzicus an ample portion of his riches Such imperfect revenge could not satisfy the unrelenting hatred of Theodora, the murder of his old enemy, the bishop of Cyzicus, afforded a decent pretence, and John of Cappadocia, whose actions had deserved a thousand deaths, was at last condemned for a crime of which he was innocent A great minister, who had been invested with the honours of consul and patrician, was ignominiously scourged like the vilest of malefactors, a tattered cloak was the sole remnant of his fortunes, he was transported in a bark to the place of his banishment at Antinopolis in Upper Egypt, and the præfect of the East begged his bread through the cities which had trembled at his name During an exile of seven years, his life was protracted and threatened by the ingenious cruelty of Theodora, and when her death permitted the emperor to recall a servant whom he had abandoned with regret, the ambition of John of Cappadocia was reduced to the humble duties of the sacerdotal profession His successors convinced the subjects of Justinian that the arts of oppression might still be improved by experience and industry, the frauds of a Syrian banker were introduced into the administration of the finances, and the example of the præfect was diligently copied by the quæstor, the public and private treasurer, the governors of provinces, and the principal magistrates of the Eastern empire [94]

V The edifices of Justinian were cemented with the blood and treasure of his people, but those stately structures appeared to announce the prosperity of the empire, and actually displayed the skill of their architects Both the theory and practice of the arts which depend on mathematical science and mechanical power were cultivated under the patronage of the emperors, the fame of Archimedes was rivalled by Proclus and Anthemius, and if their miracles had been related by intelligent spectators, they might now enlarge the speculations, instead of exciting the distrust, of philosophers A tradition has prevailed that the Roman fleet was reduced to ashes in the port of Syracuse by the burning glasses of Archimedes,[95] and it is asserted that a similar expedient was employed by Proclus to destroy the Gothic vessels in the harbour of Constantinople, and to protect his benefactor Anastasius against the bold enterprise of Vitalian [96] A machine was fixed on the walls of the city, consisting of a hexagon mirror of polished brass, with many smaller and movable polygons to receive and reflect the rays of the meridian sun, and a consuming flame was darted to the distance, perhaps, of two hundred feet [97] The truth of these two extraordinary facts is invalidated by the silence of the most authentic historians, and the use of burning-glasses was never adopted in the attack or defence of places [98] Yet the admirable experiments of a French philosopher[99] have demonstrated the possibility of such a mirror, and, since it is possible, I am more disposed to attribute the art to the greatest mathematicians of antiquity, than to give the merit of the fiction to the idle fancy of a monk or a sophist According to another story Proclus applied sulphur to the destruction of the Gothic fleet [100] in a modern imagination, the name of sulphur is ins connected with the suspicion of gunpowder and that suspicion is propagated by the secret arts of his disciple Anthemius [101] A citizen of Tralles in Asia had five sons who were all distinguished in their respective professions by merit and success Olympius excelled in the knowledge and practice of the Roman jurisprudence Dioscorus and Alexander became learned physicians but the skill of the former was exercised for the benefit of his fellow citizens while his more ambitious brother acquired wealth and reputation at Rome The fame of Metrodorus the grammarian and of Anthemius the mathematician and architect reached the ears of the emperor Justinian who invited them to Constantinople and while the one instructed the rising generation in the schools of eloquence the other filled the capital and provinces with more lasting monuments of his art In a trifling dispute relative to the walls or windows of their contiguous houses he had been vanquished by the eloquence of his neighbour Zeno but the orator was defeated in his turn by the master of mechanics whose malicious though harmless stratagems are darkly represented by the ignorance of Agathias In a lower room Anthemius arranged several vessels or caldrons of water each of them covered by the wide bottom of a leathern tube which rose to a narrow top and was artificially conveyed among the joists and rafters of the adjacent building A fire was kindled beneath the caldron the steam of the boiling water ascended through the tubes the house was shaken by the efforts of imprisoned air and its trembling inhabitants might wonder that the city was unconscious of the earthquake which they had felt At another time the friends of Zeno as they sat at table, were dazzled by the intolerable light which flashed in their eyes from the reflecting mirrors of Anthemius they were astonished by the noise which he produced from the collision of certain minute and sonorous particles and the orator declared in tragic style to the senate, that a mere mortal must yield to the power of an antagonist who shook the earth with the trident of Neptune and imitated the thunder and lightning of Jove himself The genius of Anthemius and his colleague Isidore the Milesian, was excited and employed by a prince whose taste for architecture had degenerated into a mischievous and costly passion. His favourite architects submitted their designs and difficulties to Justinian and discreetly confessed how much their laborious meditations were surpassed by the intuitive knowledge or celestial inspiration of an emperor whose views were always directed to the benefit of his people the glory of his reign and the salvation of his soul [102]

The principal church which was dedicated by the founder of Constantinople to Saint Sophia or the eternal wisdom had been twice destroyed by fire after the exile of John Chrysostom and during the Nika of the blue and green factions No sooner did the tumult subside than the Christian populace deplored their sacrilegious rashness but they might have rejoiced in the calamity had they foreseen the glory of the new temple which at the end of forty days was strenuously undertaken by the piety of Justinian [103] The ruins were cleared away a more spacious plan was described and, as it required the consent of some proprietors of ground they obtained the most exorbitant terms from the eager desires and timorous conscience of the monarch Anthemius formed the design and his genius directed the hands of ten thousand workmen whose payment in pieces of fine silver was never delayed beyond the evening The emperor himself clad in a linen tunic surveyed each day their rapid progress, and encouraged their diligence by his familiarity his zeal and his rewards The new cathedral of St Sophia was consecrated by the patriarch, five years eleven months and ten days from the first foundation and in the midst of the solemn festival Justinian exclaimed with devout vanity Glory be to God who hath thought me worthy to accomplish so great a work I have vanquished thee O Solomon! [104] But the pride of the Roman Solomon before twenty years had elapsed was humbled by an earthquake which overthrew the eastern part of the dome Its splendour was again restored by the perseverance of the same prince and in the thirty-sixth year of his reign Justinian celebrated the second dedication of a temple which remains, after twelve centuries a stately monument of his fame The architecture of St Sophia which is now converted into the principal mosque has been imitated by the Turkish sultans and that venerable pile continues to excite the fond admiration of the Greeks and the more rational curiosity of European travellers The eye of the spectator is disappointed by an irregular prospect of half domes and shelving roofs the western front the principal approach is destitute of simplicity and magnificence and the scale of dimensions has been much surpassed by several of the Latin cathedrals But the architect who first erected an aerial cupola is entitled to the

praise of bold design and skilful execution The dome of St Sophia, illuminated by four and-twenty windows, is formed with so small a curve, that the depth is equal only to one sixth of its diameter, the measure of that diameter is one hundred and fifteen feet, and the lofty centre, where a crescent has supplanted the cross, rises to the perpendicular height of one hundred and eighty feet above the pavement The circle which encompasses the dome lightly reposes on four strong arches, and their weight is firmly supported by four massy piles, whose strength is assisted on the northern and southern sides by four columns of Egyptian granite A Greek cross, inscribed in a quadrangle, represents the form of the edifice, the exact breadth is two hundred and forty three feet, and two hundred and sixty nine may be assigned for the extreme length, from the sanctuary in the east to the nine western doors which open into the vestibule, and from thence into the narthex or exterior portico That portico was the humble station of the penitents The nave or body of the church was filled by the congregation of the faithful, but the two sexes were prudently distinguished, and the upper and lower galleries were allotted for the more private devotion of the women Beyond the northern and southern piles, a balustrade, terminated on either side by the thrones of the emperor and the patriarch, divided the nave from the choir, and the space, as far as the steps of the altar, was occupied by the clergy and singers The altar itself, a name which insensibly became familiar to Christian ears, was placed in the eastern recess, artificially built in the form of a demicylinder, and this sanctuary communicated by several doors with the sacristy, the vestry, the baptistery, and the contiguous buildings, subservient either to the pomp of worship, or the private use of the ecclesiastical ministers The memory of past calamities inspired Justinian with a wise resolution that no wood, except for the doors, should be admitted into the new edifice, and the choice of the materials was applied to the strength, the lightness, or the splendour of the respective parts The solid piles which sustained the cupola were composed of huge blocks of freestone, hewn into squares and triangles, fortified by circles of iron, and firmly cemented by the infusion of lead and quicklime, but the weight of the cupola was diminished by the levity of its substance, which consists either of pumice stone that floats in the water, or of bricks, from the isle of Rhodes, five times less ponderous than the ordinary sort The whole frame of the edifice was constructed of brick, but those base materials were concealed by a crust of marble, and the inside of St Sophia, the cupola, the two larger and the six smaller semidomes, the walls, the hundred columns, and the pavement, delight even the eyes of barbarians with a rich and variegated picture

A poet,[105] who beheld the primitive lustre of St Sophia, enumerates the colours, the shades, and the spots of ten or twelve marbles, jaspers, and porphyries, which nature had profusely diversified, and which were blended and contrasted as it were by a skilful painter The triumph of Christ was adorned with the last spoils of Paganism, but the greater part of these costly stones was extracted from the quarries of Asia Minor, the isles and continent of Greece, Egypt, Africa, and Gaul Eight columns of porphyry, which Aurelian had placed in the Temple of the Sun, were offered by the piety of a Roman matron, eight others of green marble were presented by the ambitious zeal of the magistrates of Ephesus both are admirable by their size and beauty, but every order of architecture disclaims their fantastic capitals A variety of ornaments and figures was curiously expressed in mosaic, and the images of Christ, of the Virgin, of saints, and of angels, which have been defaced by Turkish fanaticism, were dangerously exposed to the superstition of the Greeks According to the sanctity of each object, the precious metals were distributed in thin leaves or in solid masses The balustrade of the choir, the capitals of the pillars, the ornaments of the doors and galleries, were of gilt bronze The spectator was dazzled by the glittering aspect of the cupola The sanctuary contained forty thousand pound weight of silver, and the holy vases and vestments of the altar were of the purest gold, enriched with inestimable gems Before the structure of the church had arisen two cubits above the ground, forty five thousand two hundred pounds were already consumed, and the whole expense amounted to three hundred and twenty thousand Each reader, according to the measure of his belief, may estimate their value either in gold or silver, but the sum of one million sterling is the result of the lowest computation A magnificent temple is a laudable monument of national taste and religion, and the enthusiast who entered the dome of St Sophia might be tempted to suppose that it was the residence, or even the workmanship, of the Deity Yet how dull is the artifice, how insignificant is the labour, if it be compared with the formation of the vilest insect that crawls upon the surface of the temple[1]

So minute a description of an edifice which time has respected may attest the truth and excuse the relation of the innumerable works both in the capital and provinces which Justinian constructed on a smaller scale and less durable foundations[106] In Constantinople alone and the adjacent suburbs he dedicated twenty five churches to the honour of Christ the Virgin and the saints Most of these churches were decorated with marble and gold and their various situation was skilfully chosen in a populous square or a pleasant grove on the margin of the sea shore or on some lofty eminence which overlooked the continents of Europe and Asia The church of the Holy Apostles at Constantinople and that of St John at Ephesus appear to have been framed on the same model their domes aspired to imitate the cupolas of St Sophia but the altar was more judiciously placed under the centre of the dome at the junction of four stately porticoes which more accurately expressed the figure of the Greek cross The Virgin of Jerusalem might exult in the temple erected by her imperial votary on a most ungrateful spot which afforded neither ground nor materials to the architect A level was formed by raising part of a deep valley to the height of the mountain The stones of a neighbouring quarry were hewn into regular forms each block was fixed on a peculiar carriage drawn by forty of the strongest oxen and the roads were widened for the passage of such enormous weights Lebanon furnished her loftiest cedars for the timbers of the church and the seasonable discovery of a vein of red marble supplied its beautiful columns two of which the supporters of the exterior portico were esteemed the largest in the world The pious munificence of the emperor was diffused over the Holy Land and if reason should condemn the monasteries of both sexes which were built or restored by Justinian yet charity must applaud the wells which he sunk and the hospitals which he founded for the relief of the weary pilgrims The schismatical temper of Egypt was ill entitled to the royal bounty but in Syria and Africa some remedies were applied to the disasters of wars and earthquakes and both Carthage and Antioch emerging from their ruins, might revere the name of their gracious benefactor[107] Almost every saint in the calendar acquired the honours of a temple—almost every city of the empire obtained the solid advantages of bridges hospitals and aqueducts but the severe liberality of the monarch disdained to indulge his subjects in the popular luxury of baths and theatres While Justinian laboured for the public service he was not unmindful of his own dignity and ease The Byzantine palace which had been damaged by the conflagration was restored with new magnificence and some notion may be conceived of the whole edifice by the vestibule or hall, which from the doors perhaps or the roof was surnamed chalce or the brazen The dome of a spacious quadrangle was supported by massy pillars, the pavement and walls were incrusted with many coloured marbles—the emerald green of Laconia the fiery red and the white Phrygian stone intersected with veins of a sea green hue The mosaic paintings of the dome and sides represented the glories of the African and Italian triumphs On the Asiatic shore of the Propontis at a small distance to the east of Chalcedon the costly palace and gardens of Heræum[108] were prepared for the summer residence of Justinian and more especially of Theodora The poets of the age have celebrated the rare alliance of nature and art the harmony of the nymphs of the groves the fountains and the waves yet the crowd of attendants who followed the court complained of their inconvenient lodgings[109] and the nymphs were too often alarmed by the famous Porphyrio a whale of ten cubits in breadth and thirty in length who was stranded at the mouth of the river Sangaris after he had infested more than half a century the seas of Constantinople[110]

The fortifications of Europe and Asia were multiplied by Justinian but the repetition of those timid and fruitless precautions exposes to a philosophic eye the debility of the empire From Belgrade to the Euxine from the conflux of the Save to the mouth of the Danube a chain of above fourscore fortified places was extended along the banks of the great river Single watch towers were changed into spacious citadels vacant walls which the engineers contracted or enlarged according to the nature of the ground, were filled with colonies or garrisons a strong fortress defended the ruins of Trajan s bridge and several military stations affected to spread beyond the Danube the pride of the Roman name But that name was divested of its terrors the barbarians in their annual inroads, passed and contemptuously repassed before these useless bulwarks and the inhabitants of the frontier instead of reposing under the shadow of the general defence were compelled to guard with incessant vigilance their separate habitations

The solitude of ancient cities was replenished, the new foundations of Justinian acquired, perhaps too hastily, the epithets of impregnable and populous, and the auspicious place of his own nativity attracted the grateful reverence of the vainest of princes Under the name of Justiniana prima, the obscure village of Tauresium became the seat of an archbishop and a praefect, whose jurisdiction extended over seven warlike provinces of Illyricum,[113] and the corrupt appellation of Giustendil still indicates, about twenty miles to the south of Sophia, the residence of a Turkish sanjak [114] For the use of the emperor's countrymen, a cathedral, a palace, and an aqueduct were speedily constructed, the public and private edifices were adapted to the greatness of a royal city, and the strength of the walls resisted, during the lifetime of Justinian, the unskilful assaults of the Huns and Sclavonians Their progress was sometimes retarded, and their hopes of rapine were disappointed, by the innumerable castles which, in the provinces of Dacia, Epirus, Thessaly, Macedonia, and Thrace, appeared to cover the whole face of the country Six hundred of these forts were built or repaired by the emperor, but it seems reasonable to believe that the far greater part consisted only of a stone or brick tower in the midst of a square or circular area, which was surrounded by a wall and ditch, and afforded in a moment of danger some protection to the peasants and cattle of the neighbouring villages [115] Yet these military works, which exhausted the public treasure, could not remove the just apprehensions of Justinian and his European subjects The warm-baths of Anchialus, in Thrace, were rendered as safe as they were salutary, but the rich pastures of Thessalonica were foraged by the Scythian cavalry, the delicious vale of Tempe, three hundred miles from the Danube, was continually alarmed by the sound of war,[116] and no unfortified spot, however distant or solitary, could securely enjoy the blessings of peace The straits of Thermopylæ, which seemed to protect, but which had so often betrayed, the safety of Greece, were diligently strengthened by the labours of Justinian From the edge of the sea shore, through the forests and valleys, and as far as the summit of the Thessalian mountains, a strong wall was continued which occupied every practicable entrance Instead of a hasty crowd of peasants, a garrison of two thousand soldiers was stationed along the rampart, granaries of corn and reservoirs of water were provided for their use, and, by a precaution that inspired the cowardice which it foresaw, convenient fortresses were erected for their retreat The walls of Corinth, overthrown by an earthquake, and the mouldering bulwarks of Athens and Platæa, were carefully restored, the barbarians were discouraged by the prospect of successive and painful sieges, and the naked cities of Peloponnesus were covered by the fortifications of the isthmus of Corinth At the extremity of Europe, another peninsula, the Thracian Chersonesus, runs three days' journey into the sea, to form, with the adjacent shores of Asia, the straits of the Hellespont The intervals between eleven populous towns were filled by lofty woods, fair pastures, and arable lands, and the isthmus, of thirty-seven stadia or furlongs, had been fortified by a Spartan general nine hundred years before the reign of Justinian [117] In an age of freedom and valour the slightest rampart may prevent a surprise, and Procopius appears insensible of the superiority of ancient times, while he praises the solid construction and double parapet of a wall whose long arms stretched on either side into the sea, but whose strength was deemed insufficient to guard the Chersonesus, if each city, and particularly Gallipoli and Sestus, had not been secured by their peculiar fortifications The long wall, as it was emphatically styled, was a work as disgraceful in the object as it was respectable in the execution The riches of a capital diffuse themselves over the neighbouring country, and the territory of Constantinople, a paradise of nature, was adorned with the luxurious gardens and villas of the senators and opulent citizens But their wealth served only to attract the bold and rapacious barbarians, the noblest of the Romans, in the bosom of peaceful indolence, were led away into Scythian captivity, and their sovereign might view from his palace the hostile flames which were insolently spread to the gates of the Imperial city At the distance only of forty miles, Anastasius was constrained to establish a last frontier, his long wall of sixty miles, from the Propontis to the Euxine, proclaimed the impotence of his arms, and as the danger became more imminent, new fortifications were added by the indefatigable prudence of Justinian [118]

Asia Minor, after the submission of the Isaurians,[119] remained without enemies and without fortifications Those bold savages, who had disdained to be the subjects of Gallienus, persisted two hundred and thirty years in a life of independence and rapine The most successful princes respected the strength of the mountains and the despair of the natives their fierce spirit

was sometimes soothed with gifts and some times restrained by terror and a military count with three legions fixed his permanent and ig nominious station in the heart of the Roman provinces [120] But no sooner was the vigilance of power relaxed or diverted than the light armed squadrons descended from the hills and invaded the peaceful plenty of Asia Although the Isaurians were not remarkable for stature or bravery want rendered them bold and experi ence made them skilful in the exercise of preda tory war They advanced with secrecy and speed to the attack of villages and defenceless towns their flying parties have sometimes touched the Hellespont the Euxine and the gates of Tarsus Antioch or Damascus [121] and the spoil was lodged in their inaccessible moun tains before the Roman troops had received their orders or the distant province had com puted its loss The guilt of rebellion and robbery excluded them from the rights of national enemies and the magistrates were instructed by an edict that the trial or punishment of an Isaurian even on the festival of Easter was a meritorious act of justice and piety [122] If the captives were condemned to domestic slavery they maintained with their sword or dagger th private quarrel of their masters and it was found expedient for the public tranquillity to prohibit the service of such dangerous retainers When their countryman Tarcalissæus or Zeno ascended the throne he invited a faithful and formidable band of Isaurians who insulted the court and city and were rewarded by an annual tribute of five thousand pounds of gold But the hopes of fortune depopulated the mountains, luxury enervated the hardiness of their minds and bodies and in proportion as they mixed with mankind they became less qualified for the enjoyment of poor and solitary freedom After the death of Zeno his successor Anasta sius suppressed their pensions exposed their persons to the revenge of the people banished them from Constantinople and prepared to sustain a war which left only the alternative of victory or servitude A brother of the last em peror usurped the title of Augustus his cause was powerfully supported by the arms the treasures and the magazines collected by Zeno and the native Isaurians must have formed the smallest portion of the hundred and fifty thou sand barbarians under his standard which was sanctified for the first time by the presence of a fighting bishop Their disorderly numbers were vanquished in the plains of Phrygia by the val our and discipline of the Goths but a war of six years almost exhausted the courage of the em peror [123] The Isaurians retired to their moun tains their fortresses were successively besieged and ruined their communication with the sea was intercepted the bravest of their leaders died in arms the surviving chiefs before their execu tion were dragged in chains through the hippo drome a colony of their youth was transplanted into Thrace and the remnant of the people submitted to the Roman government Yet some generations elapsed before their minds were re duced to the level of slavery The populous vil lages of Mount Taurus were filled with horse men and archers they resisted the imposition of tributes but they recruited the armies of Justinian and his civil magistrates the procon sul of Cappadocia the count of Isauria and the prætors of Lycaonia and Pisidia were invested with military power to restrain the licentious practice of rapes and assassinations [124]

If we extend our view from the tropic to the mouth of the Tanais we may observe on one hand the precautions of Justinian to curb the savages of Æthiopia [126] and on the other the long walls which he constructed in Crimæa for the protection of his friendly Goths a colony of three thousand shepherds and warriors [126] From that peninsula to Trebizond the eastern curve of the Euxine was secured by forts by alliance or by religion and the possession of Lazica the Colchos of ancient, the Mingrelia of modern geography soon became the object of an impor tant war Trebizond in after times the seat of a romantic empire was indebted to the liberality of Justinian for a church an aqueduct, and a castle whose ditches are hewn in the solid rock From that maritime city a frontier line of five hundred miles may be drawn to the fortress of Circesium the last Roman station on the Eu phrates [127] Above Trebizond immediately, and five days journey to the south the country rises into dark forests and craggy mountains, as savage though not so lofty as the Alps and the Pyrenees In this rigorous climate [128] where the snows seldom melt the fruits are tardy and tasteless even honey is poisonous the most in dustrious tillage would be confined to some pleasant valleys and the pastoral tribes obtain ed a scanty sustenance from the flesh and milk of their cattle The Chalybians [129] derived their name and temper from the iron quality of the soil and since the days of Cyrus they might produce under the various appellations of Chaldæans and Zanians an uninterrupted pre scription of war and rapine Under the reign of Justinian they acknowledged the god and the emperor of the Romans, and seven fortresses were built in the most accessible passes to exclude the ambition of the Persian monarch[130] The principal source of the Euphrates descends from the Chalybian mountains, and seems to flow towards the west and the Euxine bending to the south west, the river passes under the walls of Satala and Melitene (which were restored by Justinian as the bulwarks of the lesser Armenia), and gradually approaches the Mediterranean Sea, till at length, repelled by Mount Taurus,[131] the Euphrates inclines his long and flexible course to the south-east and the Gulf of Persia Among the Roman cities beyond the Euphrates we distinguish two recent foundations, which were named from Theodosius and the relics of the martyrs, and two capitals, Amida and Edessa, which are celebrated in the history of every age Their strength was proportioned by Justinian to the danger of their situation. A ditch and palisade might be sufficient to resist the artless force of the cavalry of Scythia, but more elaborate works were required to sustain a regular siege against the arms and treasures of the Great King His skilful engineers understood the methods of conducting deep mines, and of raising platforms to the level of the rampart He shook the strongest battlements with his military engines, and sometimes advanced to the assault with a line of movable turrets on the backs of elephants In the great cities of the East the disadvantage of space, perhaps of position, was compensated by the zeal of the people, who seconded the garrison in the defence of their country and religion, and the fabulous promise of the Son of God, that Edessa should never be taken, filled the citizens with valiant confidence and chilled the besiegers with doubt and dismay[132] The subordinate towns of Armenia and Mesopotamia were diligently strengthened, and the posts which appeared to have any command of ground or water were occupied by numerous forts substantially built of stone, or more hastily erected with the obvious materials of earth and brick The eye of Justinian investigated every spot, and his cruel precautions might attract the war into some lonely vale, whose peaceful natives, connected by trade and marriage, were ignorant of national discord and the quarrels of princes Westward of the Euphrates a sandy desert extends above six hundred miles to the Red Sea Nature had interposed a vacant solitude between the ambition of two rival empires, the Arabians, till Mahomet arose, were formidable only as robbers, and in the proud security of peace the fortifications of Syria were neglected on the most vulnerable side

But the national enmity, at least the effects of that enmity, had been suspended by a truce which continued above fourscore years An ambassador from the emperor Zeno accompanied the rash and unfortunate Perozes in his expedition against the Nephthalites, or White Huns, whose conquests had been stretched from the Caspian to the heart of India, whose throne was enriched with emeralds,[133] and whose cavalry was supported by a line of two thousand elephants[134] The Persians were twice circumvented, in a situation which made valour useless and flight impossible, and the double victory of the Huns was achieved by military stratagem They dismissed their royal captive after he had submitted to adore the majesty of a barbarian, and the humiliation was poorly evaded by the casuistical subtlety of the Magi, who instructed Perozes to direct his attention to the rising sun The indignant successor of Cyrus forgot his danger and his gratitude, he renewed the attack with headstrong fury, and lost both his army and his life[135] The death of Perozes abandoned Persia to her foreign and domestic enemies, and twelve years of confusion elapsed before his son Cabades or Kobad could embrace any designs of ambition or revenge The unkind parsimony of Anastasius was the motive or pretence of a Roman war,[136] the Huns and Arabs marched under the Persian standard, and the fortifications of Armenia and Mesopotamia were at that time in a ruinous or imperfect condition The emperor returned his thanks to the governor and people of Martyropolis for the prompt surrender of a city which could not be successfully defended, and the conflagration of Theodosiopolis might justify the conduct of their prudent neighbours Amida sustained a long and destructive siege at the end of three months the loss of fifty thousand of the soldiers of Cabades was not balanced by any prospect of success, and it was in vain that the Magi deduced a flattering prediction from the indecency of the women on the ramparts, who had revealed their most secret charms to the eyes of the assailants At length, in a silent night, they ascended the most accessible tower, which was guarded only by some monks, oppressed, after the duties of a festival, with sleep and wine Scaling ladders were applied at the dawn of day, the presence of Cabades, his stern command, and his drawn sword, compelled the Persians to vanquish, and, before it was sheathed, fourscore thousand of the inhabitants had expiated the blood of their companions After the siege of Amida the war continued three years and the unhappy frontier tasted the full measure of its calamities The gold of Anastasius was offered too late the number of his troops was defeated by the number of their generals the country was stripped of its inhabitants and both the living and the dead were abandoned to the wild beasts of the desert The resistance of Edessa and the deficiency of spoil inclined the mind of Cabades to peace he sold his conquests for an exorbitant price and the same line though marked with slaughter and devastation still separated the two empires To avert the repetition of the same evils Anastasius resolved to found a new colony so strong that it should defy the power of the Persian so far advanced towards Assyria that its stationary troops might defend the province by the menace or operation of offensive war For this purpose the town of Dara [137] fourteen miles from Nisibis and four days journey from the Tigris was peopled and adorned the hasty works of Anastasius were improved by the perseverance of Justinian and without insisting on places less important the fortifications of Dara may represent the military architecture of the age The city was surrounded with two walls and the interval between them of fifty paces afforded a retreat to the cattle of the besieged The inner wall was a monument of strength and beauty it measured sixty feet from the ground and the height of the towers was one hundred feet the loopholes from whence an enemy might be annoyed with missile weapons were small but numerous the soldiers were planted along the rampart under the shelter of double galleries and a third platform spacious and secure was raised on the summit of the towers The exterior wall appears to have been less lofty but more solid and each tower was protected by a quadrangular bulwark A hard rocky soil resisted the tools of the miners and on the south-east where the ground was more tractable their approach was retarded by a new work which advanced in the shape of a half moon The double and treble ditches were filled with a stream of water and in the management of the river the most skilful labour was employed to supply the inhabitants to distress the besiegers and to prevent the mischiefs of a natural or artificial inundation Dara continued more than sixty years to fulfil the wishes of its founders and to provoke the jealousy of the Persians who incessantly complained that this impregnable fortress had been constructed in manifest violation of the treaty of peace between the two empires

Between the Euxine and the Caspian the countries of Colchos Iberia and Albania are intersected in every direction by the branches of Mount Caucasus and the two principal gates or passes from north to south have been frequently confounded in the geography both of the ancients and moderns The name of Caspian or Albanian gates is properly applied to Derbend [138] which occupies a short declivity between the mountains and the sea the city if we give credit to local tradition had been founded by the Greeks and this dangerous entrance was fortified by the kings of Persia with a mole, double walls and doors of iron The Iberian gates[139] are formed by a narrow passage of six miles in Mount Caucasus which opens from the northern side of Iberia or Georgia into the plain that reaches to the Tanais and the Volga. A fortress designed by Alexander perhaps, or one of his successors to command that important pass, had descended by right of conquest or inheritance to a prince of the Huns who offered it for a moderate price to the emperor but while Anastasius paused while he timorously computed the cost and the distance a more vigilant rival interposed and Cabades forcibly occupied the straits of Caucasus The Albanian and Iberian gates excluded the horsemen of Scythia from the shortest and most practicable roads and the whole front of the mountains was covered by the rampart of Gog and Magog the long wall which has excited the curiosity of an Arabian caliph[140] and a Russian conqueror [141] According to a recent description huge stones seven feet thick, twenty one feet in length or height, are artifically joined without iron or cement to compose a wall which runs above three hundred miles from the shores of Derbend over the hills and through the valleys of Daghestan and Georgia Without a vision such a work might be undertaken by the policy of Cabades without a miracle it might be accomplished by his son, so formidable to the Romans under the name of Chosroes so dear to the Orientals under the appellation of Nushirwan The Persian monarch held in his hand the keys both of peace and war but he stipulated in every treaty that Justinian should contribute to the expense of a common barrier which equally protected the two empires from the inroads of the Scythians.[142]

VI Justinian suppressed the schools of Athens and the consulship of Rome which had given so many sages and heroes to mankind Both these institutions had long since degenerated from their primitive glory yet some re proach may be justly inflicted on the avarice and jealousy of a prince by whose hand such venerable ruins were destroyed

Athens, after her Persian triumphs, adopted the philosophy of Ionia and the rhetoric of Sicily, and these studies became the patrimony of a city whose inhabitants, about thirty thousand males, condensed, within the period of a single life, the genius of ages and millions Our sense of the dignity of human nature is exalted by the simple recollection that Isocrates[143] was the companion of Plato and Xenophon, that he assisted, perhaps with the historian Thucydides, at the first representations of the Œdipus of Sophocles and the Iphigenia of Euripides, and that his pupils Æschines and Demosthenes contended for the crown of patriotism in the presence of Aristotle, the master of Theophrastus, who taught at Athens with the founders of the Stoic and Epicurean sects [144] The ingenious youth of Attica enjoyed the benefits of their domestic education, which was communicated without envy to the rival cities Two thousand disciples heard the lessons of Theophrastus,[145] the schools of rhetoric must have been still more populous than those of philosophy, and a rapid succession of students diffused the fame of their teachers as far as the utmost limits of the Grecian language and name Those limits were enlarged by the victories of Alexander, the arts of Athens survived her freedom and dominion, and the Greek colonies which the Macedonians planted in Egypt, and scattered over Asia, undertook long and frequent pilgrimages to worship the Muses in their favourite temple on the banks of the Ilissus The Latin conquerors respectfully listened to the instructions of their subjects and captives, the names of Cicero and Horace were enrolled in the schools of Athens, and after the perfect settlement of the Roman empire, the natives of Italy, of Africa, and of Britain, conversed in the groves of the Academy with their fellow students of the East The studies of philosophy and eloquence are congenial to a popular state, which encourages the freedom of inquiry, and submits only to the force of persuasion In the republics of Greece and Rome the art of speaking was the powerful engine of patriotism or ambition, and the schools of rhetoric poured forth a colony of statesmen and legislators When the liberty of public debate was suppressed, the orator, in the honourable profession of an advocate, might plead the cause of innocence and justice, he might abuse his talents in the more profitable trade of panegyric, and the same precepts continued to dictate the fanciful declamations of the sophist, and the chaster beauties of historical composition The systems which professed to unfold the nature of God, of man, and of the universe, entertained the curiosity of the philosophic student, and according to the temper of his mind, he might doubt with the Sceptics, or decide with the Stoics, sublimely speculate with Plato, or severely argue with Aristotle The pride of the adverse sects had fixed an unattainable term of moral happiness and perfection but the race was glorious and salutary, the disciples of Zeno, and even those of Epicurus, were taught both to act and to suffer, and the death of Petronius was not less effectual than that of Seneca to humble a tyrant by the discovery of his impotence The light of science could not indeed be confined within the walls of Athens Her incomparable writers address themselves to the human race, the living masters emigrated to Italy and Asia, Berytus, in later times, was devoted to the study of the law, astonomy and physic were cultivated in the museum of Alexandria, but the Attic schools of rhetoric and philosophy maintained their superior reputation from the Peloponnesian war to the reign of Justinian Athens, though situate in a barren soil, possessed a pure air, a free navigation, and the monuments of ancient art That sacred retirement was seldom disturbed by the business of trade or government, and the last of the Athenians were distinguished by their lively wit, the purity of their taste and language, their social manners, and some traces, at least in discourse, of the magnanimity of their fathers In the suburbs of the city, the Academy of the Platonists, the Lyceum of the Peripatetics, the Portico of the Stoics, and the Garden of the Epicureans, were planted with trees and decorated with statues, and the philosophers, instead of being immured in a cloister, delivered their instructions in spacious and pleasant walks, which at different hours were consecrated to the exercises of the mind and body The genius of the founders still lived in those venerable seats, the ambition of succeeding to the masters of human reason excited a generous emulation, and the merit of the candidates was determined, on each vacancy, by the free voices of an enlightened people The Athenian professors were paid by their disciples according to their mutual wants and abilities, the price appears to have varied from a mina to a talent, and Isocrates himself, who derides the avarice of the sophists, required, in his school of rhetoric, about thirty pounds from each of his hundred pupils The wages of industry are just and honourable, yet the same Iso-

crates shed tears at the first receipt of a stipend the Stoic might blush when he was hired to preach the contempt of money and I should be sorry to discover that Aristotle or Plato so far degenerated from the example of Socrates as to exchange knowledge for gold But some property of lands and houses was settled by the permission of the laws and the legacies of deceased friends on the philosophic chairs of Athens Epicurus bequeathed to his disciples the gardens which he had purchased for eighty minæ or two hundred and fifty pounds with a fund sufficient for their frugal subsistence and monthly festivals [146] and the patrimony of Plato afforded an annual rent which in eight centuries was gradually increased from three to one thousand pieces of gold [147] The schools of Athens were protected by the wisest and most virtuous of the Roman princes The library which Hadrian founded was placed in a portico adorned with pictures statues and a roof of alabaster and supported by one hundred columns of Phrygian marble The public salaries were assigned by the generous spirit of the Antonines and each professor of politics of rhetoric of the Platonic the Peripatetic the Stoic and the Epicurean philosophy received an annual stipend of ten thousand drachmæ or more than three hundred pounds sterling [148] After the death of Marcus these liberal donations and the privileges attached to the thrones of science were abolished and revived diminished and enlarged but some vestige of royal bounty may be found under the successors of Constantine and their arbitrary choice of an unworthy candidate might tempt the philosophers of Athens to regret the days of independence and poverty [149] It is remarkable that the impartial favour of the Antonines was bestowed on the four adverse sects of philosophy which they considered as equally useful or at least as equally innocent Socrates had formerly been the glory and the reproach of his country and the first lessons of Epicurus so strangely scandalised the pious ears of the Athenians that by his exile and that of his antagonists they silenced all vain disputes concerning the nature of the gods But in the ensuing year they recalled the hasty decree restored the liberty of the schools and were convinced by the experience of ages that the moral character of philosophers is not affected by the diversity of their theological speculations [150]

The Gothic arms were less fatal to the schools of Athens than the establishment of a new religion whose ministers superseded the exercise of reason resolved every question by an article of faith and condemned the infidel or sceptic to eternal flame In many a volume of laborious controversy they exposed the weakness of the understanding and the corruption of the heart, insulted human nature in the sages of antiquity and proscribed the spirit of philosophical inquiry so repugnant to the doctrine or at least to the temper of a humble believer The surviving sect of the Platonists whom Plato would have blushed to acknowledge, extravagantly mingled a sublime theory with the practice of superstition and magic and as they remained alone in the midst of a Christian world they indulged a secret rancour against the government of the church and state, whose severity was still suspended over their heads About a century after the reign of Julian [151] Proclus [152] was permitted to teach in the philosophic chair of the Academy and such was his industry that he frequently in the same day pronounced five lessons and composed seven hundred lines. His sagacious mind explored the deepest questions of morals and metaphysics and he ventured to urge eighteen arguments against the Christian doctrine of the creation of the world. But in the intervals of study he personally conversed with Pan Æsculapius and Minerva in whose mysteries he was secretly initiated and whose prostrate statues he adored in the devout persuasion that the philosopher who is a citizen of the universe should be the priest of its various deities An eclipse of the sun announced his approaching end and his Life with that of his scholar Isidore [153] compiled by two of their most learned disciples exhibits a deplorable picture of the second childhood of human reason Yet the golden chain as it was fondly styled of the Platonic succession continued forty four years from the death of Proclus to the edict of Justinian [154] which imposed a perpetual silence on the schools of Athens and excited the grief and indignation of the few remaining votaries of Grecian science and superstition. Seven friends and philosophers Diogenes, and Hermias Eulalius and Priscian Damascius Isidore and Simplicius who dissented from the religion of their sovereign embraced the resolution of seeking in a foreign land the freedom which was denied in their native country They had heard and they credulously believed that the republic of Plato was realised in the despotic government of Persia and that a patriot king reigned over the happiest and most virtuous of nations They were soon astonished by the natural discovery that Persia resembled the other countries of the globe that Chosroes, who

affected the name of a philosopher, was vain, cruel, and ambitious, that bigotry, and a spirit of intolerance, prevailed among the Magi, that the nobles were haughty, the courtiers servile, and the magistrates unjust, that the guilty sometimes escaped, and that the innocent were often oppressed The disappointment of the philosophers provoked them to overlook the real virtues of the Persians, and they were scandalised, more deeply perhaps than became their profession, with the plurality of wives and concubines, the incestuous marriages, and the custom of exposing dead bodies to the dogs and vultures, instead of hiding them in the earth, or consuming them with fire Their repentance was expressed by a precipitate return, and they loudly declared that they had rather die on the borders of the empire than enjoy the wealth and favour of the barbarian From this journey, however, they derived a benefit which reflects the purest lustre on the character of Chosroes He required that the seven sages who had visited the court of Persia should be exempted from the penal laws which Justinian enacted against his Pagan subjects, and this privilege, expressly stipulated in a treaty of peace, was guarded by the vigilance of a powerful mediator [155] Simplicius and his companions ended their lives in peace and obscurity, and as they left no disciples, they terminate the long list of Grecian philosophers, who may be justly praised, notwithstanding their defects, as the wisest and most virtuous of their contemporaries The writings of Simplicius are now extant His physical and metaphysical commentaries on Aristotle have passed away with the fashion of the times, but his moral interpretation of Epictetus is preserved in the library of nations, as a classic book, most excellently adapted to direct the will, to purify the heart, and to confirm the understanding, by a just confidence in the nature both of God and man

About the same time that Pythagoras first invented the appellation of philosopher, liberty and the consulship were founded at Rome by the elder Brutus The revolutions of the consular office, which may be viewed in the successive lights of a substance, a shadow, and a name, have been occasionally mentioned in the present history The first magistrates of the republic had been chosen by the people, to exercise, in the senate and in the camp, the powers of peace and war, which were afterwards translated to the emperors But the tradition of ancient dignity was long revered by the Romans and barbarians A Gothic historian applauds the consulship of Theodoric as the height of all temporal glory and greatness,[156] the king of Italy himself congratulates those annual favourites of fortune who, without the cares, enjoyed the splendour of the throne, and at the end of a thousand years two consuls were created by the sovereigns of Rome and Constantinople for the sole purpose of giving a date to the year and a festival to the people But the expenses of this festival, in which the wealthy and the vain aspired to surpass their predecessors, insensibly arose to the enormous sum of fourscore thousand pounds, the wisest senators declined a useless honour which involved the certain ruin of their families, and to this reluctance I should impute the frequent chasms in the last age of the consular Fasti The predecessors of Justinian had assisted from the public treasures the dignity of the less opulent candidates, the avarice of that prince preferred the cheaper and more convenient method of advice and regulation [157] Seven processions or spectacles were the number to which his edict confined the horse and chariot races, the athletic sports, the music and pantomimes of the theatre, and the hunting of wild beasts, and small pieces of silver were discreetly substituted to the gold medals, which had always excited tumult and drunkenness when they were scattered with a profuse hand among the populace Notwithstanding these precautions and his own example, the succession of consuls finally ceased in the thirteenth year of Justinian, whose despotic temper might be gratified by the silent extinction of a title which admonished the Romans of their ancient freedom [158] Yet the annual consulship still lived in the minds of the people, they fondly expected its speedy restoration, they applauded the gracious condescension of successive princes, by whom it was assumed in the first year of their reign, and three centuries elapsed, after the death of Justinian, before that obsolete dignity, which had been suppressed by custom, could be abolished by law [159] The imperfect mode of distinguishing each year by the name of a magistrate was usefully supplied by the date of a permanent era the creation of the world, according to the Septuagint version, was adopted by the Greeks,[160] and the Latins, since the age of Charlemagne, have computed their time from the birth of Christ [161]

CHAPTERS I—XL

Chapter I

1 Dion Cassius (l liv p 736), with the annotations of Reimar, who has collected all that Roman vanity has left upon the subject The marble of Ancyra, on which Augustus recorded his own exploits, asserts that he compelled the Parthians to restore the ensigns of Crassus

2 Strabo (l xvi p 780), Pliny the elder (Hist Natur l vi c 28, 29), and Dion Cassius (l liii p 723 and l liv p 734), have left us very curious details concerning these wars The Romans made themselves masters of Mariaba a city of Arabia Felix, well known to the Orientals (see Abulfeda and the Nubian geography, p 5) They were arrived within three days' journey of the Spice country, the rich object of their invasion

3 By the slaughter of Varus and his three legions First book of the Annals of Tacitus Sueton, in August, c 23 and Velleius Paterculus, l ii c 117, etc Augustus did not receive the melancholy news with all the temper and firmness that might have been expected from his character

4 Tacit Annal l ii , Dion Cassius, l lvi p 833, and the speech of Augustus himself, in Julian's Cæsars It receives great light from the learned notes of his French translator M Spanheim

5 Germanicus, Suetonius Paulinus, and Agricola, were checked and recalled in the course of their victories Corbulo was put to death Military merit, as it is admirably expressed by Tacitus, was, in the strictest sense of the word, imperatoria virtus

6 Cæsar himself conceals that ignoble motive, but it is mentioned by Suetonius, c 47 The British pearls proved, however, of little value, on account of their dark and livid colour Tacitus observes, with reason (in Agricola, c 12), that it was an inherent defect "Ego facilius crediderim, naturam margaritis deesse quam nobis avaritiam

7 Claudius, Nero, and Domitian A hope is expressed by Pomponius Mela, l iii c 6 (He wrote under Claudius) that, by the success of the Roman arms, the island and its savage inhabitants would soon be better known

8 The admirable abridgment given by Tacitus, in the Life of Agricola, and copiously, though perhaps not completely, illustrated by our own antiquarians, Camden and Horsley

9 The Irish writers, jealous of their national honour, are extremely provoked on this occasion, both with Tacitus and with Agricola

10 Horsley's Britannia Romana, l i c 10

11 The poet Buchanan celebrates, with elegance and spirit (see his Sylvæ v), the unviolated independence of his native country But, if the single testimony of Richard of Cirencester was sufficient to create a Roman province of Vespasiana to the north of the wall, that independence would be reduced within very narrow limits

12 Appian (in Proœm) and the uniform imagery of Ossian's Poems, which, according to every hypothesis, were composed by a native Caledonian [Gibbon believed that Ossian was translated from the Gaelic Many now believe the poems to have been fabricated by Macpherson]

27 We must however remember that in the time of Hadrian a rebellion of the Jews raged with religious fury though only in a single province Pausanias (l viii c 43) mentions two necessary and successful wars conducted by the generals of Pius 1st Against the wandering Moors who were driven into the solitudes of Atlas 2nd Against the Brigantes of Britain who had invaded the Roman province Both these wars (with several other hostilities) are mentioned in the Augustan History p 19

30 The poorest rank of soldiers possessed above forty pounds sterling (Dionys Halicarn iv 17) a very high qualification at a time when money was so scarce that an ounce of silver was equivalent to seventy pound weight of brass The populace excluded by the ancient constitution were indiscriminately admitted by Marius Sallust de Bell Jugurth c 91

34 Tacitus calls the Roman eagles, Bellorum Deos. They were placed in a chapel in the camp and with the other deities received the religious worship of the troops

35 Gronovius de Pecunia vetere l iii p 120 etc. The emperor Domitian raised the annual stipend of the legionaries to twelve pieces of gold which in his time was equivalent to about ten of our guineas This pay somewhat higher than our own had been and was afterwards gradually increased according to the progress of wealth and military government After twenty years service the veteran received three thousand denarii (about one hundred pounds sterling) or a proportionable allowance of land The pay and advantages of the guards were in general, about double those of the legions

42 Vegetius de Re Militari l ii c 4 etc Considerable part of his very perplexed abridgment was taken from the regulations of Trajan and Hadrian and the legion as he describes it, cannot suit any other age of the Roman empire

43 Vegetius de Re Militari l ii c 1 In the purer age of Cæsar and Cicero the word miles was almost confined to the infantry Under the lower empire and in the times of chivalry it was appropriated almost as exclusively to the men at arms who fought on horseback

44 In the time of Polybius and Dionysius of Halicarnassus (l v c 45) the steel point of the pilum seems to have been much longer In the time of Vegetius it was reduced to a foot or even nine inches I have chosen a medium

59 The subject of the ancient machines is treated with great knowledge and ingenuity by the Chevalier Folard (Polybe, tom ii p 233–290) He prefers them in many respects to our modern cannon and mortars We may observe, that the use of them in the field gradually became more prevalent, in proportion as personal valour and military skill declined with the Roman empire When men were no longer found, their place was supplied by machines See Vegetius, ii 25 Arrian

60 Vegetius finishes his second book, and the description of the legion, with the following emphatic words "Universa quæ in quoque belli genere necessaria esse creduntur, secum legio debet ubique portare, ut in quovis loco fixerit castra, armatam faciat civitatem"

4 Dion (l iii p 698) gives us a prolix and bombast speech on this great occasion I have borrowed from Suetonius and Tacitus the general language of Augustus

5 Imperator (from which we have derived Emperor) signified under the republic no more than general, and was emphatically bestowed by the soldiers, when on the field of battle they proclaimed their victorious leader worthy of that title When the Roman emperors assumed it in that sense, they placed it after their name, and marked how often they had taken it

8 See in the viiith book of Livy, the conduct of Manlius Torquatus and Papirius Cursor They violated the laws of nature and humanity, but they asserted those of military discipline, and the people, who abhorred the action, was obliged to respect the principle

9 By the lavish but unconstrained suffrages of the people, Pompey had obtained a military command scarcely inferior to that of Augustus Among the extraordinary acts of power executed by the former, we may remark the foundation of twenty-nine cities, and the distribution of three or four millions sterling to his troops The ratification of his acts met with some opposition and delays in the senate See Plutarch Appian Dion Cassius and the first book of the epistles to Atticus

10 Under the commonwealth a triumph could only be claimed by the gen ral who was author ised to take the Auspices in the name of the people By an exact consequence drawn from this prin ciple of policy and religion the triumph was re served to the emperor and his most successful lieutenants were satisfied with some marks of dis tinction which under the name of triumphal honours were invented in their favour

11 Cicero (de Legibus iii. 3) gives the consular office the name of Regia potestas and Polybius (l. vi c 3) observes three powers in the Roman con stitution The monarchical was represented and exercised by the consuls

12 As the tribunitian power (distinct from the annual office) was first invented for the Dictator Cæsar (Dion l xliv p 384) we may easily con ceive that it was given as a reward for having so nobly asserted by arms the sacred rights of the tribunes and people Commentaries De Bell Civil l i

13 Augustus exercised nine annual consulships without interruption He then most artfully re fused that magistracy as well as the dictatorship absented himself from Rome and waited till the fatal effects of tumult and faction forced the senate to invest him with a perpetual consulship Au gustus as well as his successors affected however to conceal so invidious a title

14 See a fragment of a Decree of the Senate conferring on the emperor Vespasian all the pow ers granted to his predecessors Augustus Tiberius and Claudius This curious and important monu ment is published in Gruter's Inscriptions No ccxlii.

15 Two consuls were created on the Calends of January but in the course of the year others were substituted in their places till the annual number seems to have amounted to no less than twelve The prætors were usually sixteen or eighteen (Lipsius in Excurs. D ad Tacit Annal. l i) I have not mentioned the Ædiles or Quæstors Of ficers of the police or revenue easily adapt them selves to any form of government In the time of Nero the tribunes legally possessed the right of intercession though it might be dangerous to exer cise it (Tacit Annal. xvi 26) In the time of Trajan it was doubtful whether the tribuneship was an office or a name (Plin Epist i 23)

16 The tyrants themselves were ambitious of the consulship The virtuous princes were moder ate in the pursuit and exact in the discharge of it Trajan revived the ancient oath and swore before the consul's tribunal that he would observe the laws (Plin Panegyric c 64)

26 As Octavianus advanced to the banquet of the Cæsars his colour changed like that of the Camelion pale at first then red afterwards black, he at last assumed the mild livery of Venus and the graces (Cæsars p 309) This image employed by Julian in his ingenious fiction is just and elegant but when he considers this change of character as real and ascribes it to the power of philosophy he does too much honour to philosophy and to Octavianus

27 Two centuries after the establishment of monarchy the emperor Marcus Antoninus rec ommends the character of Brutus as a perfect model of Roman virtue

28 It is much to be regretted that we have lost the part of Tacitus which treated of that transac tion We are forced to content ourselves with the popular rumours of Josephus and the imperfect hints of Dion and Suetonius

29 Augustus restored the ancient severity of discipline After the civil wars he dropped the en dearing name of Fellow Soldiers and called them only Soldiers (Sueton in August c 25) See the

30 These words seem to have been the constitutional language See Tacit Annal xiii 4

31 The first was Camillus Scribonianus, who took up arms in Dalmatia against Claudius, and was deserted by his own troops in five days The second, L Antonius, in Germany, who rebelled against Domitian, and the third, Avidius Cassius, in the reign of M Antoninus The two last reigned but a few months, and were cut off by their own adherents We may observe, that both Camillus and Cassius coloured their ambition with the design of restoring the republic a task, said Cassius, peculiarly reserved for his name and family

44 He was fond of the theatre, and not insensible to the charms of the fair sex Marcus Antoninus, i 16 Hist August p 20, 21 Julian in Cæsar

45 The enemies of Marcus charged him with hypocrisy, and with a want of that simplicity which distinguished Pius and even Verus (Hist August 6, 34) This suspicion, unjust as it was, may serve to account for the superior applause bestowed upon personal qualifications, in preference to the social virtues Even Marcus Antoninus has been called a hypocrite, but the wildest scepticism never insinuated that Cæsar might possibly be a coward, or Tully a fool Wit and valour are qualifications more easily ascertained, than humanity or the love of justice

53 The practice of raising slaves to the great offices of state is still more common among the Turks than among the Persians The miserable countries of Georgia and Circassia supply rulers to the greatest part of the East

54 Chardin says, that European travellers have diffused among the Persians some ideas of the freedom and mildness of our governments They have done them a very ill office

55 They alleged the example of Scipio and Cato (Tacit Annal iii 66) Marcellus Eprius and Crispus Vibius had acquired two millions and a half under Nero Their wealth, which aggravated their crimes, protected them under Vespasian Tacit Hist iv 43 Dialog de Orator c 8 For one accusation, Regulus, the just object of Pliny's satire, received from the senate the consular ornaments, and a present of sixty thousand pounds

56 The crime of majesty was formerly a treasonable offence against the Roman people As tribunes of the people, Augustus and Tiberius applied it to their own persons, and extended it to an infinite latitude

57 After the virtuous and unfortunate widow of Germanicus had been put to death Tiberius received the thanks of the senate for his clemency She had not been publicly strangled nor was the body drawn with a hook to the Gemoniæ where those of common malefactors were exposed Tacit Annal vi 25 Sueton in Tiberio c 53

58 Seriphus was a small rocky island in the Ægean Sea the inhabitants of which were despised for their ignorance and obscurity The place of Ovid s exile is well known by his just but unmanly lamentations It should seem, that he only received an order to leave Rome in so many days and to transport himself to Tomi Guards and gaolers were unnecessary

59 Under Tiberius a Roman knight attempted to fly to the Parthians He was stopt in the Straits of Sicily but so little danger did there appear in the example that the most jealous of tyrants disdained to punish it Tacit Annal vi 14

39 He mixed, however, some prudence with his courage, and passed the greatest part of his time in a country retirement, alleging his advanced age, and the weakness of his eyes "I never saw him in the senate," says Dion, "except during the short reign of Pertinax" All his infirmities had suddenly left him, and they returned as suddenly upon the murder of that excellent prince Dion, l lxxiii p 1227

42 Pertinax was a native of Alba Pompeia, in Piedmont, and son of a timber merchant The order of his employments (it is marked by Capitolinus) well deserves to be set down, as expressive of the form of government and manners of the age 1 He was a centurion 2 Præfect of a cohort in Syria, in the Parthian war, and in Britain 3 He obtained an Ala, or squadron of horse, in Mæsia 4 He was commissary of provisions on the Æmilian way 5 He commanded the fleet upon the Rhine 6 He was procurator of Dacia, with a salary of about £1600 a year 7 He commanded the Veterans of a legion 8 He obtained the rank of senator 9 Of prætor 10 With the command of the first legion in Rhætia and Noricum 11 He was consul about the year 175 12 He attended Marcus into the east 13 He commanded an army on the Danube 14 He was consular legate of Mæsia 15 Of Dacia 16 Of Syria 17 Of Britain 18 He had the care of the public provisions at Rome 19 He was proconsul of Africa 20 Præfect of the city Herodian (l i p 48) does justice to his disinterested spirit, but Capitolinus, who collected every popular rumour, charges him with a great fortune acquired by bribery and corruption

43 Julian in the Cæsars taxes him with being accessory to the death of Commodus

44 Capitolinus gives us the particulars of these tumultuary votes, which were moved by one senator, and repeated, or rather chanted, by the whole body Hist August p 52

45 The senate condemned Nero to be put to death more majorum Sueton c 49

48 Besides the design of converting these useless ornaments into money, Dion (l lxxiii p 1229) assigns two secret motives of Pertinax He wished to expose the vices of Commodus and to discover by the purchasers those who most resembled him

49 Though Capitolinus has picked up many idle tales of the private life of Pertinax, he joins with Dion and Herodian in admiring his public conduct

18 Mr Hume is justly surprised at a passage in Herodian (l iv p 139) who on this occasion, represents the Imperial palace as equal in extent to the rest of Rome The whole region of the Palatine Mount on which it was built occupied at most a circumference of eleven or twelve thousand feet (Notitia and Victor in Nardini's Roma Antica) But we should recollect that the opulent senators had almost surrounded the city with their extensive gardens and suburban palaces the greatest part of which had been gradually confiscated by the emperors If Geta resided in the gardens that bore his name in the Janiculum and if Caracalla inhabited the gardens of Mæcenas on the Esquiline the rival brothers were separated from each other by the distance of several miles, and yet the intermediate space was filled by the imperial gardens of Sallust of Lucullus, of Agrippa, of Domitian of Caius etc all skirting round the city and all connected with each other and with the palace by bridges thrown over the Tiber and the streets But this explanation of Herodian would require though it ill deserves a particular dissertation illustrated by a map of ancient Rome

38 Dion (l lxxviii p 1343) informs us, that the extraordinary gifts of Caracalla to the army amounted annually to seventy millions of drachmæ (about two millions three hundred and fifty thousand pounds) There is another passage in Dion, concerning the military pay, infinitely curious, were it not obscure, imperfect, and probably corrupt The best sense seems to be, that the Prætorian guards received twelve hundred and fifty drachmæ (forty pounds) a year (Dion, l lxxvii p 1307) Under the reign of Augustus, they were paid at the rate of two drachmæ, or denarii, per day, 720 a year (Tacit Annal i 17) Domitian, who increased the soldiers' pay one fourth, must have raised the Prætorians to 960 drachmæ (Gronovius de Pecunia Veteri, l iii c 2) These successive augmentations ruined the empire, for, with the soldiers pay, their numbers too were increased We have seen the Prætorians alone increased from 10,000 to 50,000 men

40 The fondness of Caracalla for the name and ensigns of Alexander, is still preserved on the medals of that emperor Spanheim, de Usu Numismatum, Dissertat xii Herodian (l iv p 154) had seen very ridiculous pictures, in which a figure was drawn, with one side of the face like Alexander, and the other like Caracalla

42 Dion, l lxxviii p 1350 Elagabalus reproached his predecessor, with daring to seat himself on the throne, though, as Prætorian præfect, he could not have been admitted into the senate after the voice of the crier had cleared the house The personal favour of Plautianus and Sejanus had broke through the established rule They rose indeed from the equestrian order, but they preserved the præfecture with the rank of senator, and even with the consulship

43 He was a native of Cæsarea, in Numidia, and began his fortune by serving in the household of Plautian, from whose ruin he narrowly escaped His enemies asserted that he was born a slave, and had exercised among other infamous professions, that of gladiator The fashion of aspersing the birth and condition of an adversary, seems to have lasted from the time of the Greek orators to the learned grammarians of the last age

44 Both Dion and Herodian speak of the virtues and vices of Macrinus, with candour and impartiality, but the author of his Life, in the Augustan History, seems to have implicitly copied some of the venal writers, employed by Elagabalus, to blacken the memory of his predecessor

45 Dion, l lxxxiii p 1336 The sense of the author is as clear as the intention of the emperor, but M Wotton has mistaken both, by understanding the distinction, not of veterans and recruits, but of old and new legions History of Rome, p 347

47 According to Lampridius (Hist August p 135), Alexander Severus lived twenty nine years, three months, and seven days As he was killed March 19, 235, he was born December 12, 205, and was consequently about this time thirteen years old, as his elder cousin might be about seventeen This computation suits much better the history of the young princes than that of Herodian (l v p 181) who represents them as three years younger whilst by an opposite error of chronology he lengthens the reign of Elagabalus two years beyond its real duration For the particulars of the conspiracy see Dion l lxxviii p 1339 Herodian l v p 184

62 The era of the death of Elagabalus and of the accession of Alexander has employed the learning and ingenuity of Pagi Tillemont, Valsecchi Vignoli and Torre bishop of Adria. The question is most assuredly intricate but I still adhere to the authority of Dion the truth of whose calculations is und niable and the purity of whose text is justified by the agreement of Xiphil n Zonaras and Cedrenus Elagabalus reigned three years nine months and four days from his victory over Macrinus and was killed March 10 2 2 B t what shall we reply to the medals undoubtedly genuine which reckon the fifth year of his tribunitian power? We shall reply with the learned Valsecchi that the usurpation of Macrinus was annihilated and that the son of Caracalla dated his reign from his father s death After resolving this great difficulty the small r knots of this question may be easily untied or cut asunder

74 Though the author of the Life of Alexander (Hist August p 132) mentions the sedition raised against Ulpian by the soldiers, he conceals the catastrophe, as it might discover a weakness in the administration of his hero From this designed omission, we may judge of the weight and candour of that author

80 The Life of Alexander, in the Augustan History, is the mere idea of a perfect prince, an awkward imitation of the Cyropædia The account of his reign, as given by Herodian, is rational and moderate, consistent with the general history of the age, and, in some of the most invidious particulars, confirmed by the decisive fragments of Dion Yet from a very paltry prejudice, the greater number of our modern writers abuse Herodian, and copy the Augustan History Mess de Tillemont and Wotton From the opposite prejudice the emperor Julian (in Cæsarib p 315) dwells with a visible satisfaction on the effeminate weakness of the Syrian, and the ridiculous avarice of his mother

27 Augustan History, p 166, from the registers of the senate, the date is confessedly faulty, but the coincidence of the Apollinarian games enables us to correct it

28 He was descended from Cornelius Balbus, a noble Spaniard, and the adopted son of Theophanes the Greek historian Balbus obtained the freedom of Rome by the favour of Pompey, and preserved it by the eloquence of Cicero (see Orat pro Cornel Balbo) The friendship of Cæsar (to whom he rendered the most important secret services in the civil war) raised him to the consulship and the pontificate, honours never yet possessed by a stranger The nephew of this Balbus triumphed over the Garamantes See Dictionnaire de Bayle, au mot Balbus, where he distinguishes the several persons of that name, and rectifies, with his usual accuracy, the mistakes of former writers concerning them

29 Zonaras, l xii p 622 But little dependence is to be had on the authority of a moderate Greek, so grossly ignorant of the history of the third century, that he creates several imaginary emperors, and confounds those who really existed

30 Herodian, l vii p 256, supposes that the senate was at first convoked in the Capitol, and is very eloquent on the occasion The Augustan History, p 116, seems much more authentic

31 In Herodian, l vii p 249, and in the Augustan History, we have three several orations of Maximin to his army, on the rebellion of Africa and Rome M de Tillemont has very justly observed, that they neither agree with each other, nor with truth. Histoire des Empereurs, tom iii p 799

32 The carelessness of the writers of that age leaves us in a singular perplexity 1 We know that Maximus and Balbinus were killed during the Capitoline games Herodian, l viii p 285 The authority of Censorinus (de Die Natali, c 18) enables us to fix those games with certainty to the year 238, but leaves us in ignorance of the month or day 2 The election of Gordian by the senate is fixed, with equal certainty, to the 27th of May, but we are at a loss to discover whether it was in the same or the preceding year Tillemont and Muratori, who maintain the two opposite opinions, bring into the field a desultory troop of authorities, conjectures, and probabilities The one seems to draw out, the other to contract, the series of events between those periods, more than can be well reconciled to reason and history Yet it is necessary to choose between them

33 Velleius Paterculus, l ii c 24 The president de Montesquieu (in his dialogue between Sulla and Eucrates) expresses the sentiments of the dictator, in a spirited and even a sublime manner

34 Muratori (Annali d'Italia, tom ii p 294) thinks the melting of the snows suits better with the months of June or July, than with that of February The opinion of a man who passed his life between the Alps and the Apennines, is undoubtedly of great weight yet I observe, 1 That the long winter, of which Muratori takes advantage, is to be found only in the Latin version, and not in the Greek text of Herodian 2 That the vicissitude of suns and rains, to which the soldiers of Maximin were exposed (Herodian l viii p 277) denotes the spring rather than the summer, We may observe likewise, that these several streams, as they melted into one, composed the Timavus, so poetically (in every sense of the word) described by Virgil They are about twelve miles to the east of Aquileia See Cluver Italia Antiqua, tom i p 189, etc

35 Herodian, l viii p 272 The Celtic deity was supposed to be Apollo, and received under that name the thanks of the senate A temple was likewise built to Venus the bald, in honour of the women of Aquileia, who had given up their hair to make ropes for the military engines

36 Herodian, l viii p 279 Hist August p 146 The duration of Maximin's reign has not been defined with much accuracy, except by Eutropius, who allows him three years and a few days (l ix 1), we may depend on the integrity of the text, as the Latin original is checked by the Greek version of Pæanius

37 Eight Roman feet and one third, which are equal to above eight English feet, as the two measures are to each other in the proportion of 967 to 1000 See Graves's discourse on the Roman foot We are told that Maximin could drink in a day an amphora (or about seven gallons of wine), and eat thirty or forty pounds of meat He could move a loaded waggon, break a horse's leg with his fist,

46 Quintus Curtius (l x c 9) pays an elegant compliment to the emperor of the day for having by his happy accession extinguished so many fire brands sheathed so many swords and put an end to the evils of a divided government After weighing with attention every word of the passage I am of opinion that it suits better with the elevation of Gordian than with any other period of the Roman history In that case it may serve to decide the age of Quintus Curtius Those who place him under the first Cæsars argue from the purity of his style but are embarrassed by the silence of Quintilian in his accurate list of Roman historians

47 Hist August p 161 From some hints in the two letters I should expect that the eunuchs were not expelled the palace without some degree of gentle violence and that young Gordian rather approved of than consented to their disgrace

54 The military republic of the Mamalukes in Egypt would have afforded M de Montesquieu (Considerations sur la Grandeur et la Decadence des Romains c 16) a juster and more noble parallel

55 The Augustan History (p 163 164) cannot in this instance be reconciled with itself or with probability How could Philip condemn his predecessor and yet consecrate his memory? How could he order his public execution and yet in his letters to the senate exculpate himself from the guilt of his death? Philip though an ambitious usurper was by no means a mad tyrant Some chronological difficulties have likewise been discovered by the nice eyes of Tillemont and Muratori in this supposed association of Philip to the empire

56 The account of the last supposed celebration though in an enlightened period of history was so very doubtful and obscure that the alternative seems not doubtful When the popish jubilees, the copy of the secular games were invented by Boniface VIII the crafty pope pretended that he only revived an ancient institution M de Chais Lettres sur les Jubilès

57 Either of a hundred or a hundred and ten years Varro and Livy adopted the former opinion, but the infallible authority of the Sibyl consecrated the latter (Censorinus de Die Natal. c 17). The emperors Claudius and Philip however did not treat the oracle with implicit respect

58 The idea of the secular games is best understood from the poem of Horace and the description of Zosimus l ii p 167 etc

59 The received calculation of Varro assigns to the foundation of Rome an era that corresponds with the 754th year before Christ But so little is the chronology of Rome to be depended on in the more early ages that Sir Isaac Newton has brought the same event as low as the year 627

Chapter VIII

1 An ancient chronologist quoted by Velleius Paterculus (l i c 6) observes that the Assyrians the Medes the Persians and the Macedonians reigned over Asia one thousand nine hundred and ninety five years from the accession of Ninus to the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans As the latter of these great events happened 289 years before Christ the former may be placed 2184 years before the same era The Astronomical Observations found at Babylon by Alexander went fifty years higher

7 Hyde and Prideaux, working up the Persian legends and their own conjectures into a very agreeable story, represent Zoroaster as a contemporary of Darius Hystaspes But it is sufficient to observe, that the Greek writers, who lived almost in the age of Darius, agree in placing the era of Zoroaster many hundred, or even thousand, years before their own time The judicious criticism of Mr Moyle perceived, and maintained against his uncle Dr Prideaux, the antiquity of the Persian prophet See his work, vol ii

8 That ancient idiom was called the Zend The language of the commentary, the Pehlvi, though much more modern, has ceased many ages ago to be a living tongue This fact alone (if it is allowed as authentic) sufficiently warrants the antiquity of those writings, which M d'Anquetil has brought into Europe, and translated into French

10 I have principally drawn this account from the Zendavesta of M d Anquetil, and the Sadder, subjoined to Dr Hyde's treatise It must, however, be confessed, that the studied obscurity of a prophet, the figurative style of the East, and the deceitful medium of a French or Latin version, may have betrayed us into error and heresy in this abridgment of Persian theology

11 The modern Parsees (and in some degree the Sadder) exalt Ormusd into the first and omnipotent cause, whilst they degrade Ahriman into an inferior but rebellious spirit Their desire of pleasing the Mahometans may have contributed to refine their theological system

1 The modern philosophers of Sweden seem agreed that the waters of the Baltic gradually sink in a regular proportion, which they have ventured to estimate at half an inch every year Twenty centuries ago, the flat country of Scandinavia must have been covered by the sea, while the high lands rose above the waters, as so many islands of various forms and dimensions Such indeed is the notion given us by Mela, Pliny, and Tacitus, of the vast countries round the Baltic See in the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tom xl and xlv a large abstract of Dalin's History of Sweden, composed in the Swedish language

26 Cantoclarus, with his usual accuracy, chooses to translate three hundred thousand, his version is equally repugnant to sense and to grammar

27 We may remark, as an instance of bad taste, that Dexippus applies to the light infantry of the Alemanni the technical terms proper only to the Grecian phalanx

40 Plin Hist Natur iii 5 [§ 9] To confirm our idea, we may observe that for a long time Mount Cælius was a grove of oaks, and Mount Viminal was overrun with osiers, that in the fourth century the Aventine was a vacant and solitary retirement that till the time of Augustus the Esquiline was an unwholesome burying-ground, and that the numerous inequalities remarked by the ancients in the Quirinal sufficiently prove that it was not covered with buildings Of the seven hills, the Capitoline and Palatine only, with the adjacent valleys, were the primitive habitation of the Roman people But this subject would require a dissertation

1 Vopiscus in Hist August p 222 [Aurel c 41] Aurelius Victor mentions a formal deputation from the troops to the senate

2 Vopiscus, our principal authority, wrote at Rome sixteen years only after the death of Aurelian and, besides the recent notoriety of the facts, constantly draws his materials from the Journals of the Senate and the original papers of the Ulpian library Zosimus and Zonaras appear as ignorant of this transaction as they were in general of the Roman constitution

3 Liv i 17 Dionys Halicarn, l ii [c 57] p 115 Plutarch in Numa Pompilius The first of these writers relates the story like an orator, the second like a lawyer, and the third like a moralist, and none of them probably without some intermixture of fable

4 Vopiscus (in Hist August p 227 [Tacit c 4]) calls him "primæ sententiæ consularis" and soon afterwards Princeps senatûs It is natural to suppose that the monarchs of Rome, disdaining that humble title, resigned it to the most ancient of the senators

5 The only objection to this genealogy is, that the historian was named Cornelius, the emperor Claudius But under the Lower Empire surnames were extremely various and uncertain

6 Zonaras, l xii [c 28] p 637 [ed Paris, p 608, ed Bonn] The Alexandrian Chronicle, by an obvious mistake, transfers that age to Aurelian

7 In the year 273 he was ordinary consul But he must have been Suffectus many years before, and most probably under Valerian

8 Bis millies octingenties Vopiscus in Hist August p 229 [Tacit c 10] This sum, according to the old standard, was equivalent to eight hundred and forty thousand Roman pounds of silver, each of the value of three pounds sterling But in the age of Tacitus the coin had lost much of its weight and purity

9 After his accession he gave orders that ten copies of the historian should be annually transcribed and placed in the public libraries The Roman libraries have long since perished, and the most valuable part of Tacitus was preserved in a single MS, and discovered in a monastery of Westphalia See Bayle, Dictionnaire, Art Tacite, and Lipsius ad Annal ii 9

10 Vopiscus in Hist August p 227 [Tacit c 4.]

11 Hist August p 228 [ib c 7] Tacitus addressed the Prætorians by the appellation of sanctissimi milites, and the people by that of sacratissimi Quirites

12 In his manumissions he never exceeded the number of an hundred as limited by the Caninian law, which was enacted under Augustus, and at length repealed by Justinian See Casaubon ad locum Vopisci

13 See the Lives of Tacitus, Florianus, and Probus, in the Augustan History, we may be well assured that whatever the soldier gave the senator had already given

14 Vopiscus in Hist August p 216 [Aurel c 20] The passage is perfectly clear, yet both Casaubon and Salmasius wish to correct it

15 Vopiscus in Hist August p 230, 232, 233 [Florian c 5 and 6] The senators celebrated the happy restoration with hecatombs and public rejoicings

17 Vopiscus in Hist August p 230

13] Zosimus l i [c 63] p 57 Zonaras l xii [c 28] p 637 [ed Paris p 608 ed Bonn] Two passages in the Life of Probus (p 236 238 [Vopisc Probus c. 8 and 12]) convince me that these Scythian invaders of Pontus were Alani If we may believe Zosimus (l i [c 64] p 58) Florianus pursued them as far as the Cimmerian Bosphorus But he had scarcely time for so long and difficult an expedition

18 Eutropius [9 c 10] and Aurelius Victor [c 36] only say that he died Vi tor Junior adds that it was of a fever Zosimus [i 63 p 55] and Zonaras [xii c 28] affirm that he was killed by the soldiers Vopiscus [Tacit c 13] mentions both accounts and seems to hesitate Yet surely these jarring opinions are easily reconciled

19 According to the two Victors he reigned exactly two hundred days

20 Hist August p 231 [Vopiscus Florian c 1] Zosimus l i [c 64 p 56] p 58 59 Zonaras l xii [c 29 p 609] p 637 Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 37] says that Probus assumed the empire in Illyricum an opinion which (though adopted by a very learned man) would throw that period of history into inextricable confusion

21 Hist August p 229 [Vopisc Tacit c 10]

22 He was to send judges to the Parthians Persians and Sarmatians a president to Taprobana and a proconsul to the Roman island (supposed by Casaubon and Salmasius to mean Britain) Such a history as mine (says Vopiscus with proper modesty) will not subsist a thousand years to expose or justify the prediction

23 For the private life of Probu see Vopiscus in Hist August p 234–237 [Probus c 3 sqq]

24 According to the Alexandrian chronicle he was fifty at the time of his death

25 The letter was addressed to the Pr etorian præfect whom (on condition of his good behaviour) he pro nised to continue in his great office See Hist August p 237 [Vopisc Probus c 10]

26 Vopiscus in Hist August p 237 [in Probo c 11] The date of the letter is assuredly faulty Instead of Non F brua we may read Non August

27 Hist August p 238 [Vopisc ib c 12] It is odd that the senate should treat Probus less favourably than Marcus Anton nus That prince had received ev n before the death of Pius Jus q i tæ rel t on s See Capitol n in Hist August p 24 [in M Anton c 6]

65 Probus had requested of the senate an equestrian statue and a marble palace, at the public expen e, as a just recompense of the singular merit of Carus Vopiscus in Hist August p 249 [in Caro, c 6]

66 Vopiscus in Hist August p 242, 249 [in Probo, c 24, in Caro, c 3] Julian excludes the emperor Carus and both his sons from the banquet of the Cæsars.

73 Synesius tells this story of Carinus, and it is much more natural to understand it of Carus than (as Petavius and Tillemont choose to do) of Probus

76 Hist August p 250 [Vopisc Carus, c 8] Yet Eutropius, Festus Rufus, the two Victors, Jerome, Sidonius, Apollinaris, Syncellus, and Zonaras, all ascribe the death of Carus to lightning

77 See Nemesian Cynegeticon, v 71, etc

78 See Festus and his commentators, on the word Scribonianum Places struck by lightning were surrounded with a wall, things were buried with mysterious ceremony

79 Vopiscus in Hist August p 250 [Carus, c 9] Aurelius Victor seems to believe the prediction, and to approve the retreat

81 Cancellarius This word, so humble in its origin, has by a singular fortune risen into the title of the first great office of state in the monarchies of Europe See Casaubon and Salmasius, ad Hist August p 253 [Vopisc Carinus, c 15]

82 Vopiscus in Hist August p 253, 254 [id ib c 15, 16] Eutropius, ix 19 [13] Victor Junior The reign of Diocletian indeed was so long and prosperous, that it must have been very unfavourable to the reputation of Carinus

83 Vopiscus in Hist August p 255 [in Carino, 19] He calls him Carus, but the sense is sufficiently obvious, and the words were often confounded

84 See Calphurnius, Eclog vii. 43 We may ob-

92 Maffei l ii c 2 The height was very much exaggerated by the ancients It reached almost to the heavens according to Calphurnius (Eclog vii 23) and surpassed the ken of human sight according to Ammianus Marcellinus (xvi 10) Yet how trifling to the great pyramid of Egypt which rises 500 feet perpendicular! [The height was 157 feet]

93 According to different copies of Victor we read 77 000 or 87 000 spectators but Maffei (l ii c 12) finds room on the open seats for no more than 34 000 The remainder were contained in the upper covered galleries

94 See Maffei l ii c 5–12 He treats the very difficult subject with all possible clearness and like an architect as well as an antiquarian

95 Calphurn Eclog vii 64–73 These lines are curious and the whole eclogue has been of infinite use to Maffei Calphurnius as well as Martial (see his first book) was a poet but when they described the amphitheatre they both wrote from their own senses and to those of the Romans

99. With regard to the time when these Roman games were celebrated Scaliger Salmasius and Cuper have given themselves a great deal of trouble to perplex a very clear subject

100 Nemesianus (in the Cynegeticon [v 80 sqq]) seems to anticipate in his fancy that auspicious day

101 He won all the crowns from Nemesianus with whom he vied in didactic poetry The senate erected a statue to the son of Carus with a very ambiguous inscription To the most powerful of orators See Vopiscus in Hist August p 251 [Numerian c 11]

1 Eutrop ix. 19 [13] Victor in Epitome [c 39] The town seems to have been properly called Doclia from a small tribe of Illyrians (see Cellarius Geograph Antiqua tom i p 393) and the original name of the fortunate slave was probably Docles he first lengthened it to the Grecian harmony of Diocles and at length to the Roman majesty of Diocletianus He likewise assumed the Patrician name of Valerius and it is usually given him by Aurelius Victor

3 Lactantius (or whoever was the author of the little treatise De Mortibus Persecutorum) accuses Diocletian of timidity in two places, c 7, 8 In chap 9 he says of him, "erat in omni tumultu meticulosus et animi disjectus"

4 In this encomium Aurelius Victor seems to convey a just, though indirect, censure of the cruelty of Constantius It appears from the Fasti that Aristobolus remained præfect of the city, and that he ended with Diocletian the consulship which he had commenced with Carinus

5 Aurelius Victor styles Diocletian "Parentem potius quam Dominum" [De Cæsar 39] See Hist August p 30 [Capitol M Anton Phil c 19]

6 The question of the time when Maximian received the honours of Cæsar and Augustus has divided modern critics and given occasion to a great deal of learned wrangling I have followed M de Tillemont (Histoire des Empereurs, tom iv p 500–505), who has weighed the several reasons and difficulties with his scrupulous accuracy

7 In an oration delivered before him (Panegyr Vet i 8) Mamertinus expresses a doubt whether his hero, in imitating the conduct of Hannibal and Scipio, had ever heard of their names From thence we may fairly infer that Maximian was more desirous of being considered as a soldier than as a man of letters and it is in this manner that we can often translate the language of flattery into that of truth

8 Lactantius de M P c 8 Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 39] As among the Panegyrics we find orations pronounced in praise of Maximian, and others which flatter his adversaries at his expense, we derive some knowledge from the contrast

9 See the second and third Panegyrics, particularly iii [ii] 3, 10, 14, but it would be tedious to copy the diffuse and affected expressions of their false eloquence With regard to the titles, consult Aurel Victor, Lactantius de M P c 52 Spanheim de Usu Numismatum, etc Dissertat xii 8

13 Galerius married Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian, if we speak with strictness, Theodora, the wife of Constantius, was daughter only to the wife of Maximian Spanheim, Dissertat xi 2

24 Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 39] calls them Germans Eutropius (ix 21 [13]) gives them the name of Saxons But Eutropius lived in the ensuing century, and seems to use the language of his own times

25 The three expressions of Eutropius [ix 13], Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar 39], and Eumenius, "vilissime natus," 'Bataviæ alumnus," and "Menapiæ civis," gives us a very doubtful account of the birth of Carausius Dr Stukely however (Hist of Carausius p 62), chooses to make him a native of St David s and a prince of the blood royal of Britain The former idea he had found in Richard of Cirencester, p 44

26 Panegyr v 12 Britain at this time was secure, and slightly guarded

27 Panegyr Vet v 11, vii 9 The orator Eumenius wished to exalt the glory of the hero (Constantius) with the importance of the conquest Notwithstanding our laudable partiality for our native country, it is difficult to conceive that, in the beginning of the fourth century, England deserved all these commendations A century and a half before it hardly paid its own establishment See Appian in Proœm

28 As a great number of medals of Carausius are still preserved, he is become a very favourite object of antiquarian curiosity and every circumstance of his life and actions has been investigated with sagacious accuracy Dr Stukely in particular has devoted a large volume to the British emperor I have used his materials, and rejected most of his fanciful conjectures

29 When Mamertinus pronounced his first panegyric the naval preparations of Maximian were completed and the orator presaged an assured victory His silence in the second panegyric might alone inform us that the expedition had not succeeded

30. Aurelius Victor Eutropius and the medals (Pax Augg) inform us of this temporary reconciliation though I will not presume (as Dr Stukely has done Medallic History of Carausius p 86 etc) to insert the identical articles of the treaty

53 If we give credit to the younger Victor [Epit. 41] who supposes that in the year 323 Licinius was only sixty years of age he could scarcely be the same person as the patron of Tiridates but we know from much better authority (Euseb. Hist. Ecclesiast l x c 8) that Licinius was at that time in the last period of old age sixteen years before he is represented with grey hairs and as the contemporary of Galerius See Lactant c 32 Licinius was probably born about the year 250.

56 The Armenian nobility was numerous and powerful Moses mentions many families which were distinguished under the reign of Valarsaces (l ii 7) and which still subsisted in his own time about the middle of the fifth century See the preface of his editors

57 She was named Chosroiduchta and had not the os patulum like other women (Hist Armen. l ii c 79) I do not understand the expression.

59. Vou ti the first emperor of the seventh dynasty who then reigned in China had political transactions with Fergana, a province of Sogdiana, and is said to have received a Roman embassy (Histoire des Huns, tom 1 p 38) In those ages the Chinese kept a garrison at Kashgar, and one of their generals, about the time of Trajan, marched as far as the Caspian Sea With regard to the intercourse between China and the western countries, a curious memoir of M de Guignes may be consulted, in the Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxii p 355

62 Moses of Chorene takes no notice of this second revolution, which I have been obliged to collect from a passage of Ammianus Marcellinus (l xxiii c 5) Lactantius speaks of the ambition of Narses "Concitatus domesticis exemplis avi sui Saporis ad occupandum orientem magnis copiis inhiabat" De Mort Persecut c 9

63 We may readily believe that Lactantius ascribes to cowardice the conduct of Diocletian Julian, in his oration, says that he remained with all the forces of the empire a very hyperbolical expression

64 Our five abbreviators, Eutropius, Festus, the two Victors, and Orosius, all relate the last and great battle but Orosius is the only one who speaks of the two former

65 The nature of the country is finely described by Plutarch, in the Life of Crassus and by Xenophon, in the first book of the Anabasis

72 The story is told by Ammianus, l xxii Instead of saccum some read scutum

73 The Persians confessed the Roman superiority in morals as well as in arms Eutrop ix 24 But this respect and gratitude of enemies is very seldom to be found in their own accounts

74 The account of the negotiation is taken from the fragments of Peter the Patrician, in the Excerpta Legationum published in the Byzantine Collection Peter lived under Justinian, but it is very evident, by the nature of his materials, that they are drawn from the most authentic and respectable writers

75 Adeo Victor (says Aurelius [de Cæsar c 39]) ut ni Valerius, cujus nutu omnia gerebantur, abnuisset, Romani fasces in provinciam novam ferrentur Verum pars terrarum tamen nobis utilior quæsita

76 He had been governor of Sumium (Pet Patricius in Excerpt Legat p 30) [ed Paris p 21, ed Ven p 135, ed Bonn] This province seems to be mentioned by Moses of Chorene (Geograph p 360), and lay to the east of Mount Ararat

77 By an error of the geographer Ptolemy, the position of Singara is removed from the Aboras to the Tigris, which may have produced the mistake of Peter in assigning the latter river for the boundary instead of the former The line of the Roman frontier traversed, but never followed, the course of the Tigris

78 Procopius de Ædificiis, l ii c 6

79 Three of the provinces, Zabdicene, Arzanene, and Carduene, are allowed on all sides But instead of the other two, Peter (in Excerpt Leg p 30) inserts Rehimene and Sophene I have preferred Ammianus (l xxv 7), because it might be proved that Sophene was never in the hands of the Persians, either before the reign of Diocletian or after that of Jovian For want of correct maps, like those of M d'Anville, almost all the moderns, with Tillemont and Valesius at their head, have imagined that it was in respect to Persia, and not to Rome, that the five provinces were situate beyond the Tigris discovery of the treatise De Mortibus Persecutorum it was not certain that the triumph and the Vicennalia were celebrated at the same time

86 At the time of the Vicennalia Galerius seems to have kept his station on the Danube See Lactant de M P c 38

87 Eutropius (ix 27 [16]) mentions them as a part of the triumph As the persons had been restored to Narses nothing more than their images could be exhibited

88 Livy gives us a speech of Camillus on that subject (v 51 54) full of eloquence and sensibility in opposition to a design of removing the seat of government from Rome to the neighbouring city of Veii

89. Julius Cæsar was reproached with the intention of removing the empire to Ilium or Alexandria See Sueton in Cæsar c 79 According to the ingenious conjecture of Le Fèvre and Dacier the third ode of the third book of Horace was intended to divert Augustus from the execution of a similar design

90 See Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 39] who likewise mentions the buildings erected by Maximian at Carthage probably during the Moorish war We shall insert some verses of Ausonius de Clar Urb v —

107 The particulars of the journey and illness are taken from Lactantius (c 17) who may sometimes be admitted as an evidence of public facts, though very seldom of private anecdotes

108 Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 39] ascribes the abdication which had been so variously accounted for to two causes first Diocletian's contempt of ambition and secondly his apprehension of impending troubles One of the panegyrists (vi [v] 9) mentions the age and infirmities of Diocletian as a very natural reason for his retirement

109. The difficulties as well as mistakes attending th dates both of the year and of the day of Diocletian's abdication are perfectly cleared up by

117 Adam's Antiquities of Diocletian's Palace at Spalatro, p 6 We may add a circumstance or two from the Abate Fortis the little stream of the Hyader, mentioned by Lucan, produces most exquisite trout, which a sagacious writer, perhaps a monk, supposes to have been one of the principal reasons that determined Diocletian in the choice of his retirement Fortis, p 45 The same author (p 38) observes that a taste for agriculture is reviving at Spalatro, and that an experimental farm has lately been established near the city by a society of gentlemen

123 The orator Eumenius was secretary to the emperors Maximian and Constantius, and Professor of Rhetoric in the college of Autun His salary was six hundred thousand sesterces, which, according to the lowest computation of that age, must have exceeded three thousand pounds a year He generously requested the permission of employing it in rebuilding the college See his Oration De Restaurandis Scholis [c 11], which, though not exempt from vanity, may atone for his panegyrics

124 Porphyry died about the time of Diocletian s abdication The life of his master Plotinus, which he composed, will give us the most complete idea of the genius of the sect and the manners of its professors This very curious piece is inserted in Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, tom IV p 88-148

1 M de Montesquieu (Considérations sur la Grandeur et la Decadence des Romains, c 17) supposes, on the authority of Orosius and Eusebius, that, on this occasion, the empire, for the first time, was really divided into two parts It is difficult, however, to discover in what respect the plan of Galerius differed from that of Diocletian

4 Lactantius de Mort Persecutor c 18 Were the particulars of this conference more consistent with truth and decency, we might still ask how they came to the knowledge of an obscure rhetorician? But there are many historians who put us in mind of the admirable saying of the great Condé to Cardinal de Retz "Ces coquins nous font parler et agir comme ils auroient fait eux memes à norte place"

5 Sublatus nuper a pecoribus et silvis (says Lactantius de M P c 19) statim Scutarius, continuo Protector, mox Tribunus, postridie Cæsar, accepit Orientem Aurelius Victor is too giving him the whole portion of Diocletian

6 His diligence and fidelity are acknowledged even by Lactantius de M P c 18

7 These schemes however rest only on the very doubtful authority of Lactantius de M P c 20

8 This tradition unknown to the contemporaries of Constantine was invented in the darkness of monasteries was embellished by Jeffrey of Monmouth and the writers of the twelfth century has been defended by our antiquarians of the last age and is seriously related in the ponderous History of England compiled by Mr Carte (vol 1 p 147) He transports however the kingdom of Coil the imaginary father of Helena from Essex to the wall of Antoninus

9 Eutropius (x 2) expresses in a few words the real truth and the occasion of the error ex obscuriori matrimonio ejus filius Zosimus (l. ii [c 8] p 78) eagerly seized the most unfavourable report and is followed by Orosius (vii 25) whose authority is oddly enough overlooked by the indefatigable but partial Tillemont By insisting on the divorce of Helena Diocletian acknowledged her marriage

10 There are three opinions with regard to the place of Constantine s birth 1 Our English antiquarians were used to dwell with rapture on the words of his panegyrist Britannias illic oriendo nobiles fecisti But this celebrated passage may be referred with as much propriety to the accession as to the nativity of Constantine 2 Some of the modern Greeks have ascribed the honour of his birth to Drepanum a town on the gulf of Nicomedia (Cellarius tom ii. p 174) which Constantine dignified with the name of Helenopolis and Justinian adorned with many splendid buildings (Procop de Edificiis v 2) It is indeed probable enough that Helena s father kept an inn at Drepanum and that Constantius might lodge there when he returned from a Persian embassy in the reign of Aurelian But in the wandering life of a soldier the place of his marriage and the places where his children are born have very little connection with each other 3 The claim of Naissus is supported by the anonymous writer published at the end of Ammianus p 710 [vol ii p 295 ed Bip] and who in general copied very good materials and it is confirmed by Julius Firmicus (de Astrologia, l 1 c 4) who flourished under the reign of Constantine himself Some objections have been raised against the integrity of the text and the application of the passage of Firmicus but the former is established by the best MSS and the latter is very ably defended by Lipsius de Magnitudine Romana l. iv c 11 et Supplement

12 Galerius or perhaps his own courage exposed him to single combat with a Sarmatian (Anonym p. 710) and with a monstrous lion See Praxagoras apud Photium p 63 Praxagoras an Athenian philosopher had written a life of Constantine in two books which are now lost He was a contemporary

13 Zosimus l ii [c 8] p 78 79 Lactantius de M P c 24 The former tells a very foolish story that Constantine caused all the post horses which he had used to be hamstrung Such a bloody execution without preventing a pursuit, would have scattered suspicions and might have stopped his journey

14. Anonym p 710 Panegyr Veter vii. 7 But Zosimus l ii [c 9] p 79 Eusebius de Vit. Constant l. i c 21 and Lactantius de M P c. 24 suppose with less accuracy that he found his father on his death bed

15 Cunctis qui aderant annitentibus sed præcipue Croco (alii Eroco) [Erich?] Alemannorum Rege auxilii gratiâ Constantium comitato imperium capit Victor Junior c 41 This is perhaps the first instance of a barbarian king who assisted the Roman arms with an independent body of his own subjects The practice grew familiar and at last became fatal

16 His panegyrist Eumenius (vii 8) ventures to affirm in the presence of Constantine that he put spurs to his horse and tried but in vain to escape from the hands of his soldiers

17 Lactantius de M P c 25 Eumenius (vii. 8) gives a rhetorical turn to the whole transaction

18. The choice of Constantine by his dying father which is warranted by reason and insinuated by Eumenius seems to be confirmed by the most unexceptionable authority the concurring evidence of Lactantius (de M P c 24) and of Libanius (Oratio 1) of Eusebius (in Vit. Constantin. l 1 c 21) and of Julian (Oratio I [p 7])

19 Of the three sisters of Constantine Constantia married the emperor Licinius Anastasia the Cæsar Bassianus and Eutropia the consul Nepotianus The three brothers were Dalmatius, Julius Constantius and Annibalianus of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter

20 See Gruter Inscrip p 178 The six princes are all mentioned Diocletian and Maximian as the senior Augusti and fathers of the emperors. They jointly dedicate for the use of their own Romans this magnificent edifice The architects have delineated the ruins of these Thermæ and the antiquarians particularly Donatus and Nardini have ascertained the ground which they covered. One of the great rooms is now the Carthusian church and even one of the porter's lodges is sufficient to form another church which belongs to the Feuillans

22 The sixth Panegyric represents the conduct of Maximian in the most favourable light and the ambiguous expression of Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 40] retractante diu may signify either that he contrived or that he opposed the conspiracy See Zosimus l ii [c 9] p 79 and Lactantius de M P c. 26

23 The circumstances of this war and the death of Severus are very doubtfully and variously told in our ancient fragments (see Tillemont Hist.

des Empereurs, tom iv part 1 p 555) I have endeavoured to extract from them a consistent and probable narration

24 The sixth Panegyric was pronounced to celebrate the elevation of Constantine, but the prudent orator avoids the mention either of Galerius or of Maxentius He introduces only one slight allusion to the actual troubles, and to the majesty of Rome

25 With regard to this negotiation, see the fragments of an anonymous historian, published by Valesius at the end of his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus, p 711 These fragments have furnished us with several curious, and, as it should seem, authentic anecdotes

26 Lactantius de M P c 27 The former of these reasons is probably taken from Virgil's Shepherd "Illam ego huic nostræ similem, Melibœe, putavi, etc " Lactantius delights in these poetical allusions

27 Castra super Tusci si ponere Tybridis undas (jubeas)
Hesperios audax veniam metator in agros
Tu quoscunque voles in planum effundere muros;
His aries actus disperget saxa lacertis,
Illa licet penitus tolli quam jusseris urbem
Roma sit Lucan Pharsal 1 381.

28 Lactantius de M P c 27 Zosim l ii [c 10] p 82 The latter insinuates that Constantine, in his interview with Maximian, had promised to declare war against Galerius

29 M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv part 1 p 559) has proved that Licinius, without passing through the intermediate rank of Cæsar, was declared Augustus, the 11th of November, A D 307, after the return of Galerius from Italy

30 Lactantius de M P c 32 When Galerius declared Licinius Augustus with himself, he tried to satisfy his younger associates, by inventing for Constantine and Maximin (not Maxentius, see Baluze, p 81) the new title of sons of the Augusti But when Maximin acquainted him that he had been saluted Augustus by the army, Galerius was obliged to acknowledge him, as well as Constantine, as equal associates in the Imperial dignity

31 See Panegyr Vet vi [v] 9 Audi doloris nostri liberam vocem, etc The whole passage is imagined with artful flattery, and expressed with an easy flow of eloquence

32 Lactantius de M P c 28 Zosim l ii [c 11] p 82 A report was spread that Maxentius was the son of some obscure Syrian, and had been substituted by the wife of Maximian as her own child See Aurelius Victor [Epit 40], Anonym Vales an [§12], and Panegyr Vet ix. 3, 4

33 Ab urbe pulsum, ab Italia fugatum, ab Illyrico repudiatum, tuis provinciis, tuis copiis, tuo palatio recepisti Eumen in Panegyr Vet vii [vi] 14.

34 Lactantius de M P c 29 Yet after the resignation of the purple, Constantine still continued to Maximian the pomp and honours of the Imperial dignity, and on all public occasions gave the right-hand place to his father in law Panegyr Vet viii 15

35 Zosim l ii [c 11] p 82 Eumenius in Panegyr Vet vii 16-21 The latter of these has undoubtedly represented the whole affair in the most favourable light for his sovereign Yet even from this partial narrative we may conclude that the repeated clemency of Constantine, and the reiterated treasons of Maximian, as they are described by Lactantius (de M P c 29 30), and copied by the moderns, are destitute of any historical foundation

36 Aurelius Victor, c 40 But that lake was situated on the upper Pannonia, near the borders of Noricum, and the province of Valeria (a name which the wife of Galerius gave to the drained country) undoubtedly lay between the Drave and the Danube (Sextus Rufus, c 8) I should therefore suspect that Victor has confounded the lake Pelso with the Volocean marshes, or, as they are now called, the lake Sabaton It is placed in the heart of Valeria, and its present extent is not less than twelve Hungarian miles (about seventy English) in length, and two in breadth See Severini Pannonia, l 1 c 9

37 Lactantius (de M P c 33) and Eusebius (l viii c 16) describe the symptoms and progress of his disorder with singular accuracy and apparent pleasure

38 If any (like the late Dr Jortin, Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol ii p 307 356) still delight in recording the wonderful deaths of the persecutors, I would recommend to their perusal an admirable passage of Grotius (Hist l vii p 332) concerning the last illness of Philip II of Spain

39 See Eusebius, l ix 6, 10 Lactantius de M. P. c 36 Zosimus is less exact, and evidently confounds Maximian with Maximin

40 See the eighth Panegyr, in which Eumenius displays, in the presence of Constantine, the misery and the gratitude of the city of Autun

41 Eutropius, x 2 Panegyr Veter vii 10 11, 12 A great number of the French youth were likewise exposed to the same cruel and ignominious death

42 Julian excludes Maxentius from the banquet of the Cæsars with abhorrence and contempt and Zosimus (l ii [c 14] p 85) accuses him of every kind of cruelty and profligacy

43 Zosimus, l ii [c 14] p 83 85 Aurelius Victor [Cæsar 40]

44 The passage of Aurelius Victor (l c] should be read in the following manner Primus instituto pessimo, munerum specie, Patres Oratoresque pecuniam conferre prodigenti sibi cogeret

45 Panegyr Vet ix 3 Euseb Hist Eccles viii. 14, et in Vit Constant 1 33, 34. Rufinus c. 17 The virtuous matron, who stabbed herself to escape the violence of Maxentius, was a Christian, wife to the præfect of the city, and her name was Sophronia It still remains a question among the casuists Whether on such occasions suicide is justifiable?

46 Prætorianis cædem vulgi quondam annuerit is the vague expression of Aurelius Victor [Cæsar 40] See more particular though somewhat different accounts of a tumult and massacre which happened at Rome in Eusebius (l viii c 14) and in Zosimus (l ii [c 13] p 84)

47 See in the Panegyrics (ix. 14) a lively description of the indolence and vain pride of Maxentius In another place [ib c 3] the orator observes that the riches which Rome had accumulated in a period of 1060 years were lavished by the tyrant on his mercenary bands redemptis ad civile latrocinium manibus ingesserat

48 After the victory of Constantine it was universally allowed that the motive of delivering the republic from a detested tyrant would at any time have justified his expedition into Italy Euseb in Vit Constantin l i c 26 Panegyr Vet ix 2

50 See Panegyr Vet ix [viii] 2 Omnibus fere tuis Comitibus et Ducibus non solum tacite mussantibus sed etiam aperte timentibus contra consilia hominum contra Haruspicum monita ipse per temet liberandæ urbis tempus venisse sentires The embassy of the Romans is mentioned only by Zonaras (l xiii [c 1]) and by Cedrenus (in Compend Hist p 270 [ed Paris vol. 1 p 474 ed Bonn]) but those modern Greeks had the opportunity of consulting many writers which have since been lost among which we may reckon the Life of Constantine by Praxagoras Photius (p 63) has made a short extract from that historical work

51 Zosimus (l ii [c 15] p 86) has given us this curious account of the forces on both sides He makes no mention of any naval armaments though we are assured (Panegyr Vet ix. 25) that the war was carried on by sea as well as by land and that the fleet of Constantine took possession of Sardinia Corsica and the ports of Italy

52 Panegyr Vet ix. 3 It is not surprising that the orator should diminish the numbers with which his sovereign achieved the conquest of Italy but it appears somewhat singular that he should esteem the tyrant's army at no more than 100 000 men.

53 The three principal passages of the Alps between Gaul and Italy are those of Mount St Bernard Mount Cenis and Mount Genevre Tradition and a resemblance of names (Alpes Penninæ) had assigned the first of these for the march of Hannibal (see Simler de Alpibus) The Chevalier de Folard (Polyb tom iv) and M d Anville have led him over Mount Genevre But notwithstanding the authority of an experienced officer and a learned geographer the pretensions of Mount Cenis are supported in a specious not to say a convincing manner by M Grosley Observations sur l Italie tom 1 p 40 etc

54 La Brunette near Suse Demont Exiles, Fenestrelles Coni etc

55 See Ammian Marcellin xv 10 His description of the roads over the Alps is clear lively and accurate

56 Zosimus as well as Eusebius hasten from the passage of the Alps to the decisive action near Rome We must apply to the two Panegyrics for the intermediate actions of Constantine

57 The Marquis Maffei has examined the siege and battle of Verona with that degree of attention and accuracy which was due to a memorable action that happened in his native country The fortifications of that city constructed by Gallienus, were less extensive than the modern walls, and the amphitheatre was not included within their circumference See Verona Illustrata part 1. p 142 150

61 Remedia malorum potius quam mala differebat is the fine censure which Tacitus passes on the supine indolence of Vitellius

62 The Marquis Maffei has made it extremely probable that Constantine was still at Verona, the 1st of September A D 312 and that the memorable era of the Indictions was dated from his conquest of the Cisalpine Gaul.

63 See Panegyr Vet xi 16 [ix 14?] Lactantius de M P c 44

64 Illo die hostem Romanorum esse periturum. [Lact l c] The vanquished prince became of course the enemy of Rome

65 See Panegyr Vet ix 16 x 27 The former of these orators magnifies the hoards of corn which Maxentius had collected from Africa and the islands And yet if there is any truth in the scarcity mentioned by Eusebius (in Vit Constantin. l. i c. 36) the Imperial granaries must have been open only to the soldiers

66 Maxentius tandem urbe in Saxa Rubra, millia ferme novem ægerrime progressus Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar 40] See Cellarius Geograph. Antiq tom. 1 p 463 Saxa Rubra was in the neighborhood of the Cremera a trifling rivulet, illustrated by the valour and glorious death of the three hundred Fabii

67 The post which Maxentius had taken, with the Tiber in his rear is very clearly described by the two Panegyrists ix 16 x 28

68 Exceptis latrocinii illius primis auctoribus, qui desperatâ veniâ locum quem pugnæ sumpserant texere corporibus Panegyr Vet ix 17

69 A very idle rumour soon prevailed, that

Maxentius, who had not taken any precaution for his own retreat, had contrived a very artful snare to destroy the army of the pursuers, but that the wooden bridge, which was to have been loosened on the approach of Constantine, unluckily broke down under the weight of the flying Italians M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv part i p 576) very seriously examines whether, in contradiction to common sense, the testimony of Eusebius and Zosimus ought to prevail over the silence of Lactantius, Nazarius, and the anonymous but contemporary orator who composed the ninth Panegyric

70 Zosimus, l ii [c 15, sq] p 86–88, and the two Panegyrics, the former of which was pronounced a few months afterwards, afford the clearest notion of this great battle Lactantius, Eusebius, and even the Epitomes, supply several useful hints

71 Zosimus, the enemy of Constantine, allows (l ii [c 17] p 88) that only a few of the friends of Maxentius were put to death, but we may remark the expressive passage of Nazarius (Panegyr Vet x 6) Omnibus qui labefactari statum ejus poterant cum stirpe deletis The other orator (Panegyr Vet ix 20, 21) contents himself with observing that Constantine, when he entered Rome, did not imitate the cruel massacres of Cinna, of Marius, or of Sylla

72 See the two Panegyrics, and the laws of this and the ensuing year, in the Theodosian Code

73 Panegyr Vet ix 20 Lactantius de M P c 44 Maximin, who was confessedly the eldest Cæsar, claimed, with some show of reason, the first rank among the Augusti

75 Prætoriæ legiones ac subsidia factionibus aptiora quam urbi Romæ, sublata penitus simul arma atque usus indumenti militaris Aurelius Victor [l c] Zosimus (l ii [c 17] p 89) mentions this fact as an historian, and it is very pompously celebrated in the ninth Panegyric

76 Ex omnibus provinciis optimates viros Curiæ tuæ pigneraveris, ut Senatûs dignitas ex totius Orbis flore consisterat Nazarius in Panegyr Vet x [ix] 35 The word pigneraveris might almost seem maliciously chosen Concerning the senatorial tax, see Zosimus, l ii [c 38] p 115, the second title of the sixth book of the Theodosian Code, with Godefroy's Commentary and Memoires de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxviii p 726

77 From the Theodosian Code we may now begin to trace the motions of the emperors, but the dates both of time and place have frequently been altered by the carelessness of transcribers

78 Zosimus (l. ii [c. 17] p 89) observes, that before the war the sister of Constantine had been betrothed to Licinius According to the younger Victor [Epit c 39], Diocletian was invited to the nuptials, but having ventured to plead his age and infirmities, he received a second letter filled with reproaches for his supposed partiality to the cause of Maxentius and Maximin

79 Zosimus mentions the defeat and death of Maximin as ordinary events, but Lactantius expatiates on them (de M P c 45 50), ascribing them to the miraculous interposition of Heaven Licinius at that time was one of the protectors of the church

80 Lactantius de M P c 50 Aurelius Victor touches on the different conduct of Licinius, and of Constantine, in the use of victory

81 The sensual appetites of Maximin were gratified at the expense of his subjects His eunuchs, who forced away wives and virgins, examined their naked charms with anxious curiosity, lest any part of their body should be found unworthy of the royal embraces Coyness and disdain were considered as treason, and the obstinate fair one was condemned to be drowned A custom was gradually introduced that no person should marry a wife without the permission of the emperor, "ut ipse in omnibus nuptiis prægustator esset" Lactantius de M P c 38

83 Diocletian at last sent cognatum suum, quendam militarem ac potentem virum, to intercede in favour of his daughter (Lactantius de M P c 41) We are not sufficiently acquainted with the history of these times to point out the person who was employed

84 Valeria quoque per varias provincias quindecim mensibus plebeio cultû pervagata Lactantius de M P c 51 There is some doubt whether we should compute the fifteen months from the moment of her exile, or from that of her escape The expression of pervagata seems to denote the latter, but in that case we must suppose that the treatise of Lactantius was written after the first civil war between Licinius and Constantine See Cuper, p 254

85 Ita illis pudicitia et conditio exitio fuit Lactantius de M P c 51 He relates the misfortunes of the innocent wife and daughter of Diocletian with a very natural mixture of pity and exultation

86 The curious reader who consults the Valesian Fragment, p 713, will probably accuse me of giving a bold and licentious paraphrase, but if he considers it with attention, he will acknowledge that my interpretation is probable and consistent.

87 The situation of Æmona, or, as it is now called, Laybach, in Carniola (d Anville, Géographie Ancienne, tom i p 187), may suggest a conjecture As it lay to the north-east of the Julian Alps, that important territory became a object of dispute between the sovereigns of and of Illyricum

88 Cibalis or Cibalæ (whose name is served in the obscure ruins of Swilei) was situated about fifty miles from Sirmium the capital of Illyricum and about one hundred from Taurunum or Belgrade and the conflux of the Danube and the Save The Roman garrisons and cities on those rivers are finely illustrated by M d Anville in a memoir inserted in l Académie des Inscriptions tom xxviii

89 Zosimus (l ii [c 18] p 90 91) gives a very particular account of this battle but the descriptions of Zosimus are rhetorical rather than military

90 Zosimus l ii [c 19] p 92 93 Anonym Valesian p 713 The Epitomes furnish some circumstances but they frequently confound the two wars between Licinius and Constantine

91 Petrus Patricius in Excerpt Legat p 27 [ed Paris p 19 ed Ven p 129 ed Bonn] If it should be thought that γάμβρος signifies more properly a son in law we might conjecture that Constantine assuming the name as well as the duties of a father had adopted his younger brothers and sisters the children of Theodora But in the best authors γάμβρος sometimes signifies a husband sometimes a father in law and sometimes a kinsman in general See Spanheim Observat ad Julian Orat 1 p 72

97 Eusebius (in Vitâ Constant l. iii c 1) chooses to affirm that in the reign of this hero the sword of justice hung idle in the hands of the magistrates Eusebius himself (l iv c 29 54) and the Theodosian Code will inform us that this excessive lenity was not owing to the want either of atrocious criminals or of penal laws.

98 Nazarius in Panegyr Vet x [36] The victory of Crispus over the Alemanni is expressed on some medals

99 See Zosimus l ii [c 21] p 93 94 the narrative of that historian is neither clear nor consistent The Panegyric of Optatianus (c. 32) mentions the alliance of the Sarmatians with the Carpi and Getæ and points out the several fields of battle It is supposed that the Sarmatian games, celebrated in the month of November derived their origin from the success of this war

100 In the Cæsars of Julian (p 329 Commentaire de Spanheim p 25) Constantine boasts that he had recovered the province (Dacia) which Trajan had subdued But it is insinuated by Silenus that the conquests of Constantine were like the gardens of Adonis which fade and wither almost the moment they appear

107 Zosimus l ii [c 22] p 95 96 This great battle is described in the Valesian fragment (p. 714) [ad fin Amm Marcell. vol ii p 300 ed. 110 Eusebius (in Vitâ Constantin l ii c 16, 17) ascribes this decisive victory to the pious prayers of the emperor The Valesian fragment (p 714) [Amm Marcell vol ii p 301, ed Bip] mentions a body of Gothic auxiliaries, under their chief Aliquaca, who adhered to the party of Licinius

8 Jussi a Caio Cesare, effigiem ejus in templo locare, arma potius sumpsere Tacit Hist v 9 Philo and Josephus give a very circumstantial, but a very rhetorical, account of this transaction, which exceedingly perplexed the governor of Syria At the first mention of this idolatrous proposal king Agrippa fainted away, and did not recover his senses until the third day

9 For the enumeration of the Syrian and Arabian deities, it may be observed that Milton has comprised in one hundred and thirty very beautiful lines the two large and learned syntagmas which Selden had composed on that abstruse subject

10 "How long will this people provoke me? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shown among them?" (Numbers xiv 11) It would be easy, but it would be unbecoming to justify the complaint of the Deity from the whole tenor of the Mosaic history

11 All that relates to the Jewish proselytes has been very ably treated by Basnage, Hist des Juifs, l v c 6, 7

13 When Pompey, using or abusing the right of conquest, entered into the Holy of Holies, it was observed with amazement, "Nullâ intus Deum effigie, vacuam sedem et inania arcana" Tacit Hist v 9 It was a popular saying, with regard to the Jews,

Nil præter nubes et cœli numen adorant

14 A second kind of circumcision was inflicted on a Samaritan or Egyptian proselyte The sullen indifference of the Talmudists, with respect to the conversion of strangers, may be seen in Basnage, Histoire des Juifes, l v c 6

15 These arguments were urged with great ingenuity by the Jew Orobio, and refuted with equal ingenuity and candour by the Christian Limborch See the Amica Collatio (it well deserves that name), or account of the dispute between

19 Eusebius l iii c 5 Le Clerc Hist Ecclesiast p 605 During this occasional absence the bishop and church of Pella still retained the title of Jerusalem In the same manner the Roman pontiffs resided seventy years at Avignon and the patriarchs of Alexandria have long since transferred their episcopal seat to Cairo

20 Dion Cassius l lxix [c 12] The exile of the Jewish nation from Jerusalem is attested by Aristo of Pella (apud Euseb l iv c 6) and is mentioned by several ecclesiastical writers though some of them too hastily extend this interdiction to the whole country of Palestine

21 Eusebius l iv c 6 Sulpicius Severus ii 31 By comparing their unsatisfactory accounts Mosheim (p 327 etc) has drawn out a very distinct representation of the circumstances and motives of this revolution

22 Le Clerc (Hist Ecclesiast p 477 535) seems to have collected from Eusebius Jerome Epiphanius and other writers all the principal circumstances that relate to the Nazarenes or Ebionites The nature of their opinions soon divided them into a stricter and a milder sect and there is some reason to conjecture that the family of Jesus Christ remained members at least of the latter and more moderate party

23 Some writers have been pleased to create an Ebion the imaginary author of their sect and name But we can more safely rely on the learned Eusebius than on the vehement Tertullian or the credulous Epiphanius According to Le Clerc the Hebrew word Ebjonim may be translated into Latin by that of Pauperes See Hist Ecclesiast p 477

24 See the very curious Dialogue of Justin Martyr with the Jew Tryphon The conference between them was held at Ephesus in the reign of Antoninus Pius and about twenty years after the return of the church of Pella to Jerusalem For this date consult the accurate note of Tillemont Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom ii p 511

25 Of all the systems of Christianity that of Abyssinia is the only one which still adheres to the Mosaic rites (Geddes's Church History of Æthiopia and Dissertations de La Grand sur la Relation du P Lobo) The eunuch of the queen Candace might suggest some suspicions but as we are assured (Socrates i 19 Sozomen ii 24 Ludolphus p 281) that the Æthiopians were not converted till the fourth century it is more reasonable to believe that they respected the sabbath, and distinguished the forbidden meats in imitation of the Jews who in a very early period were seated on both sides of the Red Sea Circumcision had been practised by the most ancient Æthiopians, from motives of health and cleanliness which seem to be explained in the Recherches Philosophiques sur les Américains tom ii p 117

26 Beausobre Histoire du Manichéisme l i c 3 has stated their objections particularly those of Faustus the adversary of Augustin with the most learned impartiality

27 Apud ipsos fides obstinata misericordia in promptû adversus omnes alios hostile odium. Tacit Hist v 5 Surely Tacitus had seen the Jews with too favourable an eye The perusal of Josephus must have destroyed the antithesis

28 Dr Burnet (Archæologia l ii c 7) has discussed the first chapters of Genesis with too much wit and freedom

29 The milder Gnostics considered Jehovah, the Creator as a Being of a mixed nature between God and the Dæmon Others confounded him with the evil principle Consult the second century of the general history of Mosheim which gives a very distinct though concise account of their strange opinions on this subject

30 See Beausobre Hist du Manichéisme l i c 4 Origen and St Augustin were among the allegorists

31 Hegesippus ap Euseb l iii 32 iv 22. Clemens Alexandrin Stromat vii 17

32 In the account of the Gnostics of the second and third centuries Mosheim is ingenious and candid Le Clerc dull but exact Beausobre almost always an apologist and it is much to be feared that the primitive fathers are very frequently calumniators

33 See the catalogues of Irenæus and Epiphanius It must indeed be allowed that those writers were inclined to multiply the number of sects which opposed the unity of the church.

34 Eusebius l. iv c 15 Sozomen l. ii c 32. See in Bayle in the article of Marcion a curious detail of a dispute on that subject It should seem that some of the Gnostics (the Basilidians) declined, and even refused the honour of martyrdom. Their reasons were singular and abstruse See Mosheim, p 539

35 See a very remarkable passage of Origen (Proem ad Lucam) That indefatigable writer who had consumed his life in the study of the Scriptures relies for their authenticity on the inspired authority of the church It was impossible that the Gnostics could receive our present Gospels many parts of which (particularly in the resurrection of Christ) are directly, and as it might seem designedly, pointed against their favourite tenets It is therefore somewhat singular that Ignatius (Epist ad Smyrn Patr Apostol tom ii p 34) should choose to employ a vague and doubtful tradition, instead of quoting the certain testimony of the evangelists

36 Faciunt favos et vespæ, faciunt ecclesias et Marcionitæ, is the strong expression of Tertullian, which I am obliged to quote from memory [Adv Marcion, iv 5] In the time of Epiphanius (advers Hæreses, p 302 [ed Paris, 1622]) the Marcionites were very numerous in Italy, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, and Persia

37 Augustin is a memorable instance of this gradual progress from reason to faith He was, during several years, engaged in the Manichæan sect

38 The unanimous sentiment of the primitive church is very clearly explained by Justin Martyr, Apolog Major [c 25, p 59, ed Bened], by Athenagoras, Legat c 22, etc, and by Lactantius, Institut Divin ii 14-19

39 Tertullian (Apolog c 23) alleges the confession of the dæmons themselves as often as they were tormented by the Christian exorcists

40 Tertullian has written a most severe treatise against idolatry, to caution his brethren against the hourly danger of incurring that guilt Recogita silvam, et quantæ latitant spinæ De Coronâ Militis c 10

41 The Roman senate was always held in a temple or consecrated place (Aulus Gellius, xiv 7) Before they entered on business, every senator dropped some wine and frankincense on the altar Sueton in August c 35

42 See Tertullian, De Spectaculis This severe reformer shows no more indulgence to a tragedy of Euripides than to a combat of gladiators The dress of the actors particularly offends him By the use of the lofty buskin they impiously strive to add a cubit to their stature c 23

43 The ancient practice of concluding the entertainment with libations may be found in every classic Socrates and Seneca, in their last moments, made a noble application of this custom Postremo stagnum calidæ aquæ introit, respergens proximos servorum, additâ voce, libare se liquorem illum Jovi Liberatori Tacit Annal xv 64

44 See the elegant but idolatrous hymn of Catullus on the nuptials of Manlius and Julia O Hymen, Hymenæe Io! Quis huic Deo compararier ausit?

45 The ancient funerals (in those of Misenus and Pallas) are no less accurately described by Virgil than they are illustrated by his commentator Servius The pile itself was an altar, the flames were fed with the blood of victims, and all the assistants were sprinkled with lustral water

46 Tertullian de Idololatria, c 11

47 See every part of Montfaucon's Antiquities Even the reverses of the Greek and Roman coins were frequently of an idolatrous nature Here, indeed, the scruples of the Christian were suspended by a stronger passion

48 Tertullian de Idololatria, c 20, 21, 22 If a Pagan friend (on the occasion perhaps of sneezing) used the familiar expression of "Jupiter bless you," the Christian was obliged to protest against the divinity of Jupiter

49 Consult the most laboured work of Ovid, his imperfect Fasti He finished no more than the first six months of the year The compilation of Macrobius is called the Saturnalia, but it is only a small part of the first book that bears any relation to the title

50 Tertullian has composed a defence, or rather panegyric, of the rash action of a Christian soldier, who, by throwing away his crown of laurel, had exposed himself and his brethren to the most imminent danger By the mention of the emperors (Severus and Caracalla) it is evident, notwithstanding the wishes of M de Tillemont, that Tertullian composed his treatise De Coronâ long before he was engaged in the errors of the Montanists See Memoires Ecclésiastiques, tom iii p 384

51 In particular, the first book of the Tusculan Questions, and the treatise De Senectute, and the Somnium Scipionis, contain, in the most beautiful language, everything that Grecian philosophy or Roman good sense could possibly suggest on this dark but important object

52 The pre existence of human souls, so far at least as that doctrine is compatible with religion, was adopted by many of the Greek and Latin fathers See Beausobre, Hist du Manichéisme, l vi c 4

54 The eleventh book of the Odyssey gives a very dreary and incoherent account of the infernal shades Pindar and Virgil have embellished the picture but even those poets, though more correct than their great model, are guilty of very strange inconsistencies See Bayle, Responses aux Questions d un Provincial part iii c 22

55 See the sixteenth epistle of the first book of Horace, the thirteenth Satire of Juvenal, and the second Satire of Persius these popular discourses express the sentiment and language of the multitude

56 If we confine ourselves to the Gauls, we may observe that they intrusted not only their lives, but even their money, to the security of another world Vetus ille mos Gallorum occurrit (says Valerius Maximus, l ii c 6, § 10) quos, memoria proditum est, pecunias mutuas, quæ his apud inferos redderentur, dare solitos The same custom is darkly insinuated by Mela, l iii c 2 It is needless to add that the profits of trade hold proportion to the credit of the merchant and that the Druids derived from their holy profession a character of responsibility which could scarcely be claimed by any other order of men

57 The right reverend author of the Divine Legation of Moses assigns a very curious reason for the omission and most ingeniously retorts it on the unbelievers

58 See Le Clerc (Prolegomena ad Hist Eccle siast sect 1 c 8) His authority seems to carry the greater weight as he has written a learned and judicious commentary on the books of the Old Testament

59 Joseph Antiquitat l xiii c 10 [§ 5 sq] De Bell Jud ii 8 [§ 2] According to the most natural interpretation of his words the Sadducees admitted only the Pentateuch but it has pleased some modern critics to add the Prophets to their creed and to suppose that they contented themselves with rejecting the traditions of the Pharisees Dr Jortin has argued that point in his Remarks on Ecclesiastical History vol ii p 103

60 This expectation was countenanced by the twenty fourth chapter of St Matthew and by the first epistle of St Paul to the Thessalonians Erasmus removes the difficulty by the help of allegory and metaphor and the learned Grotius ventures to insinuate that for wise purposes the pious deception was permitted to take place

61 See Burnet s Sacred Theory part iii c 5 This tradition may be traced as high as the author of the Epistle of Barnabas who wrote in the first century and who seems to have been half a Jew

62 The primitive church of Antioch computed almost 6000 years from the creation of the world to the birth of Christ Africanus Lactantius, and the Greek church have reduced that number to 5500 and Eusebius has contented himself with 5200 years These calculations were formed on the Septuagint which was universally received during the six first centuries The authority of the Vulgate and of the Hebrew text has determined the moderns Protestants as well as Catholics to prefer a period of about 4000 years though in the study of profane antiquity they often find themselves straitened by those narrow limits

63 Most of these pictures were borrowed from a misrepresentation of Isaiah Daniel and the Apocalypse One of the grossest images may be found in Irenæus (l v [c 23] p 455 [ed. Oxon 1702]) the disciple of Papias who had seen the apostle St John

64 See the second dialogue of Justin with Tryphon and the seventh book of Lactantius It is unnecessary to allege all the intermediate fathers as the fact is not disputed Yet the curious reader may consult Daillé de Usu Patrum l. ii. c 4

65 The testimony of Justin of his own faith and that of his orthodox brethren in the doctrine of a Millennium is delivered in the clearest and most solemn manner (Dialog cum Tryphonte Jud p 177 178 edit. Benedictin.) If in the beginning of this important passage there is anything consistency we may impute it, as we think proper either to the author or to his transcribers.

66 Dupin Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom. i p 223 tom. ii p 366 and Mosheim, p 720 though the latter of these learned divines is not altogether candid on this occasion

67 In the council of Laodicea (about the year 360) the Apocalypse was tacitly excluded from the sacred canon by the same churches of Asia to which it is addressed and we may learn from the complaint of Sulpicius Severus that their sentence had been ratified by the greater number of Christians of his time From what causes then is the Apocalypse at present so generally received by the Greek the Roman and the Protestant churches? The following ones may be assigned —1 The Greeks were subdued by the authority of an impostor who in the sixth century assumed the character of Dionysius the Areopagite 2 A just apprehension that the grammarians might become more important than the theologians engaged the council of Trent to fix the seal of their infallibility on all the books of Scripture contained in the Latin Vulgate in the number of which the Apocalypse was fortunately included (Fr Paolo Istoria del Concilio Tridentino l ii) 3 The advantage of turning those mysterious prophecies against the See of Rome inspired the Protestants with uncommon veneration for so useful an ally See the ingenious and elegant discourses of the present bishop of Lichfield on that unpromising subject

68 Lactantius (Institut Divin vii 15 etc) relates the dismal tale of futurity with great spirit and eloquence

69 On this subject every reader of taste will be entertained with the third part of Burnet s Sacred Theory He blends philosophy Scripture and tradition into one magnificent system in the description of which he displays a strength of fancy not inferior to that of Milton himself

70 And yet whatever may be the language of individuals it is still the public doctrine of all the Christian churches nor can even our own refuse to admit the conclusions which must be drawn from the eighth and the eighteenth of her Articles. The Jansenists who have so diligently studied the works of the fathers maintain this sentiment with distinguished zeal and the learned M de Tillemont never dismisses a virtuous emperor without pronouncing his damnation Zuinglius is perhaps the only leader of a party who has ever adopted the milder sentiment and he gave no less offence to the Lutherans than to the Catholics. See Bossuet Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes l ii c 19–22

71 Justin and Clemens of Alexandria allow that some of the philosophers were instructed by the Logos confounding its double signification of the human reason and of the Divine Word.

72 Tertullian de Spectaculis c. 30. In order to ascertain the degree of authority which the zealous

African had acquired, it may be sufficient to allege the testimony of Cyprian, the doctor and guide of all the western churches (see Prudent Hym xiii 100) As often as he applied himself to his daily study of the writings of Tertullian, he was accustomed to say "Da mihi magistrum, Give me my master" (Hieronym de Viris Illustribus, tom i p 284 [c 53, tom ii p 878, ed Vallars])

73 Notwithstanding the evasions of Dr Middleton, it is impossible to overlook the clear traces of visions and inspiration which may be found in the apostolic fathers

80 The university of Oxford conferred degrees on his opponents From the indignation of Mosheim (p 221) we may discover the sentiments of the Lutheran divines

81 It may seem somewhat remarkable that Bernard of Clairvaux, who records so many miracles of his friend St Malachi, never takes any notice of his own, which, in their turn, however, are carefully related by his companions and disciples In the long series of ecclesiastical history, does there exist a single instance of a saint asserting that he himself possessed the gift of miracles?

110 See the introduction to the Apocalypse Bishops under the name of angels were already instituted in the seven cities of Asia And yet the epistle of Clemens (which is probably of as ancient a date) does not lead us to discover any traces of episcopacy either at Corinth or Rome

The subsequent conduct of the deacon Laurence only proves how proper a use was made of the wealth of the Roman church, it was undoubtedly very considerable, but Fra Paolo (c 3) appears to exaggerate when he supposes that the successors of Commodus were urged to persecute the Christians by their own avarice, or that of their Prætorian præfects

170 This proportion of the presbyters and of the poor to the rest of the people was originally fixed by Burnet (Travels into Italy p 168) and is approved by Moyle (vol ii p 151) They were both unacquainted with the passage of Chrysostom, which converts their conjecture almost into a fact.

181 The legend of Abgarus, fabulous as it is, affords a decisive proof that many years before Eusebius wrote his history the greatest part of the inhabitants of Edessa had embraced Christianity Their rivals, the citizens of Carrhæ, adhered, on the contrary, to the cause of Paganism, as late as the sixth century

182 According to Bardesanes (ap Euseb Præpar Evangel), there were some Christians in Persia before the end of the second century In the time of Constantine (see his epistle to Sapor [Euseb], Vit l iv c 13) they composed a flourishing church Consult Beausobre, Hist Critique du Manicheisme, tom 1 p 180, and the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemani

191 Dr Lardner, in his first and second volumes of Jewish and Christian testimonies, collects and illustrates those of Pliny the younger, of Tacitus, of Galen, of Marcus Antoninus, and perhaps of Epictetus (for it is doubtful whether that philosopher means to speak of the Christians) The new sect is totally unnoticed by Seneca, the elder Pliny and Plutarch.

192 If the famous prophecy of the Seventy Weeks had been alleged to a Roman philosopher, would he not have replied in the words of Cicero, "Quæ tandem ista auguratio est, annorum potius quam aut mensium aut dierum?' De Divinatione, ii 30 Observe with what irreverence Lucian (in Alexandro, c. 13), and his friend Celsus, ap Origen (l vii. [c 14] p 327), express themselves concerning the Hebrew prophets

193 The philosophers, who derided the more ancient predictions of the Sibyls, would easily have detected the Jewish and Christian forgeries which have been so triumphantly quoted by the fathers, from Justin Martyr to Lactantius When the Sibylline verses had performed their appointed task, they, like the system of the millennium were quietly laid aside The Christian Sibyl had unluckily fixed the ruin of Rome for the year 195, A. 194 The fathers, as they are drawn out in battle array by Dom Calmet (Dissertations sur la Bible, tom iii p 295–308), seem to cover the whole earth with darkness, in which they are followed by most of the moderns

195 Origen ad Matth. c. 27, and a few modern critics Beza, Le Clerc, Lardner, etc., are desirous of confining it to the land of Judea.

196 The celebrated passage of Phlegon is now wisely abandoned. When Tertullian assures the Pagans that the mention of the prodigy is found in Arcanis (not Archivis) vestris (see his Apology, c 21), he probably appeals to the Sibylline verses, which relate it exactly in the words of the Gospel.

1 In Cyrene they massacred 220 000 Greeks in Cyprus 240 000 in Egypt a very great multitud Many of these unhappy victims were sawn asund r according to a precedent to which David had given th sanction of his example The victorious Jews devoured the flesh licked up the blood and twisted the entrails like a girdle round their bodies See Dion Cassius l lxviii [c 32] p 1145

2 Without repeating the well known narratives of Josephus we may learn from Dion (l lxix [c 14] p 1162) that in Hadrian s war 580 000 Jews were cut off by the sword besides an infinite number which perished by famine by disease and by fire

11 The author of the Philopatris perpetually treats the Christians as a company of dreaming enthusiasts δαιμό ιοι αἰθέριοι αἰθεροβατοῦντες ἀεροβατοῦντ ς etc and in one place manifestly alludes to the vision in which St Paul was transported to the third heaven In another place Triephon, who personates a Chri tian after deriding the gods of Paganism proposes a mysterious oath —

12 According to Justin Martyr (Apolog Major c 70–85) the dæmon who had gained some imperfect knowledge of the prophecies purposely contrived this resemblance which might deter though by different means both the people and the philosophers from embracing the faith of Christ.

22 When Tertullian became a Montanist, he aspersed the morals of the church which he had so resolutely defended "Sed majoris est Agape, quia per hanc adolescentes tui cum sororibus dormiunt Appendices scilicet gulæ lascivia et luxuria" De Jejuniis, c 17 The 35th canon of the council of Illiberis provides against the scandals which too often polluted the vigils of the church, and disgraced the Christian name in the eyes of unbelievers

24 In the various compilation of the Augustan History (a part of which was composed under the reign of Constantine) there are not six lines which relate to the Christians, nor has the diligence of Xiphilin discovered their name in the large history of Dion Cassius

25 An obscure passage of Suetonius (in Claud c 25) may seem to offer a proof how strangely the Jews and Christians of Rome were confounded with each other

27 In the time of Tertullian and Clemens of Alexandria the glory of martyrdom was confined to St Peter, St Paul, and St James It was gradually bestowed on the rest of the apostles by the more recent Greeks, who prudently selected for the theatre of their preaching and sufferings some remote country beyond the limits of the Roman empire See Mosheim, p 81, and Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclésiastiques, tom 1 part iii

30 We may observe that the rumour is mentioned by Tacitus with a very becoming distrust and hesitation, whilst it is greedily transcribed by Suetonius, and solemnly confirmed by Dion

31 This testimony is alone sufficient to expose the anachronism of the Jews, who place the birth of Christ near a century sooner (Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, l v c 14, 15) We may learn from Josephus (Antiquitat xviii 3 [c 2, § 2, ed Oxon 1720]) that the procuratorship of Pilate corresponded with the last ten years of Tiberius, A D 27–37 As to the particular time of the death of Christ, a very early tradition fixed it to the 25th of March, A D 29, under the consulship of the two Gemini (Tertullian adv Judæos, c 8) This date, which is adopted by Pagi, Cardinal Norris, and Le Clerc, seems at least as probable as the vulgar era, which is placed (I know not from what conjectures) four years later

32 Odio humani generis convicti These words may either signify the hatred of mankind towards the Christians, or the hatred of the Christians towards mankind I have preferred the latter sense, as the most agreeable to the style of Tacitus, and to the popular error, of which a precept of the Gospel (see Luke xiv 26) had been, perhaps, the innocent occasion My interpretation is justified by the authority of Lipsius, of the Italian, the French, and the English translators of Tacitus of Mosheim (p 102), of Le Clerc (Historia Ecclesiast p 427), of Dr Lardner (Testimonies, vol 1 p 345), and of the Bishop of Gloucester (Divine Legation, vol iii, p 38) But as the word convicti does not unite very happily with the rest of the sentence, James Gronovius has preferred the reading of conjuncti, which is authorised by the valuable MS of Florence

48 This appellation was at first understood in the most obvious sense and it was supposed that the brothers of Jesus were the lawful issue of Joseph and Mary A devout respect for the virginity of the mother of God suggested to the Gnostics and afterwards to the orthodox Greeks the expedient of bestowing a second wife on Joseph The Latins (from the time of Jerome) improved on that hint asserted the perpetual celibacy of Joseph and justified by many similar examples the new interpretation that Jude as well as Simon and James who are styled the brothers of Jesus Christ were only his first-cousins See Tillemont, Mém Ecclésiast tom 1 part iii and Beausobre Hist. 60 Eusebius (Hist Ecclesiast l iv c 9) has preserved the edict of Hadrian. He has likewise (c 13) given us one still more favourable under the name of Antoninus the authenticity of which is not so universally allowed The second Apology of Justin contains some curious particulars relative to the accusations of Christians.

70 Though we cannot receive with entire confidence either the epistles or the acts of Ignatius (they may be found in the second volume of the Apostolic Fathers), yet we may quote that bishop of Antioch as one of these exemplary martyrs He was sent in chains to Rome as a public spectacle, and when he arrived at Troas he received the pleasing intelligence that the persecution of Antioch was already at an end

71 Among the martyrs of Lyons (Euseb l v c 1) the slave Blandina was distinguished by more exquisite tortures Of the five martyrs so much celebrated in the Acts of Felicitas and Perpetua, two were of a servile, and two others of a very mean, condition

73 If we recollect that all the Plebeians of Rome were not Christians, and that all the Christians were not saints and martyrs, we may judge with how much safety religious honours can be ascribed to bones or urns indiscriminately taken from the public burial place After ten centuries of a very free and open trade some suspicions have arisen among the more learned Catholics They now require, as a proof of sanctity and martyrdom, the letters B M , a vial full of red liquor supposed to be blood, or the figure of a palm tree But the two former signs are of little weight, and with regard to the last, it is observed by the critics—1 That the figure, as it is called, of a palm, is perhaps a cypress, and perhaps only a stop, the flourish of a comma used in the monumental inscriptions. 2 That the palm was the symbol of victory among the Pagans 3 That among the Christians it served as the emblem, not only of martyrdom, but in general of a joyful resurrection See the epistle of P Mabillon on the worship of unknown saints, and Muratori sopra le Antichità Italiane, Dissertat lviii

74 As a specimen of these legends, we may be satisfied with 10,000 Christian soldiers crucified in one day, either by Trajan or Hadrian, on Mount Ararat See Baronius ad Martyrologium Romanum, Tillemont, Mem Ecclésiast tom ii part ii p 438, and Geddes's Miscellanies, vol ii p 203 The abbreviation of Mil , which may signify either soldiers or thousands, is said to have occasioned some extraordinary mistakes

75 Dionysius ap Euseb l vi c 41 One of the seventeen was likewise accused of robbery

76 The letters of Cyprian exhibit a very curious and original picture both of the man and of the times See likewise the two Lives of Cyprian, composed with equal accuracy, though with very different views, the one by Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom xii p 208-378), the other by Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclesiastiques, tom iv part i p 76-459

77 See the polite but severe epistle of the clergy of Rome to the bishop of Carthage (Cyprian Epist 8, 9) Pontius labours with the greatest care and diligence to justify his master against the general censure

79 See Cyprian Epist 16, and his Life by Pontius

80 We have an original Life of Cyprian by the deacon Pontius, the companion of his exile and the spectator of his death, and we likewise possess the ancient proconsular Acts of his martyrdom These two relations are consistent with each other, and with probability, and what is somewhat remarkable, they are both unsullied by any miraculous circumstances

81 It should seem that these were circular orders, sent at the same time to all the governors Dionysius (ap Euseb l vii c 11) relates the history of his own banishment from Alexandria almost in the same manner But as he escaped and survived the persecution we must account him either more or less fortunate than Cyprian

82 See Plin Hist Natur v 3 Cellarius Geograph Antiq part iii p 96 Shaw s Travels p 90 and for the adjacent country (which is terminated by Cape Bona or the promontory of Mercury) l Afrique de Marmol tom ii p 494 There are the remains of an aqueduct near Curubis or Curbis at present altered into Gurbes and Dr Shaw read an inscription which styles that city Colonia Ful ia The deacon Pontius (in Vit Cyprian c 1) calls it Apricum et competentem locum hospitium pro voluntate secretum et quicquid apponi eis ante promissum est qui regnum et justitiam Dei quærunt

83 See Cyprian Epistol 77 edit Fell

84 Upon his conversion he had sold those gardens for the benefit of the poor The indulgence of God (most probably the liberality of some Christian friend) restored them to Cyprian See Pontius c 15

85 When Cyprian a twelvemonth before was sent into exile he dreamt that he should be put to death the next day The event made it necessary to explain that word as signifying a year Pontius c 12

86 Pontius (c 15) acknowledges that Cyprian with whom he supped passed the night custodiâ delicatâ The bishop exercised a last and very proper act of jurisdiction by directing that the younger females who watched in the street should be removed f om the dangers and temptations of a nocturnal crowd Act Proconsularia c 2

87 See the orig nal sentence in the Acts c 4 and in Pontius c 17 The latter expresses it in a more rhetorical manner

88 Pontius c 19 M de Tillemont (Mémoires tom iv part i p 450 note 50) is not pleased with so positive an exclusion of any former martyrs of the episcopal rank

89 Whatever opinion we may entertain of the character or principles of Thomas Becket we must acknowledge that he suffered death with a constancy not unworthy of the primitive martyrs See Lord Lyttelton s History of Henry II vol ii p 592 etc

90 See in particular the treatise of Cyprian de Lapsis p 87 98 edit Fell [p 121] The learning of Dodwell (Dissertat Cyprianic xii xiii) and the ingenuity of Middleton (Free Inquiry p 162 etc) have left scarcely anything to add concerning the merit the honours and the motives of the martyrs

91 Cyprian Epistol 5 6 7 22 24 and de Unitat Ecclesiæ The number of pretended martyrs has been very much multiplied by the custom which was introduced of bestowing that honourable name on confessors

92 Certatim gloriosa in certamina ruebatur multoque avidius tum martyria gloriosis mortibus quærebantur quam nunc Episcopatus pravis ambitionibus appetuntur Sulpicius Severus l ii [p 385 ed Lugd Bat 1647] He might have omitted the word nunc

93 See Epist ad Roman c 4 5 ap Patres Apostol tom ii p 27 It suited the purpose of Bishop Pearson (see Vindiciæ Ignatianæ part ii c 9) to justify by a profusion of examples and authorities the sentiments of Ignatius

94 The story of Polyeuctes on which Corneille has founded a very beautiful tragedy is one of the most celebrated though not perhaps the most authentic instances of this excessive zeal We should observe that the 60th canon of the council of Illiberis refuses the title of martyrs to those who exposed themselves to death by publicly destroying the idols

95 See Epictetus Discourses iv 7 (though there is some doubt whether he alludes to the Christians) Marcus Aurelius Meditations xi 3 Lucian in Peregrin

96 Tertullian ad Scapul c 5 The learned are divided between three persons of the same name who were all proconsuls of Asia I am inclined to ascribe this story to Antoninus Pius who was afterwards emperor and who may have governed Asia under the reign of Trajan

97 Mosheim de Rebus Christ ante Constantin p 235

98 See the Epistle of the Church of Smyrna ap Euseb Hist Eccles l iv c 15

99 In the second Apology of Justin there is a particular and very curious instance of this legal delay The same indulgence was granted to accused Christians in the persecution of Decius and Cyprian (de Lapsis) expressly mentions the Dies negantibus præstitutus

100 Tertullian considers flight from persecution as an imperfect but very criminal apostasy as an impious attempt to elude the will of God, etc. etc He has written a treatise on this subject (see p 536 544 edit Rigalt) which is filled with the wildest fanaticism and the most incoherent declamation It is however somewhat remarkable that Tertullian did not suffer martyrdom himself

101 The Libellatici who are chiefly known by the writings of Cyprian are described with the utmost precision in the copious commentary of Mosheim p 483 489

102 Pl n Epistol x 97 Dionysius Alexandrin ap Euseb l vi c 41 Ad prima statim verba minantis inimici maximus fratrum numerus fidem suam prodidit nec prostratus est persecutionis impetu sed voluntario lapsu seipsum prostravit Cyprian Opera p 89 Among these deserters were many priests and even bishops

103 It was on this occasion that Cyprian wrote his treatise De Lapsis and many of his epistles The controversy concerning the treatment of penitent apostates does not occur among the Christians of the preceding century Shall we ascribe this to the superiority of their faith and courage or to our less intimate knowledge of their history?

104. See Mosheim, p 97 Sulpicius Severus was the first author of this computation, though he seemed desirous of reserving the tenth and greatest persecution for the coming of the Antichrist

105 The testimony given by Pontius Pilate is first mentioned by Justin The successive improvements which the story acquired (as it has passed through the hands of Tertullian, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Orosius, Gregory of Tours, and the authors of the several editions of the Acts of Pilate), are very fairly stated by Dom Calmet, Dissertat sur l'Ecriture, tom iii p 651, etc

106 On this miracle, as it is commonly called, of the Thundering Legion, see the admirable criticism of Mr Moyle, in his Works, vol ii p 81 390

107 Dion Cassius, or rather his abbreviator Xiphilin, l lxxii [c 4] p 1206 Mr Moyle (p 266) has explained the condition of the church under the reign of Commodus

108 Compare the Life of Caracalla, in the Augustan History, with the epistle of Tertullian to Scapula Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol ii p 5, etc) considers the cure of Severus, by the means of holy oil, with a strong desire to convert it into a miracle

109 Tertullian de Fugâ, c 13 The present was made during the feast of the Saturnalia, and it is a matter of serious concern to Tertullian that the faithful should be confounded with the most infamous professions which purchased the connivance of the government

110 Euseb l v c 23, 24 Mosheim, p 435 447

111 Judæos fieri sub gravi pœnâ vetuit Idem etiam de Christianis sanxit Hist August p 70 [Spart Sever c 17]

112 Sulpicius Severus, l ii p 384 [ed Lugd Bat 1647] This computation (allowing for a single exception) is confirmed by the History of Eusebius and by the writings of Cyprian

113 The antiquity of Christian churches is discussed by Tillemont (Mémoires Ecclesiastiques, tom iii part ii p 68-72) and by Mr Moyle (vol i p 378-398) The former refers the first construction of them to the peace of Alexander Severus, the latter, to the peace of Gallienus

114 See the Augustan History, p 130 [Lamprid Alex Sever c 45] The emperor Alexander adopted their method of publicly proposing the names of those persons who were candidates for ordination It is true that the honour of this practice is likewise attributed to the Jews

115 Euseb Hist Ecclesiast l vi c 21 Hieronym de Script Eccles c 54 [vol ii p 879, ed Vallars] Mamæa was styled a holy and pious woman, both by the Christians and the Pagans From the former, therefore, it was impossible that she should deserve that honourable epithet

116 See the Augustan History, p 123 [Lampr Alex. Sever c 29] Mosheim (p 465) seems to refine too much on the domestic religion of Alexander His design of building a public temple to Christ (Hist August p 129 [Lampr Alex Sever c 43]), and the objection which was suggested either to him, or in similar circumstances to Hadrian, appear to have no other foundation than an improbable report, invented by the Christians, and credulously adopted by an historian of the age of Constantine

117 Euseb l vi c. 28 It may be presumed that the success of the Christians had exasperated the increasing bigotry of the Pagans Dion Cassius, who composed his history under the former reign, had most probably intended for the use of his master those counsels of persecution which he ascribes to a better age, and to the favourite of Augustus Concerning this oration of Mæcenas, or rather of Dion, I may refer to my own unbiased opinion (vol i p 55, note 25), and to the Abbe de la Bléterie (Mémoires de l Académie, tom xxiv p 303, tom xxv p 432)

118 Orosius, l vii c 19, mentions Origen as the object of Maximin's resentment, and Firmilianus, a Cappadocian bishop of that age, gives a just and confined idea of this persecution (apud Cyprian Epist 75)

119 The mention of those princes who were publicly supposed to be Christians, as we find it in an epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria (ap Euseb l vii c 10), evidently alludes to Philip and his family, and forms a contemporary evidence that such a report had prevailed, but the Egyptian bishop, who lived at an humble distance from the court of Rome, expresses himself with a becoming diffidence concerning the truth of the fact The epistles of Origen (which were extant in the time of Eusebius, see l vi c 36) would most probably decide this curious, rather than important, question

120 Euseb l vi c 34 The story, as is usual, has been embellished by succeeding writers, and is confuted, with much superfluous learning, by Frederick Spanheim (Opera Varia, tom ii p 400, etc)

121 Lactantius, de Mortibus Persecutorum, c 3, 4. After celebrating the felicity and increase of the church under a long succession of good princes, he adds, "Extitit post annos plurimos, execrabile animal, Decius, qui vexaret Ecclesiam "

122 Euseb l vi c. 39 Cyprian Epistol 55 The see of Rome remained vacant from the martyrdom of Fabianus, the 20th of January, A D 250, till the election of Cornelius, the 4th of June, A D 251 Decius had probably left Rome, since he was killed before the end of that year

123 Euseb l vii c. 10 Mosheim (p 548) has very clearly shown that the præfect Macrianus, and the Egyptian Magus, are one and the same person

124. Eusebius (l vii c 13) gives us a Greek version of this Latin edict, which seems to have been very concise By another edict he directed that the Cæmeteria should be restored to the Christians

125 Euseb l vii c 30 Lactantius de M P

6 Hieronym in Chron p 177 [Anno ab Abr 2290 tom viii p 757 ed Vallars] Orosius l vii c 23 Their language is in general so ambiguous and incorrect that we are at a loss to determine how far Aurelian had carried his intentions before he was assassinated Most of the moderns (except Dodwell Dissertat Cyprian xi 64) have seized the occasion of gaining a few extraordinary martyrs

126 Paul was better pleased with the title of Ducenarius than with that of bishop The Ducenarius was an imperial procurator so called from his salary of two hundred sestertia or £1600 a year (See Salmasius ad Hist August p 124) Some critics suppose that the bishop of Antioch had actually obtained such an office from Zenobia while others consider it only as a figurative expression of his pomp and insolence

127 Simony was not unknown in those times and the clergy sometimes bought what they intended to sell It appears that the bishopric of Carthage was purchased by a wealthy matron named Lucilla for her servant Majorinus The price was 400 Folles (Monument Antiq ad calcem Optati p 263) Every Follis contained 125 pieces of silver and the whole sum may be computed at about £2400

128 If we are desirous of extenuating the vices of Paul we must suspect the assembled bishops of the East of publishing the most malicious calumnies in circular epistles addressed to all the churches of the empire (ap Euseb l vii c 30)

129 His heresy (like those of Noetus and Sabellius in the same century) tended to confound the mysterious distinction of the divine persons See Mosheim, p 702 etc

130 Euseb Hist Ecclesiast l vii c 30 We are entirely indebted to him for the curious story of Paul of Samosata

131 The era of martyrs which is still in use among the Copts and the Abyssinians must be reckoned from the 29th of August A D 284 as the beginning of the Egyptian year was nineteen days earlier than the real accession of Diocletian See Dissertation Préliminaire à l Art de vérifier les Dates.

132 The expression of Lactantius (de M P c. 15) sacrificio pollui coegit implies their antecedent conversion to the faith but does not seem to justify the assertion of Mosheim (p 912) that they had been privately baptised

133 M de Tillemont (Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom v part. 1 p 11 12) has quoted from the Spicilegium of Dom Luc d Acheri a very curious instruction which bishop Theonas composed for the use of Lucian

134. Lactantius de M P c 10.

135. Eusebius, Hist Ecclesiast L viii. c 1 The reader who consults the original will not accuse me of heightening the picture Eusebius was about sixteen years of age at the accession of the emperor Diocletian

136 We might quote among a great number of instances the mysterious worship of Mithras and the Taurobolia the latter of which became fashionable in the time of the Antonines (see a Dissertation of M de Boze in the Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions tom. ii p 443) The romance of Apuleius is as full of devotion as of satire

137 The impostor Alexander very strongly recommended the oracle of Trophonius at Mallos, and those of Apollo at Claros and Miletus (Lucian, tom ii p 236 edit Reitz [Alexand c 29]) The last of these whose singular history would furnish a very curious episode was consulted by Diocletian before he published his edicts of persecution (Lactantius de M P c 11)

138 Besides the ancient stories of Pythagoras and Aristeas the cures performed at the shrine of Æsculapius and the fables related of Apollonius of Tyana were frequently opposed to the miracles of Christ though I agree with Dr Lardner (see Testimonies vol iii p 253 352) that when Philostratus composed the Life of Apollonius, he had no such intention

139 It is seriously to be lamented that the Christian fathers by acknowledging the supernatural or as they deem it the infernal part of Paganism destroy with their own hands the great advantage which we might otherwise derive from the liberal concessions of our adversaries.

140 Julian ([tom i] p 301 edit Spanheim) expresses a pious joy that the providence of the gods had extinguished the impious sects, and for the most part destroyed the books of the Pyrrhonians and Epicureans which had been very numerous since Epicurus himself composed no less than 300 volumes See Diogenes Laertius, l x c 26.

141 Cumque alios audiam mussitare indignanter et dicere opportere statui per Senatum, aboleantur ut haec scripta quibus Christiana Religio comprobetur et vetustatis opprimatur auctoritas Arnobius adversus Gentes l iii p 103 104 [c 7 p 98 99 ed Ant 1604] He adds very properly Erroris convincite Ciceronem nam intercipere scripta et publicatam velle submergere lectionem non est Deum [Deos] defendere sed veritatis testificationem timere

142 Lactantius (Divin Institut l v c 2 3) gives a very clear and spirited account of two of these philosophic adversaries of the faith. The large treatise of Porphyry against the Christians consisted of thirty books and was composed in Sicily about the year 270

144 Eusebius l viii c 4 c 17 He limits the number of military martyrs by a remarkable expression (σπανίως τούτων εἷς που καὶ δεύτερος) of which neither his Latin nor French translator have rendered the energy Notwithstanding the authority of Eusebius and the silence of Lactantius, Ambrose, Sulpicius Orosius etc it has been long believed that the Thebæan legion, consisting of 6000 Christians, suffered martyrdom by the order of Maximian, in the valley of the Pennine Alps The story was first published about the middle of the fifth century, by Eucherius bishop of Lyons, who received it from certain persons, who received it from Isaac bishop of Geneva, who is said to have received it from Theodore bishop of Octodurum The abbey of St Maurice still subsists, a rich monument of the credulity of Sigismund, king of Burgundy See an excellent Dissertation in the thirty sixth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, p 427 454

145 See the Acta Sincera, p 299 The accounts of his martyrdom, and of that of Marcellus, bear every mark of truth and authenticity

147 De M P c 11 Lactantius (or whoever was the author of this little treatise) was, at that time, an inhabitant of Nicomedia, but it seems difficult to conceive how he could acquire so accurate a knowledge of what passed in the Imperial cabinet

148 The only circumstance which we can discover is the devotion and jealousy of the mother of Galerius She is described by Lactantius as Deorum montium cultrix, mulier admodum superstitiosa She had a great influence over her son, and was offended by the disregard of some of her Christian servants

149 The worship and festival of the god Terminus are elegantly illustrated by M de Boze, Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom 1 p 50

150 In our only MS of Lactantius we read profectus, but reason, and the authority of all the critics, allow us, instead of that word, which destroys the sense of the passage, to substitute præfectus

151 Lactantius, de M P c 12, gives a very lively picture of the destruction of the church

152 Mosheim (p 922 926), from many scattered passages of Lactantius and Eusebius, has collected a very just and accurate notion of this edict, though he sometimes deviates into conjecture and refinement

153 Many ages afterwards Edward I practised, with great success, the same mode of persecution against the clergy of England See Hume's History of England, vol 11 p 300, last 4to edition

154 Lactantius only calls him quidam, etsi non recte, magno tamen animo, etc, M P c 13 Eusebius (l viii c 5) adorns him with secular honours Neither have condescended to mention his name, but the Greeks celebrate his memory under that of John See Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom v part ii p 320

155 Lactantius de M P c 13, 14 [14, 15] Potentissimi quondam Eunuchi necati, per quos Palatium et ipse constabat Eusebius (l viii c 6) mentions the cruel executions of the eunuchs Gorgonius and Dorotheus, and of Anthimus bishop of Nicomedia and both those writers describe, in a vague but tragical manner, the horrid scenes which were acted even in the Imperial presence

156 See Lactantius, Eusebius, and Constantine, ad Cœtum Sanctorum, c xxv Eusebius confesses his ignorance of the cause of this fire

157 Tillemont, Memoires Ecclésiast tom. v part 1 p 43

158 See the Acta Sincera of Ruinart, p 353, those of Felix of Thibara, or Tibiur, appear much less corrupted than in the other editions, which afford a lively specimen of legendary licence

159 See the first book of Optatus of Milevis against the Donatists Paris, 1700, edit Dupin He lived under the reign of Valens

160 The ancient monuments, published at the end of Optatus, p 261, etc, describe, in a very circumstantial manner, the proceedings of the governors in the destruction of churches They made a minute inventory of the plate, etc, which they found in them That of the church of Cirta, in Numidia, is still extant It consisted of two chalices of gold and six of silver, six urns, one kettle, seven lamps, all likewise of silver, besides a large quantity of brass utensils and wearing apparel

161 Lactantius (Institut Divin v 11) confines the calamity to the conventiculum, with its congregation Eusebius (viii 11) extends it to a whole city, and introduces something very like a regular siege His ancient Latin translator, Rufinus, adds the important circumstance of the permission given to the inhabitants of retiring from thence As Phrygia reached to the confines of Isauria, it is possible that the restless temper of those independent barbarians may have contributed to this misfortune

162 Eusebius, l viii c 6 M de Valois (with some probability) thinks that he has discovered the Syrian rebellion in an oration of Libanius, and that it was a rash attempt of the tribune Eugenius who with only five hundred men seized Antioch and might perhaps allure the Christians by the promise of religious toleration From Eusebius (l ix c 8), as well as from Moses of Chorene (Hist Armen l ii 77, etc), it may be inferred that Christianity was already introduced into Armenia

163 See Mosheim, p 938 the text of Eusebius very plainly shows that the governors, whose powers were enlarged, not restrained, by the new laws, could punish with death the most obstinate Christians as an example to their brethren

165 Eusebius, l viii c 13 Lactantius de M P c 15 Dodwell (Dissertat Cyprian, xi 75) represents them as inconsistent with each other But the former evidently speaks of Constantius in the station of Cæsar, and the latter of the same prince in the rank of Augustus 166 Datianus is mentioned in Gruter's Inscriptions as having determined the limits between the territories of Pax Julia and those of Ebora, both cities in the southern part of Lusitania If we recollect the neighbourhood of those places to Cape St.

Vincent we may suspect that the celebrated deacon and martyr of that name has been inaccurately assigned by Prudentius etc to Saragossa or Valentia. See the pompous history of his sufferings in the Mémoires de Tillemont tom v part ii p 58 85 Some critics are of opinion that the department of Constantius as Cæsar did not include Spain which still continued under the immediate jurisdiction of Maximian

167 Eusebius l viii c 11 Gruter Inscrip p 1171 No 18 Rufinus has mistaken the office of Adauctus as well as the place of his martyrdom

168 Eusebius l viii c 14 But as Maxentius was vanquished by Constantine it suited the purpose of Lactantius to place his death among those of the persecutors

169 The epitaph of Marcellus is to be found in Gruter Inscrip p 1172 No 3 and it contains all that we know of his history Marcellinus and Marcellus whose names follow in the list of popes are supposed by many critics to be different persons but the learned Abbé de Longuerue was convinced that they were one and the same

171 The Acts of the Passion of St Boniface which abound in miracles and declamation are published by Ruinart (p 283 291) both in Greek and Latin, from the authority of very ancient manuscripts

172 During the four first centuries there exist few traces of either bishops or bishoprics in the western Illyricum It has been thought probable that the primate of Milan extended his jurisdiction over Sirmium the capital of that great province See the Geographia Sacra of Charles de St Paul p 68-76 with the observations of Lucas Holstenius

173 The eighth book of Eusebius as well as the supplement concerning the martyrs of Palestine principally relate to the persecution of Galerius and Maximin The general lamentations with which Lactantius opens the fifth book of his Divine Institutions allude to their cruelty

174 Eusebius (l. viii c 17) has given us a Greek version and Lactantius (de M P c 34) the Latin original, of this memorable edict Neither of these writers seems to recollect how directly it contradicts whatever they have just affirmed of the remorse and repentance of Galerius

175. Eusebius l. ix. c 1 He inserts the epistle of the præfect

176. See Eusebius, l. viii. c 14 l. ix. c. 2-8. Lactantius de M P c 36 These writers agree in representing the arts of Maximin but the former relates the execution of several martyrs while the latter expressly affirms occidi servos Dei vetuit.

177 A few days before his death he published a very ample edict of toleration in which he imputes all the severities which the Christians suffered to the judges and governors who had misunderstood his intentions See the edict in Eusebius l. ix. c 10.

178 Such is the fair deduction from two remarkable passages in Eusebius l. viii c 2 and de Martyr Palestin c 12 The prudence of the historian has exposed his own character to censure and suspicion It was well known that he himself had been thrown into prison and it was suggested that he had purchased his d liverance by some dishonourable compliance The reproach was urged in his lifetime and even in his presence at the council of Tyre See Tillemont Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom viii part i p 67

179 The ancient and perhaps authentic account of the sufferings of Tarachus and his companions (Acta Sincera Ruinart p 419-448) is filled with strong expressions of resentment and contempt which could not fail of irritating the magistrate The behaviour of Ædesius to Hierocles præfect of Egypt was still more extraordinary λόγοις τε καὶ ἔργοις τὸ δικαστὴν [illegible] λων Euseb de Martyr Palestin c 5

181 Augustin Collat Carthagin Dei. iii. c. 13, ap Tillemont Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom v part i p 46 The controversy with the Donatists has reflected some though perhaps a partial, light on the history of the African church

182 Eusebius de Martyr Palestin. c. 13 He closes his narration by assuring us that these were the martyrdoms inflicted in Palestine during the whole course of the persecution The ninth chapter of his eighth book which relates to the province of Thebais in Egypt may seem to contradict our moderate computation but it will only lead us to admire th artful management of the historian. Choosing for the scene of the most exquisite cruelty the most remote and sequestered country of the Roman empire he relates that in Thebais from ten to one hundred persons had frequently suffered martyrdom in the same day But when he proceeds to mention his own journey into Egypt his language insensibly becomes more cautious and moderate Instead of a large but definite number he speaks of many Christians (πλείους) and most artfully selects two ambiguous words (ἱστορήσαμεν and [illegible]) which may signify either what he had seen or what he had heard either the expectation or the execution of the punishment Having thus provided a secure evasion he commits the equivocal passage to his readers and translators justly conceiving that their piety would induce them to prefer the most favourable sense There was perhaps some malice in the remark of Theodorus Metochita that all who, like

Eusebius, had been conversant with the Egyptians, delighted in an obscure and intricate style (See Valesius ad loc)

183 When Palestine was divided into three, the præfecture of the East contained forty-eight provinces As the ancient distinctions of nations were long since abolished, the Romans distributed the provinces according to a general proportion of their extent and opulence

186 Fra Paolo (Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, l iii) reduces the number of the Belgic martyrs to 50,000 In learning and moderation Fra Paolo was not inferior to Grotius The priority of time gives some advantage to the evidence of the former, which he loses on the other hand by the distance of Venice from the Netherlands

Chapter XVII

1 Polybius, l iv [c 45] p 423, edit Casaubon He observes that the peace of the Byzantines was frequently disturbed, and the extent of their territory contracted, by the inroads of the wild Thracians

2 The navigator Byzas, who was styled the son of Neptune, founded the city 656 years before the Christian era His followers were drawn from Argos and Megara Byzantium was afterwards rebuilt and fortified by the Spartan general Pausanias See Scaliger, Animadvers ad Euseb p 81 Ducange, Constantinopolis, l i part i cap 15, 16 With regard to the wars of the Byzantines against Philip, the Gauls, and the kings of Bithynia, we should trust none but the ancient writers who lived before the greatness of the Imperial city had excited a spirit of flattery and fiction

3 The Bosphorus has been very minutely described by Dionysius of Byzantium, who lived in the time of Domitian (Hudson, Geograph Minor tom iii), and by Gilles or Gyllius, a French traveller of the sixteenth century Tournefort (Lettre XV) seems to have used his own eyes, and the learning of Gyllius

4 There are very few conjectures so happy as that of Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom i. p 148), who supposes that the harpies were only locusts The Syriac or Phœnician name of those insects, their noisy flight, the stench and devastation which they occasion, and the north wind which drives them into the sea, all contribute to form the striking resemblance

5 The residence of Amycus was in Asia, between the old and the new castles, at a place called Laurus Insana That of Phineus was in Europe, near the village of Mauromole and the Black Sea See Gyllius de Bosph l ii c 23 Tournefort, Lettre XV

6 The deception was occasioned by several pointed rocks, alternately covered and abandoned by the waves At present there are two small islands, one towards either shore that of Europe is distinguished by the column of Pompey

7 The ancients computed one hundred and twenty stadia, or fifteen Roman miles They measured only from the new castles, but they carried the straits as far as the town of Chalcedon

8 Ducas Hist c 34 [p 136, ed Paris, p 108, ed Ven , p 242, ed Bonn] Leunclavius Hist Turcica Mussulmanica, l xv p 577 Under the Greek empire these castles were used as state prisons, under the tremendous name of Lethe, or towers of oblivion

9 Darius engraved in Greek and Assyrian letters, on two marble columns, the names of his subject nations, and the amazing numbers of his land and sea forces The Byzantines afterwards transported these columns into the city, and used them for the altars of their tutelar deities Herodotus, l iv c 87

11 Strabo, l vii p 492 [320, ed Casaubon] Most of the antlers are now broken off, or, to speak less figuratively, most of the recesses of the harbour are filled up See Gyllius de Bosphoro Thracio, l i c 5

12 Procopius de Ædificiis, l i c 5 His description is confirmed by modern travellers See Thevenot part i l i c 15 Tournefort, Lettre XII Niebuhr, Voyage d Arabie, p 22

13 See Ducange, C P l i part i c 16, and his Observations sur Villehardouin, p 289 The chain was drawn from the Acropolis near the modern Kiosk to the tower of Galata, and was supported at convenient distances by large wooden piles

14 Thevenot (Voyages au Levant, part i l i c 14) contracts the measure to 125 small Greek miles Belon (Observations, l ii c i) gives a good description of the Propontis, but contents himself with the vague expression of one day and one night s sail When Sandys (Travels p 21) talks of 150 furlongs in length as well as breadth, we can only suppose some mistake of the press in the text of that judicious traveller

ville upon the Hellespont or Dardanelles in the Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xxviii p 318 346 Yet even that ingenious geographer is too fond of supposing new and perhaps imaginary measures for the purpose of rendering ancient writers as accurate as himself The stadia employed by Herodotus in the description of the Euxine the Bosphorus etc (l iv c 85) must undoubtedly be all of the same species but it seems impossible to reconcile them either with truth or with each other

16 The oblique distance between Sestus and Abydus was thirty stadia The improbable tale of Hero and Leander is exposed by M Mahudel but is defended on the authority of poets and medals by M de la Nauze See the Académie des Inscriptions tom vii Hist p 74 Mem p 240

17 See the seventh book of Herodotus who has erected an elegant trophy to his own fame and to that of his country The review appears to have been made with tolerable accuracy but the vanity first of the Persians and afterwards of the Greeks was interested to magnify the armament and the victory I should much doubt whether the invaders have ever outnumbered the men of any country which they attacked

18 See Wood s Observations on Homer p 320 I have with pleasure selected this remark from an author who in general seems to have disappointed the expectation of the public as a critic and still more as a traveller He had visited the banks of the Hellespont he had read Strabo he ought to have consulted the Roman itineraries How was it possible for him to confound Ilium and Alexandria Troas (Observations p 340 341) two cities which were sixteen miles distant from each other?

19 Demetrius of Scepsis wrote sixty books on thirty lines of Homer s catalogue The thirteenth Book of Strabo is sufficient for our curiosity

20 Strabo l xiii p 595 The disposition of the ships which were drawn up on dry land and the posts of Ajax and Achilles are very clearly described by Homer See Iliad viii 220

21 Zosim l ii [c 30] p 105 Sozomen l ii c 3 Theophanes p 18 [p 14, ed Ven vol i p 34 ed Bonn] Nicephorus Callistus l vii p 48 Zonaras tom. ii. l xiii [c 3] p 6 Zosimus places the new city between Ilium and Alexandria but this apparent difference may be reconciled by the large extent of its circumference Before the foundation of Constantinople Thessalonica is mentioned by Cedrenus (p 283) [vol i p 496 ed Bonn] and Sardica by Zonaras as the intended capital They both suppose with very little probability that the emperor if he had not been prevented by a prodigy would have repeated the mistake of the blind Chalcedonians

22 Pocock s Description of the East vol. ii part ii. p 127 His plan of the seven hills is clear and accurate That traveller is seldom so satisfactory

23 See Belon Observations c 72 76 Among a variety of different species the Pelamides, a sort of Thunnies were the most celebrated We may learn from Polybius Strabo and Tacitus, that the profits of the fishery constituted the principal revenue of Byzantium

24 See the eloquent description of Busbequius, epistol i p 64 Est in Europa habet in conspectu Asiam Egyptum Africamque à dextrâ quæ tametsi contiguæ non sunt maris tamen navigandique commoditate veluti junguntur A sinistrâ vero Pontus est Euxinus etc

26 He says in one of his laws pro commoditate Urbis quam æterno nomine jubente Deo donavimus Cod Theodos l xiii tit v leg 7

27 The Greeks Theophanes Cedrenus, and the author of the Alexandrian Chronicle confine themselves to vague and general expressions For a more particular account of the vision we are obliged to have recourse to such Latin writers as William of Malmesbury See Ducange C. P l i p 24 25

28 See Plutarch in Romulus Among other ceremonies a large hole which had been dug for that purpose was filled up with handfuls of earth which each of the settlers brought from the place of his birth and thus adopted his new country

29 Philostorgius l ii c 9 This incident though borrowed from a suspected writer is characteristic and probable

30 See in the Mémoires de l Académie tom xxxv p 747 758 a dissertation of M d Anville on the extent of Constantinople He takes the plan inserted in the Imperium Orientale of Banduri as the most complete but by a series of very nice observations he reduces the extravagant proportion of the scale and instead of 9500 determines the circumference of the city as consisting of about 7800 French toises

31 Codinus Antiquitat Const p 12 [p 25, ed. Bonn] He assigns the church of St Anthony as the boundary on the side of the harbour It is mentioned in Ducange l iv c 6 but I have tried, without success to discover the exact place where it was situated

32 The new wall of Theodosius was constructed in the year 413 In 447 it was thrown down by an earthquake and rebuilt in three months by the diligence of the præfect Cyrus. The suburb of the Blachernæ was first taken into the city in the reign of Heraclius Ducange Const l i c 10 11

33 The measurement is expressed in the Notitia by 14 075 feet It is reasonable to suppose that these were Greek feet the proportion of which has been ingeniously determined by M d Anville He compares the 180 feet with 78 Hashemite cubits, which in different writers are assigned for the heights of St Sophia Each of these cubits was equal to 27 French inches.

34 The accurate Thevenot (l i c 15) walked in one hour and three-quarters round two of the sides of the triangle, from the Kiosk of the Seraglio to the seven towers D'Anville examines with care, and receives with confidence, this decisive testimony, which gives a circumference of ten or twelve miles The extravagant computation of Tournefort (Lettre XI) of thirty-four or thirty miles, without including Scutari, is a strange departure from his usual character

35 The sycæ, or fig trees, formed the thirteenth region, and were very much embellished by Justinian It has since borne the names of Pera and Galata The etymology of the former is obvious, that of the latter is unknown See Ducange, Const l i 22, and Gyllius de Byzant l iv c 10

36 One hundred and eleven stadia, which may be translated into modern Greek miles each of seven stadia, or 660, sometimes only 600, French toises See D'Anville, Mesures Itineraires, p 53

37 When the ancient texts, which describe the size of Babylon and Thebes, are settled, the exaggerations reduced, and the measures ascertained, we find that those famous cities filled the great but not incredible circumference of about twenty five or thirty miles Compare D'Anville, Mém de l'Academie, tom xxviii p 235, with his Description de l Egypte, p 201, 202

38 If we divide Constantinople and Paris into equal squares of 50 French toises, the former contains 850, and the latter 1160, of those divisions

39 Six hundred centenaries, or sixty thousand pounds' weight of gold This sum is taken from Codinus, Antiquit Const p 11 [p 23, ed Bonn], but unless that contemptible author had derived his information from some purer sources, he would probably have been unacquainted with so obsolete a mode of reckoning

40 For the forests of the Black Sea, consult Tournefort, Lettre XVI , for the marble quarries of Proconnesus, see Strabo, l xiii p 588 The latter had already furnished the materials of the stately buildings of Cyzicus

41 See the Codex Theodos l xiii tit iv leg 1 This law is dated in the year 334, and was addressed to the præfect of Italy, whose jurisdiction extended over Africa The commentary of Godefroy on the whole title well deserves to be consulted

42 Constantinopolis dedicatur pœne omnium urbium nuditate Hieronym Chron p 181 See Codinus, p 8, 9 [p 16 sq ed Bonn] The author of the Antiquitat Const l iii (apud Banduri Imp Orient tom i p 41) enumerates Rome, Sicily, Antioch, Athens, and a long list of other cities The provinces of Greece and Asia Minor may be supposed to have yielded the richest booty

43 Hist Compend p 369 [vol i p 648, ed Bonn] He describes the statue, or rather bust, of Homer with a degree of taste which plainly indicates that Cedrenus copied the style of a more fortunate age

44 Zosim. l ii [c 30] p 106 Chron Alexandrin vel Paschal p 284 Ducange, Const l. i c 24. Even the last of those writers seems to confound the Forum of Constantine with the Augusteum, or court of the palace I am not satisfied whether I have properly distinguished what belongs to the one and the other

45 The most tolerable account of this column is given by Pocock, Description of the East, vol ii part ii p 131 But it is still in many instances perplexed and unsatisfactory

46 Ducange, Const l i c 24, p 76, and his notes ad Alexiad p 382 The statue of Constantine or Apollo was thrown down under the reign of Alexius Comnenus

47 Tournefort (Lettre XII) computes the Atmeidan at four hundred paces If he means geometrical paces of five feet each, it was three hundred toises in length, about forty more than the great circus of Rome. See d'Anville, Mesures Itinéraires, p 73

48 The guardians of the most holy relics would rejoice if they were able to produce such a chain of evidence as may be alleged on this occasion See Banduri ad Antiquitat Const p 668 Gyllius de Byzant l ii c. 13 1 The original consecration of the tripod and pillar in the temple of Delphi may be proved from Herodotus and Pausanias 2 The Pagan Zosimus agrees with the three ecclesiastical historians, Eusebius, Socrates, and Sozomen, that the sacred ornaments of the temple of Delphi were removed to Constantinople by the order of Constantine and among these the serpentine pillar of the Hippodrome is particularly mentioned 3 All the European travellers who have visited Constantinople, from Buondelmonte to Pocock, describe it in the same place, and almost in the same manner, the differences between them are occasioned only by the injuries which it has sustained from the Turks Mahomet the Second broke the under jaw of one of the serpents with a stroke of his battle-axe Thevenot, l i c 17

49 The Latin name Cochlea was adopted by the Greeks, and very frequently occurs in the Byzantine history Ducange, Const l ii c. 1, p 104

50 There are three topographical points which indicate the situation of the palace 1 The staircase which connected it with the Hippodrome or Atmeidan 2 A small artificial port on the Propontis, from whence there was an easy ascent, by a flight of marble steps, to the gardens of the palace 3 The Augusteum was a spacious court, one side of which was occupied by the front of the palace, and another by the church of St Sophia

51 Zeuxippus was an epithet of Jupiter, and the baths were a part of old Byzantium The difficulty of assigning their true situation has not been felt by Ducange History seems to connect them with St Sophia and the palace, but the original plan inserted in Banduri places them on the other side of the city, near the harbour For their see Chron Paschal, p 285, and Gyllius de

53 Liutprand Legatio ad Imp Nicephorum p 153 The modern Greeks have strangely disfigured the antiquities of Constantinople We might ex cuse the errors of the Turkish or Arabian writers but it is somewhat astonishing that the Greeks who had access to the authentic materials pre served in their own language should prefer fiction to truth and loose tradition to genuine history In a single page of Codinus we may detect twelve un pardonable mistakes the reconciliation of Severus and Niger the marriage of their son and daughter the siege of Byzantium by the Macedonians the invasion of the Gauls which recalled Severus to Rome the sixty years which elapsed from his death to the foundation of Constantinople etc

55 Themist Orat iii p 48 edit Hardouin Sozomen l ii c 3 Zosim l ii [c 31] p 107 Anonym. Valesian p 175 If we could credit Codinus (p 10) [p 20 sq ed Bonn] Constantine built houses for the senators on the exact model of their Roman palaces and gratified them as well as himself with the pleasure of an agreeable sur prise but the whole story is full of fictions and inconsistencies

56 The law by which the younger Theodosius in the year 438 abolished this tenure may be found among the Novellæ of that emperor at the end of the Theodosian Code tom vi nov 12 M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom iv p 371) has evidently mistaken the nature of these estates With a grant from the Imperial demesnes the same condition was accepted as a favour which would justly have been deemed a hardship if it had been imposed upon private property

57 The passages of Zosimus of Eunapius of Sozomen and of Agathias which relate to the in crease of buildings and inhabitants at Constan tinople are collected and connected by Gyllius de Byzant l. i c 3 Sidonius Apollinaris (in Panegyr Anthem 56 p 279 edit Sirmond) describes the moles that were pushed forwards into the sea they consist d of the famous Puzzolan sand which hardens in the water

58 Sozomen l. ii c 3 Philostorg l. ii c 9 Codin Antiquitat. Const p 8 [p 16 ed Bonn] It appears by Socrates l ii c 13 that the daily allowance of the city consisted of eight myriads of σίτου which we may either translate with Vale sius by the words modii of corn or consider as expressive of the number of loaves of bread

60 The regions of Constantinople are mention ed in the Code of Justinian and particularly de scribed in the Notitia of the younger Theodosius but as the four last of them are not included within the wall of Constantine it may be doubted wheth er this division of the city should be referred to the founder

61 Senatum constituit secundiordinis Claros vocavit Anonym Valesian p 715 The senators of old Rome were styled Clarissimi See a curious note of Valesius ad Ammian Marcellin. xxii. 9 From the eleventh epistle of Julian it should seem that the place of senator was considered as a burthen rather than as an honour but the Abbé de la Bléterie (Vie de Jovien tom ii p 371) has shown that this epistle could not relate to Constan tinople Might we not read instead of the cele brated name of Βυζα τίοις the obscure but more probable word Βισα θη οῖς? Bisanthe or Rhœdestus, now Rhodosto was a small maritime city of Thrace See Stephan Byz de Urbibus p 225 [ed. Lugd B 1694] and Cellar Geograph tom i. p 849

62 Cod Theodos l xiv 13 [Add Cod Just xi. 20 —S] The commentary of Godefroy (tom v p. 220) is long but perplexed nor indeed is it easy to ascertain in what the Jus Italicum could consist after the freedom of the city had been communi cated to the whole empire

63 Julian (Orat i p 8) celebrates Constan tinople as not less superior to all other cities than she was inferior to Rome itself His l arned com mentator (Spanheim p 75 76) justifies this language by several parallel and contemporary in stances Zosimus as well as Socrates and Sozomen, flourished after the division of the empire between the two sons of Theodosius which established a perfect equality between the old and the new capi tal

64 Codinus (Antiquitat p 8 [p 17 ed. Bonn]) affirms that the foundations of Constantinople were laid in the year of the world 5837 (A D 329) on the 26th of September and that the city was dedicated the 11th of May 5838 (A D 330) He connects these dates with several characteristic epochs but they contradict each other the au thority of Codinus is of little weight and the space which he assigns must appear insufficient The term of ten years is given us by Julian (Orat. i. p. 8) and Spanheim labours to establish the truth of it (p 69-75) by the help of two passages from Themistius (Orat iv p 58) and of Philostorgius (l ii c 9) which form a period from the year 324 to the year 334 Modern critics are divided con cerning this point of chronology, and their different sentiments are very accurately described by Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 619-625

65 Themistius, Orat iii p 47 Zosim l ii [c 32]p 108 Constantine himself, in one of his laws (Cod Theod l xv tit 1 [leg 23?]), betrays his impatience

66 Cedrenus and Zonaras, faithful to the mode of superstition which prevailed in their own times, assure us that Constantinople was consecrated to the virgin Mother of God

67 The earliest and most complete account of this extraordinary ceremony may be found in the Alexandrian Chronicle, p 285 Tillemont, and the other friends of Constantine, who are offended with the air of Paganism which seems unworthy of a Christian prince, had a right to consider it as doubtful, but they were not authorised to omit the mention of it

68 Sozomen, l ii c 3 Ducange, C P l i c 6 Velut ipsius Romæ filiam, is the expression of Augustine, The City of God, l v c 25

69 Eutropius, l x c 8 Julian Orat i p 8 Ducange, C P l i c 5 The name of Constantinople is extant on the metals of Constantine

70 The lively Fontenelle (Dialogues des Morts, xii) affects to deride the vanity of human ambition, and seems to triumph in the disappointment of Constantine, whose immortal name is now lost in the vulgar appellation of Istambol, a Turkish corruption of εἰς τὴν πόλιν Yet the original name is still preserved, 1 By the nations of Europe 2 By the modern Greeks 3 By the Arabs, whose writings are diffused over the wide extent of their conquests in Asia and Africa See d'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p 275 4 By the more learned Turks, and by the emperor himself in his public mandates Cantemir's History of the Othman Empire, p 51

71 The Theodosian code was promulgated A D 438 See the Prolegomena of Godefroy, c 1 p 185

72 Pancirolus, in his elaborate Commentary, assigns to the Notitia a date almost similar to that of the Theodosian Code, but his proofs, or rather conjectures, are extremely feeble I should be rather inclined to place this useful work between the final division of the empire (A D 395) and the successful invasion of Gaul by the barbarians (A D 407) See Histoire des Anciens Peuples de l'Europe, tom vii p 40

73 Scilicet externæ superbiæ sueto non inerat notitia nostri (perhaps nostræ), apud quos vis Imperii valet, inania transmittuntur Tacit Annal xv 31 The gradation from the style of freedom and simplicity to that of form and servitude may be traced in the Epistles of Cicero, of Pliny, and of Symmachus

74 The emperor Gratian, after confirming a law of precedency published by Valentinian, the father of his Divinity, thus continues Siquis igitur indebitum sibi locum usurpaverit, nullâ se ignoratione defendat, sitque plane sacrilegii reus, qui divina præcepta neglexerit Cod Theod l vi tit v leg 2

75 Consult the Notitia Dignitatum at the end of the Theodosian Code, tom vi p 316

76 Pancirolus ad Notitiam utriusque Imperii, p 39 But his explanations are obscure, and he does not sufficiently distinguish the painted emblems from the effective ensigns of office

77 In the Pandects, which may be referred to the reigns of the Antonines, Clarissimus is the ordinary and legal title of a senator

78 Pancirol p 12 17 I have not taken any notice of the two inferior ranks, Perfectissimus and Egregius, which were given to many persons who were not raised to the senatorial dignity

79 Cod Theodos l vi tit vi The rules of precedency are ascertained with the most minute accuracy by the emperors, and illustrated with equal prolixity by their learned interpreter

92 In Consulatu honos sine labore suscipitur (Mamertin in Panegyr Vet xi [x] 2) This exalted idea of the consulship is borrowed from an Oration (iii p 107) pronounced by Julian in the servile court of Constantius See the Abbé de la Blèterie (Mémoires de l Académie tom xxiv p 289) who delights to pursue the vestiges of the old constitution and who sometimes finds them in his cop ous fancy

93 Intermarriages between the Patricians and Plebeians were prohibited by the laws of the XII Tables and the uniform operations of human nature may attest that the custom survived the law See in Livy (iv 1 6) the pride of family urged by the consul and the rights of mankind asserted by the tribune Canuleius

94 See the animated picture drawn by Sallust in the Jugurthine war of the pride of the nobles and even of the virtuous Metellus who was unable to brook the idea that the honour of the consulship should be bestowed on the obscure merit of his lieutenant Marius (c 64) Two hundred years before the race of the Metelli themselves were confounded among the Plebeians of Rome and from the etymology of their name of Cæcilius there is reason to believe that those haughty nobles derived their origin from a sutler

95 In the year of Rome 800 very few remained not only of the old Patrician families but even of those which had been created by Cæsar and Augustus. (Tacit Annal xi 25.) The family of Scaurus (a branch of the Patrician Æmilii) was degraded so low that his father who exercised the trade of a charcoal merchant left him only ten slaves and somewhat less than three hundred pounds sterling (Valerius Maximus l. iv c. 4, n. 11 Aurel Victor in Scauro [De Viris Ill. 72]) The family was saved from oblivion by the merit of the son

96 Tacit Annal xi 25 Dion Cassius, l. lii [c. 42] p 693 The virtues of Agricola who was created a Patrician by the emperor Vespasian reflected honour on that ancient order but his ancestors had not any claim beyond an Equestrian nobility

97 This failure would have been almost impossible if it were true as Casaubon compels Aurelius Victor to affirm (ad Sueton in Cæsar c 42 see Hist August p 203 [Trebell Poll Claud c 3], and Casaubon Comment p 220) that Vespasian created at once a thousand Patrician families. But this extravagant number is too much even for the whole Senatorial order unless we should include all the Roman knights who were distinguished by the permission of wearing the laticlave

101 When Justinian in the exhausted condition of the empire instituted a Prætorian præfect for Africa he allowed him a salary of one hundred pounds of gold Cod Justinian l i. tit xxvii. leg l.

102 For this and the other dignities of the empire it may be sufficient to refer to the ample commentaries of Pancirolus and Godefroy who have diligently collected and accurately digested in their proper order all the legal and historical materials From those authors Dr Howell (History of the World vol ii p 24 77) has deduced a very distinct abridgment of the state of the Roman empire

103 Tacit Annal vi 11 Euseb. in Chron. p. 155 Dion Cassius in the oration of Mæcenas (l. lii [c 21] p 675) describes the prerogatives of the præfect of the city as they were established in his own time

104 The fame of Messalla has been scarcely equal to his merit In the earliest youth he was recommended by Cicero to the friendship of Brutus. He followed the standard of the republic till

it was broken in the fields of Philippi he then accepted and deserved the favour of the most moderate of the conquerors, and uniformly asserted his freedom and dignity in the court of Augustus The triumph of Messalla was justified by the conquest of Aquitain As an orator he disputed the palm of eloquence with Cicero himself Messalla cultivated every muse, and was the patron of every man of genius He spent his evenings in philosophic conversation with Horace, assumed his place at table between Delia and Tibullus, and amused his leisure by encouraging the poetical talents of young Ovid

108 Quidquid igitur intra urbem admittitur, ad. P U videtur pertinere, sed et siquid intra centesimum milliarium Ulpian in Pandect l i tit xii n 1 He proceeds to enumerate the various offices of the præfect, who, in the code of Justinian (l. i. tit xxxix. leg 3), is declared to precede and command all city magistrates sine injuriâ ac detrimento honoris alieni

109 Besides our usual guides, we may observe that Felix Cantelorius has written a separate treatise, De Præfecto Urbis, and that many curious details concerning the police of Rome and Constantinople are contained in the fourteenth book of the Theodosian Code

110 Eunapius affirms that the proconsul of Asia was independent of the præfect, which must, however, be understood with some allowance the jurisdiction of the vice præfect he most assuredly disclaimed Pancirolus, p 161

111 The proconsul of Africa had four hundred apparitors, and they all received large salaries, either from the treasury or the province See Pancirol p 26, and Cod Justinian, l xii tit lvi lvii

112 In Italy there was likewise the Vicar of Rome It has been much disputed whether his jurisdiction measured one hundred miles from the city, or whether it stretched over the ten southern provinces of Italy

113 The Table taken from Marquardt (Becker's Handbuch der Römischen Alterthümer, vol. iii part 1 p 240), shows the division of the empire under the four Prætorian præfects

114. Among the works of the celebrated Ulpian there was one, in ten books, concerning the office of a proconsul, whose duties in the most essential articles were the same as those of an ordinary governor of a province

115 The presidents, or consulars, could impose only two ounces the vice præfects, three, the proconsuls, count of the East, and præfect of Egypt, six See Heineccii Jur Civil tom 1 p 75 Pandect l xlviii tit xix n 8 Cod Justinian l i tit liv leg 4, 6

122 As in a former period I have traced the civil and military promotion of Pertinax, I shall here insert the civil honours of Mallius Theodorus 1 He was distinguished by his eloquence while he pleaded as an advocate in the court of the Prætorian præfect 2 He governed one of the provinces of Africa, either as president or consular, and deserved, by his administration, the honour of a brass statue 3 He was appointed vicar, or vice-præfect of Macedonia 4 Quæstor 5 Count of the sacred largesses 6 Prætorian præfect of the Gauls, whilst he might yet be represented as a young man 7 After a retreat, perhaps a disgrace, of many years, which Mallius (confounded by some critics with the poet Manilius, see Fabricius Bibliothec. Latin edit Ernest tom 1 c 18, p 501) employed in the study of the Grecian philosophy he was named Prætorian præfect of Italy in the year 397 8 While he still exercised that great office he was created in the year 399 consul for the West and his name on account of the infamy of his colleague the eunuch Eutropius often stands alone in the Fasti 9 In the year 408 Mallius was appointed a second time Prætorian præfect of Italy Even in the venal panegyric of Claudian we may discover the merit of Mallius Theodorus who by a rare felicity was the intimate friend both of Symmachus and of St Augustin See Tillemont Hist des Emp tom v p 1110–1114

124 The curious passage of Ammianus (l xxx c 4) in which he paints the manners of contemporary lawyers affords a strange mixture of sound sense false rhetoric and extravagant satire Godefroy (Prolegom ad Cod Theod c 1 p 185) supports the historian by similar complaints and authentic facts In the fourth century many camels might have been laden with law books Eunapius in Vit Ædesii p 72

125 See a very splendid example in the Life of Agricola, particularly c 20 21 The lieutenant of Britain was intrusted with the same powers which Cicero proconsul of Cilicia had exercised in the name of the senate and people

126 The Abbé Dubos who has examined with accuracy (see Hist de la Monarchie Françoise tom i p 41–100 edit 1742) the institutions of Augustus and of Constantine observes that if Otho had been put to death the day before he executed his conspiracy Otho would now appear in history as innocent as Corbulo

137 See the two titles De Veteranis and De Filiis Veteranorum [tit xx. xxii] in the seventh book of the Theodosian Code The age at which their military service was required varied from twenty five to sixteen If the sons of the veterans appeared with a horse they had a right to serve in the cavalry two horses gave them some valuable privileges

138 Cod Theod l vii tit xiii leg 7 According to the historian Socrates (see Godefroy ad loc.) the same emperor Valens sometimes required eighty pieces of gold for a recruit In the following law it is faintly expressed that slaves shall not be admitted inter optimas lectissimorum militum turmas

139 The person and property of a Roman knight who had mutilated his two sons were sold at public auction by order of Augustus (Sueton, in August c 24.) The moderation of that artful usurper proves that this example of severity was justified by the spirit of the times Ammianus makes a distinction between the effeminate Italians and the hardy Gauls (l xv c 12) Yet only fifteen years afterwards Valentinian in a law addressed to the præfect of Gaul is obliged to enact that these cowardly deserters shall be burnt alive (Cod Theod l vii tit. xiii l g 5) Their numbers in Illyricum were so considerable that the province complained of a scarcity of recruits. (Id. leg 10)

140. They were called Murci Murcidus is found in Plautus and Festus to denote a lazy and cowardly person who according to Arnobius and Augustin was under the immediate protection of the goddess Murcia From this particular instance of cowardice murcare is used as synonymous to mu-

143 Cod Theod l vi tit 8

144 By a very singular metaphor, borrowed from the military character of the first emperors, the steward of their household was styled the count of their camp (comes castrensis) Cassiodorus very seriously represents to him that his own fame, and that of the empire, must depend on the opinion which foreign ambassadors may conceive of the plenty and magnificence of the royal table (Variar l vi epistol 9)

145 Gutherius (de Officiis Domûs Augustæ, l ii c 20, l iii) has very accurately explained the functions of the master of the offices, and the constitution of the subordinate scrinia But he vainly attempts, on the most doubtful authority, to deduce from the time of the Antonines, or even of Nero, the origin of a magistrate who cannot be found in history before the reign of Constantine

146 Tacitus (Annal xi 22) says that the first quæstors were elected by the people sixty four years after the foundation of the republic but he is of opinion that they had, long before that period, been annually appointed by the consuls, and even by the kings But this obscure point of antiquity is contested by other writers

147 Tacitus (Annal xi 22) seems to consider twenty as the highest number of quæstors and Dion (l xliii [c 47] p 374) insinuates that, if the dictator Cæsar once created forty, it was only to facilitate the payment of an immense debt of gratitude Yet the augmentation which he made of prætors subsisted under the succeeding reigns

149 The youth and inexperience of the quæstors, who entered on that important office in their twenty fifth year (Lips Excurs ad Tacit l iii D), engaged Augustus to remove them from the management of the treasury and though they were restored by Claudius, they seem to have been finally dismissed by Nero (Tacit Annal xiii 29 Sueton in Aug c 36, in Claud c 24 Dion, p 696 [l liii c 2], 961 [l lx c 24], etc Plin Epistol x 20 et alibi) In the provinces of the Imperial division, the place of the quæstors was more ably supplied by the procurators (Dion Cas p 707 [l liii c 15], Tacit in Vit Agricol c 15), or, as they were afterwards called, rationales (Hist August p 130 [Lamprid Alex Sever cc 45, 46]) But in the provinces of the senate we may still discover a series of quæstors till the reign of Marcus Antoninus (See the Inscriptions of Gruter, the Epistles of Pliny, and a decisive fact in the Augustan History, p 64 [Spartian Sever c 2]) From Ulpian we may learn (Pandect l i tit 13) that, under the government of the House of Severus, their provincial administration was abolished and in the subsequent troubles the annual or triennial elections of quæstors must have naturally ceased

156 Cod Theod l x tit vi de Grege Dominico Godefroy has collected every circumstance of antiquity relative to the Cappadocian horses One of the finest breeds, the Palmatian, was the forfeiture of a rebel, whose estate lay about sixteen miles from Tyana, near the great road between Constantinople and Antioch

163 The Pandects (l xlviii tit xviii) contains the sentiments of the most celebrated civilians on the subject of torture They strictly confine it to slaves and Ulpian himself is ready to acknowledge that Res est fragilis et periculosa et quæ veritatem fallat [§ 23]

167 This definition of the sage Ulpian (Pandect l xlviii tit iv) seems to have been adapted to the court of Caracalla rather than to that of Alexander Severus See the Codes of Theodosius and Justinian ad leg Juliam majestatis

168 Arcadius Charisius is the oldest lawyer quoted in the Pandects to justify the universal practice of torture in all cases of treason but this maxim of tyranny which is admitted by Ammianus (l. xix c 12) with the most respectful terror is enforced by several laws of the successors of Constantine See Cod Theod l ix tit xxxv In majestatis crimine omnibus æqua est conditio [leg 1]

170 Mr Hume (Essays vol. i. p 389) has seen this important truth with some degree of perplexity

171 The cycle of indictions which may be traced as high as the reign of Constantius or perhaps of his father Constantine is still employed by the Papal court but the commencement of the year has been very reasonably altered to the first of January See l Art d vérifier les Dates p xi, and Dictionnaire I aison de la Diplomatique tom ii. p 25 two accurate treatises which come from the workshop of the Benedictines

172 The first twenty eight titles of the eleventh book of the Theodosian Code are filled with the circumstantial regulations on the important subject of tributes but they suppose a clearer knowledge of fundamental principles than it is at present in our power to attain

173 The title concerning the Decurions (l. xii. tit 1) is the most ample in the whole Theodosian Code since it contains not less than one hundred and ninety two distinct laws to ascertain the duties and privileges of that useful order of citizens.

177 Some precautions were taken (see Cod. Theod l xi tit ii and Cod Justinian l x. tit. xxvii leg 1 2 3) to restrain the magistrates from the abuse of their authority either in the exaction or in the purchase of corn but those who had learning enough to read the orations of Cicero against Verres (iii de Frumento) might instruct themselves in all the various arts of oppression, with regard to the weight the price the quality and the carriage The avarice of an unlettered governor would supply the ignorance of precept or precedent

178 Cod Theod l xi tit xxviii leg 2 published the 24th of March A D 395 by the emperor Honorius only two months after the death of his father Theodosius He speaks of 528 042 Roman jugera which I have reduced to the English measure The jugerum contained 28 800 square Roman feet

179 Godefroy (Cod Theod tom v p 116 [l xiv tit x leg 2]) argues with weight and learning on the subject of the capitation but while he explains the caput as a share or measure of property he too absolutely excludes the idea of a personal assessment

180 Quid profuerit (Julianus) anhelantibus extremâ penuriâ Gallis hinc maxime claret quod primitus partes eas ingressus pro capitibus singulis tributi nomine vicenos quinos aureos reperit flagi-

181 In the calculation of any sum of money under Constantine and his successors, we need only refer to the excellent discourse of Mr Greaves on the Denarius for the proof of the following principles 1 That the ancient and modern Roman pound, containing 5256 grains of Troy weight, is about one twelfth lighter than the English pound, which is composed of 5760 of the same grains 2 That the pound of gold, which had once been divided into forty-eight aurei, was at this time coined into seventy-two smaller pieces of the same denomination 3 That five of these aurei were the legal tender for a pound of silver, and that consequently the pound of gold was exchanged for fourteen pounds eight ounces of silver, according to the Roman, or about thirteen pounds according to the English weight 4 That the English pound of silver is coined into sixty two shillings From these elements we may compute the Roman pound of gold, the usual method of reckoning large sums, at forty pounds sterling, and we may fix the currency of the aureus at somewhat more than eleven shillings

182 Geryones nos esse puta, monstrumque tributum,

The reputation of Father Sirmond led me to expect more satisfaction than I have found in his note (p 144) on this remarkable passage The words, suo vel suorum nomine, betray the perplexity of the commentator

183 This assertion, however formidable it may seem, is founded on the original registers of births, deaths, and marriages, collected by public authority, and now deposited in the Controle General at Paris The annual average of births throughout the whole kingdom, taken in five years (from 1770 to 1774, both inclusive), is 479,649 boys and 449,269 girls, in all 928 918 children The province of French Hainault alone furnishes 9906 births, and we are assured, by an actual enumeration of the people, annually repeated from the year 1773 to the year 1776, that, upon an average, Hainault contains 257,097 inhabitants By the rules of fair analogy, we might infer that the ordinary proportion of annual births to the whole people is about 1 to 26 and that the kingdom of France contains 24,151,868 persons of both sexes and of every age If we content ourselves with the more moderate proportion of 1 to 25, the whole population will amount to 23 222,950 From the diligent researches of the French government (which are not unworthy of our own imitation) we may hope to obtain a still greater degree of certainty on this important subject

186 We might derive an additional supply of 301,750 inhabitants from the dioceses of Chalons (Cabillonum) and of Maçon (Matisco) since they contain, the one 200, and the other 260 parishes This accession of territory might be justified by very specious reasons 1 Chalons and Maçon were undoubtedly within the original jurisdiction of the Ædui (See d'Anville, Notice, p 187, 443) 2 In the Notitia of Gaul they are enumerated not as Civitates, but merely as Castra 3 They do not appear to have been episcopal seats before the fifth and sixth centuries Yet there is a passage in Eumenius (Panegyr Vet viii [vii] 7) which very forcibly deters me from extending the territory of the Ædui, in the reign of Constantine along the beautiful banks of the navigable Saône

1 On ne se trompera point sur Constantin en croyant tout le mal qu en dit Eusèbe et tout le bien qu en dit Zosime Fleury Hist Ecclésiastique tom iii p 233 Eusebius and Zosimus form indeed the two extremes of flattery and invective The intermediate shades are expressed by those writers whose character or situation variously tempered the influence of their religious zeal

16 Akritws without a trial is the strong and most probably the just expression of Suidas. The elder Victor who wrote under the next reign speaks with becoming caution Natû grandior incertum quâ causâ patris judicio occidisset [De Cæsar c 41] If we consult the succeeding writers Eutropius the younger Victor Orosius Jerom Zosimus Philostorgius and Gregory of Tours their knowledge will appear gradually to increase as their means of information must have diminished a circumstance which frequently occurs in historical disquisition

17 Ammianus (l xiv c 11) uses the general expression of peremptum Codinus (p 34) [p 63 ed. Bonn] beheads the young prince but Sidonius Apollinaris (Epistol v 8) for the sake perhaps of an antithesis to Fausta s warm bath chooses to administer a draught of cold poison

18 Sorosis filium commodæ indolis juvenem Eutropius x 6 [4] May I not be permitted to conjecture that Crispus had married Helena the daughter of the emperor Licinius and that on the happy delivery of the princess, in the year 322, a general pardon was granted by Constantine? See Ducange, Fam Byzant p 47, and the law (l ix tit xxxvii) of the Theodosian code, which has so much embarrassed the interpreters Godefroy, tom iii p 267

21 In order to prove that the statue was erected by Constantine, and afterwards concealed by the malice of the Arians, Codinus very readily creates (p 34 [p 63, ed Bonn]) two witnesses, Hippolytus and the younger Herodotus, to whose imaginary histories he appeals with unblushing confidence

22 Zosimus (l ii [c 29] p 103) may be considered as our original The ingenuity of the moderns, assisted by a few hints from the ancients, has illustrated and improved his obscure and imperfect narrative

23 Philostorgius, l ii c 4 Zosimus (l ii p 104 [c 29], 116 [c 39]) imputes to Constantine the death of two wives, of the innocent Fausta, and of an adulteress who was the mother of his three successors According to Jerom, three or four years elapsed between the death of Crispus and that of Fausta The elder Victor is prudently silent

24 If Fausta was put to death, it is reasonable to believe that the private apartments of the palace were the scene of her execution The orator Chrysostom indulges his fancy by exposing the naked empress on a desert mountain to be devoured by wild beasts

25 Julian Orat i [p 9] He seems to call her the mother of Crispus She might assume that title by adoption At least, she was not considered as his mortal enemy Julian compares the fortune of Fausta with that of Parysatis, the Persian queen A Roman would have more naturally recollected the second Agrippina —

> Et moi, qui sur le trône ai suivi mes ancêtres
> Moi, fille, femme, sœur, et mère de vos maitres

It is somewhat singular that these satirical lines should be attributed, not to an obscure libeller or a disappointed patriot, but to Ablavius, prime minister and favourite of the emperor We may now perceive that the imprecations of the Roman people were dictated by humanity as well as by superstition Zosim l ii [c 30] p 105

31 Adstruunt nummi veteres ac singulares Spanheim de Usu Numismat Dissertat xii vol ii p 357 Ammianus speaks of this Roman king (l xiv c 1, and Valesius ad loc) The Valesian fragment styles him King of kings and the Paschal Chronicle (p 286 [p 228, ed Ven , vol i p 532, ed Bonn]), by employing the word Ῥῆγα, acquires the weight of Latin evidence

32 His dexterity in martial exercises is celebrated by Julian (Orat i p 11, Orat ii p 53) and allowed by Ammianus (l xxi c 16)

33 Euseb in Vit Constantin l iv c 51 Julian, Orat i p 11–16, with Spanheim's elaborate Commentary Libanius, Orat iii p 109 [ed Paris, 1627] Constantius studied with laudable diligence, but the dulness of his fancy prevented him from succeeding in the art of poetry, or even of rhetoric

34 Eusebius (l iv c 51, 52), with a design of exalting the authority and glory of Constantine, affirms that he divided the Roman empire as a private citizen might have divided his patrimony His distribution of the provinces may be collected from Eutropius, the two Victors, and the Valesian fragment

See in the Recherches sur les Américains, tom ii p 236–271, a very curious dissertation on poisoned darts The venom was commonly extracted from the vegetable reign, but that employed by the Scythians appears to have been drawn from the viper and a mixture of human blood The use of poisoned arms, which has been spread over both worlds, never preserved a savage tribe from the arms of a disciplined enemy

40 The nine books of Poetical Epistles which

Ovid composed during the seven first years of his melancholy exile possess besides the merit of elegance a double value They exhibit a picture of the human mind under very singular circumstances and they contain many curious observations which no Roman except Ovid could have an opportunity of making Every circumstance which tends to illustrate the history of the barbarians has been drawn together by the very accurate Count de Buat Hist Ancienne des Peuples de l Europe tom iv c xvi p 286–317

41 The Sarmatian Jazygæ were settled on the banks of the Pathissus or Tibiscus when Pliny in the year 79 published his Natural History See l iv c 25 In the time of Strabo and Ovid sixty or seventy years before they appear to have inhabited beyond the Getæ along the coast of the Euxine

42 Principes Sarmatarum Jazygum penes quos civitatis regimen plebem quoque et vim equitum quâ solâ valent offerebant Tacit Hist iii 5 This offer was made in the civil war between Vitellius and Vespasian

43 This hypothesis of a Vandal king reigning over Sarmatian subjects seems necessary to reconcile the Goth Jornandes with the Greek and Latin historians of Constantine It may be observed that Isidore who lived in Spain under the dominion of the Goths gives them for enemies not the Vandals but the Sarmatians See his Chronicle in Grotius p 709

44 [No other author mentions Constantine s defeat by the Goths]

45 I may stand in need of some apology for having used without scruple the authority of Constantine Porphyrogenitus in all that relates to the wars and negotiations of the Chersonites I am aware that he was a Greek of the tenth century and that his accounts of ancient history are frequently confused and fabulous But on this occasion his narrative is for the most part consistent and probable nor is there much difficulty in conceiving that an emperor might have access to some secret archives which had escaped the diligence of meaner historians For the situation and history of Chersone see Peyssonel des Peuples barbares qui ont habité les Bords du Danube c xvi 84–90. (Gibbon has confused the inhabitants of the city of Cherson the ancient Chersonesus with the people of the Chersonesus Taurica]

46 The Gothic and Sarmatian wars are related in so broken and imperfect a manner that I have been obliged to compare the following writers who mutually supply correct and illustrate each other Those who will take the same trouble may acquire a right of criticising my narrative Ammianus L xvii. c 12 Anonym Valesian p 715 Eutropius x 7 [4] Sextus Rufus de Provinciis c 26 Julian Orat i p 9, and Spanheim, Comment p 94 Hieronym. in Chron Euseb in Vit Constantin l iv c. 6 Socrates L i c 18 Sozomen L i c 8 Zosimus, l. ii. 47 Eusebius (in Vit Const l iv c 50) remarks three circumstances relative to these Indians. 1 They came from the shores of the eastern ocean a description which might be applied to the coast of China or Coromandel 2 They presented shining gems and unknown animals 3 They protested their kings had erected statues to represent the supreme majesty of Constantine

48 Funus relatum in urbem sui nominis, quod sane P R ægerrime tulit Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 41] Constantine prepared for himself a stately tomb in the church of the Holy Apostles. Euseb l iv c 60 The best and indeed almost the only account of the sickness death and funeral of Constantine is contained in the fourth book of his Life by Eusebius

49 Eusebius (l iv c. 68) terminates his narrative by this loyal declaration of the troops, and avoids all the invidious circumstances of the subsequent massacre

50 The character of Dalmatius is advantageously though concisely drawn by Eutropius (x. 9 [5]) Dalmatius Cæsar prosperrimâ indole neque patruo absimilis haud multo post oppressus est factione militari As both Jerom and the Alexandrian Chronicle mention the third year of the Cæsar which did not commence till the 18th or 24th of September A D 337 it is certain that these military factions continued above four months.

51 I have related this singular anecdote on the authority of Philostorgius l ii c 16 But if such a pretext was ever used by Constantius and his adherents it was laid aside with contempt as soon as it served their immediate purpose Athanasius (tom i p 856) mentions the oath which Constantius had taken for the security of his kinsmen.

52 Conjugia sobrinarum diu ignorata tempore addito percrebuisse Tacit Annal xii 6 and Lipsius ad loc The repeal of the ancient law and the practice of five hundred years were insufficient to eradicate the prejudices of the Romans, who still considered the marriages of cousins-german as a species of imperfect incest (Augustine The City of God xv 16) and Julian whose mind was biassed by superstition and resentment stigmatises these unnatural alliances between his own cousins with the opprobrious epithet of γαμῶν τε οὐ γαμῶν (Orat. vii p 228) The jurisprudence of the canons has since revived and enforced this prohibition without being able to introduce it either into the civil or the common law of Europe See on the subject of these marriages Taylor's Civil Law p 331 Brouer de Jure Connub l ii c 12 Héricourt des Loix Ecclésiastiques part iii c. 5 Fleury Institutions du Droit Canonique tom i p 331 Paris 1767 and Fra Paolo Istoria del Concilio Trident. L viii.

53 Julian (ad S P Q Athen. p. 270) charges his cousin Constantius with the whole guilt of a massacre from which he himself so narrowly escaped His assertion is confirmed by Athanasius, who, for reasons of a very different nature, was not less an enemy of Constantius (tom i p 856) Zosimus [ii 40] joins in the same accusation But the three abbreviators, Eutropius and the Victors, use very qualifying expressions —"sinente potius quam jubente" "incertum quo suasore," "vi militum"

54 Euseb in Vit Constantin l iv c 69 Zosimus, l ii [c 39] p 117 Idat in Chron See two notes of Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 1086–1091 The reign of the eldest brother at Constantinople is noticed only in the Alexandrian Chronicle

56 D'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p 764.

57 Sextus Rufus (c 26), who on this occasion is no contemptible authority, affirms that the Persians sued in vain for peace, and that Constantine was preparing to march against them yet the superior weight of the testimony of Eusebius obliges us to admit the preliminaries, if not the ratification, of the treaty See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 420

58 Julian Orat i p 20

59 Julian Orat i p 20, 21 Moses of Chorene, l ii c 89, l iii c 1–9, p 226–240 The perfect agreement between the vague hints of the contemporary orator and the circumstantial narrative of the national historian, gives light to the former and weight to the latter For the credit of Moses it may be likewise observed that the name of Antiochus is found a few years before in a civil office of inferior dignity See Godefroy, Cod Theod tom vi. p 350

60 Ammianus (xiv 4) gives a lively description of the wandering and predatory life of the Saracens, who stretched from the confines of Assyria to the cataracts of the Nile It appears from the adventures of Malchus, which Jerom has related in so entertaining a manner, that the high road between Beræa and Edessa was infested by these robbers See Hieronym tom i p 256

61 We shall take from Eutropius the general idea of the war (x 10 [6]) A Persis enim multa et gravia perpessus, sæpe captis oppidis, obsessis urbibus, cæsis exercitibus, nullumque ei contra Saporem prosperum prœlium fuit, nisi quod apud Singaram, etc This honest account is confirmed by the hints of Ammianus, Rufus, and Jerom The two first orations of Julian, and the third oration of Libanius, exhibit a more flattering picture, but the recantation of both those orators after the death of Constantius, while it restores us to the possession of the truth, degrades their own character and that of the emperor The commentary of Spanheim on the first oration of Julian is profusely learned See likewise the judicious observations of Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 656

64 See Julian Orat i p 27, Orat ii p 62, etc , with the Commentary of Spanheim (p 188–202), who illustrates the circumstances, and ascertains the time of the three sieges of Nisibis Their dates are likewise examined by Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 668, 671, 674) Something is added from Zosimus l iii [c 8] p 151 and the Alexandrian Chronicle, p 290

65 Sallust Fragment lxxxiv edit Brosses, and Plutarch in Lucullus Nisibis is now reduced to one hundred and fifty houses, the marshy lands produce rice, and the fertile meadows, as far as Mosul and the Tigris, are covered with the ruins of towns and villages See Niebuhr, Voyages, tom ii p 300–309

66 The miracles which Theodoret (l ii c 30) ascribes to St James, bishop of Edessa, were at least performed in a worthy cause, the defence of his country He appeared on the walls under the figure of the Roman emperor, and sent an army of gnats to sting the trunks of the elephants, and to discomfit the host of the new Sennacherib

67 Julian Orat i p 27 Though Niebuhr (tom ii p 307) allows a very considerable swell to the Mygdonius, over which he saw a bridge of twelve arches, it is difficult, however, to understand this parallel of a trifling rivulet with a mighty river There are many circumstances obscure, and almost unintelligible, in the description of these stupendous waterworks

68 We are obliged to Zonaras (tom. ii l xiii [c 7] p 11 [15]) for this invasion of the Massagetæ, which is perfectly consistent with the general series of events to which we are darkly led by the broken history of Ammianus

69 The causes and the events of this civil war are related with much perplexity and contradiction I have chiefly followed Zonaras and the younger Victor The monody (ad calcem Eutrop edit Havercamp) pronounced on the death of Constantine might have been very instructive but prudence and false taste engaged the orator to involve himself in vague declamation

70 Quarum (gentium) obsides pretio quæsitos pueros venustiores, quod cultius habuerat, libidine hujusmodi arsisse pro certo habetur [De Cæs 41] Had not the depraved taste of Constans been publicly avowed, the elder Victor, who held a considerable office in his brother's reign, would not have asserted it in such positive terms

71 Julian Orat i and ii Zosim. l. ii [c 42] p -

134 Victor in Epitome [c 41] There is reason to believe that Magnentius was born in one of those barbarian colonies which Constantius Chlorus had established in Gaul (see this History p 313) His behaviour may remind us of the patriot earl of Leicester the famous Simon de Montfort who could persuade the good people of England that he a Frenchman by birth had taken arms to deliver them from foreign favourites

72 This ancient city had once flourished under the name of Illiberis (Pomponius Mela ii 5) The munificence of Constantine gave it new splendour and his mother s name Helena (it is still called Elne) became the seat of a bishop who long after wards transferred his residence to Perpignan the capital of modern Rousillon See d Anville Notice de l Ancienne Gaule p 380 Longuerue Description de la France p 223 and the Marca Hispanica l i c 2

73 Zosimus l ii [c 42] p 119 120 Zonaras tom ii l xiii [c 6] p 13 and the Abbreviators

74 Eutropius (x 10 [6]) describes Vetranio with more temper and probably with more truth than either of the two Victors Vetranio was born of obscure parents in the wildest parts of Mæsia and so much had his education been neglected that after his elevation he studied the alphabet

75 The doubtful fluctuating conduct of Vetranio is described by Julian in his first oration (p 30 sqq] and accurately explained by Spanheim who discusses the situation and behaviour of Constantina

76 See Peter the Patrician in the Excerpta Legationum p 28 [ed Paris cap 14 p 130 ed Bonn]

77 Zonaras tom ii l xiii [c 7] p 15. The position of Sardica near the modern city of Sophia appears better suited to this interview than the situation of either Naissus or Sirmium where it is placed by Jerom Socrates and Sozomen

78 See the two first orations of Julian particularly p 31 and Zosimus l ii [c 44] p 122 The distinct narrative of the historian serves to illustrate the diffuse but vague descriptions of the orator

79 The younger Victor assigns to his exile the emphatical appellation of voluptarium otium [Epit c. 41] Socrates (l ii c 28) is the voucher for the correspondence with the emperor which would seem to prove that Vetranio was indeed prope ad stultitiam simplicissimus

80 Eum Constantius facundiæ vi dejectum Imperio in privatum otium removit Quæ gloria post natum Imperium soli processit eloquio clementiâque etc Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 42] Julian and Themistius (Orat iii and iv) adorn this exploit with all the artificial and gaudy colouring of their rhetoric

81 Busbequius (p 112) traversed the Lower Hungary and Sclavonia at a time when they were reduced almost to a desert by the reciprocal hostilities of the Turks and Christians Yet he mentions with admiration the unconquerable fertility of the soil and observes that the height of the grass was sufficient to conceal a loaded waggon from his sight See likewise Browne s Travels in Harris's Collection vol ii p 762 etc

82 Zosimus gives a very large account of the war and the negotiation (l ii [c 45 54] p 123 130) But as he neither shows himself a soldier nor a politician his narrative must be weighed with attention and received with caution

83 This remarkable bridge which is flanked with towers and supported on large wooden piles, was constructed A D 1566 by Sultan Soliman to facilitate the march of his armies into Hungary See Browne s Travels and Busching s System of Geography vol ii p 90

84 This position and the subsequent evolutions are clearly though concisely described by Julian Orat i p 36

85 Sulpicius Severus l ii p 405 [ed Lugd Bat 1647] The emperor passed the day in prayer with Valens the Arian bishop of Mursa who gained his confidence by announcing the success of the battle M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 1110) very properly remarks the silence of Julian with regard to the personal prowess of Constantius in the battle of Mursa The silence of flattery is sometimes equal to the most positive and authentic evidence

86 Julian Orat i p 36 37 and Orat ii p 59, 60 Zonaras tom ii l xiii [c 8] p 17 Zosimus, l ii [c 49-52] p 130-133 The last of these celebrates the dexterity of the archer Menelaus who could discharge three arrows at the same time an advantage which according to his apprehension of military affairs materially contributed to the victory of Constantius

87 According to Zonaras [l c] Constantius, out of 80 000 men lost 30 000 and Magnentius lost 24 000 out of 36 000 The other articles of this account seem probable and authentic but the numbers of the tyrants army must have been mistaken either by the author or his transcribers Magnentius had collected the whole force of the West Romans and barbarians into one formidable body which cannot fairly be estimated at less than 100 000 men Julian Orat i p 34 35

88 Ingentes R I vires eâ dimicatione consumptæ sunt ad quælibet bella externa idoneæ quæ multum triumphorum possent securitatisque conferre Eutropius, x 13 [6] The younger Victor expresses himself to the same effect

89 On this occasion we must prefer the unsuspected testimony of Zosimus and Zonaras to the flattering assertions of Julian The younger Victor paints the character of Magnentius in a singular light Sermonis acer animi turmidi et immodice timidus artifex tamen ad occultandam audaciæ specie formidenem [Epit c 43] Is it most likely that in the battle of Mursa his behaviour was governed by nature or by art? I should incline for the latter

90 Julian Orat i p 38, 39 In that place, however, as well as in Oration ii p 97, he insinuates the general disposition of the senate, the people, and the soldiers of Italy, towards the party of the emperor

91 The elder Victor describes in a pathetic manner the miserable condition of Rome "Cujus stolidum ingenium adeo P R patribusque exitio fuit, uti passim domus, fora, viæ, templaque, cruore, cadaveribusque opplerentur, bustorum modo" [De Cæsar c 42] Athanasius (tom i p 677) deplores the fate of several illustrious victims, and Julian (Orat ii p 58) execrates the cruelty of Marcellinus, the implacable enemy of the house of Constantine

92 Zosim l ii [c 53] p 133 Victor in Epitome [c 42] The panegyrists of Constantius, with their usual candour, forget to mention this accidental defeat

93 Zonaras, tom ii l xiii [c 8] p 17 Julian, in several places of the two orations, expatiates on the clemency of Constantius to the rebels

94 Zosim l ii [c 53] p 133 Julian Orat i p 40, ii p 74

95 Ammian xv 6 Zosim l ii [c 53] p 133 Julian, who (Orat i p 40) inveighs against the cruel effects of the tyrant's despair, mentions (Orat i p 34) the oppressive edicts which were dictated by his necessities, or by his avarice His subjects were compelled to purchase the Imperial demesnes, a doubtful and dangerous species of property, which, in case of a revolution, might be imputed to them as a treasonable usurpation.

96 The medals of Magnentius celebrate the victories of the two Augusti, and of the Cæsar The Cæsar was another brother named Desiderius See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 757

97 Julian Orat i p 40 ii p 74, with Spanheim, p 263 His Commentary illustrates the transactions of this civil war Mons Seleuci was a small place in the Cottian Alps, a few miles distant from Vapincum, or Gap, an episcopal city of Dauphine See d'Anville, Notice de la Gaule, p 464, and Longuerue, Description de la France, p 327

98 Zosimus, l ii [c 53] p 134 Liban Orat x p 268, 269 The latter most vehemently arraigns this cruel and selfish policy of Constantius

99 Julian, Orat i p 40 Zosimus, l ii [c 53] p 134 Socrates, l ii c 32 Sozomen, l iv c 7 The younger Victor describes his death with some horrid circumstances Transfosso latere, ut erat vasti corporis, vulnere naribusque et ore cruorem effundens, exspiravit [Epit c 42] If we can give credit to Zonaras, the tyrant, before he expired, had the pleasure of murdering with his own hands his mother and his brother Desiderius

100 Julian (Orat ii p 58, 59) seems at a loss to determine whether he inflicted on himself the punishment of his crimes, whether he was drowned in the Drave, or whether he was carried by the avenging dæmons from the field of battle to his destined place of eternal tortures

101 Ammian xiv 5, xxi 16

Chapter XIX

1 Ammianus (l xiv c 6) imputes the first practice of castration to the cruel ingenuity of Semiramis, who is supposed to have reigned above nineteen hundred years before Christ The use of eunuchs is of high antiquity, both in Asia and Egypt They are mentioned in the law of Moses, Deuteron xxiii 1 See Goguet, Origines des Loix, etc , Part i l i c 3

2 Eunuchum dixti velle te,
Quia solæ utuntur his reginæ—
Terent Eunuch act i scene 2

This play is translated from Menander, and the original must have appeared soon after the eastern conquests of Alexander

3 Miles spadonibus
Servire rugosis potest
Horat Carm v 9 [Epod ix. 13], and Dacier ad loc

By the word spado the Romans very forcibly expressed their abhorrence of this mutilated condition The Greek appellation of eunuchs, which insensibly prevailed, had a milder sound and a more ambiguous sense

4 We need only mention Posides, a freedman and eunuch of Claudius, in whose favour the emperor prostituted some of the most honourable rewards of military valour See Sueton in Claudio, c 28 Posides employed a great part of his wealth in building

Ut spado vincebat Capitolia nostra Posides

5 Castrari mares vetuit Sueton in Domitian. c 7 See Dion Cassius, l lxvii [c 2] p 1101, l. lxviii [c 2] p 1119

6 There is a passage in the Augustan History, p 137, in which Lampridius, whilst he praises Alexander Severus and Constantine for restraining the tyranny of the eunuchs, deplores the mischiefs which they occasioned in other reigns Huc accedit, quod eunuchos nec in consiliis nec in ministeriis habuit, qui soli principes perdunt, dum eos more gentium aut regum Persarum volunt vivere qui a populo etiam amicissimum semovent qui internuntii sunt, aliud quàm respondetur [sæpe], referentes claudentes principem suum, et agentes ante omnia ne quid sciat [Lampr Alex Sev c. 66]

7 Xenophon (Cyropædia, l viii [5 § 60] p 540) has stated the specious reasons which engaged Cyrus to intrust his person to the guard of eunuchs He had observed in that the practice of castration might tame their ungovernable fierceness it did not diminish their strength or spirit and he persuaded himself that those who were separated from the rest of human kind would be more firmly attached to the person of their benefactor But a long experience has contradicted the judgment of Cyrus Some particular instances may occur of eunuchs distinguished by their fidelity their valour and their abilities but if we examine the general history of Persia India and China we shall find that the power of the eunuchs has uniformly marked the decline and fall of every dynasty

8 See Ammianus Marcellinus l xxi c 16 l xxii c 4 The whole tenor of his impartial history serves to justify the invectives of Mamertinus of Libanius and of Julian himself who have insulted the vices of the court of Constantius

9 Aurelius Victor censures the negligence of his sovereign in choosing the governors of the provinces and the generals of the army and concludes his history with a very bold observation as it is much more dangerous under a feeble reign to attack the ministers than the master himself Uti verum absolvam brevi ut Imperatore ipso clarius ita apparitorum plerisque magis atrox nihil [De Cæsar c 42]

10 Apud quem (si vere dici debeat) multum Constantius potuit Ammian l xviii c 4

11 Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iii p 90) reproaches the apostate with his ingratitude towards Mark bishop of Arethusa who had contributed to save his life and we learn though from a less respectable authority (Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom iv p 916) that Julian was concealed in the sanctuary of a church

12 The most authentic account of the education and adventures of Julian is contained in the epistle or manifesto which he himself addressed to the senate and people of Athens Libanius (Orat Parentalis) on the side of the Pagans and Socrates (l iii c 1) on that of the Christians have preserved several interesting circumstances

13 For the promotion of Gallus see Idatius Zosimus and the two Victors According to Philostorgius (l iv c 1) Theophilus an Arian bishop was the witness and as it were the guarantee of this solemn engagement He supported that character with generous firmness but M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom iv p 1120) thinks it very improbable that a heretic should have possessed such virtue

14 Julian was at first permitted to pursue his studies at Constantinople but the reputation which he acquired soon excited the jealousy of Constantius and the young prince was advised to withdraw himself to the less conspicuous scenes of Bithynia and Ionia

15 See Julian ad S P Q A p 271 Jerom in Chron Aurelius Victor Eutropius x 14 [7] I shall copy the words of Eutropius who wrote his abridgment about fifteen years after the death of Gallus when there was no longer any motive either to flatter or to depreciate his character Multis incivilibus gestis Gallus Cæsar vir naturâ ferus et ad tyrannidem pronior si suo jure imperare licuisset

16 Megæra quædam mortalis inflammatrix sævientis assidua humani cruoris avida etc Ammian Marcellin l xiv c 1 The sincerity of Ammianus would not suffer him to misrepresent facts or characters but his love of ambitious ornaments frequently betrayed him into an unnatural vehemence of expression

17 His name was Clematius of Alexandria and his only crime was a refusal to gratify the desires of his mother in law who solicited his death because she had been disappointed of his love Ammian l xiv c 1

18 See in Ammianus (l xiv c 1 7) a very ample detail of the cruelties of Gallus His brother Julian (p 272) insinuates that a secret conspiracy had been formed against him and Zosimus names (l ii [c 55] p 135) the persons engaged in it a minister of considerable rank and two obscure agents who were resolved to make their fortune

19 Zonaras l xiii [c 8] tom ii p 17 18 The assassins had seduced a great number of legionaries but their designs were discovered and revealed by an old woman in whose cottage they lodged

20 In the present text of Ammianus [xiv 7] we read Asper quidem sed ad lenitatem propensior which forms a sentence of contradictory nonsense. With the aid of an old manuscript Valesius has rectified the first of these corruptions and we perceive a ray of light in the substitution of the word vafer If we venture to change lenitatem into levitatem this alteration of a single letter will render the whole passage clear and consistent

21 Instead of being obliged to collect scattered and imperfect hints from various sources, we now enter into the full stream of the history of Ammianus and need only refer to the seventh and ninth chapters of his fourteenth book. Philostorgius, however (l iii c 28) though partial to Gallus, should not be entirely overlooked

22 She had preceded her husband but died of a fever on the road at a little place in Bithynia called Cœnum Gallicanum.

23 The Thebæan legions which were then quartered at Hadrianople sent a deputation to Gallus with a tender of their services Ammian l xiv c 11 The Notitia (s 6 20 38 edit Labb) mentions three several legions which bore the name of Thebæan The zeal of M de Voltaire to destroy a despicable though celebrated legend has tempted him on the slightest grounds to deny the existence of a Thebæan legion in the Roman armies See Œuvres de Voltaire tom xv p 414, quarto edition

24 See the complete narrative of the journey and death of Gallus in Ammianus l xiv c 11 Julian complains that his brother was put to death without a trial, attempts to justify, or at least to excuse, the cruel revenge which he had inflicted on his enemies, but seems at last to acknowledge that he might justly have been deprived of the purple

25 Philostorgius, l iv c 1 Zonaras, l xiii [c 9] tom ii p 19 But the former was partial towards an Arian monarch, and the latter transcribed, without choice or criticism, whatever he found in the writings of the ancients

26 See Ammianus Marcellin l xv c 1, 3, 8 Julian himself, in his epistle to the Athenians, draws a very lively and just picture of his own danger and of his sentiments He shows, however, a tendency to exaggerate his sufferings, by insinuating, though in obscure terms that they lasted above a year a period which cannot be reconciled with the truth of chronology

27 Julian has worked the crimes and misfortunes of the family of Constantine into an allegorical fable, which is happily conceived and agreeably related It forms the conclusion of the seventh Oration, from whence it has been detached and translated by the Abbe de la Bleterie, Vie de Jovien, tom ii p 385-408

28 She was a native of Thessalonica in Macedonia, of a noble family, and the daughter as well as sister of consuls Her marriage with the emperor may be placed in the year 352 In a divided age the historians of all parties agree in her praises. See their testimonies collected by Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 750-754

29 Libanius and Gregory Nazianzen have exhausted the arts as well as the powers of their eloquence to represent Julian as the first of heroes, or the worst of tyrants Gregory was his fellow-student at Athens, and the symptoms, which he so tragically describes, of the future wickedness of the apostate, amount only to some bodily imperfections, and to some peculiarities in his speech and manner He protests, however, that he then foresaw and foretold the calamities of the church and state (Greg Nazianzen, Orat iv p 121, 122)

30 Succumbere tot necessitatibus tamque crebris unum se, quod nunquam fecerat, aperte demonstrans Ammian l xv c 8 He then expresses, in their own words, the flattering assurances of the courtiers

31 Tantum a temperatis moribus Juliani differens fratris quantum inter Vespasiani filios fuit, Domitianum et Titum Ammian l xiv c 11 The circumstances and education of the two brothers were so nearly the same as to afford a strong example of the innate difference of characters

33 Julian, ad S P Q A p 275, 276 Liban ius, Orat x p 268 Julian did not yield till the gods had signified their will by repeated visions and omens His piety then forbade him to resist

34 Julian himself relates (p 274), with some humour, the circumstances of his own metamorphosis, his downcast looks, and his perplexity at being thus suddenly transported into a new world, where every object appeared strange and hostile

35 See Ammian Marcellin l xv c 8 Zosimus, l iii [c 2] p 139 Aurelius Victor Victor Junior in Epitom [c 42] Eutrop x 14 [7]

36 Militares omnes horrendo fragore scuta genibus illidentes, quod est prosperitatis indicium plenum, nam contra cum hastis clypei feriuntur, iræ documentum est et doloris Ammianus adds, with a nice distinction, Eumque ut potiori reverentia servaretur, nec supra modum laudabant nec infra quam decebat [xv 8]

37 Ἔλλαβε πορφύρεος θανατος, καὶ μοιρα κραταιη The word purple, which Homer had used as a vague but common epithet for death, was applied by Julian to express very aptly, the nature and object of his own apprehensions.

38 He represents, in the most pathetic terms (p 277), the distress of his new situation The provision for his table was however so elegant and sumptuous, that the young philosopher rejected it with disdain Quum legeret libellum assidue, quem Constantius ut privignum ad studia mittens manu suâ conscripserat, prælicenter disponens quid in convivio Cæsaris impendi deberet, Phasianum, et vulvam et sumen exigi petuit et inferri Ammian Marcellin l xvi c 5

39 If we recollect that Constantine, the father of Helena, died above eighteen years before in a mature old age, it will appear probable that the daughter, though a virgin, could not be very young at the time of her marriage She was soon afterwards delivered of a son, who died immediately, quòd obstetrix corrupta mercede, mox natum præsecto plusquam convenerat umbilico necavit. She accompanied the emperor and empress in their journey to Rome, and the latter, quæsitum venenum bibere per fraudem illexit, ut quotiescunque concepisset, immaturum abjiceret partum Ammian l xvi c 10 Our physicians will determine whether there exists such a poison For my own part, I am inclined to hope that the public malignity imputed the effects of accident as the guilt of Eusebia

40 Ammianus (xv 5) was perfectly well informed of the conduct and fate of Sylvanus He himself was one of the few followers who attended Ursicinus in his dangerous enterprise

41 For the particulars of the visit of Constantius to Rome, see Ammianus, l xvi c 10 We have only to add that Themistius was appointed deputy from Constantinople, and that he composed his fourth oration for this ceremony

42 Hormisdas, a fugitive prince of Persia, observed to the emperor that, if he made such a horse, he must think of preparing a similar stable (the Forum of Trajan) Another saying of Hormisdas is recorded, "that one thing only had displeased him, to find that men died at Rome as well as elsewhere " If we adopt this reading of the text of Ammianus (displicuisse instead of placuisse), we

mav consider it as a reproof of Roman vanity The contrary sense would be that of a misanthrope

43 When Germanicus visited the ancient monuments of Thebes the eldest of the priests explained to him the meaning of these hieroglyphics Tacit Annal ii c 60 But it seems probable that before the useful invention of an alphabet these natural or arbitrary signs were the common characters of the Egyptian nation See Warburton s Divine Legation of Moses vol iii p 69 243

44 See Plin Hist Natur l xxxvi c 14 15

45 Ammian Marcellin l xvii c 4 He gives us a Greek interpretation of the hieroglyphics and his commentator Lindenbrogius adds a Latin inscription which in twenty verses of the age of Constantius contain a short history of the obelisk

46 See Donat Roma Antiqua l iii c 14 l iv c 12 and the learned though confused Dissertation of Bargæus on Obelisks inserted in the fourth volume of Grævius s Roman Antiquities p 1897 1936 This dissertation is dedicated to Pope Sixtus V who erected the obelisk of Constantius in the square before the patriarchal church of St John Lateran

47 The events of this Quadian and Sarmatian war are related by Ammianus xvi 10 xvii 12 13 xix 11

48 Genti Sarmatarum magno decore considens apud eos regem dedit Aurelius Victor [Cæsar 42] In a pompous oration pronounced by Constantius himself he expatiates on his own exploits with much vanity and some truth

49 Ammian xvi 9

50 Ammianus (xvii 5) transcribes the haughty letter Themistius (Orat iv p 57 edit Petav) takes notice of the silk covering Idatius and Zonaras mention the journey of the ambassador and Peter the Patrician (in Excerpt Legat p 28 [ed Paris c 15 p 131 ed Bonn]) has informed us of his conciliating behaviour

51 Ammianus xvii 5 and Valesius ad loc The sophist or philosopher (in that age these words were almost synonymous) was Eustathius the Cappadocian the disciple of Jamblichus and the friend of St Basil Eunapius (in vit Ædesii p 44 47) fondly attributes to this philosophic ambassador the glory of enchanting the barbarian king by the persuasive charms of reason and eloquence See Tillemont Hist de Empereurs tom iv p 828 1132

52 Ammian xviii 5 6 8 The decent and respectful behaviour of Antoninus towards the Roman general sets him in a very interesting light and Ammianus himself speaks of the traitor with some compassion and esteem.

53 This circumstance as it is noticed by Ammianus, serves to prove the veracity of Herodotus (l i c. 133) and the permanency of the Persian manners In every age the Persians have been addicted to intemperance and the wines of Shiraz have triumphed over the law of Mahomet. 56 Diarbekir which is styled Amid or Kara-Amid in the public writings of the Turks, contains above 16 000 houses and is the resi a pasha with three tails The epithet of Kara is derived from the blackness of the stone which composes the strong and ancient wall of Amida

57 The operations of the siege of Amida are very minutely described by Ammianus (xix 1-9) who acted an honourable part in the defence and escaped with difficulty when the city was stormed by the Persians

58 Of these four nations the Albanians are too well known to require any description The Segestans [Sacastenè St Martin] inhabited a larg and level country which still preserves their name to the south of Khorasan and the west of Hindostan. (See Geographia Nubiensis p 133 and d *Herbe*lot Bibliothèque Oriental p 797) Notwithstanding the boasted victory of Bahram (p ge 294) the Segestans above fourscore years afterwards appear as an independent nation the ally of Persia We are ignorant of the situation of the Vertæ and Chionites but I am inclined to place them (at least the latter) towards the confines of India and Scythia See Ammian xvi 9.

59 Ammianus has marked the chronology of this year by three signs which do not perfectly coincide with each other or with the series of the history 1 The corn was ripe when Sapor invaded Mesopotamia Cum jam stipulâ fla ente turgerent a circumstance which, in the latitude of Aleppo would naturally refer us to the month of April or May See Harmer s Observations on Scripture vol i p 41 Shaw s Travels p 335 edit 4to 2 The progress of Sapor was checked by the overflowing of the Euphrates which generally happens in July and August Plin Hist Nat v 21 Viaggi di Pietro della Valle tom i p 696 3 When Sapor had taken Amida after a siege of seventy three days the autumn was far advanced Autumno præcipiti hædorumque improbo sidere exorto To reconcile th se apparent contradictions we must allow for some delay in the Persian king some inaccuracy in the historian and some disorder in the seasons

60 The account of these sieges is given by Ammianus xx 6 7

61 For the identity of Virtha and Tecrit see d Anville Géographie Ancienne tom ii p 201 For the siege of that castle by Timur Bec or Tam

erlane, see Cherefeddin, l iii c 33 The Persian biographer exaggerates the merit and difficulty of this exploit, which delivered the caravans of Bagdad from a formidable gang of robbers

62 Ammianus (xviii 5, 6, xix 3, xx 2) represents the merit and disgrace of Ursicinus with that faithful attention which a soldier owed to his general Some partiality may be suspected, yet the whole account is consistent and probable

63 Ammian xx 11 Omisso vano incepto, hiematurus Antiochiæ redit in Syriam ærumnosam, perpessus et ulcerum sed et atrocia, diuque defienda It is thus that James Gronovius has restored an obscure passage, and he thinks that this correction alone would have deserved a new edition of his author, whose sense may now be darkly perceived I expected some additional light from the recent labours of the learned Ernestus (Lipsiæ, 1773)

64 The ravages of the Germans, and the distress of Gaul, may be collected from Julian himself Orat ad S P Q Athen p 277 Ammian xv 11 [8?] Libanius, Orat x Zosimus, l iii [c 3] p 140 Sozomen, l iii c 1 [Mamertin Grat Act c iv]

65 Ammianus (xvii 8) This name seems to be derived from the Toxandri of Pliny, and very frequently occurs in the histories of the middle age Toxandria was a country of woods and morasses, which extended from the neighbourhood of Tongres to the conflux of the Vahal and the Rhine See Valesius, Notit Galliar p 558

66 The paradox of P Daniel, that the Franks never obtained any permanent settlement on this side of the Rhine before the time of Clovis, is refuted with much learning and good sense by Mr Biet, who has proved, by a chain of evidence, their uninterrupted possession of Toxandria one hundred and thirty years before the accession of Clovis The Dissertation of M Biet was crowned by the Academy of Soissons in the year 1736, and seems to have been justly preferred to the discourse of his more celebrated competitor, the Abbé le Bœuf, an antiquarian whose name was happily expressive of his talents

67 The private life of Julian in Gaul, and the severe discipline which he embraced, are displayed by Ammianus (xvi 5), who professes to praise, and by Julian himself, who affects to ridicule (Misopogon, p 340) a conduct which, in a prince of the house of Constantine, might justly excite the surprise of mankind

68 Aderat Latine quoque disserendi sufficiens sermo Ammianus, xvi 5 But Julian, educated in the schools of Greece, always considered the language of the Romans as a foreign and popular dialect, which he might use on necessary occasions

69 We are ignorant of the actual office of this excellent minister, whom Julian afterwards created præfect of Gaul Sallust was speedily recalled by the jealousy of the emperor, and we may still read a sensible but pedantic discourse (p 240-252), in which Julian deplores the loss of so valuable a friend, to whom he acknowledges himself indebted for his reputation See La Bleterie, Préface à la Vie de Jovien, p 20

70 Ammianus (xvi 2, 3) appears much better satisfied with the success of this first campaign than Julian himself, who very fairly owns that he did nothing of consequence, and that he fled before the enemy

71 Ammian xvi 7 Libanius speaks rather more advantageously of the military talents of Marcellus, Orat x p 272 And Julian insinuates that he would not have been so easily recalled, unless he had given other reasons of offence to the court, p 278

72 Severus, non discors, non arrogans, sed longa militiæ frugalitate compertus, et eum recta præeuntem secuturus, ut ductorem morigerus miles Ammian xvi 11 Zosimus, l iii [c 2] p 140

73 On the design and failure of the co-operation between Julian and Barbatio see Ammianus (xvi 11), and Libanius, Orat x p 273

75 After the battle Julian ventured to revive the rigour of ancient discipline by exposing these fugitives in female apparel to the derision of the whole camp In the next campaign these troops nobly retrieved their honour Zosimus, l iii [c 3] p 142

76 Julian himself (ad S P Q Athen p 279) speaks of the battle of Strasburg with the modesty of conscious merit, ἐμαχεσάμην οὐκ ἀκλεῶς, ἴσως καὶ εἰς υμας ἀφίκετο η τοιαυτη μάχη Zosimus compares it with the victory of Alexander over Darius and yet we are at a loss to discover any of those strokes of military genius which fix the attention of ages on the conduct and success of a single day

77 Ammianus, xvi 12 Libanius adds 2000 more to the number of the slain (Orat x p 274) But these trifling differences disappear before the 60,000 barbarians whom Zosimus has sacrificed to the glory of his hero (l iii [c 3] p 141) We might attribute this extravagant number to the carelessness of transcribers, if this credulous or partial historian had not swelled the army of 35,000 Alemanni to an innumerable multitude of barbarians, πλῆθος απειρον βαρβάρων It is our own fault if this detection does not inspire us with proper distrust on similar occasions

78 Ammian xvi 12 Libanius Orat x p 276

79 Libanius (Orat iii p 137) draws a very lively picture of the manners of the Franks

80 Ammianus, xvii 2 Libanius, Orat x p 278 The Greek orator, by misapprehending a passage of Julian, has been induced to represent the

Franks as consisting of a thousand men and as his head was always full of the Peloponnesian war he compares them to the Lacedæmonians who were besieged and taken in the island of Sphacteria

81 Julian ad S P Q Athen p 280 Libanius Orat x. p ~/8 According to the expression of Libanius the emperor δωρα ωνόμαζε which La Bléterie understands (Vie de Julien p 118) as an honest confession and Valesius (ad Ammian xvii 2) as a mean evasion of the truth Dom Bouquet (Historiens de France tom 1 p 733) by substituting another word ἐνόμισε would suppress both the difficulty and the spirit of this passage

82 Ammian xvii 8 Zosimus l iii [c 4 sq] p 146-150 (his narrative is darkened by a mixture of fable) and Julian ad S P Q Athen p 280 His expression υπ δεξάμην μὲν μο ραν του Σαλ ων εθν τ Χαμάβους δὲ ἐξήλασα. This difference of treatment confirms the opinion that the Salian Franks were permitted to retain the settlements in Toxandria

83 This interesting story which Zosimus has abridged is related by Eunapius (in Excerpt Legationum p 15 16 17 [ed Paris p 11 sq ed Ven cap 1 p 41 sqq ed Bonn]) with all the amplifications of Grecian rhetoric but the silence of Libanius of Ammianus and of Julian himself renders the truth of it extremely suspicious

84 Libanius the friend of Julian clearly insinuates (Orat iv p 178) that his hero had composed the history of his Gallic campaigns But Zosimus (l iii [c 2] p 140) seems to have derived his information only from the Orations (λόγοι) and the Epistles of Julian The discourse which is addressed to the Athenians contains an accurate though general account of the war against the Germans

Chapter XX

1 The date of the Divine Institutions of Lactantius has been accurately discussed difficulties have been started soluti ons proposed and an expedient imagined of two original editions—the former published during the persecutions of Diocletian the latter under that of Licinius See Dufresnoy Præfat p v Tillemont Mém Ecclésiast tom vi p 465 470. Lardner s Credibility part ii vol. vii p 78-86 For my own part I am almost convinced that Lactantius dedicated his Institutions to the sovereign of Gaul, at a time when Galerius Maximin and even Licinius persecuted the Christians that is, between the years 306 and 311

2 Lactant Divin Institut i 1 vii. 26 The first and most important of these passages is indeed wanting in twenty-eight manuscripts but it is found in nineteen If we weigh the comparative value of those manuscripts one of 900 years old in the king of France s library may be alleged in its favour but the passage is omitted in the correct manuscript of Bologna which the P de Montfaucon ascribes to the sixth or seventh century (Diarium Italic p 409) The taste of most of the editors (except Isæus see Lactant edit Dufresnoy tom. i p 596) has felt the genuine style of Lactantius

3 Euseb in Vit Constant l. i c 27 32

4. Zosimus, l ii [c 29] p 104.

5 That rite was always used in making a catechumen (see Bingham's Antiquities, l x c 1 p 419, Dom Chardon, Hist des Sacremens, tom 1 p 62), and Constantine received it for the first time (Euseb in Vit Constant l iv c 61) immediately before his baptism and death From the connection of these two facts, Valesius (ad loc Euseb) has drawn the conclusion which is reluctantly admitted by Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 628), and opposed with feeble arguments by Mosheim (p 968)

6 Euseb in Vit Constant l iv c 61, 62, 63 The legend of Constantine's baptism at Rome, thirteen years before his death, was invented in the eighth century, as a proper motive for his donation Such has been the gradual progress of knowledge, that a story, of which Cardinal Baronius (Annal Ecclesiast A D 324, No 43 49) declared himself the unblushing advocate, is now feebly supported, even within the verge of the Vatican See the Antiquitates Christianæ, tom ii p 232—a work published with six approbations at Rome, in the year 1751, by Father Mamachi, a learned Dominican

7 The quæstor, or secretary, who composed the law of the Theodosian Code, makes his master say with indifference, "hominibus supra dictæ religionis' (l. xvi tit ii leg 1) The minister of ecclesiastical affairs was allowed a more devout and respectful style, τῆς ἐνθέσμου καὶ ἁγιωτάτης καθολικῆς θρησκείας, the legal, most holy, and catholic worship See Euseb Hist Eccles l x c 6

8 Cod Theodos l ii tit viii leg 1 Cod Justinian l iii tit xii leg 3 Constantine styles the Lord's day dies solis, a name which could not offend the ears of his Pagan subjects

9 Cod Theodos l xvi tit x leg 1 Godefroy, in the character of a commentator, endeavours (tom vi p 257) to excuse Constantine, but the more zealous Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 321, No 18) censures his profane conduct with truth and asperity

10 Theodoret (l 1 c 18) seems to insinuate that Helena gave her son a Christian education, but we may be assured, from the superior authority of Eusebius (in Vit Constant l iii c 47), that she herself was indebted to Constantine for the knowledge of Christianity

11 See the medals of Constantine in Ducange and Banduri As few cities had retained the privilege of coining, almost all the medals of that age issued from the mint under the sanction of the Imperial authority

12 The panegyric of Eumenius (vii [vi] inter Panegyr Vet), which was pronounced a few months before the Italian war, abounds with the most unexceptionable evidence of the Pagan superstition of Constantine, and of his particular veneration for Apollo, or the Sun, to which Julian alludes (Orat vii p 228, ἀπολείπων σε) See Commentaire de Spanheim sur les Césars, p 317

13 Constantin Orat ad Sanctos, c 25 But it might easily be shown that the Greek translator has improved the sense of the Latin original, and the aged emperor might recollect the persecution of Diocletian with a more lively abhorrence than he had actually felt in the days of his youth and Paganism

14 See Euseb Hist Eccles l viii 13, l ix 9, and in Vit Const l i c 16, 17 Lactant Divin Institut i 1 Cæcilius de Mort Persecut c 25

15 Cæcilius (de Mort Persecut c 48) has preserved the Latin original, and Eusebius (Hist Eccles l x c 5) has given a Greek translation of this perpetual edict, which refers to some provisional regulations

16 A panegyric of Constantine, pronounced seven or eight months after the edict of Milan (see Gothofred Chronolog Legum, p 7, and Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 246), uses the following remarkable expression —"Summe rerum sator, cujus tot nomina sunt, quot linguas gentium esse voluisti, quem enim te ipse dici velis scire non possumus" (Panegyr Vet ix. [viii] 26) In explaining Constantine's progress in the faith, Mosheim (p 971, etc) is ingenious, subtle, prolix

17 See the elegant description of Lactantius (Divin Institut v 8), who is much more perspicuous and positive than becomes a discreet prophet

18 The political system of the Christians is explained by Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, l 1 c 3, 4 Grotius was a republican and an exile, but the mildness of his temper inclined him to support the established powers

22 Lactant. Divin Institut 1 1 Eusebius, in the course of his History, his Life, and his Oration, repeatedly inculcates the divine right of Constantine to the empire

23 Our imperfect knowledge of the persecution of Licinius is derived from Eusebius (Hist Eccles l x c 8, Vit Constantin l 1 c. 49-56, l. ii c 1, 2) Aurelius Victor mentions his cruelty in general terms

24 Euseb in Vit Constant l ii c 24 42 48-60

26 This careless temper of the Germans appears almost uniformly in the history of the conversion of each of the tribes The legions of Constantine were recruited with Germans (Zosimus l ii [c 15] p 86) and the court even of his father had been filled with Christians See the first book of the Life of Constantine by Eusebius

27 De his qui arma projiciunt in pace placuit eos abstinere a communione Concil Arelat Can on iii The best critics apply these words to the peace of the church

28 Eusebius always considers the second civil war against Licinius as a sort of religious crusade At the invitation of the tyrant some Christian officers had resumed their zones or in other words had returned to the military service Their conduct was afterwards censured by the twelfth canon of the Council of Nice if this particular application may be received instead of the loose and general sense of the Greek interpreters Balsamon Zonaras and Alexis Aristenus See Beveridge Pandect Eccles Græc tom i p 72 tom ii p 78 Annotation

29 Nomen ipsum crucis absit non modo a corpore civium Romanorum sed etiam a cogitatione oculis auribus Cicero pro Rabirio c 5 The Christian writers Justin Minucius Felix Tertullian Jerom and Maximus of Turin have investigated with tolerable success the figure or likeness of a cross in almost every object of nature or art in the intersection of the meridian and equator the human face a bird flying a man swimming a mast and yard a plough a standard etc etc etc See Lipsius de Cruce l i c 9

30 See Aurelius Victor [de Cæsar c 41] who considers this law as one of the examples of Constantine s piety An edict so honourable to Christianity deserved a place in the Theodosian Code instead of the indirect mention of it which seems to result from the comparison of the fifth and eighteenth titles of the ninth book

31 Eusebius in Vit Constantin l i c 40 This statue or at least the cross and inscription may be ascribed with more probability to the second or even the third visit of Constantine to Rome Immediately after the defeat of Maxentius the minds of the senate and people were scarcely ripe for this public monument

32 Agnoscas regina libens mea signa necesse est

Prudent in Symmachum, l i 464 486

33 The derivation and meaning of the word Labarum or Laborum which is employed by Gregory Nazianzen Ambrose Prudentius etc still remain totally unknown in spite of the efforts of the critics, who have ineffectually tortured the Latin Greek, Spanish Celtic Teutonic Illyric Armenian etc in search of an etymology See Ducange in Gloss Med and infim Latinitat sub voce Labarum and Godefroy ad Cod Theodos tom ii p 143

34 Euseb in Vit Constantin l i c 30, 31 Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 312 No 26) has engraved a representation of the Labarum

35 Transversâ X literâ summo capite circumflexo Christum in scutis notat Cæcilius de M P c 44 Cuper (ad M P in edit Lactant tom ii p 500) and Baronius (A D 312 No 25) have engraved from ancient monuments several specimens —as thus ☧ or ☧—of these monograms which became extremely fashionable in the Christian world

36 Euseb in Vit Constantin l ii c 7 8 9 He introduces the Labarum before the Italian expedition but his narrative seems to indicate that it was never shown at the head of an army till Constantine above ten years afterwards declared himself the enemy of Licinius and the deliverer of the church

37 See Cod Theod l vi tit xxv Sozomen l i c 2 [c 4] Theophan Chronograph p 11 Theophanes lived towards the end of the eighth century almost five hundred years after Constantine The modern Greeks were not inclined to display in the field the standard of the empire and of Christianity and though they depended on every superstitious hope of defence the promise of victory would have appeared too bold a fiction

38 The Abbé du Voisin p 103 etc alleges several of these medals and quotes a particular dissertation of a Jesuit the Père de Grainville on this subject

39 Tertullian de Coronâ c 3 Athanasius tom i p 101 [p 89 ed Bened 1698 de Incarn Verbi Dei c 48] The learned Jesuit Peta (Dogmata Theolog l xv c 9 10) has collected many similar passages on the virtues of the cross which in the last age embarrassed our protestant disputants

40 Cæcilius, de M P c 44 It is certain that this historical declamation was composed and published while Licinius, sovereign of the East, still preserved the friendship of Constantine and of the Christians Every reader of taste must perceive that the style is of a very different and inferior character to that of Lactantius, and such indeed is the judgment of Le Clerc and Lardner (Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, tom iii p 438, Credibility of the Gospel, etc, part ii vol vii p 94) Three arguments from the title of the book, and from the names of Donatus and Cæcilius, are produced by the advocates for Lactantius (see the P Lestocq, tom ii p 46–60) Each of these proofs is singly weak and defective, but their concurrence has great weight I have often fluctuated, and shall tamely follow the Colbert MS in calling the author (whoever he was) Cæcilius

41 Cæcilius, de M P c 46 There seems to be some reason in the observation of M de Voltaire (Œuvres, tom xiv p 307), who ascribes to the success of Constantine the superior fame of his Labarum above the angel of Licinius Yet even this angel is favourably entertained by Pagi, Tillemont, Fleury, etc, who are fond of increasing their stock of miracles

42 Besides these well known examples, Tollius (Preface to Boileau's translation of Longinus) has discovered a vision of Antigonus, who assured his troops that he had seen a pentagon (the symbol of safety) with these words, "In this conquer" But Tollius has most inexcusably omitted to produce his authority and his own character, literary as well as moral, is not free from reproach (see Chauffepié, Dictionnaire Critique, tom iv p 460) Without insisting on the silence of Diodorus, Plutarch, Justin, etc, it may be observed that Polyænus, who in a separate chapter (l iv c 6) has collected nineteen military stratagems of Antigonus, is totally ignorant of this remarkable vision

43 Instinctu Divinitatis, mentis magnitudine The inscription on the triumphal arch of Constantine, which has been copied by Baronius, Gruter, etc, may still be perused by every curious traveller

48 Eusebius [Vit Constant], l i c 28, 29, 30. The silence of the same Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical History, is deeply felt by those advocates for the miracle who are not absolutely callous

49 The narrative of Constantine seems to indicate that he saw the cross in the sky before he passed the Alps against Maxentius The scene has been fixed by provincial vanity at Treves, Besançon, etc See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 573

50 The pious Tillemont (Mem Ecclés tom vii p 1317) rejects with a sigh the useful Acts of Artemius, a veteran and a martyr, who attests as an eye-witness the vision of Constantine

51 Gelasius Cyzic in Act Concil Nicen l i c 4

52 The advocates for the vision are unable to produce a single testimony from the Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries, who in their voluminous writings repeatedly celebrate the triumph of the church and of Constantine As these venerable men had not any dislike to a miracle, we may suspect (and the suspicion is confirmed by the ignorance of Jerom) that they were all unacquainted with the Life of Constantine by Eusebius This tract was recovered by the diligence of those who translated or continued his Ecclesiastical History, and who have represented in various colours the vision of the cross

53 Godefroy was the first who, in the year 1643 (Not ad Philostorgium, l i c 6, p 16), expressed any doubt of a miracle which had been supported with equal zeal by Cardinal Baronius and the Centuriators of Magdeburg Since that time many of the protestant critics have inclined towards doubt and disbelief The objections are urged with great force by M Chauffepié (Dictionnaire Critique, tom iv p 6–11), and in the year 1774 a doctor of Sorbonne, the Abbé du Voisin, published an apology, which deserves the praise of learning and moderation

54 Lors Constantin dit ces propres paroles
J'ai renversé le culte des idoles
Sur les débris de leurs temples fumants
Au Dieu du Ciel j'ai prodigué l'encens
Mais tous mes soins pour sa grandeur suprême
N'eurent jamais d'autre objet que moi-même,
Les saints autels n'étoient à mes regards
Qu'un marchepié du trone des Césars
L'ambition, la fureur, les délices
Etoient mes dieux, avoient mes sacrifices
L'or des Chrétiens, leurs intrigues, leur sang
Ont cimenté ma fortune et mon rang

91 A compromise was sometimes introduced by law or by consent either the bishops or the people chose one of the three candidates who had been named by the other party

92 All the examples quoted by Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom ii l ii c vi p 704–714) appear to be extraordinary acts of power and even of oppression. The confirmation of the bishop of Alexandria is mentioned by Philostorgius as a more regular proceeding (Hist Eccles l ii 11)

93 The celibacy of the clergy during the first five or six centuries is a subject of discipline and indeed of controversy which has been very diligently examined See in particular Thomassin Discipline de l Eglise tom i l ii c lx lxi p 886–902 and Bingham s Antiquities l iv c 5 By each of these learned but partial critics one half of the truth is produced, and the other is concealed

94 Diodorus Siculus attests and approves the hereditary succession of the priesthood among the Egyptians the Chaldeans and the Indians (l i [c 73] p 84 l ii [c 29 and 40] p 142 153 edit Wesseling) The Magi are described by Ammianus as a very numerous family Per sæcula multa ad præsens unâ eâdemque prosapiâ multitudo creata Deorum cultibus dedicatur (xxiii 6) Ausonius celebrates the Stirps Druidarum (De Professorib Burdigal iv [7]) but we may infer from the remark of Cæsar (Bell Gall vi. 13) that in the Celtic hierarchy some room was left for choice and emulation

95 The subject of the vocation ordination obedience etc of the clergy is laboriously discussed by Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom ii p 1–83) and Bingham (in the 4th book of his Antiquities more especially the 4th 6th and 7th chapters) When the brother of St Jerom was ordained in Cyprus the deacons forcibly stopped his mouth lest he should make a solemn protestation which might invalidate the holy rites

96 The charter of immunities which the clergy obtained from the Christian emperors is obtained in the 16th book of the Theodosian code and is illustrated with tolerable candour by the learned Godefroy whose mind was balanced by the opposite prejudices of a civilian and a Protestant

97 Justinian Novell. ciii Sixty presbyters or priests one hundred deacons forty deaconesses ninety sub-deacons, one hundred and ten readers twenty five chanters and one hundred doorkeepers in all five hundred and twenty five This moderate number was fixed by the emperor to relieve the distress of the church which had been involved in debt and usury by the expense of a much higher establishment

99 The number of seven orders has been fixed in the Latin church exclusive of the episcopal character But the four inferior ranks the minor orders, are now reduced to empty and useless titles.

100 See Cod Theodos l xvi tit ii leg 42 43. Godefroy s Commentary and the Ecclesiastical History of Alexandria show the danger of these pious institutions which often disturbed the peace of that turbulent capital.

101 The edict of Milan (de M P c 48) acknowledges by reciting that there existed a species of landed property ad jus corporis eorum, id est ecclesiarum non hominum singulorum pertinentia. Such a solemn declaration of the supreme magistrate must have been received in all the tribunals as a maxim of civil law

102 Habeat unusquisque licentiam sanctissimo Catholicæ (ecclesiæ) venerabilique concilio decedens bonorum quod optavit relinquere Cod Theodos l xvi tit ii leg 4 This law was published at Rome A D 321 at a time when Constantine might foresee the probability of a rupture with the emperor of the East

103 Eusebius Hist Eccles l x 6 in Vit. Constantin l iv c 28 He repeatedly expatiates on the liberality of the Christian hero which the bishop himself had an opportunity of knowing and even of tasting

104 Eusebius Hist Eccles l x c 2 3 4 The bishop of Cæsarea who studied and gratified the taste of his master pronounced in public an elaborate description of the church of Jerusalem (in Vit. Const l iv c 46) It no longer exists, but he has inserted in the Life of Constantine (l iii c 36) a short account of the architecture and ornaments. He likewise mentions the church of the holy Apostles at Constantinople (l iv c 58)

105 See Justinian Novell cxxiii 3 The revenue of the patriarchs and the most wealthy bishops is not expressed the highest annual valuation of a bishopric is stated at thirty and the lowest at two pounds of gold the medium might be taken at sixteen but these valuations are much below the real value

106 See Baronius (Annal Eccles. A D 324, No 58 65 70 71) Every record which comes from the Vatican is justly suspected yet these rent rolls have an ancient and authentic colour and it is at least evident that if forged they were forged in a period when farms not kingdoms were the objects of papal avarice

107 See Thomassin Discipline de l Eglise tom iii l ii c 13 14 15 p 689–706 The legal division of the ecclesiastical revenue does not appear to have been established in the time of Ambrose and Chrysostom. Simplicius and Gelasius who were bishops of Rome in the latter part of the fifth century mention it in their pastoral letters as a general law which was already confirmed by the custom of Italy

108 Ambrose the most strenuous assertor of ecclesiastical privil ges submits without a murmur to the payment of the land tax Si tributum petit

Imperator, non negamus, agri ecclesiæ solvunt tributum, solvimus quæ sunt Cæsaris Cæsari, and quæ sunt Dei Deo, tributum Cæsaris est, non negatur" Baronius labours to interpret this tribute as an act of charity rather than of duty (Annal Eccles A D 387), but the words, if not the intentions of Ambrose, are more candidly explained by Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom iii l i c 34, p 268

109 In Ariminensi synodo super ecclesiarum et clericorum privilegiis tractatû habito, usque eo dispositio progressa est, ut juga quæ viderentur ad ecclesiam pertinere, a publicâ functione cessarent inquietudine desistente, quod nostra videtur dudum sanctio repulsisse Cod Theod l xvi tit ii leg 15 Had the synod of Rimini carried this point, such practical merit might have atoned for some speculative heresies

110 From Eusebius (in Vit. Constant l iv c 27) and Sozomen (l i c 9) we are assured that the episcopal jurisdiction was extended and confirmed by Constantine, but the forgery of a famous edict, which was never fairly inserted in the Theodosian Code (see at the end, tom vi p 303), is demonstrated by Godefroy in the most satisfactory manner It is strange that M de Montesquieu, who was a lawyer as well as a philosopher, should allege this edict of Constantine (The Spirit of Laws, xxiii 21) without intimating any suspicion

111 The subject of ecclesiastical jurisdiction has been involved in a mist of passion, of prejudice, and of interest Two of the fairest books which have fallen into my hands are the Institutes of Canon Law, by the Abbé de Fleury, and the Civil History of Naples, by Giannone Their moderation was the effect of situation as well as of temper Fleury was a French ecclesiastic, who respected the authority of the parliaments, Giannone was an Italian lawyer, who dreaded the power of the church And here let me observe that, as the general propositions which I advance are the result of many particular and imperfect facts, I must either refer the reader to those modern authors who have expressly treated the subject, or swell these notes to a disagreeable and disproportionate size

112 Tillemont has collected from Rufinus, Theodoret, etc the sentiments and language of Constantine Mém Ecclés tom iii p 749, 750

113 See Cod Theod l ix tit xlv leg 4 In the works of Fra Paolo (tom iv p 192, etc) there is an excellent discourse on the origin, claims, abuses, and limits of sanctuaries He justly observes that ancient Greece might perhaps contain fifteen or twenty asyla or sanctuaries, a number which at present may be found in Italy within the walls of a single city

114 The penitential jurisprudence was continually improved by the canons of the councils But as many cases were still left to the discretion of the bishops, they occasionally published, after the example of the Roman prætor, the rules of discipline which they proposed to observe Among the canonical epistles of the fourth century, those of Basil the Great were the most celebrated They are inserted in the Pandects of Beveridge (tom ii p 47–151), and are translated by Chardon, Hist des Sacremens, tom iv p 219–277

115 Basil Epistol xlvii in Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 370, No 91), who declares that he purposely relates it to convince governors that they were not exempt from a sentence of excommunication In his opinion, even a royal head is not safe from the thunders of the Vatican, and the cardinal shows himself much more consistent than the lawyers and theologians of the Gallican church

116 The long series of his ancestors, as high as Eurysthenes, the first Doric king of Sparta, and the fifth in lineal descent from Hercules, was inscribed in the public registers of Cyrene, a Lacedæmonian colony (synes Epist lvii p 197, edit Petav) Such a pure and illustrious pedigree of seventeen hundred years, without adding the royal ancestors of Hercules, cannot be equalled in the history of mankind

117 Synesius (de Regno, p 2 [ed Par 1612]) pathetically deplores the fallen and ruined state of Cyrene, πόλις Ελληνις, παλαιὸν ὄνομα καὶ σεμνὸν, καὶ ἐν ωδῇ μυρίᾳ τῶν πάλαι σοφῶν, νῦν πένης καὶ κατηφὴς, καὶ μέγα ερείπιον Ptolemais, a new city, 82 miles to the westward of Cyrene, assumed the metropolitan honours of the Pentapolis, or Upper Libya, which were afterwards transferred to Sozusa See Wesseling, Itinerar p 67, 68, 732 Cellarius Geograph tom ii part ii p 72, 74 Carolus a Sto Paulo, Geograph Sacra, p 273 D Anville, Geographie Ancienne, tom iii p 43, 44 Mémoires de l'Acad des Inscriptions, tom xxxvii p 363–391

118 Synesius had previously represented his own disqualifications (Epist cv p 246–250) He loved profane studies and profane sports he was incapable of supporting a life of celibacy, he disbelieved the resurrection, and he refused to preach fables to the people, unless he might be permitted to philosophise at home Theophilus, primate of Egypt, who knew his merit, accepted this extraordinary compromise See the Life of Synesius in Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xii p 499–554.

119 See the invective of Synesius, Epist lvii p 191–201 The promotion of Andronicus was illegal, since he was a native of Berenice, in the same province The instruments of tortures are curiously specified—the πιεστηριον, or press, the δακτυλήθρα, the ποδοστράβη the ῥινολάβις the ωτάγρα and the χειλοστρόφιον that variously pressed or distended the fingers the feet, the nose, the ears, and the lips of the victims.

120 The sentence of excommunication is expressed in a rhetorical style (Synesius, Epist lviii p 201–203) The method of involving whole families, though somewhat unjust, was improved into national interdicts

121 See Synesius, Epist. xlvii p 186, 187, Epist lxxii p 218, 219 Epist lxxxix, p 230 231

11 l 111 c 83 p 1761–1770) and Bingham (Antiquities vol 1 l xiv c 4 p 688–717) Preaching was considered as the most important office of the bishop but this function was sometimes intrusted to such presbyters as Chrysostom and Augustin

123 Queen Elizabeth used this expression and practised this art whenever she wished to prepossess the minds of her people in favour of any extraordinary mea.ure of government The hostile effects of this music were apprehended by her successor and severely felt by his son When pulpits drum ecclesiastic etc See Haylin s Life of Archbishop Laud p 153

124 Those modest orators acknowledged that as they were de titute of the gift of miracles they endeavoured to acquire the arts of eloquence

125 The council of Nice in the fourth fifth sixth and seventh canons has made some fundamental regulations concerning synods metropolitans and primates The Nicene canons have been variously tortured abused interpolated or forged according to the interest of the clergy The Suburbicarian churches assigned (by Rufinus) to the bishop of Rome have been made the subject of vehement controversy (See Sirmond Opera tom. iv p 1–238)

126 We have only thirty three or forty seven episcopal subscriptions but Ado a writer indeed of small acco.int reckons six hundred bishops in the council of Arle Tillemont Mém. Eccles. tom. vi p 422

127 See Tillemont tom vi p 915, and Beausobre Hist du Manichéisme tom 1 p 529. The name of bishop which is given by Eutychius to the 2048 ecclesiastics (Annal tom i p 440, vers. Pocock) must be extended far beyond the limits of an orthodox or even episcopal ordination.

129. Sancimus igitur vicem legum obtinere quæ a quatuor Sanctis Conciliis expositæ sunt aut firmatæ Prædictarum enim quatuor synodorum dogmata sicut sanctas Scripturas et regulas sicut leges observamus. Justinian Novell. cxxxi. Beveridge (ad Pandect proleg p 2) remarks that the emperors never made new laws in ecclesiastical matters and Giannone observes in a very different spirit that they gave a legal sanction to the canons of councils Istoria Civile di Napoli tom i. p 136.

130 See the article Concile in the Encyclopédie tom iii p 668–679 édition de Lucques. The author M le docteur Bouchaud has discussed, according to the principles of the Gallican church, the principal questions which relate to the form and constitution of general national and provincial councils The editors (see Preface p xvi.) have reason to be proud of this article Those who consult their immense compilation seldom depart so well satisfied

2 After some examination of the various opinions of Tillemont Beausobre Lardner etc I am convinced that Manes did not propagate his sect even in Persia before the year 270 It is strange that a philosophic and foreign heresy should have penetrated so rapidly into the African provinces yet I cannot easily reject the edict of Diocletian against the Manichæans which may be found in Baronius (Annal Eccl A D 287)

6 The best materials for this part of ecclesiastical history may be found in the edition of Optatus Milevitanus published (Paris 1700) by M Dupin who has enriched it with critical notes, geographical discussions original records, and an accurate abridgment of the whole contro ersy M. de Tillemont has bestowed on the Donatists the greatest part of a volume (tom vi part i.) and I am indebted to him for an ample collection of all the passages of his favourite St. Augustin which relate to those heretics

8 The councils of Arles, of Nice, and of Trent, confirmed the wise and moderate practice of the church of Rome The Donatists, however, had the advantage of maintaining the sentiment of Cyprian, and of a considerable part of the primitive church Vincentius Lirinensis (p 332, ap Tillemont, Mem Ecclés tom vi p 138) has explained why the Donatists are eternally burning with the Devil, while St Cyprian reigns in heaven with Jesus Christ

11 Plato Ægyptum peregravit ut a sacerdotibus barbaris numeros et cœlestia acciperet Cicero de Finibus, v 29 The Egyptians might still preserve the traditional creed of the patriarchs Josephus has persuaded many of the Christian fathers that Plato derived a part of his knowledge from the Jews, but this vain opinion cannot be reconciled with the obscure state and unsocial manners of the Jewish people, whose scriptures were not accessible to Greek curiosity till more than one hundred years after the death of Plato See Marsham, Canon Chron p 144 Le Clerc, Epistol Critic vii p 177–194.

12 The modern guides who lead me to the knowledge of the Platonic system are Cudworth (Intellectual System, p 568–620), Basnage (Hist des Juifs, l iv c 4, p 53–86), Le Clerc (Epist Crit vii p 194–209), and Brucker (Hist Philosoph tom i p 675–706) As the learning of these writers was equal, and their intention different, an inquisitive observer may derive instruction from their disputes, and certainty from their agreement

16 See Calmet, Dissertations sur la Bible, tom ii p 277 The book of the Wisdom of Solomon was received by many of the fathers as the work of that monarch and although rejected by the Protestants for want of a Hebrew original, it has obtained, with the rest of the Vulgate, the sanction of the council of Trent

17 The Platonism of Philo, which was famous to a proverb, is proved beyond a doubt by Le Clerc (Epist. Crit viii p 211–228) Basnage (Hist des Juifs, l iv c 5) has clearly ascertained that the theological works of Philo were composed before the death, and most probably before the birth, of Christ In such a time of darkness the knowledge of Philo is more astonishing than his errors Bull, De fens Fid Nicen s i c i p 12

18 Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet

Besides this material soul, Cudworth has discovered (p 562) in Amelius, Porphyry, Plotinus, and, as he thinks, in Plato himself, a superior spiritual hyper-cosmian soul of the universe But this double soul is exploded by Brucker, Basnage, and Le Clerc, as an idle fancy of the latter Platonists

19 Petav Dogmata Theologica, tom ii l viii c 2 791 Bull, Defens Fid Nicen s i c i, p 8, 13 This notion, till it was abused by the Arians, was freely adopted in the Christian theology Tertullian (adv Praxeam, c 16) has a remarkable and dangerous passage After contrasting, with indiscreet wit, the nature of God and the actions of Jehovah, he concludes Scilicet ut hæc de filio Dei non credenda fuisse, si non scripta essent, fortasse non credenda de Patre licet scripta

20 The Platonists admired the beginning of the Gospel of St John, as containing an exact transcript of their own principles Augustine, The City of God, x 29 Amelius apud Cyril advers Julian l viii p 283 But in the third and fourth centuries the Platonists of Alexandria might improve their Trinity by the secret study of the Christian theology

21 See Beausobre, Hist Critique du Manichéisme, tom i p 377 The Gospel according to St John is supposed to have been published about seventy years after the death of Christ

22 The sentiments of the Ebionites are fairly stated by Mosheim (p 331) and Le Clerc (Hist Ecclés p 535) The Clementines published among the apostolical Fathers, are attributed by the critics to one of these sectaries

23 Staunch polemics, like Bull (Judicium Eccles Cathol c 2), insist on the orthodoxy of the Nazarenes which appears less pure and certain in the eyes of Mosheim (p 330)

24 The humble condition and sufferings of Jesus have always been a stumbling block to the Jews "Deus contrariis coloribus Messiam depinxerat, futurus erat Rex, Judex, Pastor,' etc See Limborch et Orobio Amica Collat p 8, 19, 53–76, 192–234. But this objection has obliged the believing Christians to lift up their eyes to a spiritual and everlasting kingdom

25 Justin Martyr Dialog cum Tryphonte, p 143, 144 See Le Clerc, Hist Ecclés p 615 Bull, and his editor Grabe (Judicium Eccles Cathol c 7, and Appendix), attempt to distort either the sentiments or the words of Justin, but their violent correction of the text is rejected even by the Benedictine editors

26 The Arians reproached the orthodox party with borrowing their Trinity from the Valentin-

ians and Marcionites See Beausobre Hist du Manichéisme l iii c 5 7

27 Non dignum est ex utero credere Deum et Deum Christum non dignum est ut tanta majestas per sordes et squalores mulieris transire credatur The Gnostics asserted the impurity of matter and of marriage and they were scandalised by the gross interpretations of the fathers and even of Augustin himself See Beausobre tom ii p 523

8 Apostolis adhuc in sæculo superstitibus apud Judæam Christi sanguine recente et phantasma corpus Domini asserebatur Cotelerius thinks (Patres Apostol tom ii p 24) that those who will not allow the Docetes to have arisen in the time of the Apostles may with equal reason deny that the sun shines at noonday These Docetes who formed the most considerable party among the Gnostics were so called because they granted only a seeming body to Christ

29 Some proofs of the respect which the Christians entertained for the person and doctrine of Plato may be found in De la Mothe le Vayer tom v p 135 etc edit 1757 and Basnage Hist des Juifs tom. iv p 29 79 etc

30 Doleo bona fide Platonem omnium hæreticorum condimentarium factum Tertullian de Anima c 23 Petavius (Dogm Theolog tom iii proleg 2) shows that this was a general complaint Beausobre (tom i l iii c 9 10) has deduced the Gnostic errors from Platonic principles and as in the school of Alexandria those principles were blended with the Oriental philosophy (Brucker tom i p 1356) the sentiment of Beausobre may be reconciled with the opinion of Mosheim (General History of the Church vol i p 37)

31 If Theophilus bishop of Antioch (see Dupin Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom i p 66) was the first who employed the word Triad Trinity that abstract term which was already familiar to the schools of philosophy must have been introduced into the theology of the Christians after the middle of the second century

32 Athanasius tom i p 808 His expressions have an uncommon energy and as he was writing to monks there could not be any occasion for him to affect a rational language

33 In a treatise which professed to explain the opinions of the ancient philosophers concerning the nature of the gods we might expect to discover the theological Trinity of Plato But Cicero very honestly confessed that though he had translated the Timæus he could never understand that mysterious dialogue See Hieronym. præf ad l xii in Isaiam tom v p 154 [tom iv p 494, ed Vallars]

34 Tertullian in Apolog c 46 See Bayle Dictionnaire au mot Simonide His remarks on the presumption of Tertullian are prof und and interesting

35 Lactantius iv 8 Yet the Probole or Prolatio which the most orthodox divines borrowed without scrupl from the Valentinians and illustrated by the comparisons of a fountain and stream the sun and its rays etc either meant nothing or favoured a material idea of the divine generation See Beausobre tom i l iii c 7 p 548

36 Many of the primitive writers have frankly confessed that the Son owed his being to the will of the Father See Clarke s Scripture Trinity p. 280–287 On the other hand Athanasius and his followers seem unwilling to grant what they are afraid to deny The schoolmen extricate themselves from this difficulty by the distinction of a prec ding and a concomitant will Petav Dogm. Theolog tom ii l vi c 8 p 587–603

37 See Petav Dogm Theolog tom. ii. l. ii. c. 10 p 159

38 Carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem Plin Epist x 97 The sense of Deus Θεὸς Elohim in the ancient languages is critically examined by Le Clerc (Ars Critica p 150–156) and the propriety of worshipping a very excellent creature is ably defended by the Socinian Emlyn (Tracts p 29–36 51–145)

39 See Daillé de Usu Patrum and Le Clerc Bibliothèque Universelle tom x p 409 To arraign the faith of the Ante Nicene fathers was the object or at least has been the effect of the stupendous work of Petavius on the Trinity (Dogm. Theolog tom ii) nor has the deep impression been erased by the learned defence of Bishop Bull.

40 The most ancient creeds were drawn up with the greatest latitude See Bull (Judicium Eccles. Cathol) who tries to prevent Episcopius from deriving any advantage from this observation.

41 The heresies of Praxeas Sabellius etc are accurately explained by Mosheim (p 425 680–714) Praxeas who came to Rome about the end of the second century deceived for some time the simplicity of the bishop and was confuted by the pen of the angry Tertullian

42 Socrates acknowledges that the heresy of Arius proceeded from his strong desire to embrace an opinion the most diametrically opposite to that of Sabellius

43 The figure and manners of Arius the character and numbers of his first proselytes, are painted in very lively colours by Epiphanius (tom. i Hæres lxix. 3 p 729 [ed Paris 1622]) and we cannot but regret that he should soon forget the historian to assume the task of controversy

44 See Philostorgius (l i c 3) and Godefroy's ample Commentary Yet the credibility of Philostorgius is lessened in the eyes of the orthodox by his Arianism and in those of rational critics, by his passion his prejudice and his ignorance

45 Sozomen (l. i c 15) represents Alexander as indifferent and even ignorant in the beginning of the controversy while Socrates (l i. c 5) ascribes the origin of the dispute to the vain curiosity of his theological speculations Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History vol ii p 178) has censured, with his usual freedom the conduct of Alexander πρὸς ὀργὴν ἐξάπτεται ... ὁμοίως φρονεῖν ἐκέλευσε

46 The flames of Arianism might burn for some time in secret but there is reason to believe that they burst out with violence as early as the year 319 Tillemont, Mem Ecclés tom vi p 774–780

47 Quid credidit? Certe, aut tria nomina audiens tres Deos esse credidit, et idololatra effectus est, aut in tribus vocabulis trinominem credens Deum, in Sabellii hæresim incurrit, aut edoctus ab Arianis unum esse verum Deum Patrem, filium et spiritum sanctum credidit creaturas Aut extra hæc quid credere portuerit nescio Hieronym adv Luciferianos [tom ii p 184, ed Vallars] Jerom reserves for the last the orthodox system, which is more complicated and difficult

48 As the doctrine of absolute creation from nothing was gradually introduced among the Christians (Beausobre, tom ii p 165–215), the dignity of the workman very naturally rose with that of the work

49 The metaphysics of Dr Clarke (Scripture Trinity, p 276–280) could digest an eternal generation from an infinite cause

50 This profane and absurd simile is employed by several of the primitive fathers, particularly by Athenagoras, in his Apology to the emperor Marcus and his son, and it is alleged, without censure, by Bull himself See Defens Fid Nicen sect iii c 5, No 4

51 See Cudworth's Intellectual System, p 559, 579 This dangerous hypothesis was countenanced by the two Gregories, of Nyssa and Nazianzen, by Cyril of Alexandria, John of Damascus, etc See Cudworth, p 603 Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Universelle, tom xviii p 97–105

52 Augustin seems to envy the freedom of the philosophers Liberis verbis loquuntur philosophi Nos autem non dicimus duo vel tria principia, duos vel tres Deos The City of God, x 23-24

53 Boethius, who was deeply versed in the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle, explains the unity of the Trinity by the indifference of the three persons See the judicious remarks of Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Choisie, tom xvi p 225, etc

54 If the Sabellians were startled at this conclusion, they were driven down another precipice into the confession that the Father was born of a virgin, that he had suffered on the cross, and this deserved the odious epithet of Patripassians, with which they were branded by their adversaries See the invectives of Tertullian against Praxeas, and the temperate reflections of Mosheim (p 423, 681), and Beausobre, tom i l iii c 6, p 533

55 The transactions of the council of Nice are related by the ancients, not only in a partial, but in a very imperfect manner Such a picture as Fra Paolo would have drawn can never be recovered, but such rude sketches as have been traced by the pencil of bigotry, and that of reason, may be seen in Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vi p 669–759), and in Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom x p 435–454)

56 We are indebted to Ambrose (De Fide, l iii cap ult) for the knowledge of this curious anecdote Hoc verbum posuerunt Patres, quod viderunt adversariis esse formidini, ut tanquam evaginato ab ipsis gladio, ipsum nefandæ caput hæreseos amputarent

57 See Bull Defens Fid Nicen sect ii c i p 25–36 He thinks it his duty to reconcile two orthodox synods

58 According to Aristotle, the stars were homoousian to each other "That Homoousius means of one substance in kind, hath been shown by Petavius, Curcellæus, Cudworth, Le Clerc, etc, and to prove it would be actum agere" This is the just remark of Dr Jortin (vol ii p 212), who examines the Arian controversy with learning, candour, and ingenuity

59 See Petavius (Dogm Theolog tom ii l iv c 16, p 453, etc), Cudworth (p 559), Bull (sect iv p 285–290, edit Grab) The περιχώρησις, or circumincessio, is perhaps the deepest and darkest corner of the whole theological abyss

60 The third section of Bull's Defence of the Nicene Faith, which some of his antagonists have called nonsense, and others heresy, is consecrated to the supremacy of the Father

61 The ordinary appellation with which Athanasius and his followers chose to compliment the Arians was that of Ariomanites

62 Epiphanius, tom i Hæres lxxii 4, p 837 See the adventures of Marcellus, in Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 880–899) His work, in one book, of the Unity of God, was answered in the three books, which are still extant, of Eusebius After a long and careful examination, Petavius (tom ii l i c 14, p 78) has reluctantly pronounced the condemnation of Marcellus

63 Athanasius, in his epistle concerning the synods of Seleucia and Rimini (tom i p 886–905 [p 735 seqq, ed Bened]), has given an ample list of Arian creeds, which has been enlarged and improved by the labours of the indefatigable Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vi p 477)

64 Erasmus, with admirable sense and freedom, has delineated the just character of Hilary To revise his text, to compose the annals of his life, and to justify his sentiments and conduct, is the province of the Benedictine editors

65 Absque episcopo Eleusio et paucis cum eo, ex majore parte Asianæ decem provinciæ, inter quas consisto, vere Deum nesciunt Atque utinam penitus nescirent! cum procliviore enim veniâ ignorarent quam obtrectarent Hilar de Synodis, sive de Fide Orientalium, c 63, p 1186, edit Benedict In the celebrated parallel between atheism and superstition, the bishop of Poitiers would have been surprised in the philosophic society of Bayle and Plutarch

66 Hilarius ad Constantium, l i c 4, 5 p 1227, 1228 This remarkable passage deserved the attention of Mr Locke who has transcribed it (vol iii p 470) into the model of his new commonplace book

though they are carefully softened by the hand of a friend The editor Godefroy (p 153) who was more attached to his principles than to his author has collected the odious circumstances which his various adversaries have preserved or invented

68 According to the judgment of a man who respected both those sectaries Aëtius had been endowed with a stronger understanding and Eunomius had acquired more art and learning (Philostorgius l viii c 18) The confession and apology of Eunomius (Fabricius Bibliot Græc tom viii p 258–305) is one of the few heretical pieces which have escaped

69 Yet according to the opinion of Estius and Bull (p 297) there is one power that of creation which God cannot communicate to a creature Estius who so accurately defined the limits of Omnipotence was a Dutchman by birth and by trade a scholastic divine Dupin Bibliot Eccles tom xvii p 45

70 Sabinus (ap Socrat l ii c 39) had copied the acts Athanasius and Hilary have explained the divisions of this Arian synod the other circumstances which are relative to it are carefully collected by Baronius and Tillemont

71 Fideli et piâ intelligentiâ De Synod c 77 p 1193 In his short apologetical notes (first published by the Benedictines from a MS of Chartres) he observes that he used this cautious expression quia intelligerem et impiam p 1206 See p 1146 Philostorgius who saw those objects through a different medium is inclined to forget the difference of the important diphthong See in particular viii 17 and Godefroy p 352

72 Testor Deum cœli atque terræ me cum neutrum audissem semper tamen utrumque sensisse. Regeneratus pridem et in episcopatu aliquantisper manens fidem Nicenam nunquam nisi exsulaturus audivi Hilar de Synodis c xci p 1205 The Benedictines are persuaded that he governed the diocese of Poitiers several years before his exile

73 Seneca (Epist lviii) complains that even the τὸ ὂν of the Platonists (the ens of the bolder schoolmen) could not be expressed by a Latin noun

74 The preference which the fourth council of the Lateran at length gave to a numerical rather than a generical unity (see Petav tom ii l iv c 13 p 424) was favoured by the Latin language τρίας seems to excite the idea of substance trinitas of qualities

75 Ingemuit totus orbis et Arianum se esse miratus est Hieronym adv Lucifer tom. i p 145. [Tom ii p 191 ed Vallars]

76 The story of the council of Rimini is very elegantly told by Sulpicius Severus (Hist Sacra l. i p 419–430. edit Lugd Bat 1647) and by Jerom in his dialogue against the Luciferians The design of the latter is to apologise for the conduct of the Latin bishops who were deceived and who repented.

77 Eusebius in Vit Constant. l. ii. c 64–72 The principles of toleration and religious indifference contained in this epistle have given great offence to Baronius Tillemont etc who suppose that the emperor had some evil counsellor either Satan or Eusebius at his elbow See Jortin's Remarks tom ii p 183

78 Eusebius in Vit Constantin l iii c 13.

79 Theodoret has preserved (l i c 20) an epistle from Constantine to the people of Nicomedia, in which the monarch declares himself the public accuser of one of his subjects he styles Eusebius ὁ τῆ τυρα ννικῆς ὠμότητος συμμύστης and complains of his hostile behavior during the civil war

80 See in Socrates (l i c 8) or rather in Theodoret (l i c 12) an original letter of Eusebius of Cæsarea in which he attempts to justify his subscribing the Homoousion The character of Eusebius has always been a problem but those who have read the second critical epistle of Le Clerc (Ars Critica tom iii p 30–69) must entertain a very unfavourable opinion of the orthodoxy and sincerity of the bishop of Cæsarea

81 Athanasius tom i p 727 [tom i p 247 ed. Bened) Philostorgius l i c 10 and Godefroy's Commentary p 41

82 Socrates l i c 9 In his circular letters, which were addressed to the several cities, Constantine employed against the heretics the arms of ridicule and comic raillery

83 We derive the original story from Athanasius (tom i p 670) who expresses some reluctance to stigmatise the memory of the dead He might exaggerate but the perpetual commerce of Alexandria and Constantinople would have rendered it dangerous to invent Those who press the literal narrative of the death of Arius (his bowels suddenly burst out in a privy) must make their option between poison and miracle

84 The change in the sentiments or at least in the conduct of Constantine may be traced in Eusebius (in Vit Constant l. iii c 23 l iv c 41) Socrates (l i c 23–39) Sozomen (l ii c 16–34) Theodoret (l i c 14–34) and Philostorgius (l. ii c 1–17) But the first of these writers was too near the scene of action and the others were too remote from it It is singular enough that the important task of continuing the history of the church should have been left for two laymen and a heretic

pressly observes that in the reign of Constantine the cross had been found in the bowels of the earth, but that it had appeared, in the reign of Constantius, in the midst of the heavens This opposition evidently proves that Cyril was ignorant of the stupendous miracle to which the conversion of Constantine is attributed, and this ignorance is the more surprising, since it was no more than twelve years after his death that Cyril was consecrated bishop of Jerusalem by the immediate successor of Eusebius of Cæsarea See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom viii p 715

89 It is not easy to determine how far the ingenuity of Cyril might be assisted by some natural appearances of a solar halo

90 Philostorgius, l iii c 26 He is followed by the author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, by Cedrenus, and by Nicephorus (see Gothofred Dissert p 188) They could not refuse a miracle, even from the hand of an enemy

91 So curious a passage well deserves to be transcribed Christianam religionem absolutam et simplicem, anili superstitione confundens, in quâ scrutandâ perplexius, quam componendâ gravius excitaret discidia plurima, quæ progressa fusius aluit concertatione verborum, ut catervis antistitum jumentis publicis ultro citroque discurrentibus, per synodos (quas appellant) dum ritum omnem ad suum trahere conantur (Valesius reads conatur) rei vehiculariæ concideret nervos Ammianus, xxi 16

94 Sozomen, l iv c 23 Athanas tom i p 831 [tom i p 281, ed Ben] Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 947) has collected several instances of the haughty fanaticism of Constantius from the detached treatises of Lucifer of Cagliari The very titles of these treatises inspire zeal and terror — "Moriendum pro Dei Filio" "De Regibus Apostaticis" "De non conveniendo cum Hæretico" "De non parcendo in Deum delinquentibus"

95 Sulp Sever Hist Sacra l ii p 418–430 The Greek historians were very ignorant of the affairs of the West

96 We may regret that Gregory Nazianzen composed a panegyric instead of a life of Athanasius, but we should enjoy and improve the advantage of drawing our most authentic materials from the rich fund of his own epistles and apologies (tom i p 670–951) I shall not imitate the example of Socrates (l ii c 1), who published the first edition of his history without giving himself the trouble to consult the writings of Athanasius Yet even Socrates, the more curious Sozomen, and the learned Theodoret, connect the life of Athanasius with the series of ecclesiastical history The diligence of Tillemont (tom viii) and of the Benedictine editors has collected every fact and examined every difficulty

97 Sulpicius Severus (Hist Sacra l ii p 396) calls him a lawyer, a jurisconsult This character cannot now be discovered either in the life or writings of Athanasius

98 Dicebatur enim fatidicarum sortium fidem, quæve augurales portenderent alites scientissime callens aliquoties prædixisse futura Ammianus, xv 7 A prophecy, or rather a joke, is related by Sozomen (l iv c 10), which evidently proves (if the crows speak Latin) that Athanasius understood the language of the crows

99 The irregular ordination of Athanasius was slightly mentioned in the councils which were held against him (see Philostorg l ii c 11, and Godefroy, p 71), but it can scarcely be supposed that the assembly of the bishops of Egypt would solemnly attest a public falsehood Athanas tom i p 726

100 See the History of the Fathers of the Desert, published by Rosweide, and Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom vii , in the Lives of Antony Pachomius, etc Athanasius himself, who did not disdain to compose the life of his friend Antony, has carefully observed how often the holy monk deplored and prophesied the mischiefs of the Arian heresy Athanas tom ii p 492, 498, etc [tom i p 677, ed Bened]

101 At first Constantine threatened in speaking, but requested in writing, καὶ ἀγράφως μὲν ἠπείλει, γράφων δὲ ἠξίου His letters gradually assumed a menacing tone, but while he required that the entrance of the church should be open to all, he avoided the odious name of Arius Athanasius, like a skilful politician, has accurately marked these distinctions (tom i p 788 [tom i p 140, ed Bened]), which allowed him some scope for excuse and delay

102 The Meletians in Egypt, like the Donatists in Africa, were produced by an episcopal quarrel which arose from the persecution I have not leisure to pursue the obscure controversy, which seems to have been misrepresented by the partiality of Athanasius and the ignorance of Epiphanius See Mosheim's General History of the Church, vol i p 201

103 The treatment of the six bishops is specified by Sozomen (l ii c 25), but Athanasius himself, so copious on the subject of Arsenius and the chalice, leaves this grave accusation without a reply

104 Athanas tom i p 788 [tom i p 147, ed Bened] Socrates, l i c 28 Sozomen, l ii c 25 The emperor, in his Epistle of Convocation (Euseb in Vit Constant l iv c 42), seems to prejudge some members of the clergy, and it was more than probable that the synod would apply those reproaches to Athanasius

105 See, in particular, the second Apology of Athanasius (tom i p 763–808), and his Epistles to the Monks (p 808–866) [tom i p 271 199 ed Bened]) They are justified by original and authentic documents but they would inspire more confidence if he appeared less innocent, and his enemies less absurd

107 Athanas tom i p 804 [tom i p 159 ed Bened 1777] In a church dedicated to St Athanasius this situation would afford a better subject for a picture than most of the stories of miracles and martyrdoms

108 Athanas tom i p 729 [tom i p 104 ed Bened] Eunapius has related (in Vit Sophist p 36 37 [in Ædesio] edit Commelin) a strange example of the cruelty and credulity of Constantine on a similar occasion The eloquent Sopater a Syrian philosopher enjoyed his friendship and provoked the resentment of Ablavius his Prætorian præfect The corn fleet was detained for want of a south wind the people of Constantinople were discontented and Sopater was beheaded on a charge that he had bound the winds by the power of magic Suidas adds that Constantine wished to prove by this execution that he had absolutely renounced the superstition of the Gentiles

109 In his return he saw Constantius twice—at Viminiacum and at Cæsarea in Cappadocia (Athanas tom i p 676 [tom i p 236 ed Bened]) Tillemont supposes that Constantine introduced him to the meeting of the three royal brothers in Pannonia (Mémoires Eccléś tom viii p 69)

110 See Beveridge Pandect tom i p 429–452 and tom ii Annotation p 182 Tillemont Mém Eccléś tom vi p 310–324 St Hilary of Poitiers has mentioned this synod of Antioch with too much favour and respect He reckons ninety seven bishops

111 This magistrate so odious to Athanasius is praised by Gregory Nazianzen tom i Orat xxi p 390 391 [ed Par 1630]

Sæpe premente Deo fert Deus alter opem

For the credit of human nature I am always pleased to discover some good qualities in those men whom party has represented as tyrants and monsters

112 The chronological difficulties which perplex the residence of Athanasius at Rome are strenuously agitated by Valesius (Observat ad Calcem tom ii Hist Eccles l i c 1–5) and Tillemont (Mém Eccléś tom viii p 674 etc) I have followed the simple hypothesis of Valesius who allows only one journey after the intrusion of Gregory

113 I cannot forbear transcribing a judicious observation of Wetstein (Prolegomen N T p 19) —Si tamen Historiam Ecclesiasticam velimus consulere patebit jam inde a seculo quarto cum ortis controversiis ecclesiæ Græciæ doctores in duas partes scinderentur ingenio eloquentiâ numero tantum non æquales eam partem quæ vincere cupiebat Romam confugisse majestatemque pontificis comiter coluisse eoque pacto oppressis per pontificem et episcopos Latinos adversariis prævaluisse atque orthodoxiam in conciliis stabilivisse Eam ob causam Athanasius non sine comitatu Romam petiit pluresque annos ibi hæsit

114. Philostorgius l. iii c 12 If any corruption was used to promote the interest of religion an advocate of Athanasius might justify or excuse this questionable conduct by the example of Cato and Sidney the former of whom is said to have given, and the latter to have received a bribe in the cause of liberty

115 The canon which allows appeals to the Roman pontiffs has almost raised the council of Sardica to the dignity of a general council and its acts have been ignorantly or artfully confounded with those of the Nicene synod See Tillemont, tom viii p 689 and Geddes s Tracts vol. ii p. 419–460

116 As Athanasius dispersed secret invectives against Constantius (see the Epistle to the Monks) at the same time that he assured him of his profound respect we might distrust the professions of the archbishop Tom i p 677

117 Notwithstanding the discreet silence of Athanasius and the manifest forgery of a letter inserted by Socrates these menaces are proved by the unquestionable evidence of Lucifer of Cagliari, and even of Constantius himself See Tillemont tom. viii p 693

118 I have always entertained some doubts concerning the retractation of Ursacius and Valens (Athanas tom i p 776 [tom i p 139 ed Bened. 1777]) Their epistles to Julius bishop of Rome and to Athanasius himself are of so different a cast from each other that they cannot both be genuine the one speaks the language of criminals who confess their guilt and infamy the other of enemies, who solicit on equal terms an honourable reconciliation

119 The circumstances of his second return may be collected from Athanasius himself tom. i. p 769 and 822 843 [tom i p 283 ed Bened] Socrates l ii c 15 Sozomen l iii c 19 Theodoret, l ii c 11 12 Philostorgius l iii c 12

120 Athanasius (tom i p 677 678 [tom i. p. 239 ed Bened]) defends his innocence by pathetic complaints solemn assertions and specious arguments He admits that letters had been forged in his name but he requests that his own secretaries and those of the tyrant may be examined whether those letters had been written by the former or received by the latter

123 The affairs of the council of Milan are so imperfectly and erroneously related by the Greek writers that we must rejoice in the supply of some letters of Eusebius extracted by Baronius from the archives of the church of Vercellæ and of an old Life of Dionysius of Milan published by Bollandus See Baronius A D 355 and Tillemont, tom vii p 1415

124 The honours presents feasts which seduced so many bishops are mentioned with indignation by those who were too pure or too proud to accep

them "We combat" (says Hilary of Poitiers) "against Constantius the Antichrist, who strokes the belly instead of scourging the back," qui non dorsa cædit, sed ventrem palpat Hilarius contra Constant c 5, p 1240

125 Something of this opposition is mentioned by Ammianus (xv 7), who had a very dark and superficial knowledge of ecclesiastical history Liberius perseveranter renitebatur, nec visum hominem, nec auditum damnare, nefas ultimum sæpe exclamans aperte scilicet recalcitrans Imperatoris arbitrio Id enim ille Athanasio semper infestus, etc

126 More properly by the orthodox part of the council of Sardica If the bishops of both parties had fairly voted, the division would have been 94 to 76 M de Tillemont (see tom viii p 1147–1158) is justly surprised that so small a majority should have proceeded so vigorously against their adversaries, the principal of whom they immediately deposed

129 The life of Osius is collected by Tillemont (tom vii p 524–561), who, in the most extravagant terms, first admires and then reprobates the bishop of Cordova In the midst of their lamentations on his fall, the prudence of Athanasius may be distinguished from the blind and intemperate zeal of Hilary

130 The confessors of the West were successively banished to the deserts of Arabia or Thebaïs, the lonely places of Mount Taurus, the wildest parts of Phrygia, which were in the possession of the impious Montanists, etc When the heretic Aëtius was too favorably entertained at Mopsuestia in Cilicia, the place of his exile was changed, by the advice of Acacius, to Amblada, a district inhabited by savages, and infested by war and pestilence Philostorg l v c 2

133 Ample materials for the history of this third persecution of Athanasius may be found in his own works See particularly his very able Apology to Constantius (tom 1 p 673 [tom 1 p 233 sqq ed Bened]), his first Apology for his flight (p 701 [tom. 1 p 253 sqq ed Bened]), his prolix Epistle to the Solitaries (p 808), and the original Protest of the People of Alexandria against the violences committed by Syrianus (p 866 [p 311, ed Bened.]) Sozomen (l iv c 9) has thrown into the narrative two or three luminous and important circumstances

134 Athanasius had lately sent for Antony and some of his chosen monks They descended from their mountain, announced to the Alexandrians the sanctity of Athanasius, and were honourably conducted by the archbishop as far as the gates of the city Athanas tom ii p 491, 492 [tom 1 p 677 sq ed Bened 1777] See likewise Rufinus, iii 164, in Vit Patr p 524

135 Athanas tom 1 p 694 [tom 1 p 249, ed Bened] The emperor, or his Arian secretaries, while they express their resentment, betray their fears and esteem of Athanasius

136 These minute circumstances are curious, as they are literally transcribed from the protest which was publicly presented three days afterwards by the catholics of Alexandria See Athanas tom 1 p 867 [tom 1 p 311, ed Bened 1777]

137 The Jansenists have often compared Athanasius and Arnauld, and have expatiated with pleasure on the faith and zeal, the merit and exile, of those celebrated doctors This concealed parallel is very dexterously managed by the Abbé de la Bléterie, Vie de Jovien, tom 1 p 130

138 Hinc jam toto orbe profugus [agitur] Athanasius, nec ullus ei tutus ad latendum supererat locus Tribuni, Præfecti, Comites, exercitus quoque, ad pervestigandum eum moventur edictis Imperialibus, præmia delatoribus proponuntur, si quis eum vivum, si id minus, caput certe Athanasii detulisset Rufin l 1 c 18

141 Rufin l 1 c 18 Sozomen, l iv c 10 This and the following story will be rendered impossible if we suppose that Athanasius always inhabited the asylum which he accidentally or occasionally had used

142 Palladius (Hist Lausiac c 136 in Vit Patrum, p 776 [p 230 ed Paris, Pallad 1555]), the original author of this anecdote, had conversed with the damsel, who in her old age still remembered with pleasure so pious and honourable a connection I cannot indulge the delicacy of Baronius, Valesius, Tillemont, etc, who almost reject a story so unworthy, as they deem it, of the gravity of ecclesiastical history

143 Athanas tom 1 p 869 [tom 1 p 572, ed Bened 1777] I agree with Tillemont (tom viii. p 1197), that his expressions imply a personal, though perhaps secret, visit to the synods

144 The epistle of Athanasius to the monks is filled with reproaches which the public must feel to be true (vol 1 p 834, 856 [tom 1 p 304 ed Bened]) and, in compliment to his readers, he has introduced the comparisons of Pharaoh, Ahab,

Belshazzar etc The boldness of Hilary was attended with less danger if he published his invective in Gaul after the revolt of Julian but Lucifer sent his libels to Constantius and almost challenged the reward of martyrdom See Tillemont, tom vii p 905

145 Athanasius (tom. i p 811) complains in general of this practice which he afterwards exemplifies (p 861 [tom i p 307 ed Bened]) in the pretended election of Felix Three eunuchs represented the Roman people and three prelates who followed the court assumed the functions of the bishops of the Suburbicarian provinces

146 Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom i l ii c 72 73 p 966–984) has collected many curious facts concerning the origin and progress of church singing both in the East and West

147 Philostorgius l iii c 13 God froy has examined this subject with singular accuracy (p 147 etc) There were three heterodox forms To the Father by the Son and in the Holy Ghost To the Father and the Son in the Holy Ghost and To the Father in the Son and the Holy Ghost

148 After the exile of Eustathius under the reign of Constantine the rigid party of the orthodox formed a separation which afterwards degenerated into a schism and lasted above fourscore years See Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom vii p 35–54 1137–1158 tom viii p 573–632 1314–1332 In many churches the Arians and Homoousians who had renounced each other s communion continued for some time to join in prayer Philostorgius l iii c 14

151 Athanasius (tom. i. p 703 813 814 [tom. i. p 275 ed Bened]) affirms in the most positive terms that Paul was murdered and appeals not only to common fame but even to the unsuspicious testimony of Philagrius one of the Arian persecutors Yet he acknowledges that the heretics attributed to disease the death of the bishop of Constantinople Athanasius is servilely copied by Socrates (l ii c 26) but Sozomen who discovers a more liberal temper presumes (l iv c 2) to insinuate a prudent doubt

152 Ammianus (xiv 10) refers to his own account of this tragic event. But we no longer possess that part of his history

153 See Socrates l ii c 6 7 12 13 15 16, 26 27 38 and Sozomen l iii 3 4, 7 9 l. iv c 2 21 The acts of St Paul of Constantinople of which Photius has made an abstract (Phot Biblioth. p 1419–1430) are an indifferent copy of these historians but a modern Greek who could write the Life of a saint without adding fables and miracles, is entitled to some commendation

154 Socrates l ii c 27 38 Sozomen l. iv c. 21 The principal assistants of Macedonius, in the work of persecution were the two bishops of Nicomedia and Cyzicus who were esteemed for their virtues and especially for their charity I cannot forbear reminding the reader that the difference between the Homoousion and Homoiousion is almost invisible to the nicest theological eye

155 We are ignorant of the precise situation of Mantinium In speaking of these four bands of legionaries Socrates Sozomen and the author of the Acts of St Paul use the indefinite terms of ἀριθμοί φάλαγγες τάγματα which Nicephorus very properly translates thousands Vales ad Socrat l ii. c 38

157 See Optatus Milevitanus (particularly iii. 4) with the Donatist history by M Dupin and the original pieces at the end of his edition. The numerous circumstances which Augustin has mentioned of the fury of the Circumcellions against others and against themselves have been laboriously collected by Tillemont Mém Ecclés. tom. vi p 147–165, and he has often though without design exposed the injuries which had provoked those fanatics

158 It is amusing enough to observe the language of opposite parties when they speak of the same men and things Gratus bishop of Carthage begins the acclamations of an orthodox synod, "Gratias Deo omnipotenti et Christo Jesu qui imperavit religiosissimo Constanti Imperatori, ut votum gereret unitatis et mitteret ministros sancti operis famulos Dei Paulum et Macarium. Monument Vet ad Calcem Optati p 313 Ecce subito (says the Donatist author of the Passion of Marculus) de Constantis regis tyrannicâ domo pollutum Macarianæ persecutionis murmur increpuit et duabus bestiis ad Africam missis eodem scilicet Macario et Paulo execrandum prorsus ac dirum ecclesiæ certamen indictum est ut populus Christianus ad unionem cum traditoribus faciendam nudatis militum gladiis et draconum præsentibus signis et tubarum vocibus cogeretur Monument p 304.

159 The Histoire des Camisards, in 3 vols. 12mo Villefranche 1760 may be recommended as accurate and impartial It requires some attention to discover the religion of the author

164 According to Eusebius (in Vit Constantin l ii c 45) the emperor prohibited, both in cities and in the country, τὰ μυσαρα τῆς εἰδωλολατρείας, the abominable acts or parts of idolatry Socrates (l i c 18) and Sozomen (l ii c 4, 5) have represented the conduct of Constantine with a just regard to truth and history, which has been neglected by Theodoret (l v c 21) and Orosius (vii 28) Tum deinde (says the latter) primus Constantinus justo ordine et pio vicem vertit edicto, siquidem statuit citra ullam hominum cædem, paganorum templa claudi

165. See Eusebius in Vit Constantin l ii c 56, 60 In the sermon to the assembly of saints which the emperor pronounced when he was mature in years and piety, he declares to the idolaters (c xi) that they are permitted to offer sacrifices and to exercise every part of their religious worship

166 See Eusebius, in Vit Constantin l iii c 54-58, and l iv c 23, 25 These acts of authority may be compared with the suppression of the Bacchanals, and the demolition of the temple of Isis, by the magistrates of Pagan Rome

167 Eusebius (in Vit Constant l iii c 54) and Libanius (Orat pro Templis, p 9, 10, edit Gothofred.) both mention the pious sacrilege of Constantine, which they viewed in very different lights The latter expressly declares that "he made use of the sacred money, but made no alteration in the legal worship, the temples indeed were impoverished, but the sacred rites were performed there " Lardner's Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 140

168 Ammianus (xxii 4) speaks of some court eunuchs who were spoliis templorum pasti Libanius says (Orat pro Templ p 23) that the emperor often gave away a temple, like a dog, or a horse, or a slave, or a gold cup but the devout philosopher takes care to observe that these sacrilegious favourites very seldom prospered

170 Placuit omnibus locis atque urbibus universis claudi protinus templa, et accessu vetitis omnibus licentiam delinquendi perditis abnegari Volumus etiam cunctos a sacrificiis abstinere Quod siquis aliquid forte hujusmodi perpetraverit, gladio [ultore] sternatur facultitates etiam perempti fisco decernimus vindicari et similiter ad fligi rectores provinciarum si facinora vindicare neglexerint Cod Theodos l xvi tit x leg 4. Chronology has discovered some contradiction in the date of this extravagant law, the only one, perhaps, by which the negligence of magistrates is punished by death and confiscation M de la Bastie (Mém de l'Acedémie, tom xv p 98) conjectures, with a show of reason, that this was no more than the minutes of a law, the heads of an intended bill, which were found in Scriniis Memoriæ, among the papers of Constantius, and afterwards inserted, as a worthy model, in the Theodosian Code

173 As I have freely anticipated the use of pagans and paganism, I shall now trace the singular revolutions of those celebrated words 1 Παγη, in the Doric dialect, so familiar to the Italians, signifies a fountain and the rural neighbourhood which frequented the same fountain derived the common appellation of pagus and pagans (Festus sub voce, and Servius ad Virgil Georgic ii 382) 2 By an easy extension of the word, pagan and rural became almost synonymous (Plin Hist Natur xxviii 5), and the meaner rustics acquired that name, which has been corrupted into peasants in the modern languages of Europe 3 The amazing increase of the military order introduced the necessity of a correlative term (Hume s Essays, vol i p 555) and all the people who were not enlisted in the service of the prince were branded with the contemptuous epithet of pagans (Tacit Hist iii 24, 43, 77 Juvenal Satir 16 [v 32] Tertullian de Pallio, c 4) 4. The Christians were the soldiers of Christ, their adversaries who refused his sacrament, or military oath of baptism, might deserve the metaphorical name of pagans, and this popular reproach was introduced as early as the reign of Valentinian (A D 365) into Imperial laws (Cod Theodos l xvi tit ii leg 18) and theological writings 5 Christianity gradually filled the cities of the empire the old religion, in the time of Prudentius (advers Symmachum, l i [v 575 sqq] ad fin) and Orosius (in Præfat Hist), retired and languished in obscure villages and the word pagans, with its new signification, reverted to its primitive origin 6 Since the worship of Jupiter and his family has expired, the vacant title of Pagans has been successively applied to all the idolaters and polytheists of the old and new world 7 The Latin Christians bestowed it, without scruple, on their mortal enemies the Mahometans and the purest Unitarians were branded with the unjust reproach of idolatry and paganism See Gerard Vossius Etymologicon Linguæ Latinæ in his works tom i p 420 Godefroy s Commentary on the Theodosian Code tom vi p 250 and Ducange mediæ et infimæ Latinitat. Glossar

174. In the pure language of Ionia and Athens Εἴδωλο and Λατρεία were ancient and familiar words The former expressed a likeness an apparition (Homer Odys xi 602) a representation an image created either by fancy or art The latter denoted any sort of service or slavery The Jews of Egypt who translated the Hebrew Scriptures restrained the use of these words (Exod xx 4 5) to the religious worship of an image The peculiar idiom of the Hellenists or Grecian Jews has been adopted by the sacred and ecclesiastical writers and the reproach of idolatry (Εἰδωλολατρεία) has stigmatised that visible and abject mode of superstition which some sects of Christianity should not hastily impute to the polytheists of Greece and Rome

2 Ammian xvi 12 [fin] The orator Themistius (iv p 56 57) believed whatever was contained in the Imperial letters which were addressed to the senate of Constantinople Aurelius Victor who published his Abridgment in the last year of Constantius ascribes the German victories to the wisdom of the emperor and the fortune of the Cæsar Yet the historian soon afterwards was indebted to the favour or esteem of Julian for the honour of a brass statue and the important offices of consular of the second Pannonia and præfect of the city Ammian xxi 10

3 Callido nocendi artificio accusatoriam diritatem laudum titulis peragebant Hæ voces fuerunt ad inflammanda odia probris omnibus potentiores See Mamertin in Actione Gratiarum in Vet Panegyr xi 4 5

4. The minute interval which may be interposed between the hieme adultâ and the primo vere of Ammianus (xx 1 4) instead of allowing a sufficient space for a march of three thousand miles would render the orders of Constantius as extravagant as they were unjust The troops of Gaul could not have reached Syria till the end of autumn The memory of Ammianus must have been inaccurate and his language incorrect

5. Ammianus xx 1 The valour of Lupicinus and his military skill are acknowledged by the historian who in his affected language accuses the general of exalting the horns of his pride bellowing in a tragic tone and exciting a doubt whether he was more cruel or avaricious The danger from the Scots and Picts was so serious that Julian himself had some thoughts of passing over into the island

6 He granted them the permission of the cursus clavularis or clabularis These post waggons are often mentioned in the Cod and were supposed to carry fifteen hundred pounds weight. See Vales. ad Ammian xx 4

7 Most probably the palace of the baths (Thermarum) of which a solid and lofty hall still subsists in the Rue de la Harpe The buildings covered a considerable space of the modern quarter of the university and the gardens under the Merovingian kings communicated with the abbey of St Germain des Prez By the injuries of time and the Normans this ancient palace was reduced in the twelfth century to a maze of ruins whose dark recesses were the scene of licentious love

Explicat aula sinus montemque amplectitur alis

(These lines are quoted from the Architrenius l iv c 8 a poetical work of John de Hauteville or Hanville a monk of St Alban s about the year 1100 See Warton s History of English Poetry vol i dissert ii) Yet such thefts might be less pernicious to mankind than the theological disputes of the Sorbonne which have been since agitated on the same ground Bonamy Mém de l Academie tom xv p 6,8-68

8 Even in this tumultuous moment Julian attended to the forms of superstitious ceremony and obstinately refused the inauspicious use of a female necklace or a horse-collar which the impatient soldiers would have employed in the room of a diadem

9 An equal proportion of gold and silver five pieces of the former one pound of the latter the whole amounting to about five pounds ten shillings of our money

10 For the whole narrative of this revolt we may appeal to authentic and original materials Julian himself (ad S P Q Atheniensem, p 282 283 284) Libanius (Orat Parental c 44 48 in Fabricius Biblioth Græc tom vii p 269-273) Ammianus (xx. 4) and Zosimus (l iii [c. 9] p 151 152 153) who in the reign of Julian appears to follow the more respectable authority of Eunapius With such guides we might neglect the abbreviators and ecclesiastical historians.

11 Eutropius, a respectable witness, uses a doubtful expression, "consensu militum" (x 15 [7]) Gregory Nazianzen, whose ignorance might excuse his fanaticism, directly charges the apostate with presumption, madness, and impious rebellion, αὐθάδεια, ἀπόνοια, ἀσέβεια Orat iii p 67

12 Julian ad S P Q Athen p 284 The devout Abbé de la Bléterie (Vie de Julien, p 159) is almost inclined to respect the devout protestations of a Pagan

13 Ammian xx 5, with the note of Lindenbrogius on the Genius of the empire Julian himself, in a confidential letter to his friend and physician Oribasius (Epist xvii p 384), mentions another dream, to which, before the event, he gave credit, of a stately tree thrown to the ground, of a small plant striking a deep root into the earth Even in his sleep the mind of the Cæsar must have been agitated by the hopes and fears of his fortune Zosimus (l iii [c 9] p 155) relates a subsequent dream

14 The difficult situation of the prince of a rebellious army is finely described by Tacitus (Hist i 80–85) But Otho had much more guilt and much less abilities than Julian

15 To this ostensible epistle he added, says Ammianus, private letters, objurgatorias et mordaces, which the historian had not seen, and would not have published Perhaps they never existed

18 Julian (Epist xxxviii p 414) gives a short description of Vesontio, or Besançon, a rocky peninsula almost encircled by the river Doubs, once a magnificent city, filled with temples, etc , now reduced to a small town, emerging however from its ruins

19 Vadomair entered into the Roman service, and was promoted from a barbarian kingdom to the military rank of duke of Phœnicia He still retained the same artful character (Ammian xxi 3), but under the reign of Valens, he signalised his valour in the Armenian war (xxix 1)

20 Ammian xx 10, xxi 3, 4. Zosimus, l iii [c 10] p 155

21 Her remains were sent to Rome, and interred near those of her sister Constantina, in the suburb of the Via Nomentana Ammian xxi 1 Libanius has composed a very weak apology, to justify his hero from a very absurd charge of poison ing his wife, and rewarding her physician with his mother's jewels (See the seventh of seventeen new orations published at Venice 1754, from a MS in St Mark's library, p 117–127) Elpidius, the Prætorian præfect of the East, to whose evidence the accuser of Julian appeals, is arraigned by Libanius as effeminate and ungrateful, yet the religion of Elpidius is praised by Jerom (tom i p 243), and his humanity by Ammianus (xxi 6)

22 Feriarum die, quem celebrantes mense Januario, Christiani Epiphania dictitant, progressus, in eorum ecclesiam, solemniter numine orato discessit Ammian xxi 2 Zonaras observes that it was on Christmas Day, and his assertion is not inconsistent, since the churches of Egypt, Asia, and perhaps Gaul, celebrated on the same day (the 6th of January) the nativity and the baptism of their Saviour The Romans, as ignorant as their breth ren of the real date of his birth, fixed the solemn festival to the 25th of December, the Brumalia, or winter solstice, when the Pagans annually celebrated the birth of the sun See Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, l xx c 4, and Beausobre, Hist Critique du Manichéisme, tom ii p 690–700

23 The public and secret negotiations between Constantius and Julian must be extracted, with some caution, from Julian himself (Orat ad S P Q Athen p 286), Libanius (Orat Parent c 51, p 276), Ammianus (xx 9), Zosimus (l iii [c 9] p 154), and even Zonaras (tom ii l xiii [c 10] p 20, 21, 22), who, on this occasion, appears to have possessed and used some valuable materials

24. Three hundred myriads, or three millions, of medimni, a corn measure familiar to the Athenians, and which contained six Roman modii Julian explains, like a soldier and a statesman, the danger of his situation, and the necessity and advantages of an offensive war (ad S P Q Athen p 286, 287)

25 See his oration, and the behaviour of the troops, in Ammian xxi 5

26 He sternly refused his hand to the suppliant præfect, whom he sent into Tuscany (Ammian xxi 5) Libanius, with savage fury, insults Nebridius, applauds the soldiers, and almost censures the humanity of Julian (Orat Parent c 53, p 278)

27 Ammian xxi 8 In this promotion Julian obeyed the law which he publicly imposed on himself Neque civilis quisquam judex nec militaris [militiæ] rector, alio quodam præter merita suffragante, ad potiorem veniat gradum (Ammian xx 5) Absence did not weaken his regard for Sallust, with whose name (A D 363) he honoured the consulship

28 Ammianus (xxi 8) ascribes the same practice and the same motive to Alexander the Great and other skilful generals

29 This wood was a part of the great Hercynian forest, which, in the time of Cæsar, stretched away from the country of the Rauraci (Basel) into the boundless regions of the North See Cluver Germania Antiqua, l iii c 47

30 Compare Libanius, Orat Parent c. 53 p 278, 279, with Gregory Nazianzen, Orat iii. p 68.

Even the saint admires the speed and secrecy of this march A modern divine might apply to the progress of Julian the lines which were originally designed for another apostate —

——So eagerly the fiend
O er bog or steep through strait rough dense or rare
With head hands wings or feet pursues his way
And swims or sinks or wades or creeps or flies

31 In that interval the Notitia places two or three fleets the Lauriacensis (at Lauriacum or Lorch) the Arlapensis, the Maginensis and mentions five legions or cohorts of Liburnarii, who should be a sort of marines Sect lviii edit Labb

32 Zosimus alone (l iii [c 10] p 156) has specified this interesting circumstance Mamertinus (in Panegyr Vet xi [x] 6 7 8) who accompanied Julian as count of the sacred largesses describes this voyage in a florid and picturesque manner challenges Triptolemus and the Argonauts of Greece etc

33 The description of Ammianus which might be supported by collateral evidence ascertains the precise situation of the Angustiæ Succorum or passes of Succi M d Anville from the trifling resemblance of names has placed them between Sardica and Naissus For my own justification I am obliged to mention the only error which I have discovered in the maps or writings of that admirable geographer

34 Whatever circumstances we may borrow elsewhere Ammianus (xxi. 8 9 10) still supplies the series of the narrative

35 Ammian xxi 9 10 Libanius Orat Parent c 54 p 279 280 Zosimus l iii [c 10] p 156 157

36 Julian (ad S P Q Athen p 286) positively asserts that he int rcepted the letters of Constantius to the barbarians and Libanius as positively affirms that he read them on his march to the troops and the cities Yet Ammianus (xxi 3) expresses himself with cool and candid hesitation si famæ solius admittenda est fides He specifies how ever an intercepted letter from Vadomair to Constantius which supposes an intimate correspondence between them Cæsar tuus disciplinam non habet

37 Zosimus mentions his epistles to the Athenians the Corinthians and the Lacedæmonians The substance was probably the same though the address was properly varied The epistle to the Athenians is still extant (p 268–287) and has afforded much valuable information It deserves the praises of the Abbé de la Bléterie (Préf à l Histoire de Jovien p 24 25) and is one of the best manifestoes to be found in any language

38 Auctori t o reverent um rogamus Ammian xxi It is amusing enough to observe the secret conflicts of the senate between flattery and fear See Tacit Hist i 85

39 Tanquam venaticiam prædam caperet hoc enim ad leniendum suorum metum subinde prædicabat Ammian xxi 7

40 See the speech and preparations in Ammianus xxi 13 The vile Theodotus afterwards implored and obtained his pardon from the merciful conqueror who signified his wish of diminishing his enemies and increasing the number of his friends (xxii 14)

41 Ammian xxi 7 11 12 He seems to describe with superfluous labour the operations of the siege of Aquileia which on this occasion maintained its impregnable fame Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iii p 68) ascribes this accidental revolt to the wisdom of Constantius whose assured victory he announces with some appearance of truth. Constantio quem cred bat proculdubio fore victorem nemo enim omnium tunc ab hac constanti sententia discrepabat Ammian xxi 7

42 His death and character are faithfully delineated by Ammianus (xxi 14 15 16) and we are authorised to despise and detest the foolish calumny of Gregory (Orat iii p 68) who accuses Julian of contriving the death of his benefactor The private repentance of the emperor that he had spared and promoted Julian (p 69, and Orat. xxi p 389) is not improbable in itself nor incompatible with the public verbal testament which prudential considerations might dictate in the last moments of his life

43 In describing the triumph of Julian Ammianus (xxii 1, 2) assumes the lofty tone of an orator or poet while Libanius (Orat Parent. c. 56 p 281) sinks to the grave simplicity of an historian

44 The funeral of Constantius is described by Ammianus (xxi 16) Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 119) Mamertinus (in Panegyr Vet. xi. 27) Libanius (Orat Parent c lvi p 283) and Philostorgius (L vi c 6 with Godefroy's Dissertations p 265) These writers and their followers, Pagans Catholics Arians beheld with very different eyes both the dead and the living emperor

45 The day and year of the birth of Julian are not perfectly ascertained The day is probab y the sixth of November and the year must be either 331 or 332 Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom. iv p 693 Ducange Fam Byzantin p 50 I have preferred the earlier date

46 Julian himself (p 253–267) has expressed these philosophical ideas with much eloquence and some affectation in a very elaborate epistle to Themistius The Abbé de la Bléterie (tom ii p 146–193) who has given an elegant translation, is inclined to believe that it was the celebrated Themistius whose orations are still extant

47 Julian ad Themist p 258 Petavius (not p. 95) observes that this passage is taken from the fourth book of De Legibus but either Julian quoted from memory or his MSS were different from ours Xenophon opens the Cyropædia with a similar reflection

tium] p 261 The MS of Vossius, unsatisfied with the single beast, affords the stronger reading of θηρια, which the experience of despotism may warrant

49 Libanius (Orat Parentalis, c lxxxiv lxxxv p 310, 311, 312) has given this interesting detail of the private life of Julian He himself (in Misopogon, p 350) mentions his vegetable diet, and upbraids the gross and sensual appetite of the people of Antioch

50 Lectulus Vestalium toris purior, is the praise which Mamertinus (Panegyr Vet xi [x] 13) addresses to Julian himself Libanius affirms, in sober peremptory language, that Julian never knew a woman before his marriage, or after the death of his wife (Orat Parent c lxxxviii p 313) The chastity of Julian is confirmed by the impartial testimony of Ammianus (xxv 4), and the partial silence of the Christians Yet Julian ironically urges the reproach of the people of Antioch, that he almost always (ως ἐπιπαν, in Misopogon, p 345) lay alone This suspicious expression is explained by the Abbe de la Bleterie (Hist de Jovien, tom ii p 103 109) with candour and ingenuity

51 See Salmasius ad Sueton in Claud c xxi A twenty fifth race, or missus, was added, to complete the number of one hundred chariots, four of which, the four colours, started each heat

Centum quadrijugos agitabo ad flumina currus

It appears that they ran five or seven times round the Meta (Sueton, in Domitian c 4), and (from the measure of the Circus Maximus at Rome, the Hippodrome at Constantinople, etc) it might be about a four mile course

52 Julian, in Misopogon, p 340 Julius Cæsar had offended the Roman people by reading his despatches during the actual race Augustus indulged their taste, or his own, by his constant attention to the important business of the Circus, for which he professed the warmest inclination Sueton in August c xlv

53 The reformation of the palace is described by Ammianus (xxii 4), Libanius (Orat Parent c lxii p 288, etc), Mamertinus (in Panegyr Vet xi [x.] 11), Socrates (l iii c 1), and Zonaras (tom ii l xiii [c 12] p 24)

54 Ego non rationalem jussi sed tonsorem acciri Zonaras uses the less natural image of a senator Yet an officer of the finances, who was satiated with wealth, might desire and obtain the honours of the senate

55 Μαγείρους μὲν χιλίους, κουρέας δὲ οὐκ ἐλάττους, οἰνοχόους δὲ πλείους, σμηνη τραπεζοποιῶν, ευνουχους υπὲρ τὰς μυίας παρὰ τοῖς ποιμέσιν ἐν ἦρι, are the original words of Libanius, which I have faithfully quoted, lest I should be suspected of magnifying the abuses of the royal household

56 The expressions of Mamertinus [l c] are lively and forcible Quin etiam prandiorum et cœnarum elaboratas magnitudines Respublica sentiebat, cum quæsitissimæ dapes non gustu, sed difficultatibus æstimarentur, miracula avium, longinqui maris pisces, alieni temporis poma, æstivæ nives, hibernæ rosæ

57 Yet Julian himself was accused of bestowing whole towns on the eunuchs (Orat vii against Polyclet p 117-127) Libanius contents himself with a cold but positive denial of the fact, which seems indeed to belong more properly to Constantius This charge, however, may allude to some unknown circumstance

58 In the Misopogon (p 338, 339) he draws a very singular picture of himself, and the following words are strangely characteristic αυτὸς προσέθεικα τὸν βαθυν τουτονὶ πωγωνα ταῦτά τοι διαθεοντων ἀνεχομαι τῶν φθειρῶν ωσπερ ἐν λοχμῇ τῶν θηρίων The friends of the Abbe de la Bleterie adjured him, in the name of the French nation, not to translate this passage, so offensive to their delicacy (Hist de Jovien, tom ii p 94) Like him, I have contented myself with a transient allusion, but the little animal which Julian names, is a beast familiar to man, and signifies love

59 Julian, Epist xxiii p 389 He uses the words πολυκέφαλον ὕδραν, in writing to his friend Hermogenes, who, like himself, was conversant with the Greek poets

60 The two Sallusts, the præfect of Gaul and the præfect of the East, must be carefully distinguished (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 696) I have used the surname of Secundus as a convenient epithet The second Sallust extorted the esteem of the Christians themselves, and Gregory Nazianzen, who condemned his religion, has celebrated his virtues (Orat iii p 90) See a curious note of the Abbé de la Bléterie, Vie de Julien, p 363

61 Mamertinus praises the emperor (xi [x] 1) for bestowing the offices of treasurer and præfect on a man of wisdom, firmness, integrity, etc , like himself Yet Ammianus ranks him (xxi 1) among the ministers of Julian, quorum merita nôrat et fidem

62 The proceedings of this chamber of justice are related by Ammianus (xxii 3) and praised by Libanius (Orat Parent c 74, p 299 300)

63 Ursuli vero necem ipsa mihi videtur flêsse Justitia [Amm l c] Libanius, who imputes his death to the soldiers, attempts to criminate the count of the largesses

64 Such respect was still entertained for the venerable names of the commonwealth, that the public was surprised and scandalised to hear Taurus summoned as a criminal under the consulship of Taurus The summons of his colleague Florentius was probably delayed till the commencement of the ensuing year

65 Ammian xxii 7

66 For the guilt and punishment of Artemius, see Julian (Epist x p 379) and Ammianus (xxii. 11, and Vales, ad loc) The merit of Artemius, who demolished temples, and was put to death by an apostate, has tempted the Greek and Latin churches to honour him as a martyr But as ecclesiastical history attests that he was not only a tyrant but an Arian it is not altogether easy to justify this indiscreet promotion Tillemont Mém. Eccles tom vii p 1319

67 See Ammian xxii 6 and Vales ad locum and the Codex Theodosianus l ii tit xxix leg 1 and Godefroy s Commentary tom. i p 218 ad locum

68 The president Montesquieu (Considérations sur la Grandeur etc des Romains c xiv in his works tom iii p 448 449) excuses this minute and absurd tyranny by supposing that actions the most indifferent in our eyes might excite in a Roman mind the idea of guilt and danger This strange apology is supported by a strange misapprehension of the English laws chez une nation ou il est défendu de boire à la santé d une certaine personne

69 The clemency of Julian and the conspiracy which was formed against his life at Antioch are described by Ammianus (xxii 9 10 and Vales ad loc) and Libanius (Orat Parent c 99 p 323)

70 According to some says Aristotle (as he is quoted by Julian ad Themist p 261) the form of absolute government the παμβασιλεία is contrary to nature Both the prince and the philosopher choose however to involve this eternal truth in artful and laboured obscurity

71 That sentiment is expressed almost in the words of Julian himself Ammian xxii 10

72 Libanius (Orat Parent c 95 p 330) who mentions the wish and design of Julian insinuates in mysterious language (θεων οὕτω γ ὄντων ἀλλ ἢ ἀμείνω ὁ κωλύων) that the emperor was restrained by some particular revelation

73 Julian in Misopogon p 343 As he never abolished by any public law the proud appellations of Despot or Dominus they are still extant on his medals (Ducange Fam. Byzantin p 38 39) and the private displeasure which he affected to express only gave a different tone to the servility of the court The Abbé de la Bléterie (Hist de Jovien tom ii p 99–102) has curiously traced the origin and progress of the word Dominus under the Imperial government

74 Ammian xxii 7 The consul Mamertinus (in Panegyr Vet xi [x] 28 29 30) celebrates the auspicious day like an eloquent slave astonished and intoxicated by the condescension of his master

75 Personal satire was condemned by the laws of the twelve tables —

> Si mala condiderit in quem quis carmina jus est
> Judiciumque ———
> Horat Sat ii 1 82

Julian (in Misopogon p 337) owns himself subject to the law and the Abbé de la Bléterie (Hist de Jovien tom ii p 92) has eagerly embraced a declaration so agreeable to his own system and indeed to the true spirit of the Imperial constitution

76 Zosimus l. iii. [c. 11] p 158

77 Η της βουλης ἰσχυς ψυχη πόλεως ἐστιν See Libanius (Orat Parent c 71 p 296) Ammianus (xxii 9) and the Theodosian Code (l xii tit. i leg 50 55) with Godefroy s Commentary (tom. iv p 390–402) Yet the whole subject of the Curia, notwithstanding very ample materials still remains the most obscure in the legal history of the empire

78 Quæ paulo ante arida et siti anhelantia visebantur ea nunc perlui mundari madere Fora, Deambulacra Gymnasia lætis et gaudentibus populis frequentari dies festos et celebrari veteres, et novos in honorem principis consecrari (Mamertin xi [x] 9) He particularly restored the city of Nicopolis and the Actiac games which had been instituted by Augustus

79 Julian Epist xxxv p 407–411 This epistle which illustrates the declining age of Greece is omitted by the Abbé de la Bléterie and strangely disfigured by the Latin translator who by rendering ἀτέλεια tributum and ἰδιωται populus directly contradicts the sense of the original

80 He reigned in Mycenæ at the distance of fifty stadia or six miles from Argos but those cities which alternately flourished are confounded by the Greek poets Strabo l viii p 579 edit. Amstel 1707 [p 377 edit Casaub]

81 Marsham Canon Chron p 421 This pedigree from Temenus and Hercules may be suspicious yet it was allowed after a strict inquiry by the judges of the Olympic games (Herodot l v c 22) at a time when the Macedonian kings were obscure and unpopular in Greece When the Achæan league declared against Philip it was thought decent that the deputies of Argos should retire (T Liv xxxii 22)

82 His eloquence is celebrated by Libanius (Orat Parent c 75 76 p 300 301) who distinctly mentions the orators of Homer Socrates (L iii c 1) has rashly asserted that Julian was the only prince since Julius Cæsar who harangued the senate All the predecessors of Nero (Tacit Annal. xiii 3) and many of his successors possessed the faculty of speaking in public and it might be proved by various examples that they frequently exercised it in the senate

83 Ammianus (xxii 10) has impartially stated the merits and defects of his judicial proceedings. Libanius (Orat Parent c. 90 91 p 315, etc) has seen only the fair side and his picture if it flatters the person expresses at least the duties of the judge Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 120) who suppresses the virtues and exaggerates even the venial faults of the Apostate triumphantly asks. Whether such a judge was fit to be seated between Minos and Rhadamanthus in the Elysian fields.

84 Of the laws which Julian enacted in a reign of sixteen months fifty four have been admitted into the codes of Theodosius and Justinian (Gothofred Chron Legum. p 64–67) The Abbé de la Bléterie (tom ii p 329–336) has chosen one of these laws to give an idea of Julian s Latin style, which is forcible and elaborate, but less pure than his Greek 85 Ductor fortissimus armis,

Conditor et legum celeberrimus, ore manuque
Consultor patriæ, sed non consultor habendæ
Religionis, amans tercentûm millia Divûm
Perfidus ille Deo, quamvis non perfidus orbi

Prudent Apotheosis, 450, etc

The consciousness of a generous sentiment seems to have raised the Christian poet above his usual mediocrity

Chapter XXIII

1 I shall transcribe some of his own expressions from a short religious discourse which the Imperial pontiff composed to censure the bold impiety of a Cynic Αλλ ὅμως οὕτω δη τι τους θεους πεφρικα, καὶ φιλῶ καὶ σέβω, καὶ ἄζομαι, καὶ πάνθ απλῶς τα τοιαῦτα προς αὐτους πασχω, ὅσαπερ αν τις καὶ οἷα πρὸς ἀγαθους δεσποτας, πρὸς διδασκαλους, πρὸς πατερας, πρὸς κηδεμόνας Orat vii p 212 The variety and copiousness of the Greek tongue seems inadequate to the fervour of his devotion

2 The orator, with some eloquence, much enthusiasm, and more vanity, addresses his discourse to heaven and earth, to men and angels, to the living and the dead, and above all, to the great Constantius (εἰ τις αἴσθησις, an odd Pagan expression) He concludes with a bold assurance that he has erected a monument not less durable, and much more portable, than the Columns of Hercules See Greg Nazianzen, Orat iii p 50, iv p 134.

3 See this long invective, which has been injudiciously divided into two orations in Gregory's Works, tom i p 49–134, Paris, 1630 It was published by Gregory and his friend Basil (iv p 133), about six months after the death of Julian, when his remains had been carried to Tarsus (iv p 120), but while Jovian was still on the throne (iii p 54, iv p 117) I have derived much assistance from a French version and remarks, printed at Lyons 1735

4 Nicomediæ ab Eusebio educatus Episcopo, quem genere longius contingebat (Ammian xxii 9) Julian never expresses any gratitude towards that Arian prelate, but he celebrates his preceptor the eunuch Mardonius, and describes his mode of education, which inspired his pupil with a passionate admiration for the genius, and perhaps the religion, of Homer Misopogon, p 351, 352

5 Greg Naz iii p 70 He laboured to efface that holy mark in the blood, perhaps, of a Taurobolium Baron Annal Eccles A D 361, No 3, 4

6 Julian himself (Epist li p 434) assures the Alexandrians that he had been a Christian (he must mean a sincere one) till the twentieth year of his age

7 See his Christian, and even ecclesiastical education, in Gregory (iii p 58), Socrates (l iii c 1), and Sozomen (l v c 2) He escaped very narrowly from being a bishop, and perhaps a saint

8 The share of the work which had been allotted to Gallus was prosecuted with vigour and success, but the earth obstinately rejected and subverted the structures which were imposed by the sacrilegious hand of Julian Greg iii p 59, 60, 61 Such a partial earthquake, attested by many living spectators, would form one of the clearest miracles in ecclesiastical story

9 The philosopher (Fragment, p 288) ridicules the iron chains, etc , of these solitary fanatics (see Tillemont, Mem Ecclés tom ix p 661, 662), who had forgot that man is by nature a gentle and social animal, ἀνθρωπου φύσει πολιτικοῦ ζώου καὶ ἡμέρου The Pagan supposes that because they had renounced the gods, they were possessed and tormented by evil dæmons

10 See Julian apud Cyril l vi p 206, l viii p 253, 262 "You persecute," says he, "those heretics who do not mourn the dead man precisely in the way which you approve" He shows himself a tolerable theologian, but he maintains that the Christian Trinity is not derived from the doctrine of Paul, of Jesus, or of Moses

11 Libanius, Orat Parentalis, c 9, 10, p 232, etc Greg Nazianzen, Orat iii p 61 Eunap Vit Sophist in Maximo, p 88 seq, edit Commelin [1596]

12 A modern philosopher has ingeniously compared the different operation of theism and polytheism, with regard to the doubt or conviction which they produce in the human mind See Hume's Essays, vol ii p 444–457, in 8vo edit 1777

13 The Idæan mother landed in Italy about the end of the second Punic war The miracle of Claudia, either virgin or matron, who cleared her fame by disgracing the graver modesty of the Roman ladies, is attested by a cloud of witnesses Their evidence is collected by Drakenborch (ad Silium Italicum, xvii 33) but we may observe that Livy (xxix 14) slides over the transaction with discreet ambiguity

14 I cannot refrain from transcribing the emphatical words of Julian ἐμοὶ δὲ δοκεῖ ταῖς πόλεσι πιστεύειν μᾶλλον τὰ τοιαῦτα ἢ τουτοισὶ τοῖς κομψοῖς ὧν τὸ ψυχάριον δριμὺ μὲν ὑγιὲς δὲ οὐδὲ ἓν βλέπει. Orat v p 161 Julian likewise declares his firm belief in the ancilia the holy shields, which dropped from heaven on the Quirinal hill and pities the strange blindness of the Christians who preferred the cross to these celestial trophies. Apud Cyril l. vi p 191

15 See the principles of allegory in Julian (Orat vii p 216 222) His reasoning is less absurd than that of some modern theologians who assert that an extravagant or contradictory doctrine must be divine since no man alive could have thought of inventing it

16 Eunapius has made these sophists the subject of a partial and fanatical history and the learned Brucker (Hist Philosoph tom ii p 217–303) has employed much labour to illustrate their obscure lives and incomprehensible doctrines

17 Julian Orat vii p 222 He swears with the most fervent and enthusiastic devotion and trembles lest he should betray too much of these holy mysteries which the profane might deride with an impious Sardonic laugh

18 See the fifth oration of Julian But all the allegories which ever issued from the Platonic school are not worth the short poem of Catullus on the same extraordinary subject The transition of Atys from the wildest enthusiasm to sober pathetic complaint for his irretrievable loss must inspire a man with pity an eunuch with despair

19 The true religion of Julian may be deduced from the Cæsars p 308 with Spanheim s notes and illustrations from the fragments in Cyril l ii p 57 58 and especially from the theological oration in Solem Regem p 130–158 addressed in the confidence of friendship to the præfect Sallust

20 Julian adopts this gross conception by ascribing it to his favourite Marcus Antoninus (Cæsares p 333) The Stoics and Platonists hesitated between the analogy of bodies and the purity of spirits yet the gravest philosophers inclined to the whimsical fancy of Aristophanes and Lucian that an unbelieving age might starve the immortal gods See Observations de Spanheim p 284 444 etc

21 Ἥλιο λέγω τὸ ζῶ ἄγαλμα καὶ ἔμψυχον καὶ ἔ νουν ι ἀγαθοεργὸ τ υ νοητο πατρὸς Julian Epist li. [p 434] In another place (apud Cyril. l ii p 69) he calls the sun God, and the throne of God Julian believed the Platonician Trinity and only blames the Christians for preferring a mortal to an immortal Logos

22 The sophists of Eunapius perform as many miracles as the saints of the desert and the only circumstance in their favour is that they are of a less gloomy complexion Instead of devils with horns and tails Iamblichus evoked the genii of love Eros and Anteros from two adjacent fountains Two beautiful boys issued from the water fondly embraced him as their father and retired at his command P 26 27

23. The dexterous management of these sophists, who played their credulous pupil into each other s hands is fairly told by Eunapius [in Max imo p 85 seqq ed Commel] with unsuspecting simplicity The Abbé de la Bléterie understands and neatly describes, the whole comedy (Vie de Julian p 61–67)

24. When Julian in a momentary panic made the sign of the cross the demons instantly disappeared (Greg Naz Orat iii p 71) Gregory supposes that they were frightened but the priests declared that they were indignant The reader according to the measure of his faith will determine this profound question

25 A dark and distant view of the terrors and joys of initiation is shown by Dion Chrysostom, Themistius Proclus and Stobæus The learned author of the Divine Legation has exhibited their words (vol 1 p 239 247 248 280 edit 1765) which he dexterously or forcibly applies to his own hypothesis

26 Julian s modesty confined him to obscure and occasional hints but Libanius expatiates with pleasure on the fasts and visions of the religious hero (Legat ad Julian p 157 and Orat. Parental c lxxxiii p 309 310)

27 Libanius Orat Parent c x p 233 234. Gallus had some reason to suspect the secret apostasy of his brother and in a letter which may be received as genuine he exhorts Julian to adhere to the religion of their ancestors an argument which, as it should seem was not yet perfectly ripe See Julian Op p 454 [ed Spanheim Lips 1696], and Hist de Jovien tom. ii p 141

28 Gregory (iii p 50) with inhuman zeal censures Constantius for sparing the infant apostate (κάκως σωθέ τα) His French translator (p 65) cautiously observes that such expressions must not be prises à la lettre

29 Libanius Orat Parental c ix p 233

30 Fabricius (Biblioth Græc l v c viii p. 88–90) and Lardner (Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 44–47) have accurately compiled all that can now be discovered of Julian s work against the Christians

31 About seventy years after the death of Julian he executed a task which had been feebly attempted by Philip of Side a prolix and contemptible writer Even the work of Cyril has not entirely satisfied the most favourable judges and the Abbé de la Bléterie (Préface à l Hist de Jovien p 30, 31) wish s that some th ologien philosophe (a strange centaur) would undertake the refutation of Julian.

32 Libanius (Orat Parental. c lxxxvii p 313) who has been suspected of assisting his friend prefers this divine vindication (Orat ix in necem Julian p 257 edit Morel.) to the writings of Porphyry His judgment may be arraigned (Socrates, l iii c 23) but Libanius cannot be accused of flattery to a dead prince

33 Libanius (Orat Parent c lviii p 283 284) has eloquently explained the tolerating principles and conduct of his Imperial friend In a very remarkable epistle to the people of Bostra Julian himself (Epist lii [p 436]) professes his moderation and betrays his zeal which is acknowledged by Ammianus and exposed by Gregory (Orat iii p 72)

of Constantius! (Liban Orat Parent c 55, p 280), and Julian declares himself a Pagan in his public manifesto to the Athenians This unquestionable evidence may correct the hasty assertion of Ammianus, who seems to suppose Constantinople to be the place where he discovered his attachment to the gods

35 Ammianus, xxii 5 Sozomen, l v c 5 Bestia moritur, tranquillitas redit omnes episcopi qui de propriis sedibus fuerant exterminati per indulgentiam novi principis ad ecclesias redeunt Jerom adversus Luciferianos, tom ii p 143 [tom ii p 191, ed Vallars] Optatus accuses the Donatists for owing their safety to an apostate (l ii c 16, p 36, 37, edit Dupin)

36 The restoration of the Pagan worship is described by Julian (Misopogon, p 346), Libanius (Orat Parent c 60, p 286, 287, and Orat Consular ad Julian p 245, 246, edit Morel), Ammianus (xxii 12), and Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 121) These writers agree in the essential, and even minute, facts, but the different lights in which they view the extreme devotion of Julian are expressive of the gradations of self applause, passionate admiration, mild reproof, and partial invective

37 See Julian Epistol xlix lxii lxiii, and a long and curious fragment, without beginning or end (p 288–305) The supreme pontiff derides the Mosaic history and the Christian discipline, prefers the Greek poets to the Hebrew prophets, and palliates, with the skill of a Jesuit, the relative worship of images

38 The exultation of Julian (p 301) that these impious sects, and even their writings, are extinguished, may be consistent enough with the sacerdotal character, but it is unworthy of a philosopher to wish that any opinions and arguments the most repugnant to his own should be concealed from the knowledge of mankind

39 Yet he insinuates that the Christians, under the pretence of charity, inveigled children from their religion and parents, conveyed them on shipboard, and devoted those victims to a life of poverty or servitude in a remote country (p 305) Had the charge been proved, it was his duty not to complain but to punish

40 Gregory Nazianzen is facetious, ingenious, and argumentative (Orat iii p 101, 102, etc) He ridicules the folly of such vain imitation, and amuses himself with inquiring what lessons, moral or theological, could be extracted from the Grecian fables

41 He accuses one of his pontiffs of a secret confederacy with the Christian bishops and presbyters (Epist lxii) Ὁρῶν οὖν πολλὴν μὲν ὀλιγωρίαν οὖσαν ἡμῖν πρὸς τοὺς θεοὺς, and again, ἡμᾶς δὲ οὕτω ῥαθύμως etc Epist lxiii

42 He praises the fidelity of Callixene priestess of Ceres, who had been twice as constant as Penelope, and rewards her with the priesthood of the Phrygian goddess at Pessinus (Julian Epist xxi [p 389]) He applauds the firmness of Sopater of Hierapolis, who had been repeatedly pressed by Constantius and Gallus to apostatise (Epist xxvii p 401)

43 Ὁ δὲ νομίζων ἀδελφὰ λόγους τε καὶ θεῶν ἱερά Orat Parent c 77, p 302 The same sentiment is frequently inculcated by Julian, Libanius, and the rest of their party

44 The curiosity and credulity of the emperor, who tried every mode of divination, are fairly exposed by Ammianus, xxii 12

45 Julian Epist xxxviii Three other epistles (xv xvi xxxix), in the same style of friendship and confidence, are addressed to the philosopher Maximus

46 Eunapius (in Maximo, p 77, 78, 79, and in Chrysanthio, p 147, 148 [p 94 sqq and 191 sqq , ed Comm]) has minutely related these anecdotes, which he conceives to be the most important events of the age Yet he fairly confesses the frailty of Maximus His reception at Constantinople is described by Libanius (Orat Parent c 76, p 301) and Ammianus (xxii 7)

47 Chrysanthius, who had refused to quit Lydia, was created high-priest of the province His cautious and temperate use of power secured him after the revolution and he lived in peace, while Maximus, Priscus, etc , were persecuted by the Christian ministers See the adventures of those fanatic sophists, collected by Brucker, tom ii p 281–293

48 See Libanius (Orat Parent c 100, 101, p 324, 325, 326) and Eunapius (Vit Sophist in Proæresio, p 126 [p 160, ed Comm]) Some students, whose expectations perhaps were groundless or extravagant, retired in disgust (Greg Naz Orat iv p 120) It is strange that we should not be able to contradict the title of one of Tillemont's chapters (Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 960), "La Cour de Julien est pleine de philosophes et de gens perdus"

49 Under the reign of Louis XIV his subjects of every rank aspired to the glorious title of Convertisseur, expressive of their zeal and success in making proselytes The word and the idea are growing obsolete in France, may they never be introduced into England!

50 See the strong expressions of Libanius, which were probably those of Julian himself (Orat Parent c. 59, p 285)

51 When Gregory Nazianzen (Orat x p 167) is desirous to magnify the Christian firmness of his brother Cæsarius physician to the Imperial court he owns that Cæsarius disputed with a formidable adversary, πολὺν ἐν ὅπλοις καὶ μέγαν ἐν λόγων δεινότητι In his invectives he scarcely allows any share of wit or courage to the apostate

54 Julian s epistle (xxv) is addressed to the community of the J ws Aldus (Venet 1499) has branded it with an εἰ γνησ ον but this stigma is justly removed by the subsequent editors Petavius and Spanheim The epistle is mentioned by Sozomen (l v c 22) and the purport of it is confirmed by Gregory (Orat iv p 111) and by Julian himself (Fragment p 295)

60 I have consulted a rare and curious treatise of M d Anville (sur l Ancienne Jérusalem Paris 1747 p. 75) The circumference of the ancient city (Euseb Preparat Evangel l ix. c 36) was 27 stadia or 2550 toises A plan taken on the spot assigns no more than 1980 for the modern town The circuit is defined by natural landmarks which cannot be mistaken or removed

63 The Itinerary from Bordeaux to Jerusalem was composed in the year 333 for the use of pil grims among whom Jerom (tom i p 126) men tions the Britons and the Indians The causes of this superstitious fashion are discussed in the learned and judicious preface of Wesseling (Itinerar p 537–545)

64 Cicero (de Finibus v 1) has beautifully expressed the common s nse of mankind

65 Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 326 No 42–50) and Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 8–16) are the historians and champions of the miraculous invention of the cross under the reign of Constantine Their oldest witnesses are Paulinus, Sulpicius Severus Rufinus Ambrose and perhaps Cyril of Jerusalem The silence of Eusebius and the Bordeaux pilgrim which satisfies those who think perplexes those who believe See Jortin s sensible remarks vol ii p 238–248

66 This multiplication is asserted by Paulinus (Epist xxxvi see Dupin Bibliot Ecclés tom. iii. p 149) who seems to have improved a rhetorical flourish of Cyril into a real fact The same supernatural privilege must have been communicated to the Virgin s milk (Erasmi Opera tom i. p 778 Lugd Batav 1703 in Colloq de Peregrinat Religionis ergo) saints heads etc and other relics, which are repeated in so many different churches.

67 Jerom (tom i p 103) who resided in the neighbouring village of Bethl hem describes the vices of Jerusalem from his personal experience

68 Gregor Nyssen apud Wesseling p 539 The whole epistle which condemns either the use or the abuse of religious pilgrimage is painful to the catholic divines while it is dear and familiar to our protestant polemics

69 He renounced his orthodox ordination officiated as a deacon and was re-ordained by the hands of the Arians But Cyril afterwards changed with the times and prudently conformed to the Nicene faith Tillemont (Mém Ecclés. tom. viii.) who treats his memory with tenderness and respect has thrown his virtues into the text and his faults into the notes in decent obscurity at the end of the volume

70 Imperii sui memoriam magnitudine operum gestiens propagare Ammian xxiii 1 The temple of Jerusalem had been famous even among the Gentiles They had many temples in each city (at Sichem five at Gaza eight at Rome four hundred and twenty four) but the wealth and religion of the Jewish nation was centred in one spot.

71 The secret intentions of Julian are revealed by the late bishop of Gloucester the learned and dogmatic Warburton who with the authority of a theologian prescribes the motives and conduct of the Supreme Being The discourse entitled Julian (2nd edition London 1751) is strongly marked with all the peculiarities which are imputed to the Warburtonian school

72 I shelter myself behind Maimonides, Marsham Spencer Le Clerc Warburton etc., who have fairly derided the f ars the folly and the falsehood of some superstitious divines. See Div ine Legation vol iv p 25 etc

lxiii) with still higher reverence He doubly condemns the Christians, for believing and for renouncing the religion of the Jews Their Deity was a true, but not the only, God Apud Cyril l ix p 305, 306

77 Built by Omar, the second khalif, who died A D 644 This great mosque covers the whole consecrated ground of the Jewish temple, and constitutes almost a square of 760 toises, or one Roman mile, in circumference See d'Anville, Jerusalem, p 45

78 Ammianus records the consuls of the year 363, before he proceeds to mention the thoughts of Julian Templum instaurare sumptibus cogitabat immodicis Warburton has a secret wish to anticipate the design, but he must have understood, from former examples, that the execution of such a work would have demanded many years

79 The subsequent witnesses, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Philostorgius, etc , add contradictions rather than authority Compare the objections of Basnage (Hist des Juifs, tom viii p 157–168) with Warburton's answers (Julian, p 174–258) The bishop has ingeniously explained the miraculous crosses which appeared on the garments of the spectators by a similar instance and the natural effects of lightning

80 Ambros tom ii Epist xl p 946, edit Benedictin He composed this fanatic epistle (A D 388) to justify a bishop who had been condemned by the civil magistrate for burning a synagogue

81 Chrysostom, tom i p 580, advers Judæos et Gentes [c 16], tom ii p 574, de Sto Babylâ [c 22] edit Montfaucon I have followed the common and natural supposition, but the learned Benedictine, who dates the composition of these sermons in the year 383, is confident they were never pronounced from the pulpit

84 Dr Lardner, perhaps alone of the Christian critics, presumes to doubt the truth of this famous miracle (Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 47–71) The silence of Jerom would lead to a suspicion that the same story which was celebrated at a distance might be despised on the spot

85 Greg Naz Orat iii p 81 And this law was confirmed by the invariable practice of Julian himself Warburton has justly observed (p 35) that the Platonists believed in the mysterious virtue of words, and Julian's dislike for the name of Christ might proceed from superstition as well as from contempt

86 Fragment Julian p 288 He derides the μωρία Γαλιλαίων (Epist vii) and so far loses sight of the principles of toleration as to wish (Epist xlii [p 424]) ἄκοντας ἰᾶσθαι

87 Οὐ γάρ μοι θέμις ἐστὶ κομιζέμεν ἢ ἐλεαίρειν
Ἀνέρας οἵ κε θεοῖσιν ἀπέχθωντ᾽ ἀθανάτοισιν

These two lines, which Julian has changed and perverted in the true spirit of a bigot (Epist xlix [p 432]), are taken from the speech of Æolus, when he refuses to grant Ulysses a fresh supply of winds (Odyss x 73) Libanius (Orat Parent c lix p 286) attempts to justify this partial behaviour by an apology, in which persecution peeps through the mask of candour

88 These laws, which affected the clergy, may be found in the slight hints of Julian himself (Epist lii [p 433, sqq]), in the vague declamations of Gregory (Orat iii p 86, 87), and in the positive assertions of Sozomen (l v c 5)

89 Inclemens perenni obruendum silentio Ammian xxii 10, xxv 5

90 The edict itself, which is still extant among the epistles of Julian (xlii [p 422]), may be compared with the loose invectives of Gregory (Orat iii p 96) Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom vii p 1291–1294) has collected the seeming differences of ancients and moderns They may be easily reconciled The Christians were directly forbid to teach, they were indirectly forbid to learn since they would not frequent the schools of the Pagans

93 They had recourse to the expedient of composing books for their own schools Within a few months Apollinaris produced his Christian tions of Homer (a sacred history in xxiv books) Pindar Euripides and Menander and Sozomen is satisfied that they equalled or excelled the originals

94 It was the instruction of Julian to his magistrates (Epist vii) προτιμᾶσθαι μέ τοι τοὺς θεοσεβεῖς καὶ πάνυ φημὶ δεῖν Sozomen (l v c 18) and Socrates (l. iii c 13) must be reduced to the standard of Gregory (Orat iii p 95) not less prone to exaggeration but more restrained by the actual knowledge of his contemporary readers

95 Ψήφῳ θεῶν καὶ διδοὺς καὶ μὴ διδοὺς Libanius Orat. Parent c 88 p 314.

96 Greg Naz Orat iii p 74 91 92 Socrates l. iii c 14 Theodoret, l iii c 6 Some drawback may however be allowed for the violence of their zeal not less partial than the zeal of Julian

97 If we compare the gentle language of Libanius (Orat Parent c 60 p 286) with the passionate exclamations of Gregory (Orat iii p 86 87) we may find it difficult to persuade ourselves that the two orators are really describing the same events

98 Restan or Arethusa at the equal distance of sixteen miles between Emesa (Hems) and Epiphania (Hamath) was founded or at least named by Seleucus Nicator Its peculiar era dates from the year of Rome 685 according to the medals of the city In the decline of the Seleucides Emesa and Arethusa were usurped by the Arab Sampsiceramus whose posterity the vassals of Rome were not extinguished in the reign of Vespasian See d Anville s Maps and Géographie Ancienne tom ii p 134 Wesseling Itineraria p 188 and Noris Epoch Syro-Macedon. p 80 481 482

99 Sozomen l. v c 10. It is surprising that Gregory and Theodoret should suppress a circumstance which in their eyes must have enhanced the religious merit of the confessor

100 The sufferings and constancy of Mark which Gregory has so tragically painted (Orat. iii p 88-91) are confirmed by the unexceptionable and reluctant evidence of Libanius Μάρκος ἐκεῖνος ρεμάμενος καὶ μαστιγούμενος αἱ τ υ πώγωνος αὐτῷ τιλλομένου πάντα ἐνεγκὼν ἀνδρείως νυ ἰσόθεός ἐστι ταῖς τιμαῖς κἂν φανῇ που περιμάχητος εὐθύς Epist 730 p 350 351 Edit. Wolf Amstel 1738

101 Π εριμάχητος certatim eum sibi (Christiani) vindicant It is thus that La Croze and Wolfius (ad loc.) have explained a Greek word whose true signification had been mistaken by former interpreters and even by Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne tom. iii. p 371) Yet Tillemont is strangely puzzled to understand (Mém. Ecclés. tom. vii p 1309) how Gregory and Theodoret could mistake a Semi Arian bishop for a saint

102 See the probable advice of Sallust (Greg Nazianzen, Orat iii. 90 91) Libanius intercedes for a similar offender lest they should find many Marks yet he allows that if Orion had secreted the consecrated wealth, he deserved to suffer the punishment of Marsyas—to be flayed alive (Epist. 730 p 349-351)

103 Gregory (Orat iii p 90) is satisfied that, by saving the apostate Mark had deserved still more than he had suffered

104 The grove and temple of Daphne are described by Strabo (l xvi p 1089 1090, edit. Amstel 1707 [p 750 ed Casaub]) Libanius (Nænia, p 185-188 Antiochic Orat xi p 380, 381 [ed. Morell 1627]) and Sozomen (l v c 19) Wesseling (Itinerar p 581) and Casaubon (ad Hist. August p 64) illustrate this curious subject.

106 Hadrian read the history of his future fortunes on a leaf dipped in the Castalian stream a trick which according to the physician Vandale (de Oraculis p 281 282) might be easily performed by chemical preparations The emperor stopped the source of such dangerous knowledge which was again opened by the devout curiosity of Julian

107 It was purchased A D 44 in the year 92 of the era of Antioch (Noris Epoch Syro-Maced. p. 139-174) for the term of ninety Olympiads. But the Olympic games of Antioch were not regularly celebrated till the reign of Commodus See the curious details in the Chronicle of John Malala (tom i p 291 320 372-381 [ed Oxon p. 225, 248 and 283 sqq ed Bonn]) a writer whose merit and authority are confined within the limits of his native city

111 Julian (Misopogon p 361 362) discovers his own character with that naiveté that unconscious simplicity which always constitutes genuine humour

112 Babylas is named by Eusebius in the succession of the bishops of Antioch (Hist Eccles. l vi c 29 39) His triumph over two emperors (the first fabulous the second historical) is diffusely celebrated by Chrysostom (tom ii p. 536-5.. edit. Montfaucon) Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés. tom.

iii. part ii p 287–302, 459–465) becomes almost a sceptic

113 Ecclesiastical critics, particularly those who love relics, exult in the confession of Julian (Misopogon, p 361) and Libanius (Nænia, p 185) that Apollo was disturbed by the vicinity of one dead man Yet Ammianus (xxii 12) clears and purifies the whole ground, according to the rites which the Athenians formerly practised in the isle of Delos

114. Julian (in Misopogon, p 361) rather insinuates than affirms their guilt Ammianus (xxii 13) treats the imputation as levissimus rumor, and relates the story with extraordinary candour

115 Quo tam atroci casû repente consumpto, ad id usque imperatoris ira provexit, ut quæstiones agitari juberet solito acriores (yet Julian blames the lenity of the magistrates of Antioch), et majorem ecclesiam Antiochiæ claudi [Amm 1 c] This interdiction was performed with some circumstances of indignity and profanation and the seasonable death of the principal actor, Julian's uncle, is related with much superstitious complacency by the Abbé de la Bleterie, Vie de Julien, p 362–369

116 Besides the ecclesiastical historians, who are more or less to be suspected, we may allege the passion of St Theodore, in the Acta Sincera of Ruinart, p 591 The complaint of Julian gives it an original and authentic air

118 See Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iii. p 87) Sozomen (l v c 9) may be considered as an original, though not impartial, witness He was a native of Gaza, and had conversed with the confessor Zeno, who, as bishop of Maiuma, lived to the age of an hundred (l vii c 28) Philostorgius (l vii. c 4, with Godefroy's Dissertations, p 284) adds some tragic circumstances of Christians who were literally sacrificed at the altars of the gods, etc

119. The life and death of George of Cappadocia are described by Ammianus (xxii 11), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxi p 382, 385, 389, 390), and Epiphanius (Hæres lxxvi [p 912, ed Paris, 1622]) The invectives of the two saints might not deserve much credit, unless they were confirmed by the testimony of the cool and impartial infidel

120 After the massacre of George, the emperor Julian repeatedly sent orders to preserve the library for his own use, and to torture the slaves who might be suspected of secreting any books He praises the merit of the collection, from whence he had borrowed and transcribed several manuscripts while he pursued his studies in Cappadocia He could wish indeed that the works of the Galilæans might perish but he requires an exact account even of those theological volumes, lest other treatises more valuable should be confounded in their loss Julian Epist ix. xxxvi [p 377, 411]

123 Some Donatists (Optatus Milev p 60, 303, edit Dupin, and Tillemont, Mem Eccles tom vi p 713, in 4to) and Priscillianists (Tillemont, Mem Eccles tom viii p 517, in 4to) have in like manner usurped the honours of catholic saints and martyrs

124. The saints of Cappadocia, Basil and the Gregories, were ignorant of their holy companion Pope Gelasius (A.D 494), the first catholic who acknowledges St George, places him among the martyrs "qui Deo magis quam hominibus noti sunt" He rejects his Acts as the composition of heretics Some, perhaps not the oldest, of the spurious Acts are still extant and, through a cloud of fiction, we may yet distinguish the combat which St George of Cappadocia sustained, in the presence of Queen Alexandra, against the magician Athanasius

125 This transformation is not given as absolutely certain, but as extremely probable See the Longueruana, tom i p 194.

126 A curious history of the worship of St George, from the sixth century (when he was already revered in Palestine in Armenia at Rome, and at Treves in Gaul), might be extracted from Dr Heylin (History of St George, 2nd edition, London, 1633 in 4to p 429) and the Bollandists (Act SS Mens April tom iii p 100–163) His fame and popularity in Europe and especially in England, proceeded from the Crusades

130 I have not leisure to follow the blind obstinacy of Lucifer of Cagliari See his adventures in Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 900–926), and observe how the colour of the narrative insensibly changes, as the confessor becomes a schismatic.

131 Assensus est huic sententiæ Occidens et, per tam necessarium concilium, Satanæ faucibus mundus ereptus. The lively and artful dialogue of Jerom against the Luciferians (tom ii p 135–155 [tom ii p 193, ed Vallars]) exhibits an original picture of the ecclesiastical policy of the times.

132 Tillemont, who supposes that George was massacred in August, crowds the actions of Athanasius into a narrow space (Mém Ecclés tom. viii p 360) An original fragment, published by the Marquis Maffei, from the old Chapter Library of Verona (Osservazioni Letterarie tom iii p 60–92) affords many important dates which are authenticated by the computation of Egyptian months

138 Julian determined a lawsuit against the new Christian city at Maiuma the port of Gaza and his sentence though it might be imputed to bigotry was never reversed by his successors. Sozomen l v c 3 Reland Palestin tom ii. p 791

139 Gregory (Orat iii p 93 94 95 Orat iv p 114) pretends to speak from the information of Julian s confidants whom Orosius (vii 30) could not have seen

140 Gregory (Orat iii p 91) charges th Apostate with secret sacrifices of boys and girls and positively affirms that the dead bodies were thrown into the Orontes See Theodoret l iii. c 26 27 and the equivocal candour of the Abbé de la Bléterie Vie de Julien p 351 352 Yet contemporary malice could not impute to Julian the troops of martyrs more especially in the West which Baronius so greedily swallows and Tillemont so faintly rejects (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 1295 1315)

141 The resignation of Gregory is truly edifying (Orat iv p 123 124) Yet when an officer of Julian attempted to seize the church of Nazianzus, he would have lost his life if he had not yielded to the zeal of the bishop and people (Orat xix. p. 308) See the reflections of Chrysostom as they are alleged by Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vii. p. 575)

Chapter XXIV

1 See this fable or satire p 306–336 of the Leipzig edition of Julian s works The French version of the learned Ezekiel Spanheim (Paris 1683) is coarse languid and correct and his notes proofs illustrations etc are piled on each other till they form a mass of 557 close printed quarto pages The Abbé de la Bléterie (Vie de Jovien tom i p 241–393) has more happily expressed the spirit as well as the sense of the original which he illustrates with some concise and curious notes

2 Spanheim (in his preface) has most learnedly discussed the etymology origin resemblance and disagreement of the Greek satyrs a dramatic piece which was acted after the tragedy and the Latin sat res (from Satura) a miscellaneous composition either in prose or verse But the Cæsars of Julian are of such an original cast that the critic is perplexed to which class he should ascribe them

3 This mixed character of Silenus is finely painted in the sixth eclogue of Virgil

4 Every impartial reader must perceive and condemn the partiality of Julian against his uncle Constantine and the Christian religion On this occasion the interpreters are compelled by a more sacred interest to renounce their allegiance and to desert the cause of their author

5 Julian was secretly inclined to prefer a Greek to a Roman But when he seriously compared a hero with a philosopher he was sensible that mankind had much greater obligations to Socrates than to Alexander (Orat ad Themistium p 264)

6 Inde nationibus Indicis certatim cum donis optimates mittentibus ab usque Divis et Serendivis Ammian xxii 7 This island to which the names of Taprobana Serendib and Ceylon have been successively applied manifests how imperfectly the seas and lands to the east of Cape Comorin were known to the Romans 1 Under the reign of Claudius a freedman who farmed the customs of the Red Sea was accidentally driven by the winds upon this strange and undiscovered coast he conversed six months with the natives and the king of Ceylon who heard for the first time of the power and justice of Rome was persuaded to send an embassy to the emperor (Plin. Hist Nat vi 24) 2 The geographers (and even Ptolemy) have magnified above fifteen times the real size of this new world which they extended as far as the equator and the neighbourhood of China

7 These embassies had been sent to Constantius. Ammianus who unwarily deviates into gross flattery must have forgotten the length of the way and the short duration of the reign of Julian.

8 Gothos sæpe fallaces et perfidos hostes quærere se meliores aiebat illis enim sufficere merca

tores Galatas per quos ubique sine conditionis discrimine venumdantur [Ammian xxii 7] Within less than fifteen years these Gothic slaves threatened and subdued their masters

9 Alexander reminds his rival Cæsar, who depreciated the fame and merit of an Asiatic victory, that Crassus and Antony had felt the Persian arrows, and that the Romans, in a war of three hundred years, had not yet subdued the single province of Mesopotamia or Assyria (Cæsares, p 324)

10 The design of the Persian war is declared by Ammianus (xxii 7, 12), Libanius (Orat Parent c 79, 80, p 305, 306 [Fabric Bibl Græc ed Hamb 1715]), Zosimus (l iii [c 11] p 158), and Socrates (l iii c 19)

11 The Satire of Julian and the Homilies of St Chrysostom exhibit the same picture of Antioch The miniature which the Abbe de la Bléterie has copied from thence (Vie de Julian, p 332) is elegant and correct

12 Laodicea furnished charioteers, Tyre and Berytus, comedians, Cæsarea, pantomimes, Heliopolis, singers, Gaza, gladiators, Ascalon, wrestlers, and Castabala, rope dancers See the Expositio totius Mundi, p 6, in the third tome of Hudson's Minor Geographers

13 Χριστόν δὲ αγαπῶντες ἔχετε πολιοῦχον ἀντὶ του Διός The people of Antioch ingeniously professed their attachment to the Chi (Christ), and the Kappa (Constantius) Julian in Misopogon, p 357

14 The schism of Antioch, which lasted eighty-five years (A D 330–415), was inflamed, while Julian resided in that city, by the indiscreet ordination of Paulinus See Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom vii p 803 of the quarto edition (Paris, 1701, etc), which henceforward I shall quote

15 Julian states three different proportions, of five, ten, or fifteen modii of wheat, for one piece of gold, according to the degrees of plenty and scarcity (in Misopogon, p 369) From this fact, and from some collateral examples, I conclude that, under the successors of Constantine, the moderate price of wheat was about thirty two shillings the English quarter, which is equal to the average price of the sixty-four first years of the present century See Arbuthnot's Tables of Coins, Weights, and Measures, p 88, 89 Plin Hist Natur xviii 12 Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxviii p 718–721 Smith's Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, Bk I, ch 11 This last I am proud to quote, as the work of a sage and a friend

16 Nunquam a proposito declinabat, Galli similis fratris, licet incruentus Ammian xxii 14 The ignorance of the most enlightened princes may claim some excuse but we cannot be satisfied with Julian's own defence (in Misopogon, p 368, 369), or the elaborate apology of Libanius (Orat Parental c xcvii p 321)

17 Their short and easy confinement is gently touched by Libanius (Orat Parental c xcviii p 322, 323)

18 Libanius (ad Antiochenos de Imperatoris ira, c 17, 18, 19, in Fabricius, Biblioth Græc tom vii p 221–223), like a skilful advocate, severely censures the folly of the people, who suffered for the crime of a few obscure and drunken wretches

19 Libanius (ad Antiochen c vii p 213) reminds Antioch of the recent chastisement of Cæsarea, and even Julian (in Misopogon, p 355) insinuates how severely Tarentum had expiated the insult to the Roman ambassadors

20 On the subject of the Misopogon, see Ammianus (xxii 14), Libanius (Orat Parentalis, c xcix p 323), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 133 [ed Paris, 1609]), and the Chronicle of Antioch, by John Malala (tom ii p 15, 16 [ed Ox , p 328, ed Bonn]) I have essential obligations to the translation and notes of the Abbe de la Bleterie (Vie de Jovien, tom ii p 1 138)

21 Ammianus [l c] very justly remarks, Coactus dissimulare pro tempore irâ sufflabatur internâ The elaborate irony of Julian at length bursts forth into serious and direct invective

22 Ipse autem Antiochiam egressurus, Heliopoliten quendam Alexandrum Syriacæ jurisdictioni præfecit, turbulentum et sævum, dicebatque non illum meruisse, sed Antiochensibus avaris et contumeliosis hujusmodi judicem convenire Ammian xxiii 2 Libanius (Epist 722, p 346, 347 [ed Wolf Amst 1738]), who confesses to Julian him self that he had shared the general discontent, pretends that Alexander was an useful, though harsh, reformer of the manners and religion of Antioch

23 Julian, in Misopogon, p 364 Ammian xxiii 2, and Valesius ad loc Libanius in a professed oration, invites him to return to his loyal and penitent city of Antioch

24 Libanius, Orat Parent c vii p 230, 231

25 Eunapius reports that Libanius refused the honorary rank of Prætorian præfect, as less illustrious than the title of Sophist (in Vit Sophist p 135 [p 175, ed Comm]) The critics have observed a similar sentiment in one of the epistles (xviii [p 7] ed Wolf) of Libanius himself

26 Near two thousand of his letters—a mode of composition in which Libanius was thought to excel—are still extant, and already published The critics may praise their subtle and elegant brevity, yet Dr Bentley (Dissertation upon Phalaris, p 487) might justly though quaintly observe that "you feel, by the emptiness and deadness of them, that you converse with some dreaming pedant, with his elbow on his desk "

27 His birth is assigned to the year 314 He mentions [Ep 866] the seventy-sixth year of his age (A D 390), and seems to allude to some events of a still later date

28 Libanius has composed the vain prolix, but curious narrative of his own life (tom ii p 1–84 edit Morell), of which Eunapius (p 130–135) has left a concise and unfavourable account Among the moderns, Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom iv p 571–576), Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom vii p 376–414) and Lardner (Heathen Testimonies tom. iv p 127–163) have illustrated the character and writings of this famous sophist.

29 From Antioch to Litarbe on the territory of Chalcis the road over hills and through morasses was extremely bad and the loose stones were cemented only with sand (Julian Epist xxvii) It is singular enough that the Romans should have neglected the great communication between Antioch and the Euphrates See Wesseling Itinerar p 190 Bergier Hist des Grands Chemins tom ii p 100

30 Julian alludes to this incident (Epist xxvii) which is more distinctly related by Theodoret (l iii c 22) The intolerant spirit of the father is applauded by Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs tom iv p 534) and even by la Bléterie (Vie de Julien, p 413)

31 See the curious treatise de Deâ Syriâ inserted among the works of Lucian (tom iii p 451–490 edit Reitz) The singular appellation of Ninus vetus (Ammian xiv 8) might induce a suspicion that Hierapolis had been the royal seat of the Assyrians

32 Julian (Epist xxviii [xxvii]) kept a regular account of all the fortunate omens but he suppresses the inauspicious signs which Ammianus (xxiii 2) has carefully recorded

33 Julian Epist xxvii p 399–402

34 I take the earliest opportunity of acknowledging my obligations to M d Anville for his recent geography of the Euphrates and Tigris (Paris 1780 in 4to) which particularly illustrates the expedition of Julian [Hierapolis was about twenty two miles from the Euphrates]

35 There are three passages within a few miles of each other 1 Zeugma celebrated by the ancients 2 Bir frequented by the moderns and, 3 The bridge of Menbigz [Manbedj] or Hierapolis at the distance of four parasangs from the city

36 Haran or Carrhæ was the ancient residence of the Sabæans and of Abraham See the Index Geographicus of Schultens (ad calcem Vit Saladin) a work from which I have obtained much Oriental knowledge concerning the ancient and modern geography of Syria and the adjacent countries

37 See Xenophon, Cyropæd l iii. [c. 1 § 34] p 189 edit Hutchinson Artavasdes might have supplied Marc Antony with 16 000 horse armed and disciplined after the Parthian manner (Plutarch, in M Antonio [c 50] tom. v p 117)

38 Moses of Chorene (Hist Armeniac L iii. c 11 p 241 [ed. Whiston Lond 1736]) fixes his accession (A.D 354) to the 17th year of Constantius

39 Ammian xx. 11 Athanasius (tom i p 856) says, in general terms, that Constantius gave his brother's widow τοῖς βαρβάροις an expression more suitable to a Roman than a Christian.

40 Ammianus (xxiii. 2) uses a word much too soft for the occasion monuerat. Muratori (Fabricius Bibliothec Græc tom. vii, p. 86) has published an epistle from Julian to the satrap Arsaces fierce vulgar and (though it might deceive Sozomen, l vi c 5 [c 1]) most probably spurious La Bléterie (Hist. de Jovien tom. ii p 339) translates and rejects it

41 Latissimum flumen Euphraten artabat. Ammian xxiii 3 Somewhat higher at the fords of Thapsacus the river is four stadia or 800 yards almost half an English mile broad (Xenophon Anabasis l i [c 4 § 11] p 41 edit Hutchinson with Foster's Observations p 29 etc., in the second volume of Spelman's translation) If the breadth of the Euphrates at Bir and Zeugma is no more than 130 yards (Voyages de Niebuhr tom. ii. p. 335) the enormous difference must chiefly arise from the depth of the channel

42 Munimentum tutissimum et fabrè politum, cujus mœnia Abora (the Orientals aspirate Chaboras or Chabour) et Euphrates ambiunt flumina, velut spatium insulare fingentes Ammian xxiii. 5

43 The enterprise and armament of Julian are described by himself (Epist xxvii) Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii 3 4 5) Libanius (Orat Parent c 108 109 p 332 333) Zosimus (l iii [c. 11] p 160 161 162) Sozomen (l vi c 1) and John Malala (tom ii p 17 [ed Ox p 328 ed. Bonn])

44 Before he enters Persia Ammian is copiously describes (xxiii. 6 p 396–419 edit Gronov in 4to) the eighteen great satrapies or provinces (as far as the Seric or Chinese frontiers) which were subject to the Sassanides

45 Ammianus (xxiv 1) and Zosimus (l. iii. [c. 14] p 162 163) have accurately expressed the order of march

46 The adventures of Hormisdas are related with some mixture of fable (Zosimus l. ii. [c. 27] p 100–102 Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom. iv p 198) It is almost impossible that he should be the brother (frater germanus) of an eldest and posthumous child nor do I recollect that Ammianus ever gives him that title

47 See the first book of the Anabasis [c 5], p. 45 46 This pleasing work is original and authentic Yet Xenophon's memory perhaps many years after the expedition has sometimes betrayed him and the distances which he marks are often larger than either a soldier or a geographer will allow 48 Mr Spelman the English translator of the Anabasis (vol i p 51) confounds the antelope with the roebuck and the wild ass with the zebra.

49 See Voyages de Tavernier part i. l. iii. p. 316 and more especially Viaggi di Pietro della Valle tom i l tt. xvii p 671 etc He was ignorant of the old name and condition of Anah Our blind travellers seldom possess any previous knowledge of the countries which they visit Shaw and Tournefort deserve an honourable exception

50 Famosi nominis latro says Ammianus—a high encomium for an Arab The tribe of Gassan had settled on the edge of Syria and reigned some time in Damascus under a dynasty of thirty-one kings or emirs from the time of Pompey to that of the Khalif Omar D'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p 360 Pococke, Specimen Hist Arabicæ, p 75-78 The name of Rodosaces does not appear in the list

51 See Ammianus (xxiv 1, 2), Libanius (Orat Parental c 110, 111, p 334), Zosimus (l iii [c 15] p 164-168)

52 The description of Assyria is furnished by Herodotus (l 1 c 192, etc), who sometimes writes for children, and sometimes for philosophers by Strabo (l xvi p 1070-1082 [p 736-746, ed Casaub]) and by Ammianus (l xxiii c 6) The most useful of the modern travellers are Tavernier (part 1 l ii p 226-258), Otter (tom ii p 35-69, and 189-224), and Niebuhr (tom ii p 172-288) Yet I much regret that the Iral Arabi of Abulfeda has not been translated

53 Ammianus remarks that the primitive Assyria, which comprehended Ninus (Nineveh) and Arbela, had assumed the more recent and peculiar appellation of Adiabene, and he seems to fix Teredon, Vologesia, and Apollonia, as the extreme cities of the actual province of Assyria

54 The two great rivers unite at Apamea, or Corna (one hundred miles from the Persian Gulf), into the broad stream of the Pasitigris, or Shat ul-Arab The Euphrates formerly reached the sea by a separate channel, which was obstructed and diverted by the citizens of Orchoe, about twenty miles to the south-east of modern Basra (D'Anville, in the Memoires de l'Acad des Inscriptions, tom xxx p 170-191)

55 The learned Kæmpfer, as a botanist, an antiquary, and a traveller, has exhausted (Amœnitat Exoticæ, Fascicul iv p 660-764) the whole subject of palm trees

56 Assyria yielded to the Persian satrap an artaba of silver each day The well known proportion of weights and measures (see Bishop Hooper s elaborate Inquiry), the specific gravity of water and silver, and the value of that metal, will afford, after a short process, the annual revenue which I have stated Yet the Great King received no more than 1000 Euboic, or Tyrian, talents (£252,000) from Assyria The comparison of two passages in Herodotus (l 1 c 192, l iii c 89-96) reveals an important difference between the gross and the net revenue of Persia, the sums paid by the province, and the gold or silver deposited in the royal treasure The monarch might annually save three millions six hundred thousand pounds, of the seventeen or eighteen millions raised upon the people

57 The operations of the Assyrian war are circumstantially related by Ammianus (xxiv 2, 3, 4, 5), Libanius (Orat Parent c 112-123, p 335-347), Zosimus (l iii [c 18] p 168-180), and Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 113 144) The military criticisms of the saint are devoutly copied by Tillemont his faithful slave

58 Libanius de ulciscenda Juliani nece, c 13, p 162 [in Fabric Bibl Græc vol vii]

59 The famous examples of Cyrus, Alexander, and Scipio, were acts of justice Julian's chastity was voluntary, and, in his opinion, meritorious

60 Sallust (ap Vet Scholiast Juvenal Satir 1 104) observes, that nihil corruptius moribus The matrons and virgins of Babylon freely mingled with the men in licentious banquets and as they felt the intoxication of wine and love, they gradually, and almost completely, threw aside the incumbrance of dress, ad ultimum ima corporum velamenta projiciunt Q Curtius v 1

61 Ex virginibus autem, quæ speciosæ sunt captæ, ut in Perside, ubi feminarum pulchritudo excellit, nec contrectare aliquam voluit nec videre Ammian xxiv 4 The native race of Persians is small and ugly, but it has been improved by the perpetual mixture of Circassian blood (Herodot l iii c 97 Buffon, Hist Naturelle, tom iii p 420)

62 Obsidionalibus coronis donati Ammian xxiv 4 Either Julian or his historian were unskilful antiquaries He should have given mural crowns The obsidional were the reward of a general who had delivered a besieged city (Aulus Gellius, Noct Attic v 6)

63 I give this speech as original and genuine Ammianus might hear, could transcribe, and was incapable of inventing, it I have used some slight freedoms, and conclude with the most forcible sentence

64 Ammian xxiv 3 Libanius, Orat Parent c 122, p 346

65 M d'Anville (Mém de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom xxxiii p 246-259) has ascertained the true position and distance of Babylon, Seleucia, Ctesiphon, Bagdad, etc The Roman traveller, Pietro della Valle (tom 1 lett xvii p 650-780), seems to be the most intelligent spectator of that famous province He is a gentleman and a scholar, but intolerably vain and prolix

66 The Royal Canal (Nahar Malcha) might be successively restored, altered, divided, etc (Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom ii p 453) and these changes may serve to explain the seeming contradictions of antiquity In the time of Julian it must have fallen into the Euphrates below Ctesiphon

67 Καὶ μεγέθεσιν ἐλέφαντας οἷς ἴσον ἔργον διὰ σταχύων ἐλθεῖν καὶ φάλαγγος [Or Parent c 125] Rien n est beau que le vrai a maxim which should be inscribed on the desk of every rhetorician

68 Libanius alludes to the most powerful of the generals I have ventured to name Sallust Ammianus [xxiv 6] says, of all the leaders, quòd acri metu territi duces concordi precatu fieri prohibere tentarent

69 Hinc Imperator (says Ammianus) ipse cum levis armaturæ auxiliis per prima postremaque discurrens, etc Yet Zosimus his friend, does not allow him to pass the river till two days after the battle 70 Secundum Homericam dispositionem. A similar disposition is ascribed to the wise Nestor, in the fourth book of the Iliad and Homer was never absent from the mind of Julian.

71 Persas terrore subito miscuerunt versisque agminibus totius gentis apertas Ctesiphontis portas victor miles intrâsset ni major prædarum occasio fuisset quam cura victoriæ (Sextus Rufus de Provinciis c 28) Their avarice might dispose them to hear the advice of Victor

72 The labour of the canal the passage of the Tigris and the victory are described by Ammianus (xxiv 5 6) Libanius (Orat Parent c 124–128 p 347–353) Greg Nazianzen (Orat iv p 115) Zosimus (l iii [c 24, p 159 sqq] p 181–183) and Sextus Rufus (de Provinciis c 28)

73 The fleet and army were formed in three divisions of which the first only had passed during the night (Ammian xxiv 6) The πασα δορ φ ρία whom Zosimus transports on the third day (l iii [c 26] p 183) might consist of the protectors among whom the historian Ammianus and the future emperor Jovian actually served some schools of the domestics and perhaps the Jovians and Herculians who often did duty as guards

74 Moses of Chorene (Hist Armen l iii c 15 p 246) supplies us with a national tradition and a spurious letter I have borrowed only the leading circumstance which is consistent with truth probability and Libanius (Orat Parent c 131 p 355)

75 Civitas inexpugnabilis facinus audax et importunum Ammianus xxiv 7 His fellow soldier Eutropius turns aside from the difficulty Assyriamque populatus castra apud Ctesiphontem stativa aliquandiu habuit remeansque victor etc x 16 [8] Zosimus is artful or ignorant and Socrates inaccurate

76 Libanius Orat Parent c 130 p 354, c 139 p 361 Socrates l iii c 21 The ecclesiastical historian imputes the refusal of peace to the advice of Maximus Such advice was unworthy of a philosopher but the philosopher was likewise a magician who flattered the hopes and passions of his master

77 The arts of this new Zopyrus (Greg Nazianzen Orat iv p 115 116 [ed Par 1609]) may derive some credit from the testimony of two abbreviators (Sextus Rufus and Victor) and the casual hints of Libanius (Orat Parent c 134 p 357) and Ammianus (xxiv 7) The course of genuine history is interrupted by a most unseasonable chasm in the text of Ammianus

78 See Ammianus (xxiv 7) Libanius (Orat. Parentalis c 132 133 p 356 357) Zosimus (l iii [c 26] p 183) Zonaras (tom ii l xiii [c 13] p 26) Gregory (Orat iv p 116) and Augustine (The City of God l iv c 29 l v c. 21) Of these Libanius alone attempts a faint apology for his hero who according to Ammianus pronounced his own condemnation by a tardy and ineffectual attempt to extinguish the flames

79 Consult Herodotus (l i. c 194) Strabo (l. xvi. p 1074 [p 739 ed Casaub]) and Tavernier (part i l. ii p 152)

81 One of these dykes, which produces an artificial cascade or cataract is described by Tavernier (part i l ii p 226) and Thevenot (part ii l. i. p. 193) The Persians or Assyrians laboured to interrupt the navigation of the river (Strabo, l. xvi. p 1075 [p 740] D Anville l Euphrate et le Tigre, p 98 99)

82 Recollect the successful and applauded rashness of Agathocles and Cortez who burnt their ships on the coast of Africa and Mexico

83 See the judicious reflections of the author of the Essai sur la Tactique tom ii p 287–353 and the learned remarks of M Guichardt Nouveaux Mémoires Militaires tom i p 351–382 on the baggage and subsistence of the Roman armies.

84 The Tigris rises to the south the Euphrates to the north, of the Armenian mountains The former overflows in March the latter in July These circumstances are well explained in the Geographical Dissertation of Foster inserted in Spelman's Expedition of Cyrus vol ii p 26

85 Ammianus (xxiv 8) describes as he had felt the inconveniency of the flood the heat and the insects The lands of Assyria oppressed by the Turks and ravaged by the Curds or Arabs yield an increase of ten fifteen and twenty fold, for the seed which is cast into the ground by the wretched and unskilful husbandmen Voyages de Niebuhr tom ii p 279 285

86 Isidore of Charax (Mansion Parthic p 5 6 in Hudson Geograph Minor tom ii.) reckons 129 schœni from Seleucia and Thevenot (part i l. i ii p 209–245) 128 hours of march from Bagdad to Ecbatana or Hamadan These measures cannot exceed an ordinary parasang or three Roman miles

87 The march of Julian from Ctesiphon is circumstantially but not clearly described by Ammianus (xxiv 7 8) Libanius (Orat Parent c 134 p 357) and Zosimus (l iii [c 26] p 183) The two last seem ignorant that their conqueror was retreating and Libanius absurdly confines him to the banks of the Tigris

88 Chardin the most judicious of modern travellers describes (tom iii p 57 58 etc ed i in 4to) the education and dexterity of the Persian horsemen Brissonius (de Regno Persico p 650 661 etc) has collected the testimonies of antiquity

89 In Mark Antony's retreat an attic chœnix sold for fifty drachmæ or in other words, a pound of flour for twelve or fourteen shillings barley bread was sold for its weight in silver It is impossible to peruse the interesting narrative of Plutarch (Life of Antony) without perceiving that Mark Antony and Julian were pursued by the same enemies and involved in the same distress.

90 Ammian xxiv 8 xxv 1 Zosimus l. iii. [c 27 seq] p 184 185 186 Libanius Orat. Parent. c. 134 135 p 357 358 359 The sophist of Antioch appears ignorant that the troops were hungry

91 Ammian xxv 2 Julian had sworn in a passion numquam se Marti sacra facturum (xxiv 6 Such whimsical quarrels were not uncommon between the gods and their insolent votaries, and even the prudent Augustus, after his fleet had been twice shipwrecked, excluded Neptune from the honours of public processions See Hume's Philosophical Reflections Essays, vol ii p 418

92 They still retained the monopoly of the vain but lucrative science, which had been invented in Etruria, and professed to derive their knowledge of signs and omens from the ancient books of Tarquitius, a Tuscan sage

93 Clamabant hinc inde candidati (see the note of Valesius) quos disjecerat terror, ut fugientium molem tanquam ruinam male compositi culminis declinaret Ammian xxv 3

94 Sapor himself declared to the Romans that it was his practice to comfort the families of his deceased satraps by sending them, as a present, the heads of the guards and officers who had not fallen by their master's side Libanius, de nece Julian ulcis c xiii p 163

95 The character and situation of Julian might countenance the suspicion that he had previously composed the elaborate oration, which Ammianus heard, and has transcribed The version of the Abbe de la Bléterie is faithful and elegant I have followed him in expressing the Platonic idea of emanations, which is darkly insinuated in the original

96 Herodotus (l i c 31) has displayed that doctrine in an agreeable tale Yet the Jupiter (in the 16th book of the Iliad), who laments with tears of blood the death of Sarpedon his son, had a very imperfect notion of happiness, or glory beyond the grave

97 The soldiers who made their verbal or nuncupatory testaments upon actual service (in procinctû) were exempted from the formalities of the Roman law See Heineccius (Antiquit Jur Roman tom i p 504) and Montesquieu (Esprit des Loix, l xxvii)

98 This union of the human soul with the divine etherial substance of the universe is the ancient doctrine of Pythagoras and Plato, but it seems to exclude any personal or conscious immortality See Warburton's learned and rational observations. Divine Legation, vol. ii p 199–216

99 The whole relation of the death of Julian is given by Ammianus (xxv 3), an intelligent spectator Libanius, who turns with horror from the scene, has supplied some circumstances (Orat Parental. c 136–140, p 359–362) The calumnies of Gregory, and the legends of more recent saints, may now be silently despised

100 Honoratior aliquis miles perhaps Ammianus himself The modest and judicious historian describes the scene of the election, at which he was undoubtedly present (xxv 5)

101 The primus or primicerius enjoyed the dignity of a senator, and, though only a tribune, he ranked with the military dukes Cod Theodosian l vi tit xxiv [leg 11] These privileges are perhaps more recent than the time of Jovian

102 The ecclesiastical historians, Socrates (l iii c 22), Sozomen (l vi c 3), and Theodoret (l iv c 1), ascribe to Jovian the merit of a confessor under the preceding reign, and piously suppose that he refused the purple till the whole army unanimously exclaimed that they were Christians Ammianus, calmly pursuing his narrative, overthrows the legend by a single sentence Hostiis pro Joviano extisque inspectis, pronuntiatum est, etc (xxv 6)

103 Ammianus (xxv 10) has drawn from the life an impartial portrait of Jovian, to which the younger Victor has added some remarkable strokes The Abbe de la Bleterie (Histoire de Jovien, tom i p 1–238) has composed an elaborate history of his short reign—a work remarkably distinguished by elegance of style, critical disquisition, and religious prejudice

104 Regius equitatus It appears from Procopius that the Immortals, so famous under Cyrus and his successors, were revived, if we may use that improper word, by the Sassanides Brisson de Regno Persico, p 268, etc

105 The obscure villages of the inland country are irrecoverably lost, nor can we name the field of battle where Julian fell but M d'Anville has demonstrated the precise situation of Sumere, Carche, and Dura, along the banks of the Tigris (Géographie Ancienne, tom ii p 248 l'Euphrate et le Tigre, p 95, 97) In the ninth century, Sumere, or Samara, became, with a slight change of name, the royal residence of the khalifs of the house of Abbas

106 Dura was a fortified place in the wars of Antiochus against the rebels of Media and Persia (Polybius, l v c 48, 52, p 548, 552, edit Casaubon, in 8vo)

107 A similar expedient was proposed to the leaders of the ten thousand, and wisely rejected Xenophon, Anabasis, l iii [c v §§ 9–11] p 255, 256, 257 It appears from our modern travellers that rafts floating on bladders perform the trade and navigation of the Tigris

108 The first military acts of the reign of Jovian are related by Ammianus (xxv 6), Libanius (Orat Parent c. 143 p 364), and Zosimus (l iii [c 30] p 189, 190, 191) Though we may distrust the fairness of Libanius, the ocular testimony of Eutropius (uno a Persis atque altero prœlio victus, x. 17 [9]) must incline us to suspect that Ammianus has been too jealous of the honour of the Roman arms

109 Sextus Rufus (de Provinciis, c 29) embraces a poor subterfuge of national vanity Tanta reverentia nominis Romani fuit, ut a Persis primus de pace sermo haberetur

110 It is presumptuous to controvert the opinion of Ammianus, a soldier and a spectator Yet it is difficult to understand how the mountains of Corduene could extend over the plain of Assyria as low as the conflux of the Tigris and the Great Zab, or how an army of sixty thousand men could march one hundred miles in four days.

111 The treaty of Dura is recorded with grief or indignation by Ammianus (xxv 7), Libanius

(Orat Parent c 142 p 364) Zosimus (l iii [c 31] p 190 191) Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 117 118 who imputes the distress to Julian the deliverance to Jovian), and Eutropius (x 17 [9]) The last mentioned writer who was present in a military station styles this peace necessariam quidem sed ignobilem

112 Libanius Orat Parent c 143 p 364 365

113 Conditionibus dispendiosis Romanæ reipublicæ impositis quibus cupidior regni quam gloriæ Jovianus imperio rudis adquievit Sextus Rufus de Provinciis c 29 La Bléterie has expressed in a long direct oration these specious considerations of public and private interest (Hist de Jovien tom i p 39 etc)

114 The generals were murdered on the banks of the Zabatus (Anabasis l ii [c v § 1] p 156 l iii [c iii § 6] p 226) or Great Zab a river of Assyria 400 feet broad which falls into the Tigris fourteen hours below Mosul The error of the Greeks bestowed on the Great and Lesser Zab the names of the Wolf (Lycus) and the Goat (Capros) They created these animals to attend the Tiger of the East

115 The Cyropædia is vague and languid the Anabasis circumstantial and animated Such is the eternal difference between fiction and truth

116 According to Rufinus an immediate supply of provisions was stipulated by the treaty and Theodoret affirms that the obligation was faithfully discharged by the Persians Such a fact is probable but undoubtedly false See Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom iv p 702

117 We may recollect some lines of Lucan (Pharsal iv 95) who describes a similar distress of Cæsar's army in Spain —

Sæva fames aderat ——
Miles eget toto censû non prodigus emit
Exiguam Cererem. Proh lucri pallida tabes!
Non deest prolato jejunus venditor auro

See Guichardt (Nouveaux Mémoires Militaires tom. i. p 379–382) His analysis of the two campaigns in Spain and Africa is the noblest monument that has ever been raised to the fame of Cæsar

118 M d'Anville (see his Maps and l'Euphrate et le Tigre p 92 93) traces their march and assigns the true position of Hatra Ur and Thilsaphata which Ammianus has mentioned He does not complain of the Samiel the deadly hot wind which Thevenot (Voyages part ii l i p 192) so much dreaded.

119 The retreat of Jovian is described by Ammianus (xxv 9) Libanius (Orat Parent c 143 p 365) and Zosimus (l. iii. [c 33] p 194)

120 Libanius (Orat Parent c 145, p 366) Such were the natural hopes and wishes of a rhetorician.

121 The people of Carrhæ a city devoted to Paganism, buried the inauspicious messenger under a pile of stones (Zosimus l. iii. [c 34] p 196) Libanius, when he received the fatal intelligence cast his eye on his sword but he recollected that Plato had condemned suicide and that he must live to compose the Panegyric of Julian (Libanius de Vitâ suâ tom ii p 45 46 [ed. Morell. Paris. 1627])

122 Ammianus and Eutropius may be admitted as fair and credible witnesses of the public language and opinions The people of Antioch reviled an ignominious peace which exposed them to the Persians on a naked and defenceless frontier (Excerpt Valesiana p 845 ex Johanne Antiocheno).

123 The Abbé de la Bléterie (Hist de Jovien tom i p 212–227) though a severe casuist has pronounced that Jovian was not bound to execute his promise since he could not dismember the empire nor alienate without their consent the allegiance of his people I have never found much delight or instruction in such political metaphysics.

124 At Nisibis he performed a royal act. A brave officer his namesake who had been thought worthy of the purple was dragged from supper thrown into a well and stoned to death without any form of trial or evidence of guilt Ammian. xxv 8.

125 See xxv 9 and Zosimus l. iii [c. 33] p 194 195

126 Chron Paschal p 300 [tom i p 554, ed Bonn] The ecclesiastical Notitiæ may be consulted

127 Zosimus l iii [c 32] p 192 193 Sextus Rufus de Provinciis c 29 Augustine The City of God l iv c 29 This general position must be applied and interpreted with some caution

128 Ammianus xxv 10 Zosimus l iii [c 34] p 196 He might be edax et vino Venereque indulgens But I agree with La Bléterie (tom. i. p 148–154) in rejecting the foolish report of a Bacchanalian riot (ap Suidam) celebrated at Antioch by the emperor his wife and a troop of concubines.

129 The Abbé de la Bléterie (tom i. p 156 209) handsomely exposes the brutal bigotry of Baronius who would have thrown Julian to the dogs ne cespititiâ quidem sepulturâ dignus

130 Compare the sophist and the saint (Libanius Monod tom ii p 251 and Orat Parent c 145 p 367 c 156 p 377 with Gregory Nazianzen Orat iv p 125–132) The Christian orator faintly mutters some exhortations to modesty and forgiveness but he is well satisfied that the real sufferings of Julian will far exceed the fabulous torments of Ixion or Tantalus.

131 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom. iv p 549) has collected these visions Some saint or angel was observed to be absent in the night on a secret expedition etc

132 Sozomen (l vi. 2) applauds the Greek doctrine of tyrannicide but the whole passage which a Jesuit might have translated is prudently suppressed by the president Cousin

133 Immediately after the death of Julian an uncertain rumour was scattered telo cecidisse Romano It was carried by some deserters to the Persian camp and the Romans were reproached as the assassins of the emperor by Sapor and his sub- jects (Ammian xxv 6, Libanius de ulciscendâ Juliani nece, c xiii p 162, 163) It was urged, as a decisive proof, that no Persian had appeared to claim the promised reward (Liban Orat Parent c 141, p 363) But the flying horseman who darted the fatal javelin might be ignorant of its effect, or he might be slain in the same action Ammianus neither feels nor inspires a suspicion

134 Ὅστις ἐντολὴν πληρῶν τῷ σφῶν αὐτῶν ἄρχοντι This dark and ambiguous expression may point to Athanasius, the first without a rival of the Christian clergy (Libanius de ulcis Jul nece, c 5, p 149 La Bléterie, Hist de Jovien, tom i p 179)

135 The orator (Fabricius, Biblioth Græc tom vii p 145–179) scatters suspicions, demands an inquiry, and insinuates that proofs might still be obtained He ascribes the success of the Huns to the criminal neglect of revenging Julian's death

136 At the funeral of Vespasian, the comedian who personated that frugal emperor anxiously inquired how much it cost?—Fourscore thousand pounds (centies) —Give me the tenth part of the sum, and throw my body into the Tiber Sueton in Vespasian, c 19, with the notes of Casaubon and Gronovius

137 Gregory (Orat iv p 119, 120 [ed Paris, 1609, Orat v c 16, 18, p 157, seqq ed Bened 1778]) compares this supposed ignominy and ridicule to the funeral honours of Constantius, whose body was chaunted over Mount Taurus by a choir of angels

138 Quintus Curtius, l iii c 4 The luxuriancy of his descriptions has been often censured Yet it was almost the duty of the historian to describe a river whose waters had nearly proved fatal to Alexander

139 Libanius, Orat Parent c 156, p 377 Yet he acknowledges with gratitude the liberality of the two royal brothers in decorating the tomb of Julian (de ulcis Jul nece, c 7, p 152)

140 Cujus suprema et cineres, si qui tunc justè consuleret, non Cydnus videre deberet, quamvis gratissimus amnis et liquidus sed ad perpetuandam gloriam rectè factorum præterlambere Tiberis, intersecans urbem æternam, divorumque veterum monumenta præstringens Ammian xxv 10

Chapter XXV

1 The medals of Jovian adorn him with victories, laurel crowns, and prostrate captives Ducange, Famil Byzantin p 52 Flattery is a foolish suicide, she destroys herself with her own hands

2 Jovian restored to the church τὸν ἀρχαῖον κόσμον, a forcible and comprehensive expression (Philostorgius, l viii c 5, with Godefroy's Dissertations, p 329 Sozomen, l vi c 3) The new law which condemned the rape or marriage of nuns (Cod Theod l ix tit xxv leg 2) is exaggerated by Sozomen, who supposes that an amorous glance, the adultery of the heart, was punished with death by the evangelic legislator

3 Compare Socrates, l iii c 25, and Philostorgius, l viii c 6, with Godefroy's Dissertations, p 330

4 The word celestial faintly expresses the impious and extravagant flattery of the emperor to the archbishop τῆς πρὸς τὸν θεὸν τῶν ὅλων ὁμοιώσεως (See the original epistle in Athanasius, tom ii p 33) Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxi p 392) celebrates the friendship of Jovian and Athanasius. The primate's journey was advised by the Egyptian monks (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom viii p 221)

5 Athanasius, at the court of Antioch, is agreeably represented by La Bléterie (Hist de Jovien, tom. i p 121–148) he translates the singular and original conferences of the emperor, the primate of Egypt, and the Arian deputies The Abbé is not satisfied with the coarse pleasantry of Jovian, but his partiality for Athanasius assumes, in his eyes, the character of justice

6 The true era of his death is perplexed with some difficulties (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom viii p 719–723) But the date (A D 373, May 2) which seems the most consistent with history and reason is ratified by his authentic Life (Maffei, Osservazioni Letterarie, tom iii p 81)

7 See the observations of Valesius and Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol iv p 38) on the original letter of Athanasius, which is preserved by Theodoret (l iv c 3) In some MSS this indiscreet promise is omitted, perhaps by the Catholics, jealous of the prophetic fame of their leader

8 Athanasius (apud Theodoret, l iv c 3) magnifies the number of the orthodox, who composed the whole world, πάρεξ ὀλίγων τῶν τὰ Ἀρείου φρονούντων This assertion was verified in the space of thirty or forty years

9 Socrates, l iii c 24. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 131) and Libanius (Orat Parentalis, c 148, p 369) express the living sentiments of their respective factions

10 Themistius, Orat v p 63–71, edit Harduin, Paris, 1684 The Abbé de la Bléterie judiciously remarks (Hist de Jovien, tom i p 199) that Sozomen has forgot the general toleration, and Themistius the establishment of the Catholic religion Each of them turned away from the object which he disliked, and wished to suppress the part of the edict the least honourable, in his opinion to the emperor Jovian

11 Οἱ δὲ Ἀντιοχεῖς οὐχ ἡδέως διέκειντο πρὸς αὐτόν ἀλλ' ἐπέσκωπτον αὐτὸν ᾠδαῖς καὶ παρῳδίαις καὶ τοῖς καλουμένοις φαμώσσοις (famosis libellis) John Antiochen in Excerpt Valesian p 845 The libels

Antioch may be admitted on very slight evidence

12 Compare Ammianus (xxv 10) who omits the name of the Batavians with Zosimus (l iii [c 35] p 197) who removes the scene of action from Rheims to Sirmium

13 Quos capita scholarum ordo castrensis appellat Ammian xxv 10 and Vales ad locum.

14 Cujus vagitus pertinaciter reluctantis ne in curuli sellâ veheretur ex more id quod mox accidit portendebat [Amm l c] Augustus and his successors respectfully solicited a dispensation of age for the sons or nephews whom they raised to the consulship But the curule chair of the first Brutus had never been dishonoured by an infant

15 The Itinerary of Antoninus fixes Dadastana 125 Roman miles from Nice 117 from Ancyra (Wesseling Itinerar p 142) The pilgrim of Bordeaux by omitting some stages reduces the whole space from 242 to 181 miles Wesseling p 574

16 See Ammianus (xxv 10) Eutropius (x 18 [9]) who might likewise be present Jerom (tom 1 p 26 [tom 1 p 341 ed Vallars] ad Heliodorum) Orosius (vii 31) Sozomen (l vi c 6) Zosimus (l iii [c 35] p 197 198) and Zonaras (tom ii l xiii [c 14] p 28 29) We cannot expect a perfect agreement and we shall not discuss minute differences

17 Ammianus unmindful of his usual candour and good sense compares the death of the harmless Jovian to that of the second Africanus who had excited the fears and resentment of the popular faction

18 Chrysostom tom 1 p 336–349 edit Montfaucon The Christian orator attempts to comfort a widow by the examples of illustrious misfortunes and observes that of nine emperors (including the Cæsar Gallus) who had reigned in his time only two (Constantine and Constantius) died a natural death Such vague consolations have never wiped away a single tear

19 Ten days appear scarcely sufficient for the march and election But it may be observed—1 That the generals might command the expeditious use of the public posts for themselves their attendants and messengers 2 That the troops for the ease of the cities marched in many divisions and that the head of the column might arrive at Nice when the rear halted at Ancyra.

20. Ammianus xxvi 1 Zosimus l iii [c 36] p 198 Philostorgius l viii. c 8 and Godefroy Dissertat p 334. Philostorgius who appears to have obtained some curious and authentic intelligence ascribes the choice of Valentinian to the præfect Sallust the master-general Arintheus Dagalaiphus count of the domestics and the patrician Datianus whose pressing recommendations from Ancyra had a weighty influence in the election

21 Ammianus (xxx 7 9) and the younger Victor [Epit c 45] have furnished the portrait of Valentinian which naturally precedes and illustrates the history of his reign

22 At Antioch where he was obliged to attend the emperor to the temple he struck a priest who had presumed to purify him with lustral water (Sozomen l vi c 6 Theodoret l iii c 16) Such public defiance might become Valentinian but it could leave no room for the unworthy delation of the philosopher Maximus which supposes some more private offence (Zosimus l iv [c 2] p 200 201)

23 Socrates l. iv A previous exile to Melitene or Thebais (the first might be possible) is interposed by Sozomen (l vi c 6) and Philostorgius (l vii c 7 with Godefroy s Dissertations p 293)

24 Ammianus in a long because unseasonable digression (xxvi 1 and Valesius ad locum) rashly supposes that he understands an astronomical question of which his readers are ignorant. It is treated with more judgment and propriety by Censorinus (de Die Natali c 20) and Macrobius (Saturnal l i c 12–16) The appellation of Bissextile which marks the inauspicious year (Augustin ad Januarium Epist 119) is derived from the repetition of the sixth days of the calends of March.

25 Valentinian s first speech is full in Ammianus (xxvi 2) concise and sententious in Philostorgius (l viii c 8)

26 Si tuos amas Imperator optime habes fratrem si Rempublicam quære quem vestias Ammian xxvi 4 In the division of the empire Valentinian retained that sincere counsellor for himself (c 6)

27 In suburbano Ammian xxvi 4 The famous Hebdomon or field of Mars was distant from Constantinople either seven stadia or seven miles. See Valesius and his brother ad loc and Ducange Const l ii p 140 141 172 173

28 Participem quidem legitimum potestatis sed in modum apparitoris morigerum, ut progrediens aperiet textus Ammian xxvi 4

29 Notwithstanding the evidence of Zonaras Suidas and the Paschal Chronicle M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom. v p 671) wishes to disbelieve these stories si advantageuses à un payen

30 Eunapius celebrates and exaggerates the sufferings of Maximus (p 82 83 [p 102 ed Comm]) yet he allows that this sophist or magician the guilty favourite of Julian and the personal enemy of Valentinian was dismissed on the payment of a small fine

31 The loose assertions of a general disgrace (Zosimus l iv [c 2] p 201) are detected and refuted by Tillemont (tom v p 21)

32 Ammianus xxvi. 5

33 Ammianus says in general terms subagrestis ingenii nec bellicis nec liberalibus studiis eruditus Ammian xxxi 14 The orator Themistius, with the genuine impertinence of a Greek wished for the first time to speak the Latin language the dialect of his sovereign τὴ δ διάλεκτον ... Orat vi p 71

34 The uncertain degree of alliance or consanguinity is expressed by the words ἀνέψιος cognatus consobrinus (see Valesius ad Ammian xxiii

3) The mother of Procopius might be a sister of Basilina and Count Julian, the mother and uncle of the Apostate Ducange, Fam Byzantin p 49

35 Ammian xxiii 3, xxvi 6 He mentions the report with much hesitation susurravit obscurior fama, nemo enim dicti auctor exstitit verus It serves, however, to mark that Procopius was a Pagan Yet his religion does not appear to have promoted, or obstructed, his pretensions

36 One of his retreats was a country-house of Eunomius, the heretic The master was absent, innocent, ignorant, yet he narrowly escaped a sentence of death, and was banished into the remote parts of Mauritania (Philostorg l ix c 5, 8, and Godefroy's Dissert p 369–378)

37 Hormisdæ maturo juveni Hormisdæ regalis illius filio, potestatem Proconsulis detulit et civilia, more veterum, et bella, recturo Ammian xxvi 8 The Persian prince escaped with honour and safety, and was afterwards (A D 380) restored to the same extraordinary office of proconsul of Bithynia (Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 204) I am ignorant whether the race of Sassan was propagated I find (A D 514) a pope Hormisdas, but he was a native of Frusino, in Italy (Pagi Brev Pontific tom i p 247)

38 The infant rebel was afterwards the wife of the emperor Gratian, but she died young and childless See Ducange, Fam Byzantin p 48, 59

39 Sequimini culminis summi prosapiam, was the language of Procopius, who affected to despise the obscure birth and fortuitous election of the upstart Pannonian Ammian xxvi 7

40 Et dedignatus hominem superare certamine despicabilem, auctoritatis et celsi fiduciâ corporis, ipsis hostibus jussit, suum vincire rectorem atque ita turmarum antesignanus umbratilis comprensus suorum manibus The strength and beauty of Arintheus, the new Hercules, are celebrated by St Basil, who supposes that God had created him as an inimitable model of the human species The painters and sculptors could not express his figure the historians appeared fabulous when they related his exploits (Ammian xxvi [c 8] and Vales ad loc)

41 The same field of battle is placed by Ammianus in Lycia, and by Zosimus at Thyatira, which are at the distance of 150 miles from each other But Thyatira alluitur Lyco (Plin Hist Natur v 31, Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom ii p 79) and the transcribers might easily convert an obscure river into a well known province

42 The adventures, usurpation, and fall of Procopius, are related, in a regular series, by Ammianus (xxvi 6, 7, 8, 9, 10) and Zosimus (l iv [c 4 sq] p 203–210) They often illustrate, and seldom contradict, each other Themistius (Orat vii p 91, 92) adds some base panegyric and Eunapius (p 83 84 [p 104, ed Comm]) some malicious satire

43 Libanius de ulciscend Julian nece, c ix [x] p 158, 159. The sophist deplores the public frenzy, but he does not (after their deaths) impeach the justice of the emperors

44. The French and English lawyers of the present age allow the theory, and deny the practice, of witchcraft (Denisart, Recueil de Decisions de Jurisprudence, au mot Sorciers, tom iv p 553 Blackstone's Commentaries, vol iv p 60) As private reason always prevents, or outstrips, public wisdom, the president Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws, l xii c 5, 6) rejects the existence of magic.

45 See Œuvres de Bayle, tom iii p 567–589 The sceptic of Rotterdam exhibits, according to his custom, a strange medley of loose knowledge and lively wit

46 The Pagans distinguished between good and bad magic, the Theurgic and the Goetic (Hist de l'Academie, etc , tom vii p 25) But they could not have defended this obscure distinction against the acute logic of Bayle In the Jewish and Christian system, all demons are infernal spirits, and all commerce with them is idolatry, apostasy, etc , which deserves death and damnation

47 The Canidia of Horace (Carm l v Od 5 [Epod 5], with Dacier's and Sanadon's illustrations) is a vulgar witch The Erichtho of Lucan (Pharsal vi 430–827) is tedious, disgusting, but sometimes sublime She chides the delay of the Furies, and threatens, with tremendous obscurity, to pronounce their real names, to reveal the true infernal countenance of Hecate, to invoke the secret powers that lie below hell, etc

48 Genus hominum potentibus infidum, sperantibus fallax, quod in civitate nostrâ et vetabitur semper et retinebitur Tacit Hist i 22 See Augustine, The City of God, l viii c 19 and the Theodosian Code, l ix tit xvi with Godefroy s Commentary

49 The persecution of Antioch was occasioned by a criminal consultation The twenty-four letters of the alphabet were arranged round a magic tripod and a dancing ring, which had been placed in the centre, pointed to the four first letters in the name of the future emperor, Θ Ε Ο Δ Theodorus (perhaps with many others who owned the fatal syllables) was executed Theodosius succeeded Lardner (Heathen Testimonie, vol iv p 353–372) has copiously and fairly examined this dark transaction of the reign of Valens

52 The cruel persecution of Rome and Antioch is described and most probably exaggerated, by Ammianus (xxviii 1, xxix 1, 2) and Zosimus (l iv [c 13] p 216–218) The philosopher with some justice was involved in the charge of magic (Eunapius in Vit Sophist p 88 89 [p 110 ed Comm]) and young Chrysostom who had accidentally found one of the proscribed books gave himself for lost (Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom v p 340)

53 Consult the six last books of Ammianus and more particularly the portraits of the two royal brothers (xxx 8 9 xxxi 14) Tillemont has collected (tom v p 12-18 p 127-133) from all antiquity their virtues and vices

54 The younger Victor asserts that he was valde timidus [Epit c 46] yet he behaved as almost every man would do with decent resolution at the head of an army The same historian attempts to prove that his anger was harmless Ammianus observes with more candour and judgment incidentia crimina ad contemptam vel læsam principis amplitudinem trahens in sanguinem sæviebat [xxvi 14]

55 Cum esset in acerbitatem naturæ calore propensior pœnas per ignes augebat et gladios Ammian xxx 8 See xxvii 7

56 I have transferred the reproach of avarice from Valens to his servants Avarice more properly belongs to ministers than to kings in whom that passion is commonly extinguished by absolute possession

57 He sometimes expressed a sentence of death with a tone of pleasantry Abi Comes et muta ei caput qui sibi mutari provinciam cupit A boy who had slipped too hastily a Spartan hound an armourer who had made a polished cuirass that wanted some grains of the legitimate weight etc were the victims of his fury

58 The innocents of Milan were an agent and three apparitors whom Valentinian condemned for signifying a legal summons. Ammianus (xxvii 7) strangely supposes that all who had been unjustly executed were worshipped as martyrs by the Christians His impartial silence does not allow us to believe that the great chamberlain Rhodanus was burnt alive for an act of oppression (Chron Paschal p 302 [tom i p 558 ed Bonn])

59 Ut bene meritam in silvas jussit abire Innoxiam Ammian xxix 3 and Valesius ad locum

60 See the Code of Justinian l viii tit li leg 2 Unusquisque sobolem suam nutriat Quod si exponendam putaverit animadversioni quæ constituta est subjacebit For the present I shall not interfere in the dispute between Noodt and Binkershoek how far or how long this unnatural practice has been condemned or abolished by law philosophy and the more civilised state of society

61 These salutary institutions are explained in the Theodosian Code L xiii tit iii De Professoribus et Medicis and l xiv t t ix De Studiis liberalibus Urbis Romæ Besides our usual guide (Godefroy) we may consult Giannone (Istoria di Napoli tom i p 105-111) who has treated the interesting subject with the zeal and curiosity of a man of letters who studies his domestic history

62 Cod Theodos l i tit xi with Godefroy's Paratitlon which diligently gleans from the rest of the code

63 Three lines of Ammianus (xxxi 14) countenance a whole oration of Themistius (viii p 101 120) full of adulation pedantry, and commonplace morality The eloquent M. Thomas (tom i p 366-396) has amused himself with celebrating the virtues and genius of Themistius who was not unworthy of the age in which he lived

64 Zosimus l iv [c 3] p 202 Ammian xxx 9 His reformation of costly abuses might entitle him to the praise of in provinciales admodum parcus, tributorum ubique molliens sarcinas By some his frugality was styled avarice (Jerom Chron p 186 [tom viii p 809 ed Vallars])

65 Testes sunt leges a me in exordio Imperii mei datæ quibus unicuique quod animo imbibisset colendi libera facultas tributa est Cod Theodos l ix tit xvi leg 9 To this declaration of Valentinian we may add the various testimonies of Ammianus (xxx 9) Zosimus (l iv [c 3] p 204) and Sozomen (L vi c 7 21) Baronius would naturally blame such rational toleration (Annal Eccles A D 370 No 129-132 A D 376 No 3 4)

66 Eudoxus was of a mild and timid disposition. When he baptised Valens (A D 367) he must have been extremely old since he had studied theology fifty five years before under Lucian a learned and pious martyr Philostorg l ii c 14-16 l iv c 4 with Godefroy p 82 206 and Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom v p 474-480 etc

67 Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxv p 432) insults the persecuting spirit of the Arians as an infallible symptom of error and heresy

68 This sketch of the ecclesiastical government of Valens is drawn from Socrates (l iv) Sozomen (l vi) Theodoret (l iv) and the immense compilations of Tillemont (particularly tom vi viii and ix.)

69 Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History vol iv p 78) has already conceived and intimated the same suspicion

70 This reflection is so obvious and forcible that Orosius (l vii c 32 33) delays the persecution till after the death of Valentinian. Socrates, on the other hand supposes (l iii [iv] c 32) that it was appeased by a philosophical oration which Themistius pronounced in the year 374 (Orat xii p 154 in Latin only) Such contradictions diminish the evidence and reduce the term of the persecution of Valens

71 Tillemont whom I follow and abridge has extracted (Mém. Ecclés tom viii p. 153-167) the most authentic circumstances from the Panegyrics of the two Gregories the brother and the friend of Basil The letters of Basil himself (Dupin, Bibliothéque Ecclésiastique tom ii p 155 180) do not present the image of a very lively persecution

72 Basilius Cæsariensis episcopus Cappadociæ clarus habetur qui multa continentiæ et ingenii bona uno superbiæ malo perdidit [Chron

Ann 2392, tom viii p 816, ed Vallars] This irreverent passage is perfectly in the style and character of St Jerom It does not appear in Scaliger's edition of his Chronicle, but Isaac Vossius found it in some old MSS which had not been reformed by the monks

73 This noble and charitable foundation (almost a new city) surpassed in merit, if not in greatness, the pyramids, or the walls of Babylon It was principally intended for the reception of lepers (Greg Nazianzen, Orat xx p 439)

74 Cod Theodos l xii tit i leg 63 Godefroy (tom iv p 409–413) performs the duty of a commentator and advocate Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom viii p 808) supposes a second law to excuse his orthodox friends, who had misrepresented the edict of Valens, and suppressed the liberty of choice

75 See D'Anville, Description de l'Egypte, p 74. Hereafter I shall consider the monastic institutions

76 Socrates, l iv c 24, 25 Orosius, l vii c 33 Jerom in Chron p 189 [tom. viii p 816, ed Vallars], and tom ii p 212 The monks of Egypt performed many miracles, which prove the truth of their faith Right, says Jortin (Remarks, vol iv p 79), but what proves the truth of those miracles?

77 Cod Theodos l xvi tit ii leg 20 Godefroy (tom vi p 49), after the example of Baronius, impartially collects all that the fathers have said on the subject of this important law, whose spirit was long afterwards revived by the emperor Frederic II, Edward I of England, and other Christian princes who reigned after the twelfth century

78 The expressions which I have used are temperate and feeble, if compared with the vehement invectives of Jerom (tom i p 13, 45, 144, etc [tom i. p 259, etc , ed Vallars]) In his turn he was reproached with the guilt which he imputed to his brother monks and the Sceleratus, the Versipellis, was publicly accused as the lover of the widow Paula (tom ii p 363) He undoubtedly possessed the affections both of the mother and the daughter, but he declares that he never abused his influence to any selfish or sensual purpose

79 Pudet dicere, sacerdotes idolorum, mimi et aurigæ, et scorta, hæreditates capiunt solis clericis ac monachis hâc [hoc] lege prohibetur Et non prohibetur a persecutoribus, sed a principibus Christianis Nec de lege queror, sed doleo cur meruerimus hanc legem Jerom (tom i p 13 [tom i p 258, ed Vallars]) discreetly insinuates the secret policy of his patron Damasus

80 Three words of Jerom, sanctæ memoriæ Damasus (tom ii p 109 [Ep ad Pammachium tom i. p 228, ed Vallars]), wash away all his stains, and blind the devout eyes of Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom viii p 386–424)

81 Jerom himself is forced to allow, crudelissimæ interfectiones diversi sexûs perpetratæ (in Chron p 186 [tom viii p 800 ed Vallars]) But an original libel or petition of two presbyters of the adverse party has unaccountably escaped They affirm that the doors of the basilica were burnt, and that the roof was untiled that Damasus marched at the head of his own clergy, gravediggers, charioteers, and hired gladiators that none of his party were killed, but that one hundred and sixty dead bodies were found This petition is published by the P Sirmond, in the first volume of his works

82 The Basilica of Sicininus, or Liberius, is probably the church of Sancta Maria Maggiore, on the Esquiline hill Baronius, A D 367, No 3 and Donatus, Roma Antiqua et Nova, l iv c 3, p 462

83 The enemies of Damasus styled him Auriscalpius Matronarum, the ladies' ear scratcher

84 Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxxii p 526) describes the pride and luxury of the prelates who reigned in the Imperial cities, their gilt car, fiery steeds, numerous train, etc. The crowd gave way as to a wild beast

85 Ammian xxvii 3 Perpetuo Numini, verisque ejus cultoribus The incomparable pliancy of a polytheist!

86 Ammianus, who makes a fair report of his præfecture (xxvii 9), styles him præclaræ indolis, gravitatisque, senator (xxii 7, and Vales ad loc) A curious inscription (Gruter MCII No 2) records, in two columns, his religious and civil honours In one line he was Pontiff of the Sun and of Vesta, Augur, Quindecemvir, Hierophant, etc , etc In the other, 1 Quæstor candidatus, more probably titular 2 Prætor 3 Corrector of Tuscany and Umbria 4 Consular of Lusitania 5 Proconsul of Achaia 6 Præfect of Rome 7 Prætorian præfect of Italy 8 Of Illyricum 9 Consul, elect, but he died before the beginning of the year 385 See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 241, 736

87 Facite me Romanæ urbis episcopum, et ero protinus Christianus (Jerom, tom ii p 165 [contra Joann Ierosol tom ii p 415, ed Vallars]) It is more than probable that Damasus would not have purchased his conversion at such a price

88 Ammian xxvi 5 Valesius adds a long and good note on the master of the offices

89 Ammian xxvii 1 Zosimus, l iv [c 9] p 208 The disgrace of the Batavians is suppressed by the contemporary soldier, from a regard for military honour, which could not affect a Greek rhetorician of the succeeding age

90 See D Anville, Notice de l Ancienne Gaule, p 587 The name of the Moselle, which is not specified by Ammianus is clearly understood by Mascou (Hist. of the Ancient Germans, vii 2)

91 The battles are described by Ammianus (xxvii 2) and by Zosimus (l iv [c 9] p 209), who supposes Valentinian to have been present

92 Studio solicitante nostrorum, occubuit Ammian xxvii 10

93 The expedition of Valentinian is related by Ammianus (xxvii. 10), and celebrated by Auson

ius (Mosell 421 etc) who foolishly supposes that the Romans were ignorant of the sources of the Danube

95 Ammian xxviii 2 Zosimus l iv [c 16] p 214 The younger Victor mentions the mechanical genius of Valentinian nova arma meditari fingere terrâ seu limo simulacra [Epit c 45]

96 Bellicosos et pubis immensæ viribus affluentes et ideo metuendos finitimis universis Ammian xxviii 5

97 I am always apt to suspect historians and travellers of improving extraordinary facts into general laws Ammianus ascribes a similar custom to Egypt and the Chinese have imputed it to the Ta tsin or Roman empire (De Guignes Hist des Huns tom ii part i p 79)

98 Salinarum finiumque causâ Alemannis sæpe jurgabant Ammian xxviii 5 Possibly they disputed the possession of the Sala a river which produced salt and which had been the object of an cient contention Tacit Annal xiii 57 and Lipsius ad loc

99 Jam inde temporibus priscis sobolem se esse Romanam Burgundii sciunt and the vague tradition gradually assumed a more regular form (Oros l vii c 32) It is annihilated by the decisive authority of Pliny who composed the History of Drusus and served in Germany (Plin Secund Epist iii 5) within sixty years after the death of that hero Germanorum genera quinque Vindili quorum pars Burgundiones etc (Hist Natur iv 28)

100 The wars and negotiations relative to the Burgundians and Alemanni are distinctly related by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxviii 5 xxix 4 xxx 3) Orosius (l vii c 32) and the Chronicles of Jerom and Cassiodorus fix some dates and add some circumstances

101 Ἐπὶ τὸ αὐχὲν α τῆς Κιμβρικῆς Χ ρσ ἥσου Σάξο ς At the northern extremity of the peninsula (the Cimbric promontory of Pliny iv 27) Ptolemy f es the remnant of the C mbri He fills the interval between the Saxons and the Cimbri with six obscure tribes who were united as early as the sixth century under the national appellation of D nes See Cluver German. Antiq l. iii. c 21 22 23

102 M d Anville (Etablissement des Etats de l E rope etc p 19–26) has marked the extensive limits of the Saxony of Charlemagne

103 The fleet of Drusus had failed in their attempt to pass or even to approach the Sound (styled from an obvious resemblance the Columns of Hercules) and the naval enterprise was never resumed (Tacit de Moribus German c 34) The knowledge which the Romans acquired of the naval powers of the Baltic (c 44 45) was obtained by their land journeys in search of amber

104 Quin et Aremoricus piratem Saxona tractus

The genius of Cæsar imitated for a particular service these rude but light vessels which were likewise used by the natives of Britain (Comment de Bell Civil i 54 and Guichardt Nouveaux Mémoires Militaires tom ii p 41 42) The British vessels would now astonish the genius of Cæsar

105 The best original account of the Saxon pirates may be found in Sidonius Apollinaris (l viii Epist 6 p 223 edit Sirmond) and the best commentary in the Abbé du Bos (Hist Critique de la Monarchie Françoise etc tom i l. i. c 16 p 148–155 See likewise p 77 78)

106 Ammian (xxviii 5) justifies this breach of faith to pirates and robbers and Orosius (l. vii. c. 32) more clearly expresses their real guilt virtute atque agilitate terribiles

107 Symmachus (l ii Epist 46) still presumes to mention the sacred names of Socrates and philosophy Sidonius bishop of Clermont, might condemn (l viii Epist 6) with less inconsistency the human sacrifices of the Saxons

108 In the beginning of the last century the learned Camden was obliged to undermine with respectful scepticism the romance of Brutus the Trojan who is now buried in silent oblivion with Scota the daughter of Pharaoh, and her numerous progeny Yet I am informed that some champions of the Milesian colony may still be found among the original natives of Ireland A people dissatisfied with their present condition grasp at any visions of their past or future glory

109 Tacitus or rather his father in law Agricola might remark the German or Spanish complexion of some British tribes But it was their sober deliberate opinion In universum tamen æstimanti Gallos vicinum solum occupâsse credibile est Eorum sacra deprehendas sermo haud multum diversus (in Vit Agricol. c xi) Cæsar had observed their common religion (Comment. de Bello Gallico vi 13) and in his time the emigration from the Belgic Gaul was a recent or at least an historical event (v 12) Camden, the British Strabo has modestly ascertained our genuine antiquities (Britannia vol. i. Introduction p ii–xxxi)

110 In the dark and doubtful paths of Caledonian antiquity I have chosen for my guides two learned and ingenious Highlanders, whom their b rth and education had peculiarly qualified for that office See Critical Dissertations on the Origin Antiquities etc of the Caledonians, by Dr John Macpherson London 1768 in 4to and Introduction to the History of Great Britain and

Ireland, by James Macpherson, Esq, London, 1773, in 4to third edit Dr Macpherson was a minister in the Isle of Skye and it is a circumstance honourable for the present age, that a work replete with erudition and criticism should have been composed in the most remote of the Hebrides

111 The Irish descent of the Scots has been revived, in the last moments of its decay, and strenuously supported, by the Rev Mr Whitaker (Hist of Manchester, vol 1 p 430, 431, and Genuine History of the Britons asserted, etc, p 154–293) Yet he acknowledges, 1 That the Scots of Ammianus Marcellinus (A D 340) were already settled in Caledonia, and that the Roman authors do not afford any hints of their emigration from another country 2 That all the accounts of such emigrations, which have been asserted or received, by Irish bards, Scotch historians, or English antiquaries (Buchanan, Camden, Usher, Stillingfleet, etc), are totally fabulous 3 That three of the Irish tribes, which are mentioned by Ptolemy (A D 150), were of Caledonian extraction 4. That a younger branch of Caledonian princes, of the house of Fingal, acquired and possessed the monarchy of Ireland. After these concessions, the remaining difference between Mr Whitaker and his adversaries is minute and obscure The genuine history, which he produces, of a Fergus, the cousin of Ossian, who was transplanted (A D 324) from Ireland to Caledonia, is built on a conjectural supplement to the Erse poetry, and the feeble evidence of Richard of Cirencester, a monk of the fourteenth century The lively spirit of the learned and ingenious antiquarian has tempted him to forget the nature of a question which he so vehemently debates, and so absolutely decides

114 The Caledonians praised and coveted the gold, the steeds, the lights, etc, of the stranger See Dr Blair's Dissertation on Ossian, vol. ii. p 343 and Mr Macpherson's Introduction, p 242–286

115 Lord Lyttelton has circumstantially related (History of Henry II vol. 1 p 182) and Sir David Dalrymple has slightly mentioned (Annals of Scotland, vol 1 p 69), a barbarous inroad of the Scots, at a time (A D 1137) when law, religion, and society must have softened their primitive manners

116 Attacotti bellicosa hominum natio Ammian xxvii 8 Camden (Introduct p clii) has restored their true name in the text of Jerom The bands of Attacotti which Jerom had seen in Gaul were afterwards stationed in Italy and Illyricum (Notitia, S viii xxxix xl)

117 Cum ipse adolescentulus in Galliâ viderim Attacottos (or Scotos) gentem Brittannicam humanis vesci carnibus, et cum per silvas porcorum greges, et armentorum pecudumque reperiant, pastorum nates et feminarum papillas solere abscindere et has solas ciborum delicias arbitrari Such is the evidence of Jerom (tom ii p 75 [adv Jovinianum, l ii tom ii p 335, ed Vallars]), whose veracity I find no reason to question

118 Ammianus has concisely represented (xx. 1, xxvi 4, xxvii 8, xxviii 3) the whole series of the British war

See likewise Pacatus (in Panegyr Vet xii 5) But it is not easy to appreciate the intrinsic value of flattery and metaphor Compare the British victories of Bolanus (Statius, Silv v 2) with his real character (Tacit in Vit Agricol. c. 16)

120 Ammianus frequently mentions their concilium annuum, legitimum, etc Leptis and Sabrata are long since ruined, but the city of Oea, the native country of Apuleius, still flourishes under the provincial denomination of Tripoli See Cellarius (Geograph Antiqua, tom ii part ii. p 81), D Anville (Géographie Ancienne, tom. iii p 71, 72), and Marmol (Afrique, tom. ii p 562)

121 Ammian xxviii 6 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 25 676) has discussed the chronological difficulties of the history of Count Romanus

122 The chronology of Ammianus is loose and obscure and Orosius (l vii c 33, p 551, edit Havercamp) seems to place the revolt of Firmus after the deaths of Valentinian and Valens Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 691) endeavours to pick his way The patient and sure footed mule of the Alps may be trusted in the most slippery paths

123 Ammian xxix. 5. The text of this long chapter (fifteen quarto pages) is broken and corrupted and the narrative is perplexed by the want of chronological and geographical landmarks

124. Ammian xxviii 4. Orosius, l. vii c 33 p 551, 552 Jerom in Chron p 187

125 Leo Africanus (in the Viaggi di Ramusio tom i fol 78–83) has traced a curious picture of the people and the country, which are more minutely described in the Afrique de Marmol tom iii p 1–54

126 This uninhabitable zone was gradually reduced by the improvements of ancient geography from forty five to twenty four or even sixteen degrees of latitude See a learned and judicious note of Dr Robertson Hist of America vol i p 426

127 Intra si credere libet vix jam homines et magis semiferi Blemmyes Satyri etc Pomponius Mela i 4 p 26 edit Voss in 8vo Pliny philosophically explains (vi 35) the irregularities of nature which he had credulously admitted (v 8)

128 If the satyr was the orang-outang the great human ape (Buffon Hist Nat tom xiv p 43 etc) one of that species might actually be shown alive at Alexandria in the reign of Constantine Yet some difficulty will still remain about the conversation which St Anthony held with one of these pious savages in the desert of Thebais (Jerom in Vit Paul Eremit tom i p 238)

129 St Anthony likewise met one of these monsters whose existence was seriously asserted by the emperor Claudius The public laughed but his praefect of Egypt had the address to send an artful preparation the embalmed corpse of an Hippocentaur which was preserved almost a century afterwards in the Imperial palace See Pliny (Hist Natur vii 3) and the judicious observations of Fréret (Mémoires de l Acad tom vii p 321 etc)

130 The fable of the pigmies is as old as Homer (Iliad iii 6) The pigmies of India and Æthiopia were (trispithami) twenty seven inches high Every spring their cavalry (mounted on rams and goats) marched in battle array to destroy the cranes eggs aliter (says Pliny) futuris gregibus non resisti Their houses were built of mud feathers and egg shells See Pliny (vi. 35 vii 2) and Strabo (l. ii p 121 [p 70 ed Casaub])

131 The third and fourth volumes of the valuable Histoire des Voyages describe the present state of the negroes The nations of the sea-coast have been polished by European commerce and those of the inland country have been improved by Moorish colonies

132 Histoire Philosophique et Politique etc tom iv p 192

133 The evidence of Ammianus is original and decisive (xxvii 12) Moses of Chorene (l iii c 17 p 249 and c 34 p 269) and Procopius (de Bell. Persico l. i c 5, p 17 edit Louvre [tom i. p 29 ed Bonn]) have been consulted but those historians who confound distinct facts repeat the same events and introduce strange stories must be used with diffidence and caution

134. Perhaps Artagera, or Ardis under whose walls Caius the grandson of Augustus was wounded. This fortress was situate above Amida near one of the sources of the Tigris. See D Anville Géographie Ancienne tom ii. p 106

135. Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 701) proves from chronology that Olympias must have been the mother of Para.

136 Ammianus (xxvii 12 xxix 1 xxx 1 2) has described the events without the dates of the Persian war Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. l iii c 28 p 261 c 31 p 266 c 35 p 271) affords some additional facts but it is extremely difficult to separate truth from fable

137 Artaxerxes was the successor and (the cousin german) of the great Sapor and guardian of his son Sapor III (Agathias l. iv [c 26] p 136 edit Louvre [p 63 ed Bonn]) See the Universal History vol xi p 86 161 The authors of that unequal work have compiled the Sassanian dynasty with erudition and diligence but it is a preposterous arrangement to divide the Roman and Oriental accounts into two distinct histories

138 Pacatus in Panegyr Vet xii 22 and Orosius l vii c 34. Ictumque tum fœdus est quo versus Oriens usque ad nunc (A D 416) tranquillissime fruitur

139 See in Ammianus (xxx. 1) the adventures of Para Moses of Chorene calls him Tiridates and tells a long and not improbable story of his son Gnelus who afterwards made himself popular in Armenia and provoked the jealousy of the reigning king (l iii. c 21 etc p 253 etc) [Para is not the same as Tiridates who was the father of Gnel, first husband of Pharandsem the future wife of Arsaces and the mother of Para]

140 The concise account of the reign and conquests of Hermanric seems to be one of the valuable fragments which Jornandes (c 23) borrowed from the Gothic histories of Ablavius, or Cassiodorus

141 M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l Europe tom vi p 311–329) investigates with more industry than success the nations subdued by the arms of Hermanric He denies the existence of the Vasinobroncæ on account of the immoderate length of their name Yet the French envoy to Ratisbon, or Dresden must have traversed the country of the Mediomatrici

142 The edition of Grotius (Jornandes p 642) exhibits the name of Æstri But reason and the Ambrosian MS have restored the Æstii whose manners and situation are expressed by the pencil of Tacitus (Germania c 45)

143 Ammianus (xxxi 3) observes in general terms Ermenrichi bellicosissimi Regis, et per multa variaque fortiter facta vicinis gentibus formidati etc

144 Valens docetur relationibus Ducum gentem Gothorum eâ tempestate intactam ideoque sævissimam conspirantem in unum ad pervadenda parari collimitia Thraciarum. Ammian. xxvi 6

145 M de Buat (Hist. des Peuples de l'Europe tom vi p 332) has curiously ascertained the real number of these auxiliaries The 3000 of Ammianus and the 10 000 of Zosimus were only the first divisions of the Gothic army

146. The march and subsequent negotiation are described in the Fragments of Eunapius (Excerpt Legat. p 18, edit Louvre [p 47, ed Bonn]) The provincials, who afterwards became familiar with the barbarians, found that their strength was more apparent than real They were tall of stature, but their legs were clumsy and their shoulders were narrow

147 Valens enim, ut consulto placuerat fratri, cujus regebatur arbitrio, arma concussit in Gothos ratione justâ permotus Ammianus (xxvii 4) then proceeds to describe, not the country of the Goths, but the peaceful and obedient province of Thrace, which was not affected by the war

148 Eunapius, in Excerpt Legat p 18, 19 [p 47, 48, ed Bonn] The Greek sophist must have considered as one and the same war, the whole series of Gothic history till the victories and peace of Theodosius

149 The Gothic war is described by Ammianus (xxvii. 5), Zosimus (l iv [c 10] p 211–214), and Themistius (Orat x p 129–141) The orator Themistius was sent from the senate of Constantinople to congratulate the victorious emperor, and his servile eloquence compares Valens on the Danube to Achilles in the Scamander Jornandes forgets a war peculiar to the Visi Goths, and inglorious to the Gothic name (Mascou's Hist of the Germans, vii 3)

150 Ammianus (xxix 6) and Zosimus (l. iv [c 16] p 219, 220) carefully mark the origin and progress of the Quadic and Sarmatian war

151 Ammianus (xxx. 5), who acknowledges the merit, has censured, with becoming asperity, the oppressive administration of Petronius Probus When Jerom translated and continued the Chronicle of Eusebius (A D 380, see Tillemont, Mém Eclés tom xii p 53, 626), he expressed the truth or at least the public opinion of his country, in the following words "Probus P P Illyrici iniquissimis tributorum exactionibus, ante provincias quas regebat, quam a Barbaris vastarentur, erasit" (Chron edit Scaliger, p 187, Animadvers p 259) The saint afterwards formed an intimate and tender friendship with the widow of Probus and the name of Count Equitius, with less propriety, but without much injustice, has been substituted in the text

152 Julian (Orat vi p 198) represents his friend Iphicles as a man of virtue and merit, who had made himself ridiculous and unhappy by adopting the extravagant dress and manners of the Cynics

153 Ammian xxx 5 Jerom, who exaggerates the misfortune of Valentinian, refuses him even this last consolation of revenge Vastato genitali solo, et inultam patriam derelinquens (tom i p 26 [Ep ad Heliodor tom i p 341, ed Vallars])

154 See, on the death of Valentinian, Ammianus (xxx 6), Zosimus (l vi [c 17] p 221), Victor (in Epitom [c 45]), Socrates (l iv c 31), and Jerom (in Chron p 187 [tom viii p 815 ed Vallars], and tom i p 26, ad Heliodor [tom i p 341, ed Vallars]) There is much variety of circumstances among them, and Ammianus is so eloquent that he writes nonsense

155 Socrates (l iv c 31) is the only original witness of this foolish story, so repugnant to the laws and manners of the Romans, that it scarcely deserved the formal and elaborate dissertation of M Bonamy (Mém de l'Academie, tom xxx p 394–405) Yet I would preserve the natural circumstance of the bath, instead of following Zosimus, who represents Justina as an old woman, the widow of Magnentius

156 Ammianus (xxvii 6) describes the form of this military election, and august investiture Valentinian does not appear to have consulted, or even informed, the senate of Rome

157 Ammianus, xxx 10 Zosimus, l iv [c 19] p 222, 223 Tillemont has proved (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 707–709) that Gratian reigned in Italy, Africa and Illyricum I have endeavoured to express his authority over his brother's dominions, as he used it, in an ambiguous style

1 Such is the bad taste of Ammianus (xxvi 10), that it is not easy to distinguish his facts from his metaphors Yet he positively affirms that he saw the rotten carcase of a ship ad secundum lapidem, at Methone, or Modon, in Peloponnesus

2 The earthquakes and inundations are variously described by Libanius (Orat de ulciscendâ Juliani nece, c x in Fabricius, Bibl Græc. tom vii p 158, with a learned note of Olearius), Zosimus (l iv [c 18] p 221), Sozomen (l vi c. 2), Cedrenus (p 310, 314 [tom i p 543, 550 ed Bonn]), and Jerom (in Chron p 186 [tom viii. p 809 ed Vallars], and tom i p 250 in Vit Hilarion [tom ii p 36 ed Vallars]) Epidaurus must have been overwhelmed, had not the prudent citizens placed St Hilarion, an Egyptian monk on the beach He made the sign of the cross, the mountain wave stopped, bowed, and returned

3 Dicæarchus the Peripatetic composed a formal treatise to prove this obvious truth which is not the most honourable to the human species (Cicero de Officiis, ii 5)

4 The original Scythians of Herodotus (l. iv c 47–57 99–101) were confined by the Danube and the Palus Mæotis within a square of 4000 stadia (400 Roman miles) See D Anville (Mém de l Académie tom xxxv p 573–591) Diodorus Siculus (tom i l. ii [c 43] p 155 edit Wesseling) has marked the gradual progress of the name and nation.

5 The Tatars or Tartars were a primitive tribe the rivals and at length the subjects of the Moguls In the victorious armies of Zingis Khan and his successors the Tartars formed the vanguard and the name which first reached the ears of foreigners was applied to the whole nation (Fréret in the Hist de l Académie tom xviii p 60) In speaking of all or any of the northern shepherds of Europe or Asia I indifferently use the appellations of Scythians or Tartars

6 Imperium Asiæ ter quæsivere ipsi perpetuo ab alieno imperio aut intacti aut invicti mansere Since the time of Justin (ii 3) they have multiplied this account Voltaire in a few words (tom x p 64, Hist Générale c 156) has abridged the Tartar conquests

Oft o er the trembling nations from afar
Has Scythia breath d the living cloud of war

7 The fourth book of Herodotus affords a curious though imperfect portrait of the Scythians Among the moderns who describe the uniform scene the Khan of Khowaresm Abulghazi Bahadur expresses his native feelings and his Genealogical History of the Tatars has been copiously illustrated by the French and English editors Carpin Ascelin and Rubruquis (in the Hist des Voyages tom vii) represent the Moguls of the fourteenth century To these guides I have added Gerbillon and the other Jesuits (Description de la Chine par Du Halde tom iv) who accurately surveyed the Chinese Tartary and that honest and intelligent traveller Bell of Antermony (two volumes in 4to Glasgow 1763)

8 The Uzbeks are the most altered from their primitive manners 1 by the profession of the Mahometan religion and 2 by the possession of the cities and harvests of the Great Bucharia

9. Il est certain que les grands mangeurs de viande sont en général cruels et féroces plus que les autres hommes Cette observation est de tous les lieux et de tous les tems la barbarie Angloise est connue etc Emile de Rousseau tom. I p 274. Whatever we may think of the general observation we shall not easily allow the truth of his example The good natured complaints of Plutarch and the pathetic lamentations of Ovid seduce our reason by exciting our sensibility

10 These Tartar emigrations have been discovered by M de Guignes (Histoire des Huns tom 1 ii) a skilful and laborious interpreter of the Chinese language who has thus laid open new and important scenes in the history of mankind

11 A plain in the Chinese Tartary only eighty leagues from the great wall was found by the missionaries to be three thousand geometrical paces above the level of the sea Montesquieu who has used and abused the relations of travellers deduces the revolutions of Asia from this important circumstance that heat and cold weakness and strength touch each other without any temperate zone (The Spirit of Laws l. xvii c. 3)

12 Petit de la Croix (Vie de Gengiscan l. iii. c. 7) represents the full glory and extent of the Mogul chase The Jesuits Gerbillon and Verbiest followed the emperor Kamhi when he hunted in Tartary (Du Halde Description de la Chine tom. iv p 81 290 etc folio edit) His grandson Kienlong who unites the Tartar discipline with the laws and learning of China describes (Eloge de Moukden p 273-285) as a poet the pleasures which he had often enjoyed as a sportsman

13 See the second volume of the Genealogical History of the Tartars and the lists of the Khans at the end of the life of Gengis or Zingis. Under the reign of Timur or Tamerlane one of his subjects, a descendant of Zingis still bore the regal appellation of Khan and the conqueror of Asia contented himself with the title of Emir or Sultan Abulghazi part v c 4 D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 878

14 See the Diets of the ancient Huns (De Guignes tom ii p 26) and a curious description of those of Zingis (Vie de Gengiscan l i c 6 l iv c 11) Such assemblies are frequently mentioned in the Persian history of Timur though they served only to countenance the resolutions of their master

15 Montesquieu labours to explain a difference which has not existed between the liberty of the Arabs and the perpetual slavery of the Tartars (The Spirit of Laws l xvii c 5 l xviii c. 19 etc.)

16 Abulghazi Khan in the two first parts of his Genealogical History relates the miserable fables and traditions of the Uzbek Tartars concerning the times which preceded the reign of Zingis.

17 In the thirteenth book of the Iliad Jupiter turns away his eyes from the bloody fields of Troy to the plains of Thrace and Scythia. We would not by changing the prospect behold a more peaceful or innocent scene

20 These wars and heroes may be found under their respective titles in the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot They have been celebrated in an epic poem of sixty thousand rhymed couplets by Ferdusi the Homer of Persia See the history of Nadir Shah p 145 165 The public must lament that Mr Jones has suspended the pursuit of Oriental learning

21 The Caspian Sea with its rivers and adjacent tribes are laboriously illustrated in the Examen Critique des Historiens d Alexandre which compares the true geography and the errors produced by the vanity or ignorance of the Greeks.

22 The original seat of the nation appears to have been in the north west of China in the provinces of Chensi and Chansi Under the two first dynasties the principal town was still a moveable camp the villages were thinly scattered more land was employed in pasture than in tillage the exercise of hunting was ordained to clear the country from wild beasts, Petcheli (where Pekin stands) was a desert, and the southern provinces were peopled with Indian savages The dynasty of the Han (before Christ 206) gave the empire its actual form and extent

23 The era of the Chinese monarchy has been variously fixed from 2952 to 2132 years before Christ, and the year 2637 has been chosen for the lawful epoch by the authority of the present emperor The difference arises from the uncertain duration of the two first dynasties, and the vacant space that lies beyond them, as far as the real, or fabulous, times of Fohi or Hoangti Sematsien dates his authentic chronology from the year 841 the thirty six eclipses of Confucius (thirty one of which have been verified) were observed between the years 722 and 480 before Christ The historical period of China does not ascend above the Greek Olympiads

24 After several ages of anarchy and despotism, the dynasty of the Han (before Christ 206) was the era of the revival of learning The fragments of ancient literature were restored, the characters were improved and fixed, and the future preservation of books was secured by the useful inventions of ink, paper, and the art of printing Ninety seven years before Christ, Sematsien published the first history of China His labours were illustrated and continued by a series of one hundred and eighty historians The substance of their works is still extant, and the most considerable of them are now deposited in the king of France's library

25 China has been illustrated by the labours of the French, of the missionaries at Pekin, and Messrs Fréret and De Guignes at Paris The substance of the three preceding notes is extracted from the Chou king, with the preface and notes of M de Guignes, Paris, 1770, The Tong-Kien Kang-Mou, translated by the P de Mailla, under the name of Hist Générale de la Chine, tom. i p xlix–cc, the Mémoires sur la Chine, Paris, 1776, etc., tom i p 1–323, tom ii p 5–364 the Histoire des Huns, tom i p 1–131, tom v p 345–362 and the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom x p 377–402, tom xv p 495–564, tom xviii p 178–295, tom xxxvi p 164–238

26 See the Histoire Générale des Voyages, tom xviii and the Genealogical History, vol. ii p 620–664.

27 M de Guignes (tom ii p 1–124) has given the original history of the ancient Hiong nou, or Huns The Chinese geography of their country (tom i part ii p lv–lxiii) seems to comprise a part of their conquests

28 See in Du Halde (tom iv p 18–65) a circumstantial description, with a correct map, of the country of the Mongous

29 The Igours or Vigours were divided into three branches—hunters, shepherds and husbandmen and the last class was despised by the two former See Abulghazi, part ii c 7

30 Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxv p 17–33 The comprehensive view of M de Guignes has compared these distant events

31 The fame of Sovou, or So-ou, his merit, and his singular adventures, are still celebrated in China See the Eloge de Moukden, p 20, and notes, p 241–247, and Mémoires sur la Chine, tom iii p 317–360

32 See Isbrand Ives in Harris's Collection, vol ii p 931, Bell's Travels, vol i p 247–254, and Gmelin in the Hist Générale des Voyages, tom xviii p 283–329 They all remark the vulgar opinion, that the holy sea grows angry and tempestuous if any one presumes to call it a lake This grammatical nicety often excites a dispute between the absurd superstition of the mariners and the absurd obstinacy of travellers

33 The construction of the wall of China is mentioned by Du Halde (tom ii p 45) and De Guignes (tom ii p 59)

34 See the life of Lieoupang, or Kaoti, in the Hist de la Chine, published at Paris, 1777, etc, tom i p 442–522 This voluminous work is the translation (by the P de Mailla) of the Tong-Kien Kang-Mou, the celebrated abridgment of the great History of Semakouang (A D 1084) and his continuators

35 See a free and ample memorial, presented by a Mandarin to the emperor Venti (before Christ 180–157), in Du Halde (tom ii p 412–426), from a collection of State papers, marked with the red pencil by Kamhi himself (p 384–612) Another memorial from the minister of war (Kang-Mou, tom ii p 555) supplies some curious circumstances of the manners of the Huns

36 A supply of women is mentioned as a customary article of treaty and tribute (Hist de la Conquete de la Chine par les Tartares Mantcheoux, tom i p 186, 187, with the note of the editor)

37 De Guignes, Hist des Huns, tom ii p 62

38 See the reign of the emperor Vouti, in the Kang Mou tom iii p 1–98 His various and inconsistent character seems to be impartially drawn

39 This expression is used in the memorial to the emperor Venti (Du Halde, tom ii p 417) Without adopting the exaggerations of Marco Polo and Isaac Vossius, we may rationally allow for Pekin two millions of inhabitants The cities of the south, which contain the manufactures of China, are still more populous

40 See the Kang Mou, tom iii p 150, and the subsequent events under the proper years This memorable festival is celebrated in the Eloge de Moukden, and explained in a note by the P Gaubil, p 89 90

41 This inscription was composed on the spot by Pankou President of the Tribunal of History (Kang Mou tom iii. p 392) Similar monuments have been discovered in many parts of Tartary (Histoires des Huns, tom ii p 122)

42 M de Guignes (tom i p 189) has inserted a short account of the Sienpi

43 The era of the Huns is placed by the Chinese 1210 years before Christ But the series of their kings does not commence till the year 230 (Hist des Huns tom ii p 21 123)

44 The various accidents of the downfall and flight of the Huns are related in the Kang Mou tom iii p 88 91 95 139 etc The small numbers of each horde may be ascribed to their losses and divisions

45 M de Guignes has skilfully traced the foot steps of the Huns through the vast deserts of Tartary (tom ii p 123 277 etc 325 etc)

46 Mohammed sultan of Carizme reigned in Sogdiana when it was invaded (A D 1218) by Zingis and his Moguls The Oriental historians (see D Herbelot Petit de la Croix etc) celebrate the populous cities which he ruined and the fruitful country which he desolated In the next century the same provinces of Chorasmia and Mawaralnahr were described by Abulfeda (Hudson Geograph Minor tom iii) Their actual misery may be seen in the Genealogical History of the Tartars p 423–469

47 Justin (xli 6) has left a short abridgment of the Greek kings of Bactriana To their industry I should ascribe the new and extraordinary trade which transported the merchandises of India into Europe by the Oxus the Caspian the Cyrus the Phasis and the Euxine The other ways both of the land and sea were possessed by the Seleucides and the Ptolemies (See l Esprit des Loix l xxi)

49 In the thirteenth century the monk Rubruquis (who traversed the immense plain of Kipzak in his journey to the court of the Great Khan) observed the remarkable name of Hungary with the traces of a common language and origin (Hist des Voyages tom vii p 269)

50 Bell (vol i p 29–34) and the editors of the Genealogical History (p 539) have described the Calmucks of the Volga in the beginning of the present century

51 This great transmigration of 300 000 Calmucks or Torgouts happened in the year 1771 The original narrative of Kien long the reigning emperor of China which was intended for the inscription of a column has been translated by the missionaries of Pekin (Mémoires sur la Chine tom. i. p 401–418) The emperor affects the smooth and specious language of the Son of Heaven and the Father of his People

52 The Kang Mou (tom. iii p 447) ascribes to their conquests a space of 14 000 lis According to the present standard 200 lis (or more accurately 193) are equal to one degree of latitude and one English mile consequently exceeds three miles of China But there are strong reasons to believe that the ancient li scarcely equalled one half of the modern See the elaborate researches of M d Anville a geographer who is not a stranger in any age or climate of the globe (Mémoires de l Acad tom. ii p 125–502 Mesures Itinéraires p 154 167)

53 See the Histoire des Huns tom ii p 125 144 The subsequent history (p 145–277) of three or four Hunnic dynasties evidently proves that their martial spirit was not impaired by a long residence in China

54 Utque hominibus quietis et placidis otium est voluptabile ita illos pericula juvant et bella. Judicatur ibi beatus qui in prœlio profuderit animam sen scentes etiam et fortuitis mortibus mundo digressos ut degeneres et ignavos conviciis atrocibus insectantur [Ammian xxxi 2] We must think highly of the conquerors of such men.

55 On the subject of the Alani see Ammianus (xxxi 2) Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 24) M de Guignes (Hist des Huns tom. ii p 279) and the Genealogical History of the Tartars (tom. ii. p 617)

56 As we are possessed of the authentic history of the Huns it would be impertinent to repeat or to refute the fables which misrepresent their origin and progress their passage of the mud or water of the Mæotis in pursuit of an ox or stag les Indes qu ils avoient découvertes etc (Zosimus l. iv [c. 20] p 224 Sozomen l vi c 37 Procopius Hist. Miscell c 5 Jornandes c 24. Grandeur et Décadence etc des Romains c 17)

57 Prodigiosæ formæ et pandi ut bipedes existimes bestias vel quales in commarginandis pontibus effigiati stipites dolantur incompti Ammian. xxxi 2 Jornandes (c 24) draws a strong caricature of a Calmuck face Species pavendâ nigredine quædam deformis offa non facies habensque magis puncta quam lumina See Buffon, Hist. Naturelle tom iii p 380.

58 This execrable origin which Jornandes (c. 24) describes with the rancour of a Goth, might be originally derived from a more pleasing fable of the Greeks (Herodot l iv c 9 etc)

59 The Roxolani may be the fathers of the Pωs the Russians (D Anville Empire de Russie p. 1–10) whose residence (A D 862) about Novogrod Veliki cannot be very remote from that which the Geographer of Ravenna (i 12 iv 4 46 v 28, 30) assigns to the Roxolani (A D 886)

60 The text of Ammianus seems to be imperfect or corrupt but the nature of the ground explains, and almost defines the Gothic rampart. Mémoires de l Académie etc tom. xxviii p 444–462

61 M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe, tom vi. p 407) has conceived a strange idea that Alavivus was the same person as Ulphilas the Gothic bishop and that Ulphilas the grandson of a Cappadocian captive became a temporal prince of the Goths

62 Ammianus (xxxi 3) and Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 24) describe the subversion of the Gothic empire by the Huns.

63 The chronology of Ammianus is obscure and imperfect Tillemont has laboured to clear and settle the annals of Valens

64 Zosimus, l iv [c 20] p 223 Sozomen, l vi c 38 The Isaurians, each winter, infested the roads of Asia Minor, as far as the neighbourhood of Constantinople Basil, Epist ccl apud Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 106

65 The passage of the Danube is exposed by Ammianus (xxxi 3, 4), Zosimus (l iv [c 20] p 223, 224), Eunapius in Excerpt Legat (p 19, 20 [p 49, 50, ed Bonn]), and Jornandes (c 25, 26) Ammianus declares (c 5) that he means only ipsas rerum digerere summitates But he often takes a false measure of their importance, and his superfluous prolixity is disagreeably balanced by his unseasonable brevity

66 Chishull, a curious traveller, has remarked the breadth of the Danube, which he passed to the south of Bucharest, near the conflux of the Argish (p 77) He admires the beauty and spontaneous plenty of Mæsia, or Bulgaria

67 Quem qui scire velit, Libyci velit æquoris idem
Discere quam multæ Zephyro turbentur arenæ

Ammianus has inserted in his prose these lines of Virgil (Georgic l ii 105), originally designed by the poet to express the impossibility of numbering the different sorts of vines See Plin Hist Natur l xiv

68 Eunapius and Zosimus curiously specify these articles of Gothic wealth and luxury Yet it must be presumed that they were the manufactures of the provinces, which the barbarians had acquired as the spoils of war, or as the gifts or merchandise of peace

69 Decem libras, the word silver must be understood Jornandes betrays the passions and prejudices of a Goth The servile Greeks, Eunapius and Zosimus, disguise the Roman oppression, and execrate the perfidy of the barbarians Ammianus, a patriot historian, slightly and reluctantly touches on the odious subject Jerom, who wrote almost on the spot, is fair, though concise Per avaritiam Maximi ducis, ad rebellionem fame coacti sunt (in Chron [tom viii p 817, ed Vallars])

70 Ammianus, xxxi 4, 5

71 Vexillis de more sublatis, auditisque triste sonantibus classicis Ammian xxxi 5 These are the rauca cornua of Claudian (in Rufin ii 57), the large horns of the Uri, or wild bull—such as have been more recently used by the Swiss cantons of Uri and Unterwald (Simler de Republica Helvet l ii p 201, edit Fuselin Tigur 1734) Their military horn is finely, though perhaps casually, introduced in an original narrative of the battle of Nancy (A D 1477) "Attendant le combat le dit cor fut corné par trois fois, tant que le vent du souffleur pouvoit durer ce qui esbahit fort Monsieur de Bourgoigne, car déja à Morat l'avoit ouy" (See the Pièces Justificatives in the 4to edition of Philippe de Comines, tom. iii. p 493)

72 Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, c 26, p 648, edit Grot These splendidi panni (they are comparatively such) are undoubtedly transcribed from the larger histories of Priscus, Ablavius, or Cassiodorus

73 Cum populis suis longe ante suscepti We are ignorant of the precise date and circumstances of their transmigration

74 An imperial manufacture of shields, etc, was established at Hadrianople, and the populace were headed by the Fabricenses, or workmen (Vales ad Ammian xxxi 6)

75 Pacem sibi esse cum parietibus memorans Ammian xxxi 6

76 These mines were in the country of the Bessi, in the ridge of mountains, the Rhodope, that runs between Philippi and Philippopolis, two Macedonian cities, which derived their name and origin from the father of Alexander From the mines of Thrace he annually received the value, not the weight, of a thousand talents (£200,000)—a revenue which paid the phalanx and corrupted the orators of Greece See Diodor Siculus, tom ii l xvi [c 8] p 88, edit Wesseling Godefroy's Commentary on the Theodosian Code, tom iii p 496 Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom i p 676, 857 D'Anville, Geographie Ancienne, tom i p 336

77 As those unhappy workmen often ran away, Valens had enacted severe laws to drag them from their hiding places Cod Theodosian, l x tit xix. leg 5, 7

78 See Ammianus xxxi 5, 6 The historian of the Gothic war loses time and space by an unseasonable recapitulation of the ancient inroads of the barbarians

79 The Itinerary of Antoninus (p 226, 227, edit Wesseling) marks the situation of this place about sixty miles north of Tomi, Ovid's exile, and the name of Salices (the willows) expresses the nature of the soil

80 This circle of waggons, the Carrago, was the usual fortification of the barbarians (Vegetius de Re Militari, l iii c 10 Valesius ad Ammian xxxi 7) The practice and the name were preserved by their descendants as late as the fifteenth century The Charroy, which surrounded the Ost, is a word familiar to the readers of Froissart, or Comines

81 Statim ut accensi malleoli [Amm xxxi 7] I have used the literal sense of real torches or beacons but I almost suspect that it is only one of those turgid metaphors, those false ornaments, that perpetually disfigure the style of Ammianus

82 Indicant nunc usque albentes ossibus campi Ammian xxxi 7 The historian might have viewed these plains either as a soldier or as a traveller But his modesty has suppressed the adventures of his own life subsequent to the Persian wars of Constantius and Julian We are ignorant of the time when he quitted the service and retired to Rome, where he appears to have composed his History of his Own Times.

83 Ammian xxxi 8

84 Hanc Taifalorum gentem turpem et ob scenæ vitæ flagitus ita accipimus mersam ut apud eos nefandi concubitûs fœdere copulentur maribus puberes ætatis viriditatem in eorum pollutis usibus consumpturi Porro si qui jam adultus aprum exceperit solus vel interemerit ursum immanem colluvione liberatur incesti Ammian. xxxi 9 Among the Greeks likewise more especially among the Cretans the holy bands of friendship were confirmed and sullied by unnatural love

85 Ammian xxxi 8 9 Jerom (tom. i p 26 [tom. i p 342 ed Vallars]) enumerates the nations and marks a calamitous period of twenty years This epistle to Heliodorus was composed in the year 397 (Tillemont Mém. Ecclés tom xii p 645)

86 The field of battle Argentaria or Argentovaria is accurately fixed by M d Anville (Notice de l Ancienne Gaule p 96–99) at twenty three Gallic leagues or thirty four and a half Roman miles to the south of Strasburg From its ruins the adjacent town of Colmar has arisen

87 The full and impartial narrative of Ammianus (xxxi 10) may derive some additional light from the Epitome of Victor the Chronicle of Jerom and the History of Orosius (l. vii c 33 p 552 edit Havercamp)

88 Moratus paucissimos dies seditione popularium levium pulsus Ammian xxxi 11 Socrates (l iv c 38) supplies the dates and some circumstances

89. Vivosque omnes circa Mutinam Regiumque et Parmam Italica oppida rura culturos exterminavit Ammianus xxxi 9 Those cities and districts about ten years after the colony of the Taifalæ appear in a very desolate state See Muratori Dissertazioni sopra le Antichità Italiane tom. i. Dissertat xxi. p 354.

90. Ammian. xxxi 11 Zosimus l iv [c 23] p 228–230. The latter expatiates on the desultory exploits of Sebastian and despatches in a few lines the important battle of Hadrianople According to the ecclesiastical critics who hate Sebastian the praise of Zosimus is disgrace (Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom. v p 121) His prejudice and ignorance undoubtedly render him a very questionable judge of merit

91 Ammianus (xxxi. 12 13) almost alone describes the councils and actions which were terminated by the fatal battle of Hadrianople We might censure the vices of his style the disorder and perplexity of his narrative but we must now take leave of this impartial historian and reproach is silenced by our regret for such an irreparable loss.

92 The difference of the eight miles of Ammianus and the twelve of Idatius can only embarrass those critics (Valesius ad loc) who suppose a great army to be a mathematical point without space or dimensions

93. Nec ulla annalibus, præter Cannensem pugnam ita ad internecionem res legitur gesta Ammian xxxi 13 According to the grave Polybi no more than 370 horse and 3000 foot from the field of Cannæ 10 000 oners and the number of the slain amounted t 5630 horse and 70 000 foot (Polyb l iii [c 117] p 371 edit Casaubon in 8vo) Livy (xxii 49) somewhat less bloody he slaughters only 270c horse and 40 000 foot The Roman army was supposed to consist of 87 200 effective men (xxii 36)

95 Libanius de ulciscend Julian Nece c. 3 in Fabricius Bibliot Græc tom vii p 146–148

96 Valens had gained or rather purchased, the friendship of the Saracens whose vexatious inroads were felt on the borders of Phœnicia Palestine and Egypt The Christian faith had been lately introduced among a people reserved in a future age to propagate another religion (Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs tom v p 104 106 141 Mém Ecclés tom vii p 593)

97 Crinitus quidam nudus omnia præter pubem subraucum et lugubre strepens Ammian xxxi 16 and Vales ad loc The Arabs often fought naked—a custom which may be ascribed to their sultry climate and ostentatious bravery The description of this unknown savage is the lively portrait of Derar a name so dreadful to the Christians of Syria See Ockley s Hist of the Saracens, vol. i. p 72 84 87

98 The series of events may still be traced in the last pages of Ammianus (xxxi 15 16) Zosimus (l. iv [c 22] p 227 231) whom we are now reduced to cherish misplaces the sally of the Arabs before the death of Valens Eunapius (in Excerpt. Legat. p 20 [p 51 ed Bonn]) praises the fertility of Thrace Macedonia etc

99 Observe with how much indifference Cæsar relates in the Commentaries of the Gallic war that he put to death the whole senate of the Veneti, who had yielded to his mercy (iii 16) that he laboured to extirpate the whole nation of the Eburones (vi 43) that forty thousand persons were massacred at Bourges by the just revenge of his soldiers who spared neither age nor sex (vii. 2) etc

100 Such are the accounts of the sack of Magdeburg by the ecclesiastic and the fisherman, which Mr Harte has transcribed (Hist of Gustavus Adolphus vol. i. p 313–320) with some apprehension of violating the dignity of history

testis Thracia, testis in quo ortus sum solum (Pannonia), ubi præter cœlum et terram, et crescentes vepres, et condensa silvarum cuncta perierunt Tom vii. p 250, ad 1 Cap Sophonias and tom. i. p 26 [tom. i. p 342, ed Vallars]

102 Eunapius (in Excerpt. Legat. p 20 [p 50, ed. Bonn]) foolishly supposes a preternatural growth of the young Goths, that he may introduce Cadmus s armed men, who sprung from the dragon's teeth, etc Such was the Greek eloquence of the times

103. Ammianus evidently approves this execution, efficacia velox et salutaris, which concludes his work (xxxi 16) Zosimus, who is curious and copious (l. iv [c 26] p 233–236), mistakes the date, and labours to find the reason why Julius did not consult the emperor Theodosius, who had not yet ascended the throne of the East

104. A life of Theodosius the Great was composed in the last century (Paris, 1679, in 4to, 1680, in 12mo), to inflame the mind of the young dauphin with Catholic zeal. The author, Flechier, afterwards bishop of Nismes, was a celebrated preacher, and his history is adorned or tainted with pulpit eloquence, but he takes his learning from Baronius, and his principles from St Ambrose and St Augustin

105. The birth, character, and elevation of Theodosius, are marked in Pacatus (in Panegyr Vet. xii. 10, 11, 12), Themistius (Orat xiv p 182), Zosimus (l iv [c. 24] p 231), Augustine (The City of God, v 26), Orosius (l. vii. c. 34), Sozomen (l. vii. c 2), Socrates (l v c. 2), Theodoret (l. v c. 5), Philostorgius (l ix c. 17, with Godefroy, p 393), the Epitome of Victor, and the Chronicles of Prosper, Idatius, and Marcellinus, in the Thesaurus Temporum of Scaliger

106 Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom. v p 716, etc

107 Italica, founded by Scipio Africanus for his wounded veterans of Italy The ruins still appear, about a league above Seville, but on the opposite bank of the river See the Hispania Illustrata of Nonius—a short though valuable treatise—c. xvii. p 64–67

108 I agree with Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 726), in suspecting the royal pedigree, which remained a secret till the promotion of Theodosius Even after that event, the silence of Pacatus outweighs the venal evidence of Themistius, Victor, and Claudian, who connect the family of Theodosius with the blood of Trajan and Hadrian.

109. Pacatus compares, and consequently prefers the youth of Theodosius, to the military education of Alexander, Hannibal, and the second Africanus, who, like him, had served under their fathers (xii. 8)

110. Ammianus (xxix 6) mentions this victory of Theodosius Junior Dux Mœsiæ, primâ etiam tum lanugine juvenis, princeps postea perspectissimus. The same fact is attested by Themistius and Zosimus, but Theodoret (l v c 5), who adds some curious circumstances, strangely applies it to the time of the interregnum.

111 Pacatus (in Panegyr Vet xii 9) prefers the rustic life of Theodosius to that of Cincinnatus, the one was the effect of choice, the other of poverty

112 M. d Anville (Geographie Ancienne, tom i. p 25) has fixed the situation of Caucha, or Coca, in the old province of Gallicia, where Zosimus and Idatius have placed the birth or patrimony of Theodosius

113 Let us hear Ammianus himself Hæc, ut miles quondam at Græcus, a principatu Cæsaris Nervæ exorsus, adusque Valentis interitum, pro virium explicavi mensura opus veritatem professum nunquam, ut arbitror, sciens, silentio ausus corrumpere vel mendacio Scribant reliqua potiores ætate, doctrinisque florentes Quos id, si libuerit, aggressuros, procudere linguas ad majores moneo stilos Ammian. xxxi. 16 The first thirteen books a superficial epitome of two hundred and fifty-seven years, are now lost, the last eighteen, which contain no more than twenty-five years, still preserve the copious and authentic history of his own times

114. Ammianus was the last subject of Rome who composed a profane history in the Latin language The East, in the next century, produced some rhetorical historians, Zosimus, Olympiodorus, Malchus, Candidus, etc. See Vossius de Historicis Græcis, l. ii. c. 18, de Historicis Latinis, l. ii c 10, etc

115. Chrysostom, tom. i. p 344, edit. Montfaucon I have verified and examined this passage, but I should never, without the aid of Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom. v p 152), have detected an historical anecdote in a strange medley of moral and mystic exhortations addressed, by the preacher of Antioch, to a young widow

116 Eunapius, in Excerpt. Legation p 21 [p 52, ed Bonn]

117 See Godefroy's Chronology of the Laws Codex Theodos tom. i. Prolegomen p xcix.–civ

118 Most writers insist on the illness and long repose of Theodosius at Thessalonica Zosimus, to diminish his glory, Jornandes, to favour the Goths and the ecclesiastical writers, to introduce his baptism

119 Compare Themistius (Orat xiv p 181) with Zosimus (l. iv [c. 25] p 232), Jornandes (c xxvii p 649), and the prolix Commentary of M de Buat (Hist des Peuples, etc , tom. vi p 477–552) The Chronicles of Idatius and Marcellinus allude, in general terms to magna certamina magna multaque prœlia The two epithets are not easily reconciled

120 Zosimus (l iv [c 25] p 232) styles him a Scythian a name which the more recent Greeks seem to have appropriated to the Goths.

121 The reader will not be displeased to see the original words of Jornandes or the author whom he transcribed Regiam urbem ingressus est mi ransque En inquit cerno quod sæpe incredulus audiebam famam videlicet tantæ urbis Et huc illuc oculos volvens nunc situm urbis commea tumque navium nunc mœnia clara prospectans miratur populosque diversarum gentium quasi fonte in uno e diversis partibus scaturiente undâ sic quoque militem ordinatum aspiciens Deus, in quit sine dubio est terrenus Imperator et quisquis adversus eum manum moverit ipse sui sanguinis reus existit Jornandes (c xxviii p 650) proceeds to mention his death and funeral.

122 Jornandes c xxviii p 650 Even Zosimus (l iv [c 34] p 246) is compelled to approve the generosity of Theodosius so honourable to himself and so beneficial to the public

123 The short but authentic hints in the Fasti of Idatius (Chron Scaliger p 52) are stained with contemporary passion The fourteenth oration of Themistius is a compliment to Peace and the con sul Saturninus (A D 383)

The opima were the spoils which a Roman general could only win from the king or general of the enemy whom he had slain with his own hands and no more than three such examples are cele brated in the victorious ages of Rome

128 See Themistius Orat xvi p 211 Claudian (in Eutrop l. ii. 152) mentions the Phrygian col ony —

———Ostrogothis colitur mistisque Gruthungis Phryx ager———

and then proceeds to nam the rivers of Lydia the Pactolus and Hermus

129 Compare Jornandes (c 21 28) who marks the condit on and number of the Gothic Federati with Zosimus (l iv p 258) who mentions their golden collars and Pacatus (in Panegyr Vet xii 37) who applauds, with false or foolish joy their bra ery and discipline.

130 Amator pacis generisque Gothorum is the praise bestowed by the Gothic historian (c. xxix.) who represents his nation as innocent, peaceable men slow to anger and patient of injuries. According to Livy the Romans conquered the world in their own defence.

131 Besides the partial invectives of Zosimus (always discontented with the Christian reigns) see the grave representations which Synesius addresses to the emperor Arcadius (de Regno, p. 25, 26 edit Petav [Paris, 1612]) The philosophic bishop of Cyrene was near enough to judge and he was sufficiently removed from the temptation of fear or flattery

132 Themistius (Orat. xvi p 211 212) composes an elaborate and rational apology which is not however exempt from the puerilities of Greek rhetoric Orpheus could only charm the wild beasts of Thrace but Theodosius enchanted the men and women whose predecessors in the same country had torn Orpheus in pieces etc.

133 Constantinople was deprived, half a day of the public allowance of bread to expiate the murder of a Gothic soldier κ νο ντες τὸ Σκυθικὸν was the guilt of the people Libanius, Orat. xii. p. 394 edit Morel

134. Zosimus l. iv [c 48] p 267–271 He tells a long and ridiculous story of the adventurous prince who roved the country with only five horsemen of a spy whom they detected whipped, and killed in an old woman s cottage etc.

135 Compare Eunapius (in Excerpt Legat. p 21 22 [p 53 54 ed Bonn] with Zosimus (l iv [c 56] p 279) The difference of circumstances and names must undoubtedly be applied to the same story Fravitta, or Travitta was afterwards consul (A D 401) and still continued his faithful service to the eldest son of Theodosius (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs tom v p 467)

136 Les Goths ravagèrent tout depuis le Danube jusqu au Bosphore exterminèrent Valens et son armée et ne repassèrent le Danube que pour abandonner l affreuse solitude qu ils avoient faite (Œuvres de Montesquieu tom iii. p. 479 Considérations sur les Causes de la Grandeur et de la Décadence des Romains c xvii) The president Montesquieu seems ignorant that the Goths after the defeat of Valens never abandoned the Roman territory It is now thirty years, says Claudian (de Bello Getico 166 etc. A D 404)

Ex quo jam patrios gens hæc oblita Triones
Atque Istrum transvecta semel vestigia fixit
Threicio funesta solo———

The error is inexcusable since it disguises the principal and immediate cause of the fall of the Western empire of Rome.

Chapter XXVII

1 Valentinian was less attentive to the religion of his son, since he intrusted the education of Gratian to Ausonius, a professed Pagan (Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom xv p 125–138) The poetical fame of Ausonius condemns the taste of his age

2 Ausonius was successively promoted to the Prætorian præfecture of Italy (A D 377) and of Gaul (A D 378), and was at length invested with the consulship (A D 379) He expressed his gratitude in a servile and insipid piece of flattery (Actio Gratiarum, p 699–736 [ed Toll Amst 1671]), which has survived more worthy productions

3 Disputare de principali judicio non oportet Sacrilegii enim instar est dubitare, an is dignus sit, quem elegerit imperator Codex Justinian l ix tit. xxix leg 2 This convenient law was revived and promulgated, after the death of Gratian, by the feeble court of Milan

4 Ambrose composed, for his instruction, a theological treatise on the faith of the Trinity and Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 158, 169) ascribes to the archbishop the merit of Gratian s intolerant laws

5 Qui divinæ legis sanctitatem [aut] nesciendo omittunt, aut negligendo violant, et offendunt, sacrilegium committunt Codex Justinian l ix tit xxix. leg 1 Theodosius indeed may claim his share in the merit of this comprehensive law

6 Ammianus (xxxi 10) and the younger Victor [Epit c 47] acknowledge the virtues of Gratian, and accuse, or rather lament, his degenerate taste The odious parallel of Commodus is saved by "licet incruentus," and perhaps Philostorgius (l x c. 10 [5], and Godefroy, p 412) had guarded, with some similar reserve, the comparison of Nero

7 Zosimus (l iv [c. 35] p 247) and the younger Victor ascribe the revolution to the favour of the Alani and the discontent of the Roman troops Dum exercitum negligeret, et paucos ex Alanis quos ingenti auro ad se transtulerat, anteferret veteri ac Romano militi [Epit c 47]

8 Britannia fertilis provincia tyrannorum, is a memorable expression used by Jerom in the Pelagian controversy, and variously tortured in the disputes of our national antiquaries The revolutions of the last age appeared to justify the image of the sublime Bossuet, "cette ile, plus orageuse que les mers qui l environnent"

9. Zosimus says of the British soldiers, τῶν ἄλλων ἁπάντων πλέον αὐθαδείᾳ καὶ θυμῷ νικωμένους [l c.]

10. Helena the daughter of Eudda Her chapel may still be seen at Caersegont, now Caer narvon (Carte s Hist of England, vol i p 168, from Rowland s Mona Antiqua) The prudent reader may not perhaps be satisfied with such Welch evidence.

11 Camden (vol i introduct p ci) appoints him governor of Britain, and the father of our antiquities is followed, as usual, by his blind progeny Pacatus and Zosimus had taken some pains to prevent this error or fable, and I shall protect myself by their decisive testimonies Regali habitú exulem suum, illi exules orbis induerunt (in Panegyr Vet xii 23), and the Greek historian still less equivocally, αυτος (Maximus) δὲ οὐδὲ εἰς ἀρχὴν εντιμον ἔτυχε προελθων (l iv [c 35] p 248)

12 Sulpicius Severus, Dialog ii 7 Orosius, l vii c 34, p 556 They both acknowledge (Sulpicius had been his subject) his innocence and merit It is singular enough that Maximus should be less favourably treated by Zosimus, the partial adversary of his rival

13 Archbishop Usher (Antiquitat Britan Eccles p 107, 108) has diligently collected the legends of the island and the continent The whole emigration consisted of 30,000 soldiers and 100,000 plebeians, who settled in Bretagne Their destined brides, St Ursula with 11,000 noble and 60,000 plebeian virgins, mistook their way, landed at Cologne, and were all most cruelly murdered by the Huns But the plebeian sisters have been defrauded of their equal honours, and, what is still harder, John Trithemius presumes to mention the children of these British virgins

14 Zosimus (l iv [c 35] p 248, 249) has transported the death of Gratian from Lugdunum in Gaul (Lyons) to Singidunum in Mæsia Some hints may be extracted from the Chronicles, some lies may be detected in Sozomen (l vii c 13) and Socrates (l v c 11) Ambrose is our most authentic evidence (tom i Enarrat in Psalm lxi p 961, tom ii Epist xxiv p 888, etc., and de Obitu Valentinian Consolat No 28, p 1182)

15 Pacatus (xii 28) celebrates his fidelity, while his treachery is marked in Prosper's Chronicle as the cause of the ruin of Gratian Ambrose, who has occasion to exculpate himself, only condemns the death of Vallio, a faithful servant of Gratian (tom ii Epist xxiv p 891, edit Benedict)

16 He protested, nullum ex adversariis nisi in acie occubuisse. Sulp Severus in Vit B Martin c 23 The orator of Theodosius bestows reluctant, and therefore weighty, praise on his clemency Si cui ille, pro ceteris, sceleribus, suit minus crudelis fuisse videtur (Panegyr Vet xii 28)

17 Ambrose mentions the laws of Gratian quas non abrogavit hostis (tom ii Epist xvii p 827)

18 Zosimus, l iv [c. 37] p 251, 252 We may disclaim his odious suspicions, but we cannot reject the treaty of peace which the friends of Theodosius have absolutely forgotten or slightly mentioned

19 Their oracle, the archbishop of Milan, assigns to his pupil Gratian an high and respectable place in heaven (tom ii de Obit Val Consol p 1193)

20 For the baptism of Theodosius see Sozomen (l vii c. 4) Socrates (l v c 6) and Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 728)

21 Ascolius or Acholius was honoured by the friendship and the praises of Ambrose who styles him murus fidei atque sanctitatis (tom ii Epist xv p 820) and afterwards celebrates his speed and diligence in running to Constantinople Italy etc (Epist xvi p 822)—a virtue which does not appertain either to a wall or a bishop

22 Codex Theodos l. xvi tit i. leg 2 with Godefroy's Commentary tom vi p 5–9 Such an edict deserved the warmest praises of Baronius auream sanctionem edictum pium et salutare — sic itur ad astra

23 Sozomen l vii c. 6 Theodoret l v c 16 Tillemont is displeased (Mém Ecclés tom vi p 627 628) with the terms of rustic bishop obscure city Yet I must take leave to think that both Amphilochius and Iconium were objects of inconsiderable magnitude in the Roman empire

24 Sozomen l vii c 5 Socrates l v c 7 Marcellin in Chron The account of forty years must be dated from the election or intrusion of Eusebius who wisely exchanged the bishopric of Nicomedia for the throne of Constantinople

25 See Jortin s Remarks on Ecclesiastical History vol. iv p 71 The thirty third Oration of Gregory Nazianzen affords indeed some similar ideas even some still more ridiculous but I have not yet found the words of this remarkable passage, which I allege on the faith of a correct and liberal scholar

26 See the thirty second Oration of Gregory Nazianzen and the account of his own life which he has composed in 1800 iambics Yet every physician is prone to exaggerate the inveterate nature of the disease which he has cured

27 I confess myself deeply indebted to the two Lives of Gregory Nazianzen composed with very different views by Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom ix p 305–560 692–731) and Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle tom. xviii p 1–128)

28 Unless Gregory Nazianzen mistook thirty years in his own age he was born as well as his friend Basil about the year 329. The preposterous chronology of Suidas has been graciously received because it removes the scandal of Gregory s father a saint likewise begetting children after he became a bishop (Tillemont Mém Ecclés. tom ix. p 693–697)

29. Gregory s Poem on his own Life contains some beautiful lines (tom. ii p 8 [ed Paris 1609]) which burst from the heart and speak the pangs of injured and lost friendship —

πόνοι κοινοὶ λόγων
Ὁμόστεγός τε καὶ συνέστιος βίος
Νοῦς εἷς ἐν ἀμφοῖν
Διεσκέδασται πάντα ἔρριπται χαμαί.
Αὖραι φέρουσι τὰς παλαιὰς ἐλπίδας

In the Midsummer Night s Dream Helena addresses the same pathetic complaint to her friend Hermia —

Is all the counsel that we two have shared,
The sisters vows etc.

Shakspeare had never read the poems of Gregory Nazianzen he was ignorant of the Greek language but his mother tongue the language of Nature is the same in Cappadocia and in Britain.

30 This unfavourable portrait of Sasima is drawn by Gregory Nazianzen (tom. ii. de Vita suâ p 7 8) Its precise situation forty nine miles from Archelais and thirty two from Tyana, is fixed in the Itinerary of Antoninus (p 144, edit. Wesseling)

31 The name of Nazianzus has been immortalised by Gregory but his native town under the Greek or Roman title of Diocæsarea (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom. ix p 692) is mentioned by Pliny (vi 3) Ptolemy and Hierocles (Itinerar Wesseling p 709) It appears to have been situate on the edge of Isauria

32 See Ducange Constant Christiana, l iv p 141 142 The θεία δύναμις of Sozomen (l. vii c. 5) is interpreted to mean the Virgin Mary

33 Tillemont (Mém Ecclés. tom ix p. 432 etc) diligently collects enlarges and explains, the oratorical and poetical hints of Gregory himself.

34 He pronounced an oration (tom i. Orat. xxiii p 409) in his praise but after their quarrel the name of Maximus was changed into that of Heron (see Jerom tom i in Catalog Script Eccles p 301 [tom ii p 930 ed Vallars]) I touch slightly on these obscure and personal squabbles.

35 Under the modest emblem of a dream, Gregory (tom ii Carmen ix p 78) describes his own success with some human complacency Yet it should seem from his familiar conversation with his auditor St. Jerom (tom i Epist. ad Nepotian. p 14 [tom i p 261 ed Vallars]) that the preacher understood the true value of popular applause

36 Lacrimæ auditorum laudes tuæ sint is the lively and judicious advice of St Jerom (loc cit.)

37 Socrates (l v c. 7) and Sozomen (l. vii c 5) relate the evangelical words and actions of Damophilus without a word of approbation. He considered says Socrates that it is difficult to resist the powerful but it was easy and would have been profitable to submit

38 See Gregory Nazianzen tom. ii. de Vitâ suâ p 21 22 For the sake of posterity the bishop of Constantinople records a stupendous prodigy In the month of November it was a cloudy morning but the sun broke forth when the procession entered the church.

39 Of the three ecclesiastical historians, Theodoret alone (l. v c. 2) has mentioned this important commission of Sapor which Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 728) judiciously removes from the reign of Gratian to that of Theodosius.

40 I do not reckon Philostorgius, though he mentions (l ix c 19) the expulsion of Damophilus The Eunomian historian has been carefully strained through an orthodox sieve

41 Le Clerc has given a curious extract (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom xviii p 91–105) of the theological sermons which Gregory Nazianzen pronounced at Constantinople against the Arians, Eunomians, Macedonians, etc. He tells the Macedonians, who deified the Father and the Son, without the Holy Ghost, that they might as well be styled Tritheists as Ditheists Gregory himself was almost a Tritheist, and his monarchy of heaven resembles a well regulated aristocracy

42 The first general council of Constantinople now triumphs in the Vatican, but the popes had long hesitated, and their hesitation perplexes and almost staggers the humble Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom ix p 499, 500)

43 Before the death of Meletius, six or eight of his most popular ecclesiastics, among whom was Flavian, had abjured, for the sake of peace, the bishopric of Antioch (Sozomen, l vii c 3, 11, Socrates, l. v c 5) Tillemont thinks it his duty to disbelieve the story, but he owns that there are many circumstances in the life of Flavian which seem inconsistent with the praises of Chrysostom and the character of a saint (Mem Ecclés tom x. p 541)

44 Consult Gregory Nazianzen, de vitâ suâ, tom ii p 25–28 His general and particular opinion of the clergy and their assemblies may be seen in verse and prose (tom i Orat i p 33, Epist lv p 814, tom ii, Carmen x p 81) Such passages are faintly marked by Tillemont, and fairly produced by Le Clerc

45 See Gregory, tom ii de Vitâ suâ, p 28–31 The fourteenth, twenty-seventh, and thirty second Orations were pronounced in the several stages of this business The peroration of the last (tom i p 528), in which he takes a solemn leave of men and angels, the city and the emperor, the East and the West, etc., is pathetic, and almost sublime.

46 The whimsical ordination of Nectarius is attested by Sozomen (l vii c. 8), but Tillemont observes (Mém Ecclés tom ix p 719), Après tout, ce narré de Sozomène est si honteux pour tous ceux qu il y mêle, et surtout pour Théodose, qu il vaut mieux travailler à le détruire qu à le soutenir an admirable canon of criticism!

47 I can only be understood to mean that such was his natural temper when it was not hardened or inflamed by religious zeal From his retirement he exhorts Nectarius to prosecute the heretics of Constantinople

48 See the Theodosian Code, l xvi tit v leg 6–23, with Godefroy's commentary on each law, and his general summary, or Paratitlon, tom vi p 104–110

49 They always kept their Easter, like the Jewish Passover, on the fourteenth day of the first moon after the vernal equinox and thus pertinaciously opposed the Roman church and Nicene synod, which had fixed Easter to a Sunday Bingham's Antiquities, l xx. c 5, vol ii p 309, fol edit

50 Sozomen, l vii c. 12

51 See the Sacred History of Sulpicius Severus (l ii p 437–452, edit Lugd Bat. 1647), a correct and original writer Dr Lardner (Credibility, etc., part ii vol ix p 256–350) has laboured this article with pure learning, good sense, and moderation Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom viii p 491–527) has raked together all the dirt of the fathers—an useful scavenger!

52 Sulpicius Severus mentions the arch heretic with esteem and pity Felix profecto, si non pravo studio corrupisset optimum ingenium, prorsus multa in eo animi et corporis bona cerneres (Hist Sacra, l ii p 439) Even Jerom (tom i in Script Eccles p 302 [tom ii p 934, ed Vallars]) speaks with temper of Priscillian and Latronian

53 The bishopric (in Old Castile) is now worth 20,000 ducats a year (Busching's Geography, vol ii p 308), and is therefore much less likely to produce the author of a new heresy

54 Exprobrabatur mulieri viduæ nimia religio, et diligentius culta divinitas (Pacat in Panegyr Vet xii 29) Such was the idea of a humane though ignorant polytheist

55 One of them was sent in Syllinam insulam quæ ultra Britanniam est What must have been the ancient condition of the rocks of Scilly (Camden s Britannia, vol ii p 1519)?

56 The scandalous calumnies of Augustin, pope Leo, etc, which Tillemont swallows like a child, and Lardner refutes like a man, may suggest some candid suspicions in favour of the older Gnostics

57 Ambrose tom ii Epist xxiv p 891

58 In the Sacred History, and the Life of St Martin, Sulpicius Severus uses some caution but he declares himself more freely in the Dialogues (iii 15) Martin was reproved, however, by his own conscience and by an angel nor could he afterwards perform miracles with so much ease

59 The catholic presbyter (Sulp Sever l ii p 448), and the Pagan orator (Pacat in Panegyr Vet xii 29), reprobate with equal indignation the character and conduct of Ithacius

60 The Life of St Martin, and the Dialogues concerning his miracles, contain facts adapted to the grossest barbarism in a style not unworthy of the Augustin age So natural is the alliance between good taste and good sense, that I am always astonished by this contrast

61 The short and superficial Life of St Ambrose by his deacon Paulinus (Appendix ad edit Benedict p i–xv) has the merit of original evidence Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom x. p 78–306) and the Benedictine editors (p xxxi–lxiii) have laboured with their usual diligence.

62 Ambrose himself (tom ii Epist xxiv p 888–891) gives the emperor a very spirited account of his own embassy

63 His own representation of his principles and conduct (tom ii. Epist xx. xxi xxii. p 852–880) is one of the curious monuments of ecclesiastical antiquity It contains two letters to his sister Marcellina with a petition to Valentinian and the sermon de Basil cis non tradendis

64. Retz had a similar message from the queen to request that he would appease the tumult of Paris. It was no longer in his power etc. A quoi j ajoutai tout ce que vous pouvez vous imaginer de respect de douleur de regret et de soumission etc. (Mémoires tom i p 140) Certainly I do not compare either the causes or the men yet the coadjutor himself had some idea (p 84) of imitating St Ambrose

65 Sozomen alone (l vii c. 13) throws this luminous fact into a dark and perplexed narrative.

66 Excubabat pia plebs in ecclesiâ mori parata cum episcopo suo Nos adhuc frigidi excitabamur tamen civitate attonitâ atque turbatâ Augustine Confessions ix 15

67 Tillemont Mém. Ecclés tom ii. p 78 498. Many churches in Italy Gaul etc were dedicated to these unknown martyrs, of whom St. Gervase seems to have been more fortunate than his companion.

68. Invenimus miræ magnitudinis viros duos ut prisca ætas ferebat tom ii Epist xxii p 875 The size of these skeletons was fortunately or skilfully suited to the popular prejudice of the gradual decrease of the human stature, which has prevailed in every age since the time of Homer

Grandiaque effossis mirabitur ossa sepulchris

69 Ambros tom ii Epist xxii p 875. Augustine Confessions, ix 16 The City of God l. xxii. c. 8 Paulin in Vitâ St Ambros. c. 14 in Append. Bened et p 4 The blind man s name was Severus he touched the holy garment recovered his sight and devoted the rest of his life (at least twenty five years) to the service of the church. I should recommend this miracle to our divines if it did not prove the worship of relics as well as the Nicene creed

70. Paulin in Vit. St Ambros c. 5 [15] in Append Bened et p 5

71 Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom. x. p. 109, 750. He partially allows the mediation of Theodosius and capriciously rejects that of Maximus, though it is attested by Prosper Sozomen and Theodoret.

72 The modest censure of Sulpicius (Dialog iii. 15 [p 5 6]) inflicts a much deeper wound than the feeble declamation of Pacatus (xii. 25, 26)

73 Esto tutior ad eius hominem, pacis involucro [bellum] tegentem was the wise caution of Ambrose (tom. ii. p 891) after his return from his second embassy

74 Baronius (A.D 387, No. 63) applies to this season of public distress some of the penitential sermons of the archbishop

75 The flight of Valentinian and the love of Theodosius for his sister are related by Zosimus (l. iv [c. 43] p 263 264) Tillemont produces some weak and ambiguous evidence to antedate the second marriage of Theodosius (Hist. des Empereurs tom. v p 740) and consequently to refute ces contes de Zosime qui seroient trop contraires à la piéte de Théodose.

76 See Godefroy s Chronology of the Laws Cod Theodos tom i p. cxix.

77 Besides the hints which may be from chronicles and ecclesiastical history Zosimus (l. iv [c. 40, seq] p. 259–267) Orosius (l. vii. c. 35) and Pacatus (in Panegyr Vet. xii 30-47) supply the loose and scanty materials of this civil war Ambrose (tom ii Epist. xl. p. 952–953) darkly alludes to the well known events of a magazine surprised an action at Petovio a Sicilian, perhaps a naval victory etc Ausonius (p. 256, edit Toll) applauds the peculiar merit and good fortune of Aquileia.

78 Quam promptum laudare principem, tam tutum siluisse de principe (Pacat in Panegyr Vet. xii. 2) Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, a native of Gaul pronounced this oration at Rome (A.D. 388) He was afterwards proconsul of Africa and his friend Ausonius praises him as a poet second only to Virgil. See Tillemont Hist. des Empereurs, tom. v p. 303.

79. See the fair portrait of Theodosius by the younger Victor the strokes are distinct and the colours are mixed The praise of Pacatus is too vague and Claudian always seems afraid of exalting the father above the son

80 Ambros tom ii Epist xl. p 955. Pacatus, from the want of skill or of courage omits this glorious circumstance

81 Pacat. in Panegyr Vet xii. 20.

82 Zosimus l. iv [c 50] p 271 27 His partial evidence is marked by an air of candour and truth. He observes these vicissitudes of sloth and activity not as a vice but as a singularity in the character of Theodosius.

83 This choleric temper is acknowledged and excused by Victor [Epit c 48] Sed habes (says Ambrose in decent and manly language to his sovereign) naturæ impetum quem si quis lenire velit, cito vertes ad misericordiam. si quis stimulet, in magis exsuscitas ut eum revocare vix possis (tom. ii. Epist li p 998) Theodosius (Claud in iv Cons. Hon 266 etc.) exhorts his son to moderate his anger

84 The Christians and Pagans agreed in believing that the sedition of Antioch was excited by the dæmons. A gigantic woman (says Sozomen, l vii c 23) paraded the streets with a scourge in her hand An old man says Libanius (Orat xii. p 396) transformed himself into a youth, then a boy etc.

85 Zosimus in his short and disingenuous account (l. i [c 41] p 258 259) is certainly mistaken in sending Libanius himself to Constantinople His own orations fix him at Antioch.

86 Libanius (Orat i. p 6, edit Venet.) declares that under such a reign the fear of a massa-

ere was groundless and absurd, especially in the emperor's absence for his presence, according to the eloquent slave, might have given a sanction to the most bloody acts

87 Laodicea, on the sea coast, sixty five miles from Antioch (see Noris, Epoch Syro Maced Dissert III p 230) The Antiochians were offended that the dependent city of Seleucia should presume to intercede for them

88 As the days of the tumult depend on the moveable festival of Easter, they can only be determined by the previous determination of the year The year 387 has been preferred, after a laborious inquiry, by Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 741-744) and Montfaucon (Chrysostom, tom XIII p 105-110)

89 Chrysostom opposes their courage, which was not attended with much risk, to the cowardly flight of the Cynics

90 The sedition of Antioch is represented in a lively and almost dramatic manner by two orators who had their respective shares of interest and merit See Libanius (Orat XIV XV [XII XIII] p 389-420, edit Morel Orat I p 1-14 Venet 1754) and the twenty orations of St John Chrysostom, de Statuis (tom II p 1-225, edit Montfaucon) I do not pretend to much personal acquaintance with Chrysostom but Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 263-283) and Hermant (Vie de St Chrysostome, tom I p 137-224) had read him with pious curiosity and diligence

91 The original evidence of Ambrose (tom II Epist li p 998), Augustine (The City of God, v 26), and Paulinus (in Vit Ambros c 24) is delivered in vague expressions of horror and pity It is illustrated by the subsequent and unequal testimonies of Sozomen (l VII c 25), Theodoret (l v c 17), Theophanes (Chronograph p 62 [tom I p 113 ed Bonn]), Cedrenus (p 317 [tom I p 556 ed Bonn]), and Zonaras (tom II l XIII [c 18] p 34) Zosimus alone, the partial enemy of Theodosius most unaccountably passes over in silence the worst of his actions

92 See the whole transaction in Ambrose (tom II Epist. xl. xli p 946-956) and his biographer Paulinus (c. 23) Bayle and Barbeyrac (Morales des Pères, c XVII p 325, etc.) have justly condemned the archbishop

93 His sermon is a strange allegory of Jeremiah s rod of an almond tree, of the woman who washed and anointed the feet of Christ But the peroration is direct and personal

94 Hodie, Episcope de me proposuisti Ambrose modestly confessed it but he sternly reprimanded Timesius general of the horse and foot who had presumed to say that the monks of Callinicum deserved punishment

95 Yet, five years afterwards when Theodosius was absent from his spiritual guide he tolerated the Jews, and condemned the destruction of their synagogues Cod Theodos l XVI tit VIII leg 9 with Godefroy s Commentary tom VI p 225

96 Ambros tom II Epist li p 997-1001 His epistle is a miserable rhapsody on a noble subject Ambrose could act better than he could write His compositions are destitute of taste or genius without the spirit of Tertullian, the copious elegance of Lactantius, the lively wit of Jerom, or the grave energy of Augustin

97 According to the discipline of St Basil (Canon lvi), the voluntary homicide was four years a mourner five an hearer, seven in a prostrate state and four in a standing posture I have the original (Beveridge, Pandect tom II p 47-151) and a translation (Chardon, Hist des Sacremens tom IV p 219-277) of the Canonical Epistles of St Basil

98 The penance of Theodosius is authenticated by Ambrose (tom II de Obit Theodos c 34 p 1207), Augustine (The City of God, v 26), and Paulinus (in Vit Ambros c 24) Socrates is ignorant Sozomen (l VII c 25) concise and the copious narrative of Theodoret (l v c. 18) must be used with precaution

99 Codex Theodos l IX tit xl leg 13 The date and circumstances of this law are perplexed with difficulties but I feel myself inclined to favour the honest efforts of Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 721) and Pagi (Critica tom I p 578)

101 Τοῦτο περὶ τοὺς εὐεργέτας καθῆκον ἔδοξεν εἶναι, is the niggard praise of Zosimus himself (l IV [c. 48] p 267) Augustin says with some happiness of expression, Valentinianum misericordissimâ veneratione restituit

102 Sozomen, l VII c 14. His chronology is very irregular

103 See Ambrose (tom II de Obit Valentinian c. 15 etc, p 1178 c 36 etc. p 1184) When the young emperor gave an entertainment he fasted himself he refused to see an handsome actress etc Since he ordered his wild beasts to be killed it is ungenerous in Philostorgius (l XI c 1) to reproach him with the love of that amusement.

104 Zosimus (l IV [c. 53] p 275) praises the enemy of Theodosius But he is detested by Socrates (l v c 25) and Orosius (l VII c 35)

105 Gregory of Tours (l II c 9 p 165 in the second volume of the Historians of France) has preserved a curious fragment of Sulpicius Alexander an historian far more valuable than himself

106 Godefroy (Dissertat ad Philostorg p 429-434) has diligently collected all the circumstances of the death of Valentinian II The variations and the ignorance of contemporary writers prove that it was secret

107 De Obitû Valentinian tom II p 1173-1196 He is forced to speak a discreet and obscure language yet he is much bolder than any layman, or perhaps any other ecclesiastic, would have dared to be

is the contemptuous expression of Claudian (iv Cons Hon 74) Eugenius professed Christianity but his secret attachment to Paganism (Sozomen l vii c 22 Philostorg l xi c 2) is probable in a grammarian and would secure the friendship of Zosimus (l iv [c 54] p 276 277)

110 Zosimus (l iv [c 55] p 278) mentions this embassy but he is diverted by another story from relating the event

111 Σ ε ἀρα ἡ το ου γαμετὴ Γάλλα τὰ βασιλε α τὸν ἀδ λφὸν ὀλοφυρομενη Zosim l iv [c 55] p 277 He afterwards says ([c 57] p 280) that Galla died in childbed and intimates that the affliction of her husband was extreme but short

114 Sozomen l vii c 22 Claudian (in Eutrop l. i. 312) mentions the eunuch s journey but he most contemptuously derives the Egyptian dreams and the oracles of the Nile

115 Zosimus l iv [c 57] p 280 Socrates l vii 10 Alaric himself (de Bell Getico 524) dwells with more complacency on his early exploits against the Romans

Tot Augustos Hebro qui teste fugavi

Yet his vanity could scarcely have proved this plurality of flying emperors

116 Claudian (in iv Cons Honor 77 etc) contrasts the military plans of the two usurpers —

Novitas audere priori

Hic vagus excurrens hic intra claustra reductus

118 Claudian s wit is intolerable the snow was dyed red the cold river smoked and the channel must have been choked with carcasses if the current had not been swelled with blood

119 Theodoret affirms that St John and St Philip appeared to the waking or sleeping emperor on horseback etc This is the first instance of apostolic chivalry which afterwards became so popular in Spain and in the Crusades

120 Te propter gelidis Aquilo de monte procellis
Obruit adversas acies revolutaque tela
Vertit in auctores et turbine reppulit hastas
O nimium dilecte Deo cui fundit ab antris
Æolus armatas hiemes cui militat Æther
Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti

These famous lines of Claudian (in iii Cons Hon or 93 A D 396) are alleged by his contemporaries Augustin and Orosius who suppress the Pagan deity of Æolus and add some circumstances from the information of eye witnesses Within four months after the victory it was compared by Ambrose to the miraculous victories of Moses and Joshua

121 The events of this civil war are gathered from Ambrose (tom ii. Epist lxii p 1022) Paulinus (in Vit Ambros c 26–34) Augustine (The City of God v 26) Orosius (l vii c 35) Sozomen (l vii c 24) Theodoret (l v c 24) Zosimus (l iv [c. 58] p 281 282) Claudian (in iii Cons. Hon 63–105 in iv Cons Hon 70–117) and the Chronicles published by Scaliger

122 This disease ascribed by Socrates (l. v c. 26) to the fatigues of war is represented by Philostorgius (l. xi c 2) as the effect of sloth and intemperance for which Photius calls him an impudent liar (Godefroy Dissert p 438)

123 Zosimus supposes that the boy Honorius accompanied his father (l iv [c. 58] p 280) Yet the quanto flagrabant pectora voto is all that flattery would allow to a contemporary poet who clearly describes the emperor s refusal and the journey of Honorius after the victory (Claudian in iii. Cons 78–125)

125 Vegetius de Re Militari l i. c. 20. The series of calamities which he marks compel us to believe that the Hero to whom he dedicates his book is the last and most inglorious of the Valentinians.

Chapter XXVIII

1 St Ambrose (tom ii de Obit Theodos p 1208 [ed Bened]) expressly praises and recommends the zeal of Josiah in the destruction of idolatry The language of Julius Firmicus Maternus on the same subject (de Errore Profan Relig p 467, edit Gronov [Rotterod 1743]) is piously inhuman Nec filio jubet (the Mosaic Law) parci, nec fratri, et per amatam conjugem gladium vindicem ducit, etc

2 Bayle (tom ii p 406, in his Commentaire Philosophique) justifies and limits these intolerant laws by the temporal reign of Jehovah over the Jews The attempt is laudable

3 See the outlines of the Roman hierarchy in Cicero (de Legibus, ii 7, 8), Livy (i 20), Dionysius Halicarnassensis (l ii [c 63, sqq] p 119–129 edit Hudson), Beaufort (République Romaine, tom i p 1–90), and Moyle (vol i p 10–55) The last is the work of an English whig, as well as of a Roman antiquary

4 These mystic, and perhaps imaginary, symbols have given birth to various fables and conjectures It seems probable that the Palladium was a small statue (three cubits and a half high) of Minerva, with a lance and distaff, that it was usually inclosed in a seria, or barrel, and that a similar barrel was placed by its side to disconcert curiosity or sacrilege See Mezeriac (Comment sur les Epitres d Ovide, tom i p 60–66) and Lipsius (tom iii p 610, de Vestâ, etc , c 10)

5 Cicero frankly (ad Atticum, l ii Epist 5) or indirectly (ad Familiar l xv Epist 4) confesses that the Augurate is the supreme object of his wishes Pliny is proud to tread in the footsteps of Cicero (l iv Epist 8), and the chain of tradition might be continued from history and marbles

6 Zosimus, l iv [c 36] p 249, 250 I have suppressed the foolish pun about Pontifex and Maximus

7 This statue was transported from Tarentum to Rome, placed in the Curia Julia by Cæsar, and decorated by Augustus with the spoils of Egypt

8 Prudentius (l ii [in Symm] in initio) has drawn a very awkward portrait of Victory, but the curious reader will obtain more satisfaction from Montfaucon's Antiquities (tom i p 341)

9 See Suetonius (in August c 35) and the Exordium of Pliny's Panegyric

10 These facts are mutually allowed by the two advocates Symmachus and Ambrose

11 The Notitia Urbis, more recent than Constantine, does not find one Christian church worthy to be named among the edifices of the city Ambrose (tom ii Epist xvii p 825) deplores the public scandals of Rome which continually offended the eyes, the ears and the nostrils of the faithful

12 Ambrose repeatedly affirms in contradiction to common sense (Moyle s Works, vol ii p 147), that the Christians had a majority in the senate

13 The first (A D 382) to Gratian, who refused them audience The second (A D 384) to Valentinian, when the field was disputed by Symmachus and Ambrose The third (A D 388) to Theodosius, and the fourth (A D 392) to Valentinian Lardner (Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 372–399) fairly represents the whole transaction

14 Symmachus, who was invested with all the civil and sacerdotal honours, represented the emperor under the two characters of Pontifex Maximus and Princeps Senatus See the proud inscription at the head of his works

15 As if any one, says Prudentius (in Symmach i 639), should dig in the mud with an instrument of gold and ivory Even saints and polemic saints, treat this adversary with respect and civility

16 See the fifty fourth Epistle of the tenth book of Symmachus [p 289, ed Paris, 1604] In the form and disposition of his ten books of Epistles he imitated the younger Pliny, whose rich and florid style he was supposed by his friends to equal or excel (Macrob Saturnal, l v c 1) But the luxuriancy of Symmachus consists of barren leaves, without fruits, and even without flowers Few facts and few sentiments can be extracted from his verbose correspondence

17 See Ambrose (tom ii Epist xvii xviii p 825–833) The former of these epistles is a short caution, the latter is a formal reply to the petition or libel of Symmachus The same ideas are more copiously expressed in the poetry, if it may deserve that name, of Prudentius who composed his two books against Symmachus (A D 404) while that senator was still alive It is whimsical enough that Montesquieu (Considérations, etc , c xix tom iii p 487) should overlook the two professed antagonists of Symmachus and amuse himself with descanting on the more remote and indirect confutations of Orosius St Augustin and Salvian

18 See Prudentius (in Symmach l i 545 etc) The Christian agrees with the Pagan Zosimus (l iv [c. 59] p 283) in placing this visit of Theodosius after the second civil war, gemini bis victor cæde Tyranni (l i 410) But the time and circumstances are better suited to his first triumph

19 Prudentius after proving that the sense of the senate is declared by a legal majority, proceeds to say (609 etc.),

> Adspice quam pleno subsellia nostra Senatu
> Decernant infame Jovis pulvinar, et omne
> Idolum longe purgatâ ex urbe fugandum
> Qua vocat egregii sententia Principis illuc
> Libera tum pedibus, tum corde, frequentia transit

Zosimus ascribes to the conscript fathers an thenish courage which few of them are found to possess

20 Jerom specifies the pontiff Albinus who was surrounded with such a believing family of children and grandchildren as would have been sufficient to convert even Jupiter himself—an extraordinary proselyte! (tom i ad Lætam p 54 [Epcvii tom i p 671 ed Vallars])

21 Exsultare Patres videas pulcherrima mundi
Lumina Conciliumque senum gestire Catonum
Candidiore togâ niveum pietatis amictum
Sumere et exuvias deponere pontificales

The fancy of Prudentius is warmed and elevated by victory

22 Prudentius after he has described the conversion of the senate and people asks with some truth and confidence

Et dubitamus adhuc Romam tibi Christe dicatam
In leges transisse tuas?

23 Jerom exults in the desolation of the Capitol and the other temples of Rome (tom i p 54, tom ii p 95)

24 Libanius (Orat pro Templis p 10 Genev 1634, published by James Godefroy and now extremely scarce) accuses Valentinian and Valens of prohibiting sacrifices Some partial order may have been issued by the Eastern emperor but the idea of any general law is contradicted by the silence of the Code and the evidence of ecclesiastical history

25 See his laws in the Theodosian Code l xvi tit x. leg 7–11

26 Homer's sacrifices are not accompanied with any inquisition of entrails (see Feithius Antiquitat Homer l i c 10 16 The Tuscans who produced the first Haruspices subdued both the Greeks and the Romans (Cicero de Divinatione ii 23)

28. Cod Theodos l. xvi tit x leg 8 18 There is room to believe that this temple of Edessa which Theodosius wished to save for civil uses was soon afterwards a heap of ruins (Libanius pro Templis, p 26 27 and Godefroy's notes p 59)

29. See this curious oration of Libanius pro Templis pronounced or rather composed about the year 390. I have consulted with advantage Dr Lardner's version and remarks (Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 135 163)

30. See the Life of Martin by Sulpicius Severus c 9–14. The saint once mistook (as Don Quixote might have done) an harmless funeral for an idolatrous procession and imprudently committed a miracle.

31 Compare Sozomen (l. vii. c. 15) with Theodoret (l v c 21) Between them they relate the crusade and death of Marcellus

32 Libanius pro Templis p 10–13 He rails at these black garbed men the Christian monks, who eat more than elephants Poor elephants! they are temperate animals

34 Donatus Roma Antiqua et Nova l iv c. 4, p 468 This consecration was performed by Boniface IV I am ignorant of the favourable circumstances which had preserved the Pantheon above two hundred years after the reign of Theodosius

35 Sophronius composed a recent and separate history (Jerom in Script Eccles, tom i. p 303) which has furnished materials to Socrates (l. v c. 16) Theodoret (l v c 22) and Rufinus (l. ii. c. 22) Yet the last who had been at Alexandria before and after the event may deserve the credit of an original witness

36 Gerard Vossius (Opera tom v p 80 and de Idololatriâ l i c 29) strives to support the strange notion of the Fathers that the patriarch Joseph was adored in Egypt as the bull Apis and the god Serapis

37 Origo dei nondum nostris celebrata Ægyptiorum antistites sic memorant etc Tacit Hist iv 83 The Greeks who had travelled into Egypt were alike ignorant of this new deity

38 Macrobius Saturnal l i c. 7 Such a living fact decisively proves his foreign extraction

39 At Rome Isis and Serapis were united in the same temple. The precedency which the queen assumed may seem to betray her unequal alliance with the stranger of Pontus But the superiority of the female sex was established in Egypt as a civil and religious institution (Diodor Sicul tom i. l. i. [c 27] p 31 edit Wesseling) and the same order is observed in Plutarch's Treatise of Isis and Osiris whom he identifies with Serapis.

40 Ammianus (xxii 16) The Exposito totius Mundi (p 8 in Hudson's Geograph Minor tom. iii) and Rufinus (l ii c 22) celebrate the Serapeum as one of the wonders of the world

41 See Mémoires de l'Acad des Inscriptions, tom ix p 397–416 The old library of the Ptolemies was totally consumed in Cæsar's Alexandrian war Marc Antony gave the whole collection of Pergamus (200 000 volumes) to Cleopatra, as the foundation of the new library of Alexandria.

42 Libanius (pro Templis p 21) indiscreetly provokes his Christian masters by this insulting remark

43 We may choose between the date of Marcellinus (A D 389) or that of Prosper (A.D 391) Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom. v p 310 756) prefers the former and Pagi the latter

44. Tillemont Mém Ecclés. tom xi p 441–500. The ambiguous situation of Theophilus—a saint, as the friend of Jerom, a devil, as the enemy of Chrysostom—produces a sort of impartiality, yet, upon the whole, the balance is justly inclined against him

45 Lardner (Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 411) has alleged a beautiful passage from Suidas, or rather from Damascius, which shows the devout and virtuous Olympius, not in the light of a warrior, but of a prophet

46 Nos vidimus armaria librorum, quibus direptis, exinanita ea a nostris hominibus, nostris temporibus memorent Orosius, l vi c 15, p 421, edit Havercamp Though a bigot and a controversial writer, Orosius seems to blush

47 Eunapius, in the Lives of Antoninus and Ædesius, execrates the sacrilegious rapine of Theophilus Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 453) quotes an epistle of Isidore of Pelusium, which reproaches the primate with the idolatrous worship of gold, the auri sacra fames

48 Rufinus names the priest of Saturn who, in the character of the god, familiarly conversed with many pious ladies of quality, till he betrayed himself, in a moment of transport, when he could not disguise the tone of his voice The authentic and impartial narrative of Æschines (see Bayle, Dictionnaire Critique, SCAMANDRE), and the adventure of Mundus (Joseph Antiquitat Judaic l xviii c 3 [§ 4], p 877, edit Havercamp), may prove that such amorous frauds have been practised with success

49 See the images of Serapis, in Montfaucon (tom. ii p 297) but the description of Macrobius (Saturnal l i c 20) is much more picturesque and satisfactory

50 Sed fortes tremuere manus, motique verendâ
Majestate loci, si robora sacra ferirent
In sua credebant redituras membra secures

(Lucan iii 419) "Is it true" (said Augustus to a veteran of Italy, at whose house he supped) "that the man who gave the first blow to the golden statue of Anaitis was instantly deprived of his eyes and of his life?"—"I was that man" (replied the clear sighted veteran), "and you now sup on one of the legs of the goddess" (Plin Hist Natur xxxiii. 24)

51 The History of the Reformation affords frequent examples of the sudden change from superstition to contempt

52 Sozomen, l vii c. 20 I have supplied the measure The same standard of the inundation, and consequently of the cubit, has uniformly subsisted since the time of Herodotus See Fréret, in the Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xvi p 344-353 Greaves s Miscellaneous Works, vol. i p 233 The Egyptian cubit is about twenty two inches of the English measure

53 Libanius (pro Templis p 15 16 17) pleads their cause with gentle and insinuating rhetoric. From the earliest age such feasts had enlivened the country and those of Bacchus (Georgic ii 380) had produced the theatre of Athens See Godefroy, ad loc, Liban, and Codex Theodos tom vi p 284 [ed Lugd 1665]

54 Honorius tolerated these rustic festivals (A D 399) "Absque ullo sacrificio, atque ullâ superstitione damnabili" But nine years afterwards he found it necessary to reiterate and enforce the same proviso (Codex Theodos l xvi tit x leg 17, 19)

55 Cod Theodos l xvi tit x leg 12 Jortin (Remarks on Eccles History, vol iv p 134) censures with becoming asperity, the style and sentiment of this intolerant law

56 Such a charge should not be lightly made, but it may surely be justified by the authority of St Augustin, who thus addresses the Donatists "Quis nostrûm, quis vestrûm non laudat leges ab Imperatoribus datas adversus sacrificia Paganorum? Et certe longe ibi pœna severior constituta est, illius quippe impietatis capitale supplicium est" Epist xciii No 10 [tom ii p 308 ed Bened 1797], quoted by Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Choisie, tom viii p 277), who adds some judicious reflections on the intolerance of the victorious Christians

57 Orosius, l vii c 28, p 537 Augustin (Enarrat in Psalm cxl apud Lardner, Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 458) insults their cowardice. "Quis eorum comprehensus est in sacrificio (cum his legibus ista prohiberentur) et non negavit?

58 Libanius (pro Templis, p 17, 18) mentions, without censure, the occasional conformity, and as it were theatrical play, of these hypocrites

59 Libanius concludes his apology (p 32) by declaring to the emperor that, unless he expressly warrants the destruction of the temples, ἴσθι τοὺς τῶν ἀγρῶν δεσπότας καὶ αὐτοῖς καὶ τῷ νόμῳ βοηθήσοντας the proprietors will defend themselves and the laws

60 Paulinus, in Vit Ambros c 26 Augustine, The City of God, l v c 26 Theodoret, l v c 24

61 Libanius suggests the form of a persecuting edict which Theodosius might enact (pro Templis, p 31) a rash joke and a dangerous experiment Some princes would have taken his advice.

62 Denique pro meritis terrestribus æqua rependens
Munera, sacricolis summos impertit honores,
Dux bonus et certare sinit cum laude suorum
Nec pago implicitos per debita culmina mundi
Ire viros prohibet

Prudent in Symmach. l 617, etc

63 Libanius (pro Templis p 32) is proud that Theodosius should thus distinguish a man who even in his presence would swear by Jupiter Yet this presence seems to be no more than a figure of rhetoric

64 Zosimus who styles himself Count and Ex advocate of the Treasury reviles with partial and indecent bigotry the Christian princes and even the father of his sovereign His work must have been privately circulated since it escaped the in vectives of the ecclesiastical historians prior to Evagrius (l iii c 40–41) who lived towards the end of the sixth century

65 Yet the Pagans of Africa complained that the times would not allow them to answer with freedom the City of God nor does St Augustin (v 26) deny the charge

66 The Moors of Spain who secretly preserved the Mahometan religion above a century under the tyranny of the Inquisition possessed the Koran with the peculiar use of the Arabic tongue See the curious and honest story of their expulsion in Geddes (Miscellanies vol i p 1–198)

67 Paganos qui supersunt quanquam jam nul los esse credamus etc Cod Theodos l xvi tit x leg 22 A D 423 The younger Theodosius was afterwards satisfied that his judgment had been somewhat premature

68 See Eunapius in the Life of the sophist Ædesius in that of Eustathius he foretells the ruin of Paganism καί τι μυθῶδ ς καὶ ἀειδὲς σ ότος τυραν νήσ ι τὰ ἐπὶ γῆς κάλλιστα

69 Caius (apud Euseb Hist Eccles l ii c 25) a Roman presbyter who lived in the time of Zephy rinus (A D 202–219) is an early witness of this superstitious practice

71 Male facit ergo Romanus episcopus? qui super mortuorum hominum Petri and Pauli se cundum nos ossa veneranda offert Domino sacrificia et tumulos eorum Christi arbitratur al taria Jerom tom ii advers Vigilant p 153 [Tom. ii p 395 ed Vallars]

72 Jerom (tom ii p 122 [contra Vigilant c. 5 tom ii p 391 ed Vallars]) bears witness to these translations, which are neglected by the ecclesi astical historians The passion of St Andrew at Patræ is described in an epistle from the clergy of Achaia, which Baronius (Annal Eccles A.D 60 No 34) wishes to believe and Tillemont is forced to reject St Andrew was adopted as the spiritual founder of Constantinople (Mém Ecclés tom i p 317–323 588–594)

73 Jerom (tom ii p 122 [l c ed Vallars]) pompously describes the translation of Samuel which is noticed in all the chronicles of the times.

74 The Presbyter Vigilantius the protestant of his age firmly though ineffectually withstood the superstition of monks relics saints fasts etc for which Jerom compares him to the Hydra Cer berus the Centaurs etc and considers him only as th organ of the Dæmon (tom ii p 120–126 [tom. ii. p. 387–402 ed Vallars]) Whoever will peruse the controversy of St Jerom and Vigilan tius and St Augustin s account of the miracles of St Stephen may speedily gain some idea of the spirit of the Fathers

75 M de Beausobre (Hist du Manichéisme tom ii p 648) has applied a worldly sense to the pious observation of the clergy of Smyrna who carefully preserved the relics of St. Polycarp the martyr

76 Martin of Tours (see his Life c 8 by Sul picius Severus) extorted this confession from the mouth of the dead man The error is allowed to be natural the discovery is supposed to be miracu lous Which of the two was likely to happen most frequently?

77 Lucian composed in Greek his original nar rative which has been translated by Avitus and published by Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 415, No 7–16) The Benedictine editors of St Augustin have given (at the end of the work De Civitate Dei) two several copies with many various readings. It is the character of falsehood to be loose and incon sistent The most incredible parts of the legend are smoothed and softened by Tillemont (Mém Ec clés tom ii p 9 etc)

78 A phial of St Stephen s blood was annually liquefied at Naples till he was superseded by St. Januarius (Ruinart Hist Persecut Vandal. p 529)

79 Augustin composed the two-and twenty books de Civitate Dei in the space of thirteen years, A D 413–426 (Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom. xiv p 608 etc) His learning is too often borrowed and his arguments are too often his own but the whole work claims the merit of a magnificent de sign vigorously and not unskilfully executed.

80 See Augustine The City of God xxii. 8 and the Appendix which contains two books of St Stephen s miracles by Evodius bishop of Uzalis Freculphus (apud Basnage Hist des Juifs, tom viii p 249) has preserved a Gallic or Spanish proverb Whoever pretends to have read all the miracles of St Stephen he lies

81 Burnet (de Statû Mortuorum p 56–84) collects the opinions of the Fathers as far as they assert the sleep or repose of human souls till the day of judgment He afterwards exposes (p 91 etc.) the inconv niences which must arise if they pos sessed a more active and sensible existence

82 Vigilantius placed the souls of the prophets and martyrs either in the bosom of Abraham (in loco refrigerii) or else under the altar of God. Nec posse [de] suis tumulis et ubi voluerint adesse præ sentes But Jerom (tom ii p 122 [tom ii 392 ed. Vallars]) sternly refutes this blasphemy Tu Deo leges pones? Tu apostolis vincula injicies ut usque ad diem judicii teneantur custodiâ nec sint cum Domino suo de quibus scriptum est Sequuntur Agnum quocunque vadit Si Agnus ubique ergo et hi qui cum Agno sunt ubique esse credendi sunt Et cum diabolus et dæmones toto vagentur in orbe etc

84 At Minorca, the relics of St Stephen converted in eight days 540 Jews, with the help, indeed, of some unwholesome severities, such as burning the synagogue, driving the obstinate infidels to starve among the rocks, etc See the original letter of Severus bishop of Minorca (ad calcem St Augustin de Civ Dei), and the judicious remarks of Basnage (tom viii p 245–251)

85 Mr Hume (Essays, vol ii p 434) observes, like a philosopher, the natural flux and reflux of polytheism and theism

86 D'Aubigne (see his own Mémoires, p 156–160) frankly offered, with the consent of the Huguenot ministers, to allow the first 400 years as the rule of faith The Cardinal du Perron haggled for forty years more, which were indiscreetly given Yet neither party would have found their account in this foolish bargain

87 The worship practised and inculcated by Tertullian, Lactantius, Arnobius, etc, is so extremely pure and spiritual, that their declamations against the Pagan sometimes glance against the Jewish ceremonies

88 Faustus the Manichæan accuses the Catholics of idolatry Vertitis idola in martyres quos votis similibus colitis M de Beausobre (Hist Critique du Manichéisme, tom ii p 629–700), a protestant, but a philosopher, has represented, with candour and learning, the introduction of Christian idolatry in the fourth and fifth centuries

89 The resemblance of superstition, which could not be imitated, might be traced from Japan to Mexico Warburton has seized this idea, which he distorts by rendering it too general and absolute (Divine Legation, vol iv p 126, etc)

90 The imitation of Paganism is the subject of Dr Middleton s agreeable letter from Rome Warburton's animadversions obliged him to connect (vol iii p 120–132) the history of the two religions, and to prove the antiquity of the Christian copy

1 Alecto, envious of the public felicity, convenes an infernal synod, Megæra recommends her pupil Rufinus, and excites him to deeds of mischief, etc. But there is as much difference between Claudian's fury and that of Virgil, as between the characters of Turnus and Rufinus

2 It is evident (Tillemont, Hist des Emp tom v p 770), though De Marca is ashamed of his countryman, that Rufinus was born at Elusa, the metropolis of Novempopulania, now a small village of Gascony (D Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p 289)

3 Philosotorgius, l xi c 3, with Godefroy's Dissert p 440

4 A passage of Suidas is expressive of his profound dissimulation, βαθυγνωμων ἄνθρωπος καὶ κρυψίνους

5 Zosimus, l iv [c 51] p 272, 273

6 Zosimus, who describes the fall of Tatian and his son (l iv [c 52] p 273, 274), asserts their innocence, and even his testimony may outweigh the charges of their enemies (Cod Theod tom iv p 489), who accuse them of oppressing the Curiæ The connection of Tatian with the Arians, while he was præfect of Egypt (A D 373), inclines Tillemont to believe that he was guilty of every crime (Hist. des Emp tom v p 360, Mém Ecclés tom vi. p 589)

7 ————Juvenum rorantia colla
Ante patrum vultus strictâ cecidere securi
Ibat grandævus nato moriente superstes
Post trabeas exsul In Rufin i 248

The facts of Zosimus explain the allusions of Claudian but his classic interpreters were ignorant of the fourth century The fatal cord I found, with the help of Tillemont, in a sermon of St Asterius of Amasea

8 This odious law is recited and repealed by Arcadius (A D 396), in the Theodosian Code, l ix tit xxxviii leg 9 The sense, as it is explained by Claudian (in Rufin i 232) and Godefroy (tom iii p 279), is perfectly clear

————Exscindere cives
Funditus, et nomen gentis delere laborat

The scruples of Pagi and Tillemont can arise only from their zeal for the glory of Theodosius

9 Ammonius Rufinum propriis manibus suscepit sacro fonte mundatum See Rosweyde s Vitæ Patrum, p 947 [Heraclidis Paradisus in Append ad Vit Patr p 941 b] Sozomen (l viii c. 17) mentions the church and monastery and Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom ix p 593) records this synod, in which St Gregory of Nyssa performed a conspicuous part

10 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws, l xii c 12) praises one of the laws of Theodosius, addressed to the præfect Rufinus (l ix tit iv leg unic), to discourage the prosecution of treasonable or sacrilegious words A tyrannical statute always proves the existence of tyranny but a laudable edict may only contain the specious professions or ineffectual wishes of the prince or his ministers This I am afraid, is a just though mortifying canon of criticism

11 ————fluctibus auri
Expleri calor ille nequit————

Congestæ cumulantur opes orbisque rapinas
Accipit una domus

This character (Claudian, in Rufin. i 183–220) is confirmed by Jerom a disinterested witness (dedecus insatiabilis avaritiæ tom 1 ad Heliodor p 26 [Epist lx tom 1 p 342 ed Vallars]) by Zosimus (l v [c 1] p 286) and by Suidas who copied the history of Eunapius

12 ———— Cætera segnis
Ad facinus velox penitus regione remotas
Impiger ire vias

This allusion of Claudian (in Rufin 1 241) is again explained by the circumstantial narrative of Zosimus (l. v [c 2] p 288 289)

13 Zosimus (l iv [c 33] p 243) praises the valour prudence and integrity of Bauto the Frank See Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom v p 771

14. Arsenius escaped from the palace of Constantinople and passed fifty five years in rigid penance in the monasteries of Egypt See Tillemont Mem Ecclés tom xiv p 676–702 and Fleury Hist Eccles tom v p 1 etc but the latter for want of authentic materials has given too much credit to the legend of Metaphrastes

15 This story (Zosimus l v [c 3] p 290) proves that the hymeneal rites of antiquity were still practised without idolatry by the Christians of the East and the bride was forcibly conducted from the house of her parents to that of her husband Our form of marriage requires with less delicacy the express and public consent of a virgin.

16 Zosimus (l v [c 4] p 290) Orosius (l vii c. 37) and the Chronicle of Marcellinus Claudian (in Rufin ii 7–100) paints in lively colours the distress and guilt of the præfect

17 Stilicho directly or indirectly is the perpetual theme of Claudian The youth and private life of the hero are vaguely expressed in the poem on his first consulship 35–140

18 Vandalorum imbellis avaræ perfidæ et dolosæ gentis genere editus Orosius l vii c 38 Jerom (tom 1 ad Gerontiam p 93) calls him a semi barbarian

19 Claudian in an imperfect poem has drawn a fair perhaps a flattering portrait of Serena That favourite niece of Theodosius was born as well as her sister Thermantia, in Spain from whence in their earliest youth they were honourably conducted to the palace of Constantinople.

20. Some doubt may be entertained whether this adoption was legal or only metaphorical (see Ducang Fam. Byzant p 75) An old inscription gives Stilicho the singular titl of Pro-gener Divi Theodosii

21 Claudian (Laus Serenæ 190 193) expresses in poetic language the "dilectus equorum and the gemino mox idem culmine duxit agmina The inscription adds count of the domestics an important command which Stilicho in the height of his grandeur might prudently retain

22 The beautiful lines of Claudian (in i. Cons Stilich. ii. 113) display his genius but the integrity of Stilicho (in the military administration) is much more firmly established by the unwilling evidence of Zosimus (l v [c 34] p 345)

23 ———— Si bellica nubes
Ingrueret quamvis annis et jure minori,
Cedere grandævos equitum peditumque magistros
Adspiceres
Claudian Laus Seren v 196 etc.

A modern general would deem their submission either heroic patriotism or abject servility

24 Compare the poem on the first consulship (i 95–115) with the Laus Serenæ (227–237 where it unfortunately breaks off) We may perceive the deep inveterate malice of Rufinus

25 ———— Quem fratribus ipse
Discedens clipeum defensoremque dedisti (iv Cons Hon 432)

Yet the nomination was private (iii Cons. Hon. 142) cunctos discedere jubet—and may therefore be suspected Zosimus and Suidas apply to Stilicho and Rufinus the same equal title of Ἐπίτροποι guardians or procurators

26 The Roman law distinguishes two sorts of minority which expired at the age of fourteen and of twenty five The one was subject to the tutor or guardian of the person the other to the curator or trustee of the estate (Heineccius Antiquitat. Rom. ad Jurisprudent pertinent l. i. tit xxii. xxiii p 218–232) But these legal ideas were never accurately transferred into the constitution of an elective monarchy

27 See Claudian (i Cons Stilich. i 188–242) but he must allow more than fifteen days for the journey and return between Milan and Leyden.

28 I Cons Stilich ii 88–94 Not only the robes and diadems of the deceased emperor but even the helmets sword hilts belts cuirasses etc. were enriched with pearls emeralds and diamonds.

29 ———— Tantoque remoto
Principe mutatas orbis non sensit habenas.

This high commendation (i Cons Stil. i. 149) may be justified by the fears of the dying emperor (de Bell Gildon 292–301) and the peace and good order which were enjoyed after his death (i. Cons. Stil. i 150–168)

30 Stilicho's march and the death of Rufinus are described by Claudian (in Rufin l. ii. 101–453) Zosimus (l v [c. 7] p 296 297) Sozomen (l viii. c 1) Socrates (l vi. c 1) Philostorgius (l xi c 3 with Godefroy p 441) and the Chronicle of Marcellinus

31 The dissection of Rufinus which Claudian performs with the savage coolness of an anatomist (in Rufin ii. 405–415) is likewise specified by Zosimus and Jerom (tom. i. p 26 [Epist lx tom 1 p 342 ed Vallars])

32 The Pagan Zosimus mentions their sanctuary and pilgrimage The sister of Rufinus Sylvania, who passed her life at Jerusalem is famous in monastic history 1 The studious virgin had diligently and even repeatedly perused the commentators on the Bible Origen Gregory Basil etc, to the amount of five millions of lines 2 At the age of threescore she could boast that she had never washed her hands, face, or any part of her whole body, except the tips of her fingers, to receive the communion See the Vitæ Patrum, p 779, 977

33 See the beautiful exordium of his invective against Rufinus, which is curiously discussed by the sceptic Bayle, Dictionnaire Critique, RUFIN Not E

34 See the Theodosian Code, l ix tit xlii leg 14, 15 The new ministers attempted, with inconsistent avarice, to seize the spoils of their predecessor and to provide for their own future security

35 See Claudian (1 Cons Stilich l 1 275, 292, 296, l ii 83), and Zosimus, l v [c 11] p 302

36 Claudian turns the consulship of the eunuch Eutropius into a national reflection (l ii 135)

————Plaudentem cerne senatum,
Et Byzantinos proceres, Graiosque Quirites
O patribus plebes, O digni consule patres

It is curious to observe the first symptoms of jealousy and schism between old and new Rome, between the Greeks and Latins

37 Claudian may have exaggerated the vices of Gildo, but his Moorish extraction, his notorious actions, and the complaints of St Augustin, may justify the poet's invectives Baronius (Annal Eccles A D 398, No 35-56) has treated the African rebellion with skill and learning

38 Instat terribilis vivis, morientibus hæres,
Virginibus raptor, thalamis obscenus adulter
Nulla quies oritur prædâ cessante libido,
Divitibusque dies, et nox metuenda maritis

————Mauris clarissima quæque
Fastidita datur

De Bello Gildonico, 165, 189

Baronius condemns, still more severely, the licentiousness of Gildo, as his wife, his daughter, and his sister, were examples of perfect chastity The adulteries of the African soldiers are checked by one of the Imperial laws

39 Inque tuam sortem numerosas transtulit urbes

Claudian (de Bell Gildonico, 230-324) has touched, with political delicacy, the intrigues of the Byzantine court, which are likewise mentioned by Zosimus (1 v [c 11] p 302)

40 Symmachus (l iv epist 4) expresses the judicial forms of the senate, and Claudian (1 Cons Stilich l. 1 325, etc) seems to feel the spirit of a Roman

41 Claudian finely displays these complaints of Symmachus, in a speech of the goddess of Rome before the throne of Jupiter (de Bell Gildon 28-128)

42 See Claudian (in Eutrop l 1 401, etc., 1 Cons. Stil. l. 1 306, etc , ii. Cons Stilich 91, etc.)

43 He was of a mature age, since he had formerly (A D 373) served against his brother Firmus (Ammian xxix. 5) Claudian, who understood the court of Milan, dwells on the injuries, rather than the merits, of Mascezel (de Bell Gild 389-414) The Moorish war was not worthy of Honorius or Stilicho, etc

44. Claudian, Bell Gild 415-423 The change of discipline allowed him to use indifferently the names of Legio, Cohors, Manipulus See the Notitia Imperii, S 38, 40

45 Orosius (L vii c 36, p 565) qualifies the account with an expression of doubt (ut aiunt) and it scarcely coincides with the δυνάμεις ἁδρὰς of Zosimus (l v [c 11] p 303) Yet Claudian, after some declamation about Cadmus's soldiers, frankly owns that Stilicho sent a small army, lest the rebel should fly, ne timeare times (1 Cons Stilich. l 1 314, etc)

46 Claud Rutil Numatian Itinerar lib 1. 439-448 He afterwards (ib 515-526) mentions a religious madman on the isle of Gorgona For such profane remarks, Rutilius and his accomplices are styled, by his commentator Barthius, rabiosi canes diaboli Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom xii p 471) more calmly observes that the unbelieving poet praises where he means to censure.

47 Orosius, l vii c 36, p 564. Augustin commends two of these savage saints of the Isle of Goats (Epist lxxxi apud Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 317, and Baronius, Annal Eccles A D 398, No 51)

48 Here the first book of the Gildonic war is terminated The rest of Claudian's poem has been lost, and we are ignorant how or where the army made good their landing in Africa

49 Orosius must be responsible for the account The presumption of Gildo and his various train of barbarians is celebrated by Claudian (1 Cons Stil l 1 345-355)

50 St Ambrose, who had been dead about a year, revealed in a vision the time and place of the victory Mascezel afterwards related his dream to Paulinus, the original biographer of the saint, from whom it might easily pass to Orosius

51 Zosimus (l v [c. 11] p 303) supposes an obstinate combat but the narrative of Orosius appears to conceal a real fact under the disguise of a miracle

52 Tabraca lay between the two Hippos (Cellarius, tom ii p 112, D Anville, tom iii p 84) Orosius has distinctly named the field of battle, but our ignorance cannot define the precise situation

53 The death of Gildo is expressed by Claudian (1 Cons Stil l 357) and his best interpreters, Zosimus and Orosius

54. Claudian (iii Cons Stilich. 99-119) describes their trial (tremuit quos Africa nuper cernunt rostra reos), and applauds the restoration of the ancient constitution It is here that he introduces the famous sentence so familiar to the friends of despotism

————Nunquam libertas gratior extat
Quam sub rege pio

But the freedom which depends on royal piety scarcely deserves that appellation.

55 See the Theodosian Code l. ix tit xxxix leg 3 tit xl leg 19

56 Stilicho who claimed an equal share in all the victories of Theodosius and his son particularly asserts that Africa was recovered by the wisdom of his counsels (see an inscription produced by Baronius)

57 I have softened the narrative of Zosimus which in its crude simplicity is almost incredible (l v [c 11] p 303) Orosius damns the victorious general (p 538 [lib vii c 36]) for violating the right of sanctuary

58 Claudian as the poet laureat composed a serious and elaborate epithalamium of 340 lines besides some gay Fescennines which were sung in a more licentious tone on the wedding night

59 ———Calet obvius ire
Jam princeps tardumque cupit discedere solem
Nobilis haud aliter sonipes—

(de Nuptus Honor et Mariæ 287) and more freely in the Fescennines 112–126 [iv 14]

Dices O quoties hoc mihi dulcius
Quam flavos decies vincere Sarmatas

Tum victor mandido prosilias toro
Nocturni referens vulnera prœlii

60 See Zosimus l v [c 28] p 333

61 Procopius de Bell Vandal l. i c. 2 [tom. i p 316 ed Bonn] I have borrowed th general practice of Honorius without adopting the singular and indeed improbable tale, which is related by the Greek historian

62 The lessons of Theodosius or rather Claudian (iv Cons Honor 214–418) might compose a fine institution for the future prince of a great and free nation It was far above Honorius and his degenerate subjects

Chapter XXX

1 The revolt of the Goths and the blockade of Constantinople are distinctly mentioned by Claudian (in Rufin l ii 7–100) Zosimus (l v [c 5] p 292) and Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 29)

2 ———Alii per terga ferocis
Danubii solidata ruunt expertaque remos
Frangunt stagna rotis
[Claud ib v 24]

Claudian and Ovid often amuse their fancy by interchanging the metaphors and properties of liquid water and solid ice Much false wit has been expended in this easy exercise

3 Jerom. tom 1 p 26 [Epist ix. tom 1 p 342 ed. Vallars.] He endeavours to comfort his friend Heliodorus bishop of Altinum for the loss of his nephew Nepotian by a curious recapitulation of all the public and private misfortunes of the times. See Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom xii p 200 etc

4 Baltha or bold origo mirifica says Jornandes (c. 29) This illustrious race long continued to flourish in France in the Gothic province of Septimania, or Languedoc under the corrupted appellation of Baux and a branch of that family afterwards settled in the kingdom of Naples (Grotius in Prolegom. ad Hist Gothic. p 53) The lords of Baux near Arles and of seventy nine subordinate places were independent of the counts of Provence (Longuerue Description de la France tom 1 p 357)

5 Zosimus (l v [c. 5] p 293–295) is our best guide for the conquest of Greece but the hints and allusion of Claudian are so many rays of historic light

6 Compare Herodotus (l vii. c. 176) and Livy (xxxvi 15) The narrow entrance of Greece was probably enlarged by each successive ravisher

7 He passed says Eunapius (in Vit. Philosoph. p 93 edit Commelin 1596) through the straits, δ ἀ των πυλων (of Thermopylæ) παρηλθε σ τερ δ ἀ σταδίου καὶ ἱπποκρότου πεδίου τρέχων

8 In obedience to Jerom and Claudian (in Rufin l ii 191) I have mixed some darker colours in the mild representation of Zosimus who wished to soften the calamities of Athens

Nec fera Cecropias traxissent vincula matres.

Synesius (Epist cxxxv p 272 edit Petav) observes that Athens whose sufferings he imputes to the proconsul s avarice, was at that tim less famous for her schools of philosophy than for her trade of honey

9 ———Vallata mari Scironia rupes,
Et duo continuo connectens æquora muro
Isthmos
Claudian de Bell Getico 188.

The Scironian rocks are described by Pausanias (l. i. c. 44 p 107 edit Kuhn) and our modern travellers Wheeler (p 436) and Chandler (p 298) Hadrian made the road passable for two carriages [Pausan i c 44 § 6 ed Bekker]

10 Claudian (in Rufin l ii 186 and de Bello Getico 611 etc) vaguely though forcibly delineates the scene of rapine and destruction

11 Τρὶς μάκαρες Δαναοὶ καὶ τετράκις etc. These generous lines of Homer (Odyss l v 306) were transcribed by one of the captive youths of Corinth and the tears of Mummius may prove that the rude conqueror though he was ignorant of the value of an original picture possessed the purest source of good taste a benevolent heart (Plutarch, Symposiac. l. ix tom ii p 737 edit Wechel [tom. viii p. 939 ed Reiske])

12 Homer perpetually describes the exemplary patience of these female captives who gave their charms and even their hearts to the murderers of their fathers brothers, etc Such a passion (of Eriphile for Achilles) is touched with admirable delicacy by Racine

13 Plutarch (in Pyrrhus) gives the genuine answer in the Laconic dialect Pyrrhus attacked Sparta with 25,000 foot, 2000 horse, and 24 elephants and the defence of that open town is a fine comment on the laws of Lycurgus, even in the last stage of decay

14 Such, perhaps, as Homer (Iliad, xx 164) has so nobly painted him

15 Eunapius (in Vit Philosoph p 90–93) intimates that a troop of monks betrayed Greece and followed the Gothic camp

16 For Stilicho's Greek war compare the honest narrative of Zosimus (l v [c 7] p 295, 296) with the curious circumstantial flattery of Claudian (i Cons Stilich l i 172–186, iv Cons Hon 459–487) As the event was not glorious, it is artfully thrown into the shade

17 The troops who marched through Elis delivered up their arms This security enriched the Eleans, who were lovers of a rural life Riches begat pride they disdained their privilege, and they suffered Polybius advises them to retire once more within their magic circle See a learned and judicious discourse on the Olympic games, which Mr West has prefixed to his translation of Pindar

18 Claudian (in iv Cons Hon 480) alludes to the fact without naming the river, perhaps the Alpheus (i Cons Stil l i 185)

——Et Alpheus Geticis angustus acervis
Tardior ad Siculos etiamnum pergit amores

Yet I should prefer the Peneus, a shallow stream in a wide and deep bed which runs through Elis and falls into the sea below Cyllene It had been joined with the Alpheus to cleanse the Augean stable (Cellarius, tom i p 760 Chandler's Travels, p 286)

19 Strabo, l viii p 517 [p 335, ed Casaub] Plin Hist Natur iv 3 Wheeler, p 308 Chandler, p 275 They measured from different points the distance between the two lands

20 Synesius passed three years (A D 397–400) at Constantinople as deputy from Cyrene to the emperor Arcadius He presented him with a crown of gold, and pronounced before him the instructive oration de Regno (p 1–32, edit Petav Paris, 1612) The philosopher was made bishop of Ptolemais, A D 410, and died about 430 See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xii p 499, 554, 683–685

21 Synesius de Regno, p 21–26

22 ———qui fœdera rumpit
Ditatur qui servat, eget vastator Achivæ
Gentis, et Epirum nuper populatus inultam
Præsidet Illyrico jam, quos obsedit, amicos
Ingreditur muros, illis responsa daturus
Quorum conjugibus potitur, natosque peremit

Claudian in Eutrop l ii 212 Alaric applauds his own policy (de Bell. Getic. 533–543) in the use which he had made of this Illyrian jurisdiction

23 Jornandes, c 29, p 651 [ed Grot 1655, p 81, ed Lugd B 1597] The Gothic historian adds, with unusual spirit, Cum suis deliberans suasit suo labore quærere regna, quam alienis per otium subjacere.

24. ——Discors odiisque anceps civilibus orbis
Non sua vis tutata diu, dum fœdera fallax
Ludit, et alternæ perjuria venditat aluæ
Claudian de Bell Get 565

25 Alpibus Italiæ ruptis penetrabis ad Urbem

This authentic prediction was announced by Alaric, or at least by Claudian (de Bell Getico, 547), seven years before the event But as it was not accomplished within the term which had been rashly fixed, the interpreters escaped through an ambiguous meaning

26 Our best materials are 970 verses of Claudian, in the poem on the Getic war, and the beginning of that which celebrates the sixth consulship of Honorius Zosimus is totally silent, and we are reduced to such scraps, or rather crumbs, as we can pick from Orosius and the Chronicles

27 Notwithstanding the gross errors of Jornandes, who confounds the Italian wars of Alaric (c 29), his date of the consulship of Stilicho and Aurelian (A D 400) is firm and respectable It is certain from Claudian (Tillemont, Hist des Emp tom v p 804), that the battle of Pollentia was fought A D 403, but we cannot easily fill the interval

28 Tantum Romanæ urbis judicium fugis, ut magis obsidionem barbaricam, quam pacatæ urbis judicium velis sustinere. Jerom, tom ii. p 239 Rufinus understood his own danger, the peaceful city was inflamed by the beldam Marcella and the rest of Jerom's faction

29 Jovinian, the enemy of fasts and of celibacy, who was persecuted and insulted by the furious Jerom (Jortin's Remarks, vol iv p 104, etc.) See the original edict of banishment in the Theodosian Code, l xvi. tit v leg 53

30 This epigram (de Sene Veronensi qui suburbium nusquam egressus est) is one of the earliest and most pleasing compositions of Claudian Cowley's imitation (Hurd's edition vol ii p 241) has some natural and happy strokes but it is much inferior to the original portrait, which is evidently drawn from the life

31 Ingentem meminit parvo qui germine quercum
Æquævumque videt consenuisse nemus
A neighbouring wood born with himself he sees,
And loves his old contemporary trees

In this passage Cowley is perhaps superior to his original, and the English poet, who was a good botanist, has concealed the oaks under a more general expression

32 Claudian de Bell Get. 199–266 He may seem prolix but fear and superstition occupied as large a space in the minds of the Italians

33 From the passages of Paulinus which Baronius has produced (Annal Eccles A D 403 No 51) it is manifest that the general alarm had pervaded all Italy as far as Nola in Campania where that famous penitent had fixed his abode

34 Solus erat Stilicho etc is the exclusive commendation which Claudian bestows (de Bell Get 267) without condescending to except the emperor How insignificant must Honorius have appeared in his own court!

35 The face of the country and the hardiness of Stilicho are finely described (de Bell. Get 340-363)

36 Venit et extremis legio praetenta Britannis
Quae Scoto dat frena truci
De Bell Get 416

Yet the most rapid march from Edinburgh or Newcastle to Milan must have required a longer space of time than Claudian seems willing to allow for the duration of the Gothic war

37 Every traveller must recollect the face of Lombardy (see Fontenelle tom v p 279) which is often tormented by the capricious and irregular abundance of waters The Austrians before Genoa were encamped in the dry bed of the Polcevera Ne sarebbe (says Muratori) mai passato per mente a que buoni Alemanni che quel picciolo torrente potesse per cosi dire in un instante cangiarsi in un terribil gigante (Annal. d Italia tom xvi p 443 Milan 1753 8vo edit)

38 Claudian does not clearly answer our question Where was Honorius himself? Yet the flight is marked by the pursuit and my idea of the Gothic war is justified by the Italian critics Sigonius (tom 1 p 11 p 360 de Imp Occident. l. x) and Muratori (Annali d Italia tom iv p 45)

39 One of the roads may be traced in the Itineraries (p 98 288 94, with Wesseling s Notes) Asta lay some miles on the right hand

40 Asta or Asti a Roman colony is now the capital of a pleasant county which in the sixteenth century devolved to the dukes of Savoy (Leandro Alberti Descrizzione d Italia p 382)

41 Nec me timor impulit ullus He might hold this proud language the next year at Rome five hundred miles from the scene of danger (vi Cons Hon 449)

42 Hanc ego vel victor regno vel morte tenebo
Victus humum

The speeches (de Bell Get 479-549) of the Gothic Nestor and Achilles are strong characteristic adapted to the circumstances and possibly not less genuine than those of Livy

43 Orosius (l vii c 37) is shocked at the impiety of the Romans who attacked on Easter Sunday such pious Christians Yet at the same time, public prayers were offered at the shrine of St Thomas of Edessa for the destruction of the Arian robber See Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom. v p 529) who quotes a homily which has been erroneously ascribed to St Chrysostom.

44 The vestiges of Pollentia are twenty five miles to the south-east of Turin Urbs in the same neighbourhood was a royal chase of the kings of Lombardy and a small river which excused the prediction penetrabis ad urbem (Cluver Ital. Antiq tom. 1 p 83-85)

45 Orosius wishes in doubtful words to insinuate the defeat of the Romans Pugnantes vicimus victores victi sumus Prosper (in Chron.) makes it an equal and bloody battle but the Gothic writers Cassiodorus (in Chron.) and Jornandes (de Reb Get c 30) claim a decisive victory

46 Demens Ausonidum gemmata monilia matrum
Romanasque altâ famulas cervice petebat.
De Bell. Get. 627

47 Claudian (de Bell Get 580-647) and Prudentius (in Symmach l ii. 694-719) celebrate without ambiguity the Roman victory of Pollentia They are poetical and party writers yet some credit is due to the most suspicious witnesses who are checked by the recent notoriety of facts.

48 Claudian s peroration is strong and elegant but the identity of the Cimbric and Gothic fields must be understood (like Virgil s Philippi, Georgic i. 490) according to the loose geography of a poet. Vercellae and Pollentia are sixty miles from each other and the latitude is still greater if the Cimbri were defeated in the wide and barren plain of Verona (Maffei Verona Illustrata p 1 p 54-62)

49 Claudian and Prudentius must be strictly examined to reduce the figures and extort the historic sense of those poets

50 Et gravant en airain ses frêles avantages
De mes états conquis enchainer les images.

The practice of exposing in triumph the images of kings and provinces was familiar to the Romans The bust of Mithridates himself was twelve feet high of massy gold (Freinshem Supplement Livian ciii 47)

51 The Getic war and the sixth consulship of Honorius obscurely connect the events of Alaric s retreat and losses

52 Taceo de Alarico saepe victo saepe concluso semperque dimisso Orosius l. vii c 37 p 56 Claudian (vi Cons Hon 320) drops the curtain with a fine image

53 The remainder of Claudian s poem on the sixth consulship of Honorius describes the journey the triumph and the games (330-660)

54 See the inscription in Mascou s History of the Ancient Germans viii 12 The words are positive and indiscreet Getarum nationem in omne aevum domitam etc

55 On the curious though horrid subject of the gladiators consult the two books of the Saturnalia of Lipsius who as an antiquarian is inclined to excuse the practice of antiquity (tom iii p 483-545)

56 Cod Theodos l xv tit xii leg i The Commentary of Godefroy affords large materials (tom v p 396) for the history of gladiators

57 See the peroration of Prudentius (in Symmach l ii. 1121-1131) who had doubtless read the eloquent invective of Lactantius (Divin Instit. l. vi c 20) The Christian apologists have not spared these bloody games, which were introduced in the religious festivals of Paganism

58 Theodoret, l v c 26 I wish to believe the story of St Telemachus Yet no church has been dedicated, no altar has been erected, to the only monk who died a martyr in the cause of humanity

59 Crudele gladiatorum spectaculum et inhumanum nonnullis videri solet, et haud scio an ita sit, ut nunc fit Cicero Tusculan ii 17 He faintly censures the abuse, and warmly defends the use, of these sports, oculis nulla poterat esse fortior contra dolorem et mortem disciplina Seneca (Epist v 1) shows the feelings of a man

60 This account of Ravenna is drawn from Strabo (l v p 327 [p 213, ed Casaub]), Pliny (iii 20), Stephen of Byzantium (sub voce 'Ράβεννα, p 651, edit Berkel), Claudian (in vi Cons Honor 494, etc) , Sidonius Apollinaris (l i Epist 5, 8), Jornandes (de Reb Get c 29), Procopius (de Bell. Gothic l i c 1 p 309, edit Louvre [tom ii p 8, ed Bonn]), and Cluverius (Ital Antiq tom i p 301–307) Yet I still want a local antiquarian, and a good topographical map

61 Martial (Epigram iii 56, 57) plays on the trick of the knave who had sold him wine instead of water, but he seriously declares that a cistern at Ravenna is more valuable than a vineyard Sidonius complains that the town is destitute of fountains and aqueducts, and ranks the want of fresh water among the local evils, such as the croaking of frogs, the stinging of gnats, etc

62 The fable of Theodore and Honoria, which Dryden has so admirably transplanted from Boccaccio (Giornata iii novell viii) was acted in the wood of Chiassi, a corrupt word from Classis, the naval station, which, with the intermediate road or suburb, the Via Cæsaris, constituted the triple city of Ravenna

63 From the year 404 the dates of the Theodosian Code became sedentary at Constantinople and Ravenna See Godefroy s Chronology of the Laws, tom i p cxlviii , etc

64 See M de Guignes, Hist des Huns, tom i p 179–189, tom ii p 295, 334–338

65 Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c iii p 182 [ed Paris tom i p 319, ed Bonn]) has observed an emigration from the Palus Mæotis to the north of Germany, which he ascribes to famine. But his views of ancient history are strangely darkened by ignorance and error

66 Zosimus (l v [c. 26] p 331) uses the general description of the nations beyond the Danube and the Rhine. Their situation, and consequently their names, are manifestly shown, even in the various epithets which each ancient writer may have casually added

67 The name of Rhadagast was that of a local deity of the Obotrites (in Mecklenburg) A hero might naturally assume the appellation of his tutelar god but it is not probable that the barbarians should worship an unsuccessful hero See Mascou, Hist. of the Germans, viii 14

68 Olympiodorus (apud Photium, p 180 [p 57, ed Bekker]) uses the Latin word 'Οπτιματοι, which does not convey any precise idea I suspect that they were the princes and nobles with their faithful companions—the knights with their squires, as they would have been styled some centuries afterwards

69 Tacit de Moribus Germanorum, c 37

70 ———Cujus agendi
Spectator vel causa fui,
Claudian, vi Cons Hon 439, is the modest language of Honorius, in speaking of the Gothic war, which he had seen somewhat nearer

71 Zosimus (l v [c. 26] p 331) transports the war and the victory of Stilicho beyond the Danube A strange error, which is awkwardly and imperfectly cured by reading 'Αρνον for 'Ιστρον (Tillemont, Hist des Emp tom v p 807) In good policy, we must use the service of Zosimus, without esteeming or trusting him

72 Codex Theodos l vii tit xiii leg 16 The date of this law (A D 406, May 18) satisfies me, as it had done Godefroy (tom ii p 387), of the true year of the invasion of Radagaisus Tillemont, Pagi, and Muratori prefer the preceding year, but they are bound, by certain obligations of civility and respect, to St Paulinus of Nola

73 Soon after Rome had been taken by the Gauls, the senate, on a sudden emergency, armed ten legions, 3000 horse and 42,000 foot—a force which the city could not have sent forth under Augustus (Livy, vii 25) This declaration may puzzle an antiquary, but it is clearly explained by Montesquieu

74 Machiavel has explained, at least as a philosopher, the origin of Florence, which insensibly descended, for the benefit of trade, from the rock of Fæsulæ to the banks of the Arno (Istoria Fiorentina, tom i l ii p 36 Londra, 1747) The triumvirs sent a colony to Florence, which, under Tiberius (Tacit Annal i 79), deserved the reputation and name of a flourishing city See Culver Ital Antiq tom i p 507, etc.

75 Yet the Jupiter of Radagaisus, who worshipped Thor and Woden, was very different from the Olympic or Capitoline Jove The accommodating temper of polytheism might unite those various and remote deities but the genuine Romans abhorred the human sacrifices of Gaul and Germany

76 Paulinus (in Vit. Ambros c. 50) relates this story, which he received from the mouth of Pansophia herself a religious matron of Florence Yet the archbishop soon ceased to take an active part in the business of the world, and never became a popular saint

77 Augustine The City of God v 23 Orosius l vii c. 37, p 567–571 The two friends wrote in Africa ten or twelve years after the victory and their authority is implicitly followed by Isidore of Seville (in Chron p 713 edit Grot.) How many interesting facts might Orosius have inserted in the vacant space which is devoted to pious nonsense!

78 Franguntur montes planumque per ardua Cæsar
Ducit opus pandit fossas turritaque summis
Disponit castella jugis magnoque recessû
Amplexus fines saltus nemorosaque tesqua
Et silvas vastâque feras indagine claudit

Yet the simplicity of truth (Cæsar de Bell Civ iii 44) is far greater than the amplifications of Lucan (Pharsal l vi. 29–63)

79 The rhetorical expressions of Orosius in arido et aspero montis jugo in unum ac parvum verticem are not very suitable to the encampment of a great army But Fæsulæ only three miles from Florence might afford space for the head-quarters of Radagaisus and would be comprehended within the circuit of the Roman lines

80 See Zosimus l v [c 26] p 331 and the Chronicles of Prosper and Marcellinus

81 Olympiodorus (apud Photium p 180 [p 57 ed Bekk]) uses an expression (προσηταιρίσατο) which would denote a strict and friendly alliance and render Stilicho still more criminal The paulisper retentus deinde interfectus of Orosius [p 570] is sufficiently odious

82 Orosius piously inhuman sacrifices the king and people—Agag and the Amalekites—without a symptom of compassion The bloody actor is less detestable than the cool unfeeling historian

83 And Claudian s muse was she asleep? had she been ill paid? Methinks the seventh consulship of Honorius (A D 407) would have furnished the subject of a noble poem. Before it was discovered that the state could no longer be saved Stilicho (after Romulus Camillus and Marius) might have been worthily surnamed the fourth founder of Rome

84 A luminous passage of Prosper's Chronicle In tres pa tes per d versos principes divisus exercitus reduces the miracle of Florence, and connects the history of Italy Gaul and Germany

85 Orosius and Jerom positively charge him with instigating the invasion Excitatæ a Stilichone gentes etc They must mean indirectly He saved Italy at the expense of Gaul

86 The Count de Buat is satisfied that the Germans who invaded Gaul were the two th rds that yet remained of the army of Radagaisus See the Histoire Ancienne des Peuples de l Europe (tom vii p 87 121 Paris 1772) an elaborate work which I had not the advantage of perusing till the year 1777 As early as 1771 I find the same idea expressed in a rough draught of the present History I have since observed a similar intimation in Mascou (viii 15) Such agreement without mutual communication may add some weight to our common sentiment

87 ———Provincia missos

Claudian (i Cons Stil l. i 235 etc.) is clear and satisfactory These kings of France are unknown to Gregory of Tours but the author of the Gesta Francorum mentions both Sunno and Marcomir and names the latter as the father of Pharamond (in tom. ii p 543) He seems to write from good materials which he did not understand

88 See Zosimus (l. vi. [c 3] p 373) Orosius (l. vii c 40, p 5,6) and the Chronicles Gregory of Tours (l. ii c 9, p 165 in the second volume of the Historians of France) has preserved a valuable fragment of Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus, whose three names denote a Christian a Roman subject and a semi barbarian

89 Claudian (i Cons Stil. l. i. 221 etc. l. ii. 186) describes the peace and prosperity of the Gallic frontier The Abbé Dubos (Hist Critique, etc. tom i. p 174) would read Alba (a nameless rivulet of the Ardennes) instead of Albis and expatiates on the danger of the Gallic cattle grazing beyond the Elbe Foolish enough! In poetical geography the Elbe and the Hercynian signify any river or any wood in Germany Claudian is not prepared for the strict examination of our antiquaries.

92 The Pelagian doctrine which was first agitated A D 405 was condemned in the space of ten years at Rome and Carthage St Augustin fought and conquered but the Greek church was favourable to his adversaries and (what is singular enough) the people did not take any part in a dispute which they could not understand

93 See the Mémoires de Guillaume du Bellay l vi In French the original reproof is less obvious and more pointed from the double sense of the word journée which alike signifies a day's travel or a battle

94 Claudian (i. Cons Stil l ii 250) It is supposed that the Scots of Ireland invaded by sea the whole western coast of Britain and some slight credit may be given even to Nennius and the Irish traditions (Carte s Hist of England vol i p 169) Whitaker s Genuine History of the Britons p 199. The sixty-six Lives of St Patrick which were extant in the ninth century must have contained as many thousand lies yet we may believe that in one of these Irish inroads the future apostle was led away captive (Usher Antiquit Eccles Britann p 431 and Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom xvi p 456 782 etc)

95 The British usurpers are taken from Zosimus

96 Cum in Constantino inconstantiam execrarentur (Sidonius Apollinaris, l v Epist 9, p 139, edit secund Sirmond) Yet Sidonius might be tempted, by so fair a pun, to stigmatise a prince who had disgraced his grandfather

97 Bagaudæ is the name which Zosimus applies to them perhaps they deserved a less odious character (see Dubos, Hist Critique, tom 1 p 203) We shall hear of them again

98 Verinianus, Didymus, Theodosius, and Lagodius, who in modern courts would be styled princes of the blood, were not distinguished by any rank or privileges above the rest of their fellow-subjects

99 These Honoriani or Honoriaci consisted of two bands of Scots or Attacotti, two of Moors, two of Marcomanni, the Victores, the Ascarii, and the Gallicani (Notitia Imperii, sect xxxviii edit Lab) They were part of the sixty-five Auxilia Palatina, and are properly styled ἐν τῇ αὐλῇ τάξεις by Zosimus (l vi [c 4] p 374)

100 ———Comitantur euntem
Pallor, et atra Fames, et saucia lividus ora
Luctus, et inferno stridentes agmine Morbi
Claudian in vi Cons. Hon 321, etc.

101 These dark transactions are investigated by the Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l Europe tom vii. c iii–viii p 69–206), whose laborious accuracy may sometimes fatigue a superficial reader

102 See Zosimus, l v [c 29] p 334, 335 He interrupts his scanty narrative to relate the fable of Æmona, and of the ship Argo, which was drawn overland from that place to the Hadriatic. Sozomen (l viii c. 25 l ix c 4) and Socrates (l vii c. 10) cast a pale and doubtful light, and Orosius (l vii c 38, p 571) is abominably partial 103 Zosimus, l v [c 29] p 338, 339 He repeats the words of Lampadius as they were spoken in Latin, "Non est ista pax, sed pactio servitutis," and then translates them into Greek for the benefit of his readers.

104. He came from the coast of the Euxine, and exercised a splendid office, λαμπρᾶς δὲ στρατείας ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις ἠξιωμένος His actions justify his character, which Zosimus (l v [c 32] p 340) exposes with visible satisfaction Augustin revered the piety of Olympius whom he styles a true son of the church (Baronius, Annal Eccles. A D 408, No 19 etc , Tillemont, Mém Ecclés. tom xiii p 467, 468) But these praises which the African saint so unworthily bestows, might proceed as well from ignorance as from adulation

105. Zosimus, l. v [c. 31] p 338, 339 Sozomen, l ix c 4. Stilicho offered to undertake the journey to Constantinople, that he might divert Honorius from the vain attempt The Eastern empire would not have obeyed, and could not have been conquered

106 Zosimus (l v [c 30, sqq] p 336–345) has copiously, though not clearly, related the disgrace and death of Stilicho Olympiodorus (apud Phot p 177 [p 56, ed Bekker]), Orosius (l vii c 38, p 571, 572), Sozomen (l ix c 4), and Philostorgius (l xi c 3, l xii c 2), afford supplemental hints

107 Zosimus, l v [c. 28] p 333 The marriage of a Christian with two sisters scandalises Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 557), who expects, in vain, that Pope Innocent I should have done something in the way either of censure or of dispensation

108 Two of his friends are honourably mentioned (Zosimus, l v [c 35] p 346)—Peter, chief of the school of notaries, and the great chamberlain Deuterius Stilicho had secured the bedchamber and it is surprising that, under a feeble prince, the bedchamber was not able to secure him

109 Orosius (l vii c 38, p 571, 572) seems to copy the false and furious manifestos which were dispersed through the provinces by the new administration

110 See the Theodosian Code, l vii tit xvi leg 1, l ix tit xlii leg 22 Stilicho is branded with the name of prædo publicus, who employed his wealth ad omnem ditandam, inquietandamque Barbariem

111 Augustin himself is satisfied with the effectual laws which Stilicho had enacted against heretics and idolaters, and which are still extant in the Code. He only applies to Olympius for their confirmation (Baronius, Annal. Eccles A D 408, No 19)

112 Zosimus, l v [c 38] p 351 We may observe the bad taste of the age in dressing their statues with such awkward finery

113 See Rutilius Numatianus (Itinerar L ii 41–60), to whom religious enthusiasm has dictated some elegant and forcible lines Stilicho likewise stripped the gold plates from the doors of the Capitol, and read a prophetic sentence which was engraven under them (Zosimus L v [c. 38] p 352) These are foolish stories yet the charge of impiety adds weight and credit to the praise, which Zosimus reluctantly bestows of his virtues

114 At the nuptials of Orpheus (a modest comparison!) all the parts of animated nature contributed their various gifts, and the gods themselves enriched their favourite. Claudian had neither flocks nor herds nor vines, nor olives His wealthy bride was heiress to them all But he carried to Africa a recommendatory letter from Serena his Juno and was made happy (Epist ii. ad Serenam)

115. Claudian feels the honour like a man who deserved it (in præfat Bell. Get) The original inscription on marble, was found at Rome In fifteenth century in the house of Pomponius Lætus The statue of a poet far superior to Claudian should have been erected during his lifetime by the men of letters his countrymen and contemporaries It was a noble design

116 See Epigram xxx —

> Mallius indulget somno noctesque di esque
> Insomnis Pharius sacra profana rapit
> Omnibus hoc Italæ gentes exposcite votis
> Mallius ut vigilet dormiat ut Pharius

Hadrian was a Pharian (of Alexandria) See his public life in Godefroy Cod Theodos. tom vi p 364 Mallius did not always sleep He composed some elegant dialogues on the Greek systems of natural philosophy (Claud in Mall. Theodor Cons 61–112)

117 See Claudian s first Epistle Yet in some places an air of irony and indignation betrays his secret reluctance

118 National vanity has made him a Florentine or a Spaniard But the first Epistle of Claudian proves him a native of Alexandria (Fabricius Biblioth. Latin tom iii p 191–202 edit Ernest.)

119 His first Latin verses were composed during the consulship of Probinus A D 395 —

> Romanos bibimus primum te consule, fontes
> Et Latiæ cessit Graia Thalia togæ.

Besides some Greek epigrams which are still extant the Latin poet had composed in Greek, the Antiquities of Tarsus Anazarbus Berytus Nic., etc It is more easy to supply the loss of good poetry than of authentic history

120 Strada (Prolusion v vi.) allows him to contend with the five heroic poets Lucretius Virgil Ovid Lucan and Statius. His patron is the accomplished courtier Balthazar Castiglione His admirers are numerous and passionate Yet the rigid critics reproach the exotic weeds or flowers which spring too luxuriantly in his Latian soil.

Chapter XXXI

1 The series of events from the death of Stilicho to the arrival of Alaric before Rome can only be found in Zosimus l v [c 35–37] p 347–350

2 The expression of Zosimus is strong and lively κα αφρόνησι ἐμποιῆσαι τοις π λεμίοις ἀρκο ν τας sufficient to excite the contempt of the enemy

3 Eos qui catholicæ sectæ sunt inimici intra palatium militare prohibemus Nullus nobis sit aliquâ ratione conjunctus qui a nobis fide et religione discordat Cod Theodos l xvi tit v leg 42 and Godefroy s Commentary tom vi p 164. This law was applied in the utmost latitude and rigorously executed Zosimus l. v [c 46] p 364

4 Addison (see his Works vol ii p 54 edit Baskerville) has given a very picturesque description of the road through the Apennine The Goths were not at leisure to observe the beauties of the prospect but they were pleased to find that the Saxa Intercisa a narrow passage which Vespasian had cut through the rock (Cluver Italia Antiq tom 1 p 618) was totally neglected

> Hinc albi Clitumne Greges et maxima taurus
> Victima sæpe tuo perfusi flumine sacro
> Romanos ad templa Deum duxere triumphos Georg ii. 147

Besides Virgil most of the Latin poets Propertius Lucan Silius Italicus Claudian etc whose passages may be found in Cluverius and Addison have celebrated the triumphal victims of Clitumnus

6 Some ideas of the march of Alaric are borrowed from the journey of Honorius over the same ground (see Claudian in vi Cons Hon 494–522) The measured distance between Ravenna and Rome was 254 Roman miles Itinerar Wesseling, p 126

7 The march and retreat of Hannibal are described by Livy l. xxvi c. 7 8 9, 10, 11 and the reader is made a spectator of the interesting scene

8 These comparisons were used by Cineas the counsellor of Pyrrhus after his return from his embassy in which he had diligently studied the discipline and manners of Rome See Plutarch in Pyrrhus

9 In the three census which were made of the Roman people about the time of the second Punic war the numbers stand as follows (see Livy Epi tom l xx Hist l xxvii 36 xxix 37) 270 213 137 108 214 000 The fall of the second and the rise of the third appears so enormous that several critics notwithstanding the unanimity of the MSS have suspected some corruption of the text of Livy (See Drakenbroch ad xxvii 36 and Beaufort République Romaine tom i p 325) They did not consider that the second census was taken only at Rome and that the numbers were diminished not only by the death but likewise by the absence of many soldiers In the third census Livy expressly affirms that the legions were mustered by the care of particular commissaries From the numbers on the list we must always deduct one-twelfth above threescore and incapable of bearing arms. See Population de la France p 72

10 Livy considers these two incidents as the effects only of chance and courage I suspect that they were both managed by the admirable policy of the senate

11 See Jerom tom 1 p 169 170 ad Eustochium [Epist cviii tom 1 p 684 ed Vallars] he bestows on Paula the splendid titles of Gracchorum stirps soboles Scipionum Pauli hæres cujus vocabulum trahit Martiæ Papyriæ Matris Afr cani

vera et germana propago This particular description supposes a more solid title than the surname of Julius, which Toxotius shared with a thousand families of the western provinces See the Index of Tacitus, of Gruter's Inscriptions, etc

12 Tacitus (Annal iii 55) affirms that, between the battle of Actium and the reign of Vespasian, the senate was gradually filled with new families from the Municipia and colonies of Italy

13 Nec quisquam Procerum tentet (licet ære vetusto Floreat, et claro cingatur Roma senatû)
Se jactare parem, sed primâ sede relictâ
Auchenius, de jure licet certare secundo
Claud in Prob et Olybrii Coss 18

Such a compliment paid to the obscure name of the Auchenii has amazed the critics, but they all agree that, whatever may be the true reading, the sense of Claudian can be applied only to the Anician family

14 The earliest date on the annals of Pighius is that of M Anicius Gallus, Trib Pl A U C 506 Another Tribune, Q Anicius, A U C 508, is distinguished by the epithet of Prænestinus Livy (xlv 43) places the Anicii below the great families of Rome

15 Livy, xliv 30, 31, xlv 3, 26, 43 He fairly appreciates the merit of Anicius, and justly observes that his fame was clouded by the superior lustre of the Macedonian, which preceded the Illyrian, triumph

16 The dates of the three consulships are A U C 593, 818, 967 the two last under the reigns of Nero and Caracalla The second of these consuls distinguished himself only by his infamous flattery (Tacit Annal xv 74), but even the evidence of crimes, if they bear the stamp of greatness and antiquity, is admitted, without reluctance, to prove the genealogy of a noble house

17 In the sixth century the nobility of the Anician name is mentioned (Cassiodor Variar l x Ep 11, 12) with singular respect by the minister of a Gothic king of Italy

18 ————Fixus in omnes
Cognatos procedit honos, quemcumque requiras
Hâc de stirpe virum, certum est de Consule nasci
Per fasces numerantur avi, semperque renatâ

19 The title of first Christian senator may be justified by the authority of Prudentius (in Symmach i 553) and the dislike of the Pagans to the Anician family See Tillemont Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 183 v p 44 Baron Annal A D 312, No 78 A D 322, No 2

21 Two Persian satraps travelled to Milan and Rome to hear St Ambrose and to see Probus (Paulin in Vit Ambros) Claudian (in Cons Probin et Olybr 30–60) seems at a loss how to express the glory of Probus

The poet lived at the time of the Gothic invasion A moderate palace would have covered Cincinnatus's farm of four acres (Val Max iv 4, 7) In laxitatem ruris excurrunt, says Seneca, Epist 114 See a judicious note of Mr Hume, Essays, vol i p 562, last 8vo edition

26 This curious account of Rome in the reign of Honorius is found in a fragment of the historian Olympiodorus, ap Photium, p 197 [p 63, ed Bekker]

27 The sons of Alypius [Olympius in Bekker's ed], of Symmachus and of Maximus, spent, during their respective prætorships twelve or twenty, or forty, centenaries (or hundredweight of gold) See Olympiodor ap Phot p 197 [p 63 ed Bekker] This popular estimation allows some latitude but it is difficult to explain a law in the Theodosian Code (l vi tit iv leg 5) which fixes the expense of the first prætor at 25 000 of the second at 20,000 and of the third at 15,000 folles The name of follis (see Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxviii p 727) was equally applied to a purse of 125 pieces of silver and to a small copper coin of the value of $\frac{1}{125}$ part of that purse In the former sense the 25 000 folles would be equal to £150 000 in the latter to five or six pounds sterling The one appears extravagant the other is ridiculous There must have existed some third and middle value which is here understood but ambiguity is an inexcusable fault in the language of laws

29 Seneca Epist lxxxix His language is of the declamatory kind but declamation could scarcely exaggerate the avarice and luxury of the Romans The philosopher himself deserved some share of the reproach if it be true that his rigorous exaction of Quadringenties above three hundred thousand pounds which he had lent at high interest provoked a rebellion in Britain. (Dion Cassius l. lxii [c. 2] p 1003) According to the conjecture of Gale (Antoninus's Itinerary in Britain p 92) the same Faustinus possessed an estate near Bury in Suffolk, and another in the kingdom of Naples

30 Volusius a wealthy senator (Tacit Annal iii 30) always preferred tenants born on the estate Columella who received this maxim from him argues very judiciously on the subject De Re Rusticâ, l i c 7 p 408 edit Gesner Leipzig 1735

31 Valesius (ad Ammian xiv 6) has proved from Chrysostom and Augustin that the senators were not allowed to lend money at usury Yet it appears from the Theodosian Code (see Godefroy ad l. ii tit xxxiii tom 1 p 230-239) that they were permitted to take six per cent or one half of the legal interest and what is more singular this permission was granted to the young senators

32 Plin Hist Natur xxxiii 50 He states the silver at only 4380 pounds which is increased by Livy (xxx 45) to 100 023 the former seems too little for an opulent city the latter too much for any private sideboard

33 The learned Arbuthnot (Tables of Ancient Coins etc. p 153) has observed with humour and I believe with truth that Augustus had neither glass to his windows nor a shirt to his back Under the lower empire the use of linen and glass became somewhat more common

[Glass was in general use during the reign of Augustus and linen in that of Tiberius]

34 It is incumbent on me to explain the liberties which I have taken with the text of Ammianus 1 I have melted down into one piece the sixth chapter of the fourteenth and the fourth of the twenty eighth book 2 I have given order and connection to the confused mass of materials 3 I have softened some extravagant hyperboles and pared away some superfluities of the original 4 I have developed some observations which were insinuated rather than expressed With these allowances my version will be found not literal indeed but faithful and exact

35 Claudian who seems to have read the history of Ammianus speaks of this great revolution in a much less courtly style

Postquam jura ferox in se communia Cæsar
Transtulit et lapsi mores desuetaque priscis
Artibus in gremium pacis servile recessi
De Bell Gildonico v 49

36 The minute diligence of antiquarians has not been able to verify these extraordinary names I am of opinion that they were invented by the historian himself who was afraid of any personal satire or application It is certain however that the simple denominations of the Romans were gradually lengthened to the number of four five, or even seven pompous surnames as for instance, Marcus Mæcius Mæmmius Furius Balburius Cæcilianus Placidus See Noris Cenotaph. Pisan. Dissert iv p 438

37 The carrucæ or coaches of the Romans were often of solid silver curiously carved and engraved and the trappings of the mules or horses were embossed with gold This magnificence continued from the reign of Nero to that of Honorius and the Appian way was covered with the splendid equipages of the nobles who came out to meet St. Melania when she returned to Rome six years before the Gothic siege (Seneca Epist lxxxvii. Plin. Hist Natur xxxiii 49 Paulin Nolan apud Baron Annal Eccles A D 397 No 5) Yet pomp is well exchanged for convenience and a plain modern coach that is hung upon springs is much preferable to the silver or gold carts of antiquity which rolled on the axletree and were exposed for the most part to the inclemency of the weather

38 In a homily of Asterius bishop of Amasia M de Valois has discovered (ad Ammian xiv 6) that this was a new fashion that bears wolves, lions and tigers woods hunting matches etc were represented in embroidery and that the more pious coxcombs substituted the figure or legend of some favourite saint

39 See Pliny's Epistles i 6 Three large wild boars were allured and taken in the toils without interrupting the studies of the philosophic sportsman

40 The change from the inauspicious word Avernus which stands in the text is immaterial. The two lakes Avernus and Lucrinus communicated with each other and were fashioned by the stupendous moles of Agrippa into the Julian port which opened through a narrow entrance into the gulf of Puteoli Virgil who resided on the spot has described (Georgic ii 161) this work at the moment of its execution and his commentators especially Catrou have derived much light from Strabo Suetonius and Dion Earthquakes and volcanoes have changed the face of the country and turned the Lucrine lake since the year 1538 into the Monte Nuovo See Camillo Pellegrino Discorsi della Campania Felice p 239 244 etc. Antonii Sanfelicii Campania p 13 88

41 The regna Cumana et Puteolana loca cætero quivalde expetenda interpellantium autem multitudine pæne fugienda Cicero ad Attic xiv 16

42 The proverbial expression of Cimmerian darkness was originally borrowed from the description of Homer (in the eleventh book of the Odyssey) which he applies to a remote and fabulous country on the shores of the ocean See Erasmi Adagia, in his Works, tom ii p 593, the Leyden edition

43 We may learn from Seneca Epist cxxiii, three curious circumstances relative to the journeys of the Romans 1 They were preceded by a troop of Numidian light horse, who announced by a cloud of dust the approach of a great man 2 Their baggage-mules transported not only the precious vases but even the fragile vessels of crystal and murra, which last is almost proved, by the learned French translator of Seneca (tom iii p 402–422), to mean the porcelain of China and Japan 3 The beautiful faces of the young slaves were covered with a medicated crust, or ointment, which secured them against the effects of the sun and frost

44 Distributio solemnium sportularum The sportulæ, or sportellæ, were small baskets supposed to contain a quantity of hot provisions of the value of 100 quadrantes, or twelvepence halfpenny, which were ranged in order in the hall, and ostentatiously distributed to the hungry or servile crowd who waited at the door This indelicate custom is very frequently mentioned in the epigrams of Martial and the satires of Juvenal See likewise Suetonius, in Claud c 21, in Neron c 16 in Domitian c 4, 7 These baskets of provisions were afterwards converted into large pieces of gold and silver coin, or plate, which were mutually given and accepted even by the persons of the highest rank (see Symmach Epist iv 55, ix 124, and Miscell p 256 [ed Paris, 1604]), on solemn occasions, of consulships, marriages, etc

45 The want of an English name obliges me to refer to the common genus of squirrels, the Latin glis, the French loir, a little animal who inhabits the woods and remains torpid in cold weather (see Plin Hist Natur viii 82, Buffon, Hist Naturelle, tom viii 158 Pennant's Synopsis of Quadrupeds, p 289) The art of rearing and fattening great numbers of glires was practised in Roman villas as a profitable article of rural economy (Varro, de Re Rusticâ, iii 15) The excessive demand of them for luxurious tables was increased by the foolish prohibitions of the censors, and it is reported that they are still esteemed in modern Rome, and are frequently sent as presents by the Colonna princes (see Brotier, the last editor of Pliny, tom ii p 458, apud Barbou, 1779)

46 This game which might be translated by the more familiar names of trictrac or backgammon was a favourite amusement of the gravest Romans and old Mucius Scævola, the lawyer, had the reputation of a very skilful player It was called ludus duodecim scriptorum, from the twelve scripta or lines which equally divided the alveolus or table On these the two armies the white and the black each consisting of fifteen men, or calculi were regularly placed and alternately moved according to the laws of the game and the chances of the tesseræ or dice Dr Hyde, who diligently traces the history and varieties of the nerdiludium (a name of Persic etymology) from Ireland to Japan, pours forth on this trifling subject a copious torrent of classic and Oriental learning See Syntagma Dissertat tom ii p 217–405

47 Marius Maximus, homo omnium verbosissimus, qui et mythistoricis se voluminibus implicavit Vopiscus in Hist August p 242 [Vopisc Firm c 1] He wrote the Lives of the Emperors from Trajan to Alexander Severus See Gerard Vossius de Historicis Latin l ii c. 3, in his Works, vol iv p 57

48 This satire is probably exaggerated The Saturnalia of Macrobius, and the Epistles of Jerom, afford satisfactory proofs that Christian theology and classic literature were studiously cultivated by several Romans of both sexes and of the highest rank

49 Macrobius, the friend of these Roman nobles, considered the stars as the cause, or at least the signs, of future events (de Somn Scipion l i c 19, p 68)

50 The histories of Livy (see particularly vi 36) are full of the extortions of the rich and the sufferings of the poor debtors The melancholy story of a brave old soldier (Dionys Hal l vi c 26, p 347, edit Hudson, and Livy, ii 23) must have been frequently repeated in those primitive times, which have been so undeservedly praised

51 Non esse in civitate duo millia hominum qui rem haberent Cicero, Offic ii 21, and Comment Paul Manut, in edit Græv This vague computation was made A U C 649, in a speech of the tribune Philippus and it was his object, as well as that of the Gracchi (see Plutarch), to deplore, and perhaps to exaggerate, the misery of the common people

52 See the third Satire (60–125) of Juvenal, who indignantly complains, > ——Quamvis quota portio fæcis Achææ!

> Jampridem Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes,
> Et linguam et mores, etc

Seneca, when he proposes to comfort his mother (Consolat ad Helv c 6) by the reflection that a great part of mankind were in a state of exile, reminds her how few of the inhabitants of Rome were born in the city

53 Almost all that is said of the bread bacon, oil, wine, etc. may be found in the fourteenth book of the Theodosian Code which expressly treats of the police of the great cities See particularly the titles iii iv xv xvi xvii xxiv The collateral testimonies are produced in Godefroy's Commentary, and it is needless to transcribe them According to a law of Theodosius which appreciates in money the military allowance a piece of gold (eleven shillings) was equivalent to eighty pounds of bacon or to eighty pounds of oil or to twelve modii (or pecks) of salt (Cod Theod l xiv tit iv leg 17) This equation compared with another seventy pounds of bacon for an amphora ( Theod l xiv tit iv leg 4) fixes the price of wine at about sixteenpence the gallon.

54 The anonymous author of the Description of the World (p 14 in tom iii Geograph Minor Husdon) observes of Lucania in his barbarous Latin Regio obtima et ipsa omnibus habundans et lardum multum foras emitit propter quod est in montibus cujus escam animalium variam

58 Olympiodor apud Phot p 197 [p 63 ed Bekker]

59 Seneca (Epistol lxxxvi) compares the baths of Scipio Africanus at his villa of Liternum with the magnificence (which was continually increasing) of the public baths of Rome long before the stately Thermæ of Antoninus and Diocletian were erected The quadrans paid for admission was the quarter of the as about one-eighth of an English penny

60 Ammianus (l xiv c 6 and l xxviii c 4) after describing the luxury and pride of the nobles of Rome exposes with equal indignation the vices and follies of the common people

61 Juvenal Satir xi 191 etc The expressions of the historian Ammianus are not less strong and animated than those of the satirist and both the one and the other painted from the life The numbers which the great Circus was capable of receiving are taken from the original Notitiæ of the city The differences between them prove that they did not transcribe each other but the sum may appear incredible though the country on these occasions flocked to the city

62 Sometimes indeed they composed original pieces

———Vestigia Græca
Ausi deserere et celebrare domestica facta

Horat Epistol ad Pisones 285 and the learned though perplexed note of Dacier who might have allowed the name of tragedies to the Brutus and the Decius of Pacuvius or to the Cato of Maternus The Octavia ascribed to one of the Senecas still remains a very unfavourable specimen of Roman tragedy

63 In the time of Quintilian and Pliny a tragic poet was reduced to the imperfect method of hiring a great room and reading his play to the company whom he invited for that purpose (See Dialog de Oratoribus, c. 9 10 and Plin Epistol vii 17)

64. See the dialogue of Lucian entitled de Saltatione tom. ii p 265–317 edit Reitz The pantomimes obtained the honourable name of χειρόσοφοι and it was required that they should be conversant with almost every art and science Burette (in the Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom i p 127 etc) has given a short history of the art of pantomimes

65 Ammianus l. xiv c 6 He complains with decent indignation that the streets of Rome were filled with crowds of females who might have given children to the state but whose only occupation was to curl and dress their hair and jactari volubilibus gyris dum exprimunt innumera simulacra quæ finxere fabulæ theatrales.

66 Lipsius (tom iii p 423 de Magnitud Romana l iii c 3) and Isaac Vossius (Observat Var p 26–34) have indulged strange dreams, of four or eight or fourteen millions in Rome. Mr Hume (Essays vol. i p 450–457) with admirable good sense and scepticism betrays some secret disposition to extenuate the populousness of ancient times

69 The successive testimonies of Pliny Aristides Claudian Rutilius etc prove the insufficiency of these restrictive edicts See Lipsius de Magnitud Romana l iii c 4.

——Tabulata tibi jam tertia fumant

A pluviâ Juvenal Satir iii 199.

70 Read the whole third Satire but particularly 166 223 etc The description of a crowded insula or lodging house in Petronius (c 95 97) perfectly tallies with the complaints of Juvenal and we learn from legal authority that in the time of Augustus (Heineccius Hist Juris Roman c iv p 181) the ordinary rent of the several cænacula or apartments of an insula annually produced forty thousand sesterces between three and four hundred pounds sterling (Pandect l xix. tit. ii. No 30) a sum which proves at once the large extent and high value of those common buildings

71 This sum total is composed of 1780 domus or great houses of 46 602 insulæ or plebeian habitations (see Nardini Roma Antica l iii p 88) and these numbers are ascertained by the agreement of the texts of the different Notitiæ Nardini l. viii p 498 500

72 See that accurate writer M de Messance, Recherches sur la Population, p 175–187 From probable or certain grounds he assigns to Paris 23,565 houses, 71,114 families, and 576,630 inhabitants

73 This computation is not very different from that which M Brotier, the last editor of Tacitus (tom. ii. p 380), has assumed from similar principles, though he seems to aim at a degree of precision which it is neither possible nor important to obtain

74 For the events of the first siege of Rome, which are often confounded with those of the second and third, see Zosimus, l v [c 38–42] p 350–354, Sozomen, l ix c 6, Olympiodorus, ap Phot p 180 [p 57, ed Bekk], Philostorgius, l xii c 3, and Godefroy, Dissertat p 467–475

75 The mother of Læta was named Pissumena Her father, family, and country are unknown Ducange, Fam Byzantin p 59

76 Ad nefandos cibos erupit esurientium rabies, et sua invicem membra laniarunt, dum mater non parcit lactenti infantiæ, et recipit utero, quem paullò ante effuderat Jerom ad Principiam, tom i. p 121 [Ep cxxvii tom i p 953, ed Vallars] The same horrid circumstance is likewise told of the sieges of Jerusalem and Paris For the latter, compare the tenth book of the Henriade, and the Journal de Henri IV tom i p 47–83, and observe that a plain narrative of facts is much more pathetic than the most laboured descriptions of epic poetry

77 Zosimus (l v [c 41] p 355, 356) speaks of these ceremonies like a Greek unacquainted with the national superstition of Rome and Tuscany I suspect that they consisted of two parts, the secret and the public the former were probably an imitation of the arts and spells by which Numa had drawn down Jupiter and his thunder on Mount Aventine

> ——Quid agant laqueis, quæ carmina dicant,
> Quâque trahant superis sedibus arte Jovem,
> Scire nefas homini

The ancilia or shields of Mars, the pignora Imperii, which were carried in solemn procession on the calends of March, derived their origin from this mysterious event (Ovid Fast iii 259–398) It was probably designed to revive this ancient festival, which had been suppressed by Theodosius. In that case we recover a chronological date (March the 1st, A D 409) which has not hitherto been observed

78 Sozomen (l. ix c. 6) insinuates that the experiment was actually though unsuccessfully made, but he does not mention the name of Innocent, and Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés tom x p 645) is determined not to believe that a pope could be guilty of such impious condescension

79 Pepper was a favourite ingredient of the most expensive Roman cookery and the best sort commonly sold for fifteen denarii, or ten shillings, the pound See Plin, Hist Natur xii 14 It was brought from India and the same country, the coast of Malabar, still affords the greatest plenty but the improvement of trade and navigation has multiplied the quantity and reduced the price See Histoire Politique et Philosophique etc tom i p 457

80 This Gothic chieftain is called, by Jornandes and Isidore, Athaulphus by Zosimus and Orosius, Ataulphus, and by Olympiodorus, Adaoulphus I have used the celebrated name of Adolphus, which seems to be authorised by the practice of the Swedes, the sons or brothers of the ancient Goths

81 The treaty between Alaric and the Romans, etc, is taken from Zosimus, l v [c 41–45] p 354 355, 358, 359 362, 363 The additional circumstances are too few and trifling to require any other quotation

85 Zosimus (l v [c 46] p 364) relates this circumstance with visible complacency, and celebrates the character of Gennerid as the last glory of expiring Paganism Very different were the sentiments of the council of Carthage, who deputed four bishops to the court of Ravenna, to complain of the law which had been just enacted, that all conversions to Christianity should be free and voluntary See Baronius, Annal Eccles A D 409 No 12, A D 410, No 47, 48

86 Zosimus, l v [c 47–49] p 367, 368, 369 This custom of swearing by the head, or life, or safety, or genius, of the sovereign, was of the highest antiquity, both in Egypt (Genesis xlii 15) and Scythia It was soon transferred, by flattery, to the Cæsars, and Tertullian complains that it was the only oath which the Romans of his time affected to reverence See an elegant Dissertation of the Abbé Massieu on the Oaths of the Ancients in the Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom i p 208 209

87 Zosimus, l v [c 50] p 368, 369 I have softened the expressions of Alaric, who expatiates in too florid a manner on the history of Rome

88 See Sueton in Claud c 20, Dion Cassius, l lx [c 11] p 949 edit Reimar and the lively description of Juvenal Satir xii 75 etc In the sixteenth century, when the remains of this Augustan port were still visible, the antiquarians sketched the plan (see D'Anville Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom xxx p 198) and declared with enthusiasm that all the monarchs of Europe would be unable to execute so great a work (Bergier, Hist des Grands Chemins des Romains, tom ii p 356).

89. The Ostia Tiberina (see Cluver Italia Antiq l iii p 870–879) in the plural number the two mouths of the Tiber were separated by the Holy Island an equilateral triangle whose sides were each of them computed at about two miles The colony of Ostia was founded immediately beyond the left or southern and the Port immediately beyond the right or northern branch of the river and the distance between their remains measures something more than two miles on Cingolani s map In the time of Strabo the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber had choked the harbour of Ostia the progress of the same cause has added much to the size of the Holy Island and gradually left both Ostia and the Port at a considerable distance from the shore The dry channels (fiumi morti) and the large estuaries (stagno di Ponente di Levante) mark the changes of the river and the efforts of the sea Consult for the present state of this dreary and desolate tract the excellent map of the ecclesiastical state by the mathematicians of Benedict XIV an actual survey of the Agro Romano in six sheets by Cingolani which contains 113 819 rubbia (about 570 000 acres) and the large topographical map of Ameti in eight sheets

90 As early as the third (Lardner s Credibility of the Gospel part ii vol. iii p 89–92) or at least the fourth century (Carol a Sancto Paulo Notit Eccles p 47) the Port of Rome was an episcopal city which was demolished as it should seem in the ninth century by pope Gregory IV during the incursions of the Arabs It is now reduced to an inn a church and the house or palace of the bishop who ranks as one of six cardinal bishops of the Roman church See Eschinard Descrizione di Roma et dell Agro Romano p 328

91 For the elevation of Attalus consult Zosimus l vi [c 6 7] p 377–380 Sozomen l ix c 8 9 Olympiodor ap Phot p 180 181 [p 57 ed Bekk] Philostorg l xii c 3 and Godefroy Dissertat p 470

92 We may admit the evidence of Sozomen for the Arian baptism and that of Philostorgius for the Pagan education of Attalus The visible joy of Zosimus and the discontent which he imputes to the Anician family are very unfavourable to the Christianity of the new emperor

93 He carried his insolence so far as to declare that he should mutilate Honorius before he sent him into exile But this assertion of Zosimus (l vi c 8) is destroyed by the more impartial testimony of Olympiodorus who attributes the ungenerous proposal (which was absolutely rejected by Attalus) to the baseness and perhaps the treachery of Jovius

94 Procop de Bell Vandal l i c 2 [tom i p 318 ed Bonn]

95 See the cause and circumstances of the fall of Attalus in Zosimus l vi [c 9–12] p 380–383 Sozomen l ix c 8 Philostorg l xii c 3 The two acts of indemnity in the Theodosian Code l ix tit xxxviii leg 11 12 which were published the 12th of February and the 8th of August A D 410, evidently relate to this usurper

96 In hoc Alaricus imperatore, facto infecto, refecto ac defecto mimum risit et ludum spectavit imperii Orosius l vii c 42 p 582

97 Zosimus L vi [c. 13] p 384 Sozomen l ix. c. 9 Philostorgius l xii c 3 In this place the text of Zosimus is mutilated and we have lost the remainder of his sixth and last book which ended with the sack of Rome Credulous and partial as he is we must take our leave of that historian with some regret

98 Adest Alaricus trepidam Romam obsidet turbat irrumpit Orosius l. vii c. 39 p 573 He despatches this great event in seven words but he employs whole pages in celebrating the devotion of the Goths I have extracted from an improbable story of Procopius the circumstances which had an air of probability Procop de Bell Vandal l i c. 2 [tom 1 p 315, ed. Bonn] He supposes that the city was surprised while the senators slept in the afternoon but Jerom with more authority and more reason affirms that it was in the night nocte Moab capta est nocte cecidit murus ejus tom. i. p 121 ad Principiam [Epist cxxvii c 12 tom i. p 953 ed Vallars]

99 Orosius (l vii c. 39 p 573–576) applauds the piety of the Christian Goths without seeming to perceive that the greatest part of them were Arian heretics Jornandes (c 30 p 653 [p 86, ed. Lugd. B 1597]) and Isidore of Seville (Chron. p. 714, edit Grot) who were both attached to the Gothic cause have repeated and embellished these edifying tales According to Isidore, Alaric himself was heard to say that he waged war with the Romans and not with the Apostles Such was the style of the seventh century two hundred years before the fame and merit had been ascribed not to the Apostles, but to Christ

100 See Augustine The City of God l i c 1–6. He particularly appeals to the examples of Troy Syracuse and Tarentum

101 Jerom (tom 1 p 121 ad Principiam [Ep cxxvii tom 1 p 953 ed Vallars]) has applied to the sack of Rome all the strong expressions of Virgil —

> Quis cladem illius noctis quis funera fando
> Explicet etc

Procopius (l i c 2 [tom. i p 316 ed Bonn]) positively affirms that great numbers were slain by the Goths Augustine (The City of God l i c 12 13) offers Christian comfort for the death of those whose bodies (multa corpora) had remained (in tantâ strage) unburied Baronius from the different writings of the Fathers has thrown some light on the sack of Rome Annal Eccles A D 410 No 16–44.

102 Sozomen l ix c 10. Augustine (The City of God l i c 17) intimates that some virgins or matrons actually killed themselves to escape violation and though he admires their spirit he is obliged, by his theology, to condemn their rash presumption Perhaps the good bishop of Hippo was too easy in the belief, as well as too rigid in the censure, of this act of female heroism The twenty maidens (if they ever existed) who threw themselves into the Elbe when Magdeburg was taken by storm, have been multiplied to the number of twelve hundred See Harte's History of Gustavus Adolphus, vol 1 p 308

103 See Augustine, The City of God, l i c 16–18 He treats the subject with remarkable accuracy and after admitting that there cannot be any crime where there is no consent, he adds, Sed quia non solum quod ad dolorem, verum etiam quod ad libidinem, pertinet, in corpore alieno perpetrari potest, quicquid tale factum fuerit, etsi retentam constantissimo animo pudicitiam non excutit, pudorem tamen incutit, ne credatur factum cum mentis etiam voluntate, quod fieri fortasse sine carnis aliquâ voluptate non potuit In c 18 he makes some curious distinctions between moral and physical virginity

104 Marcella, a Roman lady, equally respectable for her rank, her age, and her piety, was thrown on the ground and cruelly beaten and whipped, cæsam fustibus flagellisque, etc Jerom, tom i p 121, ad Principiam [Ep cxxvii c 13, tom i p 953, ed Vallars] See Augustine, The City of God, l i c 10 The modern Sacco di Roma, p 108, gives an idea of the various methods of torturing prisoners for gold

105 The historian Sallust, who usefully practised the vices which he has so eloquently censured, employed the plunder of Numidia to adorn his palace and gardens on the Quirinal hill The spot where the house stood is now marked by the church of St Susanna, separated only by a street from the baths of Diocletian, and not far distant from the Salarian gate See Nardini, Roma Antica, p 192, 193, and the great Plan of Modern Rome, by Nolli

106 The expressions of Procopius are distinct and moderate (de Bell Vandal l i c 2 [tom i p 316, ed. Bonn]) The chronicle of Marcellinus speaks too strongly, partem urbis Romæ cremavit, and the words of Philostorgius ἐν ἐρειπίοις δὲ τῆς πόλεως κειμένης (l xii c 3) convey a false and exaggerated idea Bargæus has composed a particular dissertation (see tom iv Antiquit Rom Græv) to prove that the edifices of Rome were not subverted by the Goths and Vandals

107 Orosius, l ii c 19 p 143 He speaks as if he disapproved all statues, vel Deum vel hominem mentiuntur They consisted of the kings of Alba and Rome from Æneas, the Romans illustrious either in arms or arts, and the deified Cæsars The expression which he uses of Forum is somewhat ambiguous, since there existed five principal Fora but as they were all contiguous and adjacent, in the plain which is surrounded by the Capitoline the Quirinal, the Esquiline, and the Palatine hills, they might fairly be considered as one See the Roma Antiqua of Donatus, p 162–201, and the Roma Antica of Nardini, p 212–273 The former is more useful for the ancient descriptions, the latter for the actual topography

108 Orosius (l ii c 19, p 142) compares the cruelty of the Gauls and the clemency of the Goths Ibi vix quemquam inventum senatorem, qui vel absens evaserit, hic vix quemquam requiri, qui forte ut latens perierit But there is an air of rhetoric, and perhaps of falsehood, in this antithesis, and Socrates (l vii c 10) affirms, perhaps by an opposite exaggeration, that many senators were put to death with various and exquisite tortures

113 As the adventures of Proba and her family are connected with the life of St Augustin, they are diligently illustrated by Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 620–635 Some time after their arrival in Africa, Demetrias took the veil and made a vow of virginity an event which was considered as of the highest importance to Rome and to the world All the Saints wrote congratulatory letters to her, that of Jerom is still extant (tom i p 62–73 ad Demetriad de servandâ Virginitat [Epist cxxx tom i p 969 ed Vallars]), and contains a mixture of absurd reasoning spirited declamation, and curious facts, some of which relate to the siege and sack of Rome

117 The furious spirit of Luther the effect of temper and enthusiasm has been forcibly attacked (Bossuet Hist des Variations des Eglises Protestantes livre i p 20–36) and feebly defended (Seckendorf Comment de Lutheranismo especially l i No 78 p 120 and l iii No 122 p 556)

118 Marcellinus in Chron Orosius (l vii c 39 p 575) asserts that he left Rome on the third day but this difference is easily reconciled by the successive motions of great bodies of troops

119 Socrates (l vii c 10) pretends without any colour of truth or reason that Alaric fled on the report that the armies of the Eastern empire were in full march to attack him

121 Forty eight years before the foundation of Rome (about 800 before the Christian era) the Tuscans built Capua and Nola at the distance of twenty three miles from each other but the latter of the two cities never emerged from a state of mediocrity

122 Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom xiv p 1–146) has compiled with his usual diligence all that relates to the life and writings of Paulinus whose retreat is celebrated by his own pen and by the praises of St Ambrose St Jerom St Augustin Sulpicius Severus etc his Christian friends and contemporaries

123 See the affectionate letters of Ausonius (Epist xix–xxv p 650–698 edit Toll) to his colleague his friend and his disciple Paulinus The religion of Ausonius is still a problem (see Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xv p 123–138) I believe that it was such in his own time and consequently that in his heart he was a Pagan

126 The platanus or plane tree was a favourite of the ancients by whom it was propagated, for the sake of shade from the East to Gaul. Pliny Hist Natur xii. 3 4, 5 He mentions several of an enormous size one in the Imperial villa at Velitræ which Caligula called his nest as the branches were capable of holding a large table, the proper attendants and the emperor himself whom Pliny quaintly styles pars umbræ an expression which might with equal reason be applied to Alaric

130 Orosius l vii c 43 p 584 585 He was sent by St Augustin in the year 415 from Africa to Palestine to visit St Jerom and to consult with him on the subject of Pelagian controversy

131 Jornandes supposes without much probability that Adolphus visited and plundered Rome a second time (more locustarum erasit) Yet he agrees with Orosius in supposing that a treaty of peace was concluded between the Gothic prince and Honorius See Oros l vii c 43 p 584, 585 Jornandes de Reb Geticis c. 31 p 654 655 [p 88 ed Lugd B]

132 The retreat of the Goths from Italy and their first transactions in Gaul are dark and doubtful I have derived much assistance from Mascou (Hist of the Ancient Germans l vi i c 29 35 36 37) who has illustrated and connected the broken chronicles and fragments of the times

133 See an account of Placidia in Ducange Fam Byzant p 72 and Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom v p 260 386 etc tom vi p 240.

135 Zosim l vi [c 12] p 383 Orosius (l vii

c. 40, p 567) and the Chronicles of Marcellinus and Idatius seem to suppose that the Goths did not carry away Placidia till after the last siege of Rome

136 See the pictures of Adolphus and Placidia, and the account of their marriage, in Jornandes, de Reb Geticis, c 31, p 654, 655 [p 88, ed Lugd B] With regard to the place where the nuptials were stipulated, or consummated, or celebrated, the MSS of Jornandes vary between two neighbouring cities, Forli and Imola (Forum Livii and Forum Cornelii) It is fair and easy to reconcile the Gothic historian with Olympiodorus (see Mascou, l. viii. c 36) but Tillemont grows peevish, and swears that it is not worth while to try to conciliate Jornandes with any good authors

137 The Visigoths (the subjects of Adolphus) restrained, by subsequent laws, the prodigality of conjugal love It was illegal for a husband to make any gift or settlement for the benefit of his wife during the first year of their marriage, and his liberality could not at any time exceed the tenth part of his property The Lombards were somewhat more indulgent they allowed the morgingcap immediately after the wedding night, and this famous gift, the reward of virginity, might equal the fourth part of the husband s substance Some cautious maidens, indeed, were wise enough to stipulate beforehand a present which they were too sure of not deserving See Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws, l xix c 25 Muratori, delle Antichità Italiane, tom. i Dissertazione xx p 243

138 We owe the curious detail of this nuptial feast to the historian Olympiodorus, ap Photium, p 185 188 [p 59, ed Bekk]

139. See in the great collection of the Historians of France by Dom Bouquet, tom ii Greg Turonens l. iii c 10, p 191 Gesta Regum Francorum, c. 23 p 557 The anonymous writer, with an ignorance worthy of his times, supposes that these instruments of Christian worship had belonged to the temple of Solomon If he has any meaning, it must be that they were found in the sack of Rome.

141 The president Goguet (Origine des Loix, etc, tom ii p 239) is of opinion that the stupendous pieces of emerald, the statues and columns which antiquity has placed in Egypt at Gades at Constantinople, were in reality artificial compositions of coloured glass The famous emerald dish which is shown at Genoa is supposed to countenance the suspicion

143 His three laws are inserted in the Theodosian Code, l xi tit xxviii leg 7, l xiii. tit xi leg 12 l xv tit xiv leg 14. The expressions of the last are very remarkable, since they contain not only a pardon, but an apology

144 Olympiodorus ap Phot p 188 [p 59, ed Bekk] Philostorgius (l xii c. 5) observes, that when Honorius made his triumphal entry he encouraged the Romans, with his hand and voice (χειρὶ καὶ γλώττῃ), to rebuild their city, and the Chronicle of Prosper commends Heraclian, qui in Romanæ urbis reparationem strenuum exhibuerat ministerium

145 The date of the voyage of Claudius Rutilius Numatianus is clogged with some difficulties, but Scaliger has deduced from astronomical characters that he left Rome the 14th of September, and embarked at Porto the 9th of October, A D 416 See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 820 In this poetical Itinerary, Rutilius (l i 115 etc) addresses Rome in a high strain of congratulation

Erige crinales lauros, seniumque sacrati
Verticis in virides, Roma, recinge comas, etc.

146 Orosius composed his history in Africa only two years after the event, yet his authority seems to be overbalanced by the improbability of the fact The Chronicle of Marcellinus gives Heraclian 700 ships and 3000 men the latter of these numbers is ridiculously corrupt, but the former would please me very much

147 The Chronicle of Idatius affirms, without the least appearance of truth that he advanced as far as Otriculum, in Umbria, where he was overthrown in a great battle, with the loss of fifty thousand men

148 See Cod Theod l xv tit xiv leg 13 The legal acts performed in his name, even the manumission of slaves, were declared invalid till they had been formally repeated

149 I have disdained to mention a very foolish, and probably a false, report (Procop de Bell Vandal l i c. 2 [tom i p 316, ed Bonn]), that Honorius was alarmed by the loss of Rome till he understood that it was not a favourite chicken of that name, but only the capital of the world, which had been lost Yet even this story is some evidence of the public opinion

150 The materials for the lives of all these tyrants are taken from six contemporary historians two Latins and four Greeks Orosius l vii c 42, p 581 582 583 Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus apud Gregor Turon l ii c 9 in the Historians of France tom ii p 165, 166 Zosimus l vi [c. 2] p 370 371 Olympiodorus apud Phot p 180 181, 184 185 [p 57 sqq ed Bekk] Sozomen l. ix. c. 12 13 14 15 and Philostorgius l xii c. 5, 6 with Godefroy s Dissertations p 477-481 besides the four Chronicles of Prosper Tyro Prosper of Aquitain, Idatius, and Marcellinus

151 The praises which Sozomen has bestowed on this act of desp ur appear strange and scanda lous in the mouth of an ecclesiastical historian He observes (p 379 [ed Cantab 1720]) that the wife of Gerontius was a Christian and that her death was worthy of her religion and of immortal fame.

152 Εἶδ ι ἄξιον τυρα νῖδος is the expression of Olympiodorus which he seems to have borrowed from Æolus a tragedy of Euripides of which some fragments only are now extant (Euripid Barnes tom ii p 443 ver 38) This allusion may prove that the ancient tragic poets were still familiar to the Greeks of the fifth century

153 Sidonius Apollinaris (l v Epist 9 p 139 and Not Sirmond p 58) after stigmatising the inconstancy of Constantine the facility of Jovinus the perfidy of Gerontius continues to observe that all the vices of these tyrants were united in the per son of Dardanus Yet the præfect supported a re spectable character in the world and even in the church held a devout correspondence with St Augustin and St Jerom and was complimented by the latter (tom iii p 66) with the epithets of Christianorum Nobilissime and Nobilium Christianissime

154. The expression may be understood almost literally Olympiodorus says μόλις σάκκο ι ἐζωγρησα Σακ ι (or σάκος) may signify a sack or a loose garment and this method of entangling and catching an enemy laciniis contortis was much practised by the Huns (Ammian xxxi 2) Il fut pris vif avec des filets is the translation of Tille mont Hist des Empereurs tom v p 608

155 Without recurring to the more ancient writers I shall quote three respectable testimonies which belong to the fourth and seventh centuries the Expositio totius Mundi (p 16 in the third volume of Hudson s Minor Geographers) Auson ius (de Claris Urbibus p 242 edit Toll) and Isi dore of Seville (Præfat ad Chron ap Grotium Hist Goth p 707) Many particulars relative to the fertility and trade of Spain may be found in Nonnius Hispania Illustrata and in Huet Hist du Commerce des Anciens c 40 p 228–234

156 The date is accurately fixed in the Fasti and the Chronicle of Idatius Orosius (l vii c 40 p 578) imputes the loss of Spain to the treachery of the Honorians while Sozomen (l ix c 12) accuses only their negligence

157 Idatius wishes to apply the prophecies of Daniel to these national calamities and is there fore obliged to accommodate the circumstances of the event to the terms of the prediction

158 Mariana de Rebus Hispanicis l. v c 1 tom i p 148 Hag Comit 1733 He had read in Orosius (l. vii c. 41 p 579) that the barbarians had turned their swords into ploughshares and that many of the provincials preferred inter Bar baros pauperem libertatem quam inter Romanos tributariam solicitudinem sustinere

159 This mixture of force and persuasion may be fairly inferred from comparing Orosius and Jornandes the Roman and the Gothic historian

160 According to the system of Jornandes (c. 33 p 659 [ed Grot]) the true hereditary right to the Gothic sceptre was vested in the Amali but those princes who were the vassals of the Huns, commanded the tribes of the Ostrogoths in some distant parts of Germany or Scythia.

161 The murder is related by Olympiodorus but the number of the children is taken from an epitaph of suspected authority

162 The death of Adolphus was celebrated at Constantinople with illuminations and Circensian games (See Chron Alexandrin) It may seem doubtful whether the Greeks were actuated on this occasion by their hatred of the barbarians or of the Latins

163 Quòd Tartessacis avus hujus Vallia terris
Vandalicas turmas et juncti Martis Alanos
Stravit et occiduam texêre cadavera Calpen

Sidon Appollinar in Panegyr Anthem 363 p 300 edit Sirmond.

164. This supply was very acceptable the Goths were insulted by the Vandals of Spain with the epithet of Truli because in their extreme distress they had given a piece of gold for a trula or about half a pound of flour Olympiod apud Phot p 189 [p 60 ed. Bekk]

165 Orosius inserts a copy of these pretended letters Tu cum omnibus pacem habe omniumque obsides accipe nos nobis confligimus nobis peri mus tibi vincimus immortalis vero quæstus erit Reipublicæ tuæ si utrique pereamus [p 586] The idea is just but I cannot persuade myself that it was entertained or expressed by the barbarians.

166 Romam triumphans ingreditur is the for mal expression of Prosper's Chronicle The facts which relate to the death of Adolphus and the ex ploits of Wallia are related from Olympiodorus (ap Phot p 188 [p 59 60 ed Bekk]) Orosius (l vii c 43 p 584–587) Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 31 32) and the Chronicles of Idatius and Isidore

167 Ausonius (de Claris Urbibus p 257–262 [No 14]) celebrates Bourdeaux with the part al affection of a native See in Salvian (de Gubern. Dei p 228 Paris 1608) a florid description of the provinces of Aquitain and Novempopulania

168 Orosius (l vii c. 32 p 550) commends the mildness and modesty of these Burgundians who treated their subjects of Gaul as their Christian brethren Mascou has illustrated the origin of their kingdom in the four first annotations at the end of his laborious H story of the Ancient Germans vol. ii p 555–572 of the English translation

169 See Mascou l viii c 43 44 45 Except in a short and suspicious l ne of the Chronicle of Prosper (in tom i p 638) the name of Pharamond is never mentioned before the seventh century

The author of the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 543) suggests, probably enough, that the choice of Pharamond, or at least of a king, was recommended to the Franks by his father Marcomir, who was an exile in Tuscany

171 See the remarkable passage of the Eucharisticon of Paulinus, 575, apud Mascou, l viii c 42

172 This important truth is established by the accuracy of Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 641) and by the ingenuity of the Abbé Dubos (Hist de l'Etablissement de la Monarchie Françoise dans les Gaules, tom i p 259)

173 Zosimus (l vi [c 5] 376 [c 10], 383) relates in a few words the revolt of Britain and Armorica Our antiquarians, even the great Camden himself, have been betrayed into many gross errors by their imperfect knowledge of the history of the continent

174 The limits of Armorica are defined by two national geographers, Messieurs de Valois and d'Anville, in their Notitias of Ancient Gaul The word had been used in a more extensive, and was afterwards contracted to a much narrower, signification

175 Gens inter geminos notissima clauditur amnes,
Armoricana prius veteri cognomine dicta
Torva, ferox, ventosa, procax, incauta, rebellis
Inconstans, disparque sibi novitatis amore,
Prodiga verborum, sed non et prodiga facti

Ericus Monach in Vit St Germani, l v apud Vales Notit Galliarum, p 43 Valesius alleges several testimonies to confirm this character, to which I shall add the evidence of the presbyter Constantine (A D 488), who, in the Life of St Germain, calls the Armorican rebels mobilem et indisciplinatum populum See the Historians of France, tom i p 643

176 I thought it necessary to enter my protest against this part of the system of the Abbé Dubos, which Montesquieu has so vigorously opposed See The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 24

177 Βρεταννίαν μέντοι Ῥωμαῖοι ἀνασώσασθαι οὐκέτι εἶχον, are the words of Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 2, p 181, Louvre edition [tom i p 318, ed Bonn]), in a very important passage which has been too much neglected Even Bede (Hist Gent Anglican l i c 12, p 50, edit Smith) acknowledges that the Romans finally left Britain in the reign of Honorius Yet our modern historians and antiquarians extend the term of their dominion, and there are some who allow only the interval of a few months between their departure and the arrival of the Saxons

178 Bede has not forgot the occasional aid of the legions against the Scots and Picts, and more authentic proof will hereafter be produced that the independent Britons raised 12,000 men for the service of the emperor Anthemius in Gaul

179 I owe it to myself and to historic truth to declare that some circumstances in this paragraph are founded only on conjecture and analogy The stubbornness of our language has sometimes forced me to deviate from the conditional into the indicative mood

185 The establishment of their power would have been easy indeed if we could adopt the impracticable scheme of a lively and learned antiquarian, who supposes that the British monarchs of the several tribes continued to reign, though with subordinate jurisdiction, from the time of Claudius to that of Honorius See Whitaker's History of Manchester, vol i p 247–257

1 Father Montfaucon who by the command of his Benedictine superiors was compelled (see Longueruana tom 1 p 205) to execute the laborious edition of St Chrysostom in thirteen volumes in fol o (Paris 1738) amused himself with extracting from that immense collection of morals some curious antiquities which illustrate the manners of the Theodosian age (see Chrysostom Opera tom xiii p 192–196) and his French Dissertation in the Mémoires de l Acad des Inscriptions tom xiii p 474–490

2 According to the loose reckoning that a ship could sail with a fair wind 1000 stadia or 125 miles in the revolution of a day and night Diodorus Siculus computes ten days from the Palus Mæotis to Rhodes and four days from Rhodes to Alexandria. The navigation of the Nile from Alexandria to Syene under the tropic of Cancer required as it was against the stream ten days more Diodor Sicul tom 1 l iii [c 33] p 200 edit Wesseling He might without much impropriety measure the extreme heat from the verge of the torrid zone but he speaks of the Mæotis in the 47th degree of northern latitude as if it lay within the polar circle

3 Barthius who adored his author with the blind superstition of a commentator gives the preference to the two books which Claudian composed against Eutropius above all his other productions (Baillet Jugemens des Savans tom iv p 227) They are indeed a very elegant and spirited satire and would be more valuable in an historical light if the invective were less vague and more temperate

4 After lamenting the progress of the eunuchs in the Roman palace and defining their proper functions Claudian adds,

——A fronte recedant
Imperii

In Eutrop 1 422

Yet it does not appear that the eunuch had assumed any of the efficient offices of the empire and he is styled only Præpositus sacri cubiculi in the edict of his banishment See Cod Theod l ix tit xl leg 17

5 Jamque oblita sui nec sobria divitiis mens
In miseras leges hominumque negotia ludit
Judicat eunuchus
Arma etiam violare parat

Claudian (in Eutrop 1 229–270) with that mixture of indignation and humour which always pleases in a satiric poet describes the insolent folly of the eunuch the disgrace of the empire and the joy of the Goths

——— Gaudet cum viderit, hostis,
Et sentit jam deesse viros

6 The poet s lively description of his deformity (1 110–125) is confirmed by the authentic testimony of Chrysostom (tom iii [in Eutrop 1. c 3] p 384 edit Montfaucon) who observes that when the paint was washed away the face of Eutropius appeared more ugly and wrinkled than that of an old woman Claudian remarks (1 469) and the remark must have been founded on experience that there was scarcely any interval between the youth and the decrepit age of a eunuch

7 Eutropius appears to have been a native of Armenia or Assyria His three services which Claudian more particularly describes were these —1 He spent many years as the catamite of Ptolemy a groom or soldier of the Imperial stables 2 Ptolemy gave him to the old general Arintheus for whom he very skilfully exercised the profession of a pimp 3 He was given on her marriage to the daughter of Arintheus and the future consul was employed to comb her hair to present the silver ewer to wash and to fan his mistress in hot weather See l 1 31–137

8 Claudian (l 1 in Eutrop 1–22) after enumerating the various prodigies of monstrous births, speaking animals showers of blood or stones, double suns etc adds with some exaggeration,

Omnia cesserunt eunucho consule monstra

The first book concludes with a noble speech of the goddess of Rome to her favourite Honorius deprecating the new ignominy to which she was exposed

9 Fl Mallius Theodorus whose civil honours and philosophical works have been celebrated by Claudian in a very elegant panegyric

10 Μ θύω δὲ ἤδη τῷ πλούτῳ drunk with riches, is the forcible expression of Zosimus (l v [c. 10] p 301) and the avarice of Eutropius is equally execrated in the Lexicon of Suidas and the Chronicle of Marcellinus Chrysostom had often admonished the favourite of the vanity and danger of immoderate wealth, tom iii. p 381 [in Eutrop i c i]

11 ———certantum sæpe duorum

Diversum suspendit onus cum pondere judex

Vergit, et in geminas nutat provincia lances

Claudian (i 192–209) so curiously distinguishes the circumstances of the sale that they all seem to allude to particular anecdotes

12 Claudian (in Eutrop i 154–170) mentions the guilt and exile of Abundantius, nor could he fail to quote the example of the artist who made the first trial of the brazen bull which he presented to Phalaris See Zosimus, l v [c 10] p 302, Jerom, tom i p 26 [Ep lx c 16, tom i p 342, ed Vallars] The difference of place is easily reconciled, but the decisive authority of Asterius of Amasia (Orat iv p 76, apud Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 435) must turn the scale in favour of Pityus

13 Suidas (most probably from the history of Eunapius) has given a very unfavourable picture of Timasius The account of his accuser, the judges, trial, etc., is perfectly agreeable to the practice of ancient and modern courts (See Zosimus, l v [c 9] p 298, 299, 300) I am almost tempted to quote the romance of a great master (Fielding's Works, vol iv p 49, etc, 8vo edit), which may be considered as the history of human nature

14 The great Oasis was one of the spots in the sands of Libya, watered with springs, and capable of producing wheat, barley, and palm trees It was about three days journey from north to south, about half a day in breadth, and at the distance of about five days' march to the west of Abydus, on the Nile See D'Anville, Description de l'Egypte, p 186, 187, 188 The barren desert which encompasses Oasis (Zosimus l. v [c 9] p 300) has suggested the idea of comparative fertility, and even the epithet of the happy island (Herodot iii. 26)

15 The line of Claudian, in Eutrop l i 180,

Marmaricus claris violatur cædibus Hammon, evidently alludes to his persuasion of the death of Timasius

16 Sozomen, l viii c. 7 He speaks from report, ὡς τινος ἐπυθόμην

17 Zosimus, l v [c 9] p 300 Yet he seems to suspect that this rumour was spread by the friends of Eutropius

18 See the Theodosian Code, l ix tit 14, ad legem Corneliam de Sicariis, leg 3, and the Code of Justinian, l ix tit. viii ad legem Juliam de Majestate, leg 5. The alteration of the title, from murder to treason, was an improvement of the subtle Tribonian Godefroy, in a formal dissertation, which he has inserted in his Commentary, illustrates this law of Arcadius and explains all the difficult passages which had been perverted by the jurisconsults of the darker ages See tom iii p 88–111

19 Bartolus understands a simple and naked consciousness, without any sign of approbation or concurrence For this opinion, says Baldus, he is now roasting in hell. For my own part, continues the discreet Heineccius (Element Jur Civil l iv p 411), I must approve the theory of Bartolus, but in practise I should incline to the sentiment of Baldus Yet Bartolus was gravely quoted by the lawyers of Cardinal Richelieu, and Eutropius was indirectly guilty of the murder of the virtuous De Thou

20 Godefroy, tom iii p 89 It is, however, suspected that this law, so repugnant to the maxims of Germanic freedom, has been surreptitiously added to the golden bull

21 A copious and circumstantial narrative (which he might have reserved for more important events) is bestowed by Zosimus (l v [c. 10, sqq] p 304–312) on the revolt of Tribigild and Gainas See likewise Socrates, l vi c 6, and Sozomen, l viii c 4 The second book of Claudian against Eutropius is a fine though imperfect piece of history

22 Claudian (in Eutrop l ii 237–250) very accurately observes that the ancient name and nation of the Phrygians extended very far on every side, till their limits were contracted by the colonies of the Bithynians of Thrace, of the Greeks, and at last of the Gauls His description (ii 257–272) of the fertility of Phrygia, and of the four rivers that produced gold, is just and picturesque

23 Xenophon, Anabasis, l i [c 2, § 8] p 11, 12, edit Hutchinson, Strabo, l xii p 865, edit Amstel [p 577, ed Casaub], Q Curt l. iii c. i Claudian compares the junction of the Marsyas and Mæander to that of the Saone and the Rhône, with this difference, however, that the smaller of the Phrygian rivers is not accelerated but retarded by the larger

24 Selgæ, a colony of the Lacedæmonians, had formerly numbered twenty thousand citizens, but in the age of Zosimus it was reduced to a πολίχνη or small town See Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom ii p 117

25 The council of Eutropius, in Claudian, may be compared to that of Domitian in the fourth Satire of Juvenal The principal members of the former were, juvenes protervi lascivique senes, one of them had been a cook, a second a woolcomber The language of their original profession exposes their assumed dignity, and their trifling conversation about tragedies, dancers, etc., is made still more ridiculous by the importance of the debate.

26 Claudian (l ii 376–461) has branded him with infamy and Zosimus in more temperate language, confirms his reproaches l. v [c. 14] p 305

27 The conspiracy of Gainas and Tribigild, which is attested by the Greek historian, had not reached the ears of Claudian who attributes the revolt of the Ostrogoth to his own martial spirit and the advice of his wife.

28 This anecdote which Philostorgius alone has preserved (l xi c. 6 and Gothofred Dissertat p 451–456) is curious and important since it connects the revolt of the Goths with the secret intrigues of the palace

29 See the Homily [i in Eutrop] of Chrysostom tom iii p 381–386 of which the exordium is particularly beautiful Socrates l vi c 5 Sozomen l viii c 7 Montfaucon (in his Life of Chrysostom tom xiii p 135) too hastily supposes that Tribigild was actually in Constantinople and that he commanded the soldiers who were ordered to seize Eutropius Even Claudian a Pagan poet (Præfat ad l ii in Eutrop 27) has mentioned the flight of the eunuch to the sanctuary

Suppliciterque pias humilis prostratus ad aras
Mitigat iratas voce tremente nurus

30 Chrysostom in another homily [in Eutr ii, c 1] (tom iii p 386) affects to declare that Eutropius would not have been taken had he not deserted the church Zosimus (l v [c 18] p 313) on the contrary pretends that his enemies forced him (ἐξαρπάσαντες αὐτὸν) from the sanctuary Yet the promise is an evidence of some treaty and the strong assurance of Claudian (Præfat ad l ii. 46)

Sed tamen exemplo non feriere tuo

may be considered as an evidence of some promise

31 Cod Theod l ix. tit xl leg 14 [leg 17] The date of that law (Jan 17 A D 399) is erroneous and corrupt since the fall of Eutropius could no happen till the autumn of the same year See Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom v p 780

32 Zosimus L v [c. 18] p 313 Philostorgius l xi c 6

33 Zosimus (L v [c. 18–22] p 313–323) Socrates (l vi c 4 [6]) Sozomen (l viii c. 4) and Theodoret (l v c 32 33) represent though with some various circumstances the conspiracy defeat and death of Gainas

34 Ὁσί ς Εὐφημί ς μαρτύριο is the expression of Zosimus himself (L v [c 18] p 314), who inadvertently uses the fashionable language of the Christians Evagrius describes (l ii c 3) the situation, architecture rel cs and miracles of that celebrated church in which the general council of Chalcedon was afterwards held

35 The pious remonstrances of Chrysostom which do not appear in his own writings are strongly urged by Theodoret but his insinuation that they were successful is disproved by facts Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 383) has discovered that the emperor to satisfy the rapacious demands of Gainas was obliged to melt the plate of the church of the Apostles

36 The ecclesiastical historians who sometimes guide and sometimes follow the publ c opinion most confidently assert that the palace of Constantinople was guarded by legions of angels

37 Zosimus (L v [c 20] p 319) mentions these galleys by the name of Libu nans and observes that they were as swift (without explaining the difference between them) as the vessels with fifty oars but that they were far inferior in speed to the triremes which had been long disused Yet he reasonably concludes from the testimony of Polybius, that galleys of a still larger size had been constructed in the Punic wars Since the establishment of the Roman empire over the Mediterranean the useless art of building large ships of war had probably been neglected and at length forgotten

38 Chishull (Travels p 61–63 72–76) proceeded from Gallipoli through Hadrianople to the Danube in about fifteen days He was in the train of an English ambassador whose baggage consisted of seventy-one waggons That learned traveller has the merit of tracing a curious and unfrequented route

39 The narrative of Zosimus who actually leads Gainas beyond the Danube must be corrected by the testimony of Socrates [l vi c. 6] and Sozomen [l viii c 4] that he was killed in Thrace and by the precise and authentic dates of the Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle p 307 [ed Paris tom i p 567 ed Bonn] The naval victory of the Hellespont is fixed to the month Apellæus the tenth of the calends of January (December 23) the head of Gainas was brought to Constantinople the third of the nones of January (January 3) in the month Audynæus

40 Eusebius Scholasticus acquired much fame by his poem on the Gothic war in which he had served Near forty years afterwards Ammonius recited another poem on the same subject, in the presence of the emperor Theodosius See Socrates l vi c 6

41 The sixth book of Socrates the eighth of Sozomen and the fifth of Theodoret afford curious and authentic materials for the Life of John Chrysostom Besides those general historians I have taken for my guides the four principal biographers of the saint —1 The author of a partial and passionate Vindication of the Archbishop of Constantinople composed in the form of a dialogue and under the name of his zealous partisan Palladius bishop of Helenopolis (Tillemont Mém. Ecclés tom xi p 500–533) It is inserted among the works of Chrysostom tom xiii p 1–90 edit. Montfaucon 2 The moderate Erasmus (tom. iii. Epist MCL p 1331–1347 edit Lugd Bat) His vivacity and good sense were his own his errors, in the uncultivated state of ecclesiastical antiquity were almost inevitable 3 The learned Tillemont (Mém Ecclesiastiques tom xi p 1–405 547–6 6, etc etc) who compiles the Lives of the saints with incredible patience and religious accuracy He has minutely searched the voluminous works of Chrysostom himself 4 Father Montfaucon who has perused those works with the curious dil gence of an editor discovered several new homilies and again reviewed and composed the Life of Chrysostom (Opera Chrysostom tom xiii p 91–177)

42 As I am almost a stranger to the voluminous sermons of Chrysostom I have given my confi dence to the two most judicious and moderate of the ecclesiastical critics, Erasmus (tom iii p 1344) and Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclesiastique, tom iii p 38), yet the good taste of the former is sometimes vitiated by an excessive love of antiquity, and the good sense of the latter is always restrained by prudential considerations

43 The females of Constantinople distinguished themselves by their enmity or their attachment to Chrysostom Three noble and opulent widows—Marsa, Castricia, and Eugraphia—were the leaders of the persecution (Pallad Dialog tom xiii p 14 [c 4, p 35, ed Paris, 1680]) It was impossible that they should forgive a preacher who reproached their affectation to conceal, by the ornaments of dress, their age and ugliness (Pallad p 27) Olympias, by equal zeal, displayed in a more pious cause, has obtained the title of saint See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 416–440

44 Sozomen, and more especially Socrates, have defined the real character of Chrysostom with a temperate and impartial freedom very offensive to his blind admirers Those historians lived in the next generation, when party violence was abated, and had conversed with many persons intimately acquainted with the virtues and imperfections of the saint

45 Palladius (tom xiii p 40, etc [c xii p 102, ed Paris, 1680]) very seriously defends the archbishop 1 He never tasted wine 2 The weakness of his stomach required a peculiar diet 3 Business, or study, or devotion, often kept him fasting till sunset 4 He detested the noise and levity of great dinners 5 He saved the expense for the use of the poor 6 He was apprehensive, in a capital like Constantinople, of the envy and reproach of partial invitations

46 Chrysostom declares his free opinion (tom ix hom iii in Act Apostol p 29) that the number of bishops who might be saved bore a very small proportion to those who would be damned

47 See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 441–500

48 I have purposely omitted the controversy which arose among the monks of Egypt concerning Origenism and Anthropomorphism, the dissimulation and violence of Theophilus, his artful management of the simplicity of Epiphanius the persecution and flight of the long or tall brothers, the ambiguous support which they received at Constantinople from Chrysostom, etc. etc.

49 Photius (p 53–60 [p 17, sqq ed Bekk]) has preserved the original acts of the synod of the Oak, which destroy the false assertion that Chrysostom was condemned by no more than thirty six bishops of whom twenty nine were Egyptians Forty five bishops subscribed his sentence See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 595

50 Palladius owns (p 30 [c 8 p 75]) that if the people of Constantinople had found Theophilus they would certainly have thrown him into the sea Socrates mentions (l vi c. 17) a battle between the mob and the sailors of Alexandria, in which many wounds were given, and some lives were lost The massacre of the monks is observed only by the Pagan Zosimus (l v [c 23] p 324), who acknowledges that Chrysostom had a singular talent to lead the illiterate multitude, ἦν γὰρ ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἄλογον ὄχλον ὑπαγαγέσθαι δεινός

51 See Socrates, l vi c 18 Sozomen, l viii c 20 Zosimus (l v [c 24] p 324, 327) mentions, in general terms, his invectives against Eudoxia The homily which begins with those famous words is rejected as spurious Montfaucon, tom xiii p 151 Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 603

52 We might naturally expect such a charge from Zosimus (l v [c 24] p 327, but it is remarkable enough that it should be confirmed by Socrates, l vi c 18, and the Paschal Chronicle, p 307 [ed Paris, tom i p 568, ed Bonn]

53 He displays those specious motives (Post Reditum, c 13, 14) in the language of an orator and a politician

54 Two hundred and forty-two of the epistles of Chrysostom are still extant (Opera, tom iii p 528–736 [ed Bened]) They are addressed to a great variety of persons, and show a firmness of mind much superior to that of Cicero in his exile The fourteenth epistle contains a curious narrative of the dangers of his journey

55 After the exile of Chrysostom, Theophilus published an enormous and horrible volume against him, in which he perpetually repeats the polite expressions of hostem humanitatis, sacrilegorum principem, immundum dæmonem, he affirms that John Chrysostom had delivered his soul to be adulterated by the devil, and wishes that some farther punishment, adequate (if possible) to the magnitude of his crimes, may be inflicted on him St Jerom, at the request of his friend Theophilus, translated this edifying performance from Greek into Latin See Facundus Hermian Defens pro iii Capitul l vi c. 5 [p 260, ed Paris, 1629], published by Sirmond, Opera, tom ii p 595, 596 597

56 His name was inserted by his successor Atticus in the dyptics of the church of Constantinople, A D 418 Ten years afterwards he was revered as a saint Cyril, who inherited the place and the passions of his uncle Theophilus, yielded with much reluctance See Facund Hermian l vi c. 1 [p 142, ed Par 1629] Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom xiv p 277–283

57 Socrates l vii c 45 Theodoret l v c. 36 This event reconciled the Joanites who had hitherto refused to acknowledge his successors. During his lifetime the Joanites were respected by the catholics as the true and orthodox communion of Constantinople Their obstinacy gradually drove them to the brink of schism

58 According to some accounts (Baronius Annal Eccles A D 438 No 9 10) the emperor was forced to send a letter of invitation and excuses before the body of the ceremonious saint could moved from Comana

59 Zosimus l v [c 18] p 315 The chastity of an empress should not be impeached without producing a witness but it is astonishing that the witness should write and live under a prince whose legitimacy he dared to attack We must suppose that this history was a party libel privately read and circulated by the Pagans Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 782) is not averse to brand the reputation of Eudoxia

60 Porphyry of Gaza His zeal was transported by the order which he had obtained for the destruction of eight Pagan temples of that city See the curious details of his life (Baronius A.D 401 No 17–51) originally written in Greek or perhaps in Syriac by a monk one of his favourite deacons

61 Philostorg l. xi c 8 and Godefroy Dissertat p 457

62 Jerom (tom vi p 73 76) describes in lively colours the regular and destructive march of the locusts which spread a dark cloud between heaven and earth over the land of Palestine Seasonable winds scattered them partly into the Dead Sea and partly into the Mediterranean

63 Procopius de Bell Persic. l i c 2 p 8 edit Louvre [tom i p 14 ed Bonn]

64 Agathias l vi. [c 26] p 136 137 [p 264 ed Bonn] Although he confesses the prevalence of the tradition he asserts that Procopius was the first who had committed it to writing Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 597) argues very sensibly on the merits of this fable His criticism was not warped by any ecclesiastical authority both Procopius and Agathias are half Pagans

65 Socrates l. vii c. 1 Anthemius was the grandson of Philip one of the ministers of Constantius and the grandfather of the emperor Anthemius After his return from the Persian embassy he was appointed consul and Prætorian præfect of the East in the year 405 and held the præfecture about ten years See his honours and praises in Godefroy Cod Theod tom vi p 350 Tillemont Hist des Emp tom vi p 1 etc

66 Sozomen l ix c 5 He saw some Scyrri at work near Mount Olympus in Bithynia and cherished the vain hope that those captives were the last of the nation

67 Cod Theod l vii tit xvii l xv tit i leg 49

68 Sozomen has filled three chapters with a magnificent panegyric of Pulcheria (l ix c 1 3) and Tillemont (Mémoires Ecclés tom xv p 171–184) has dedicated a separate article to the honour of St Pulcheria virgin and empress

69 Suidas (Excerpta p 68 in Script Byzant) pretends on the credit of the Nestorians that Pulcheria was exasperated against their founder because he censured her connection with the beautiful Paulinus and her incest with her brother Theodosius

70 See Ducange Famil Byzantin p 70 Flaccilla the eldest daughter either died before Arcadius or if she lived till the year 431 (Marcellin Chron) some defect of mind or body must have excluded her from the honours of her rank

71 She was admonished by repeated dreams of the place where the relics of the forty martyrs had been buried The ground had successively belonged to the house and garden of a woman of Constantinople to a monastery of Macedonian monks and to a church of St Thyrsus erected by Cæsarius who was consul A.D 397 and the memory of the relics was almost obliterated Notwithstanding the charitable wishes of Dr Jortin (Remarks tom iv p 234) it is not easy to acquit Pulcheria of some share in the pious fraud which must have been transacted when she was more than five and thirty years of age

72 There is a remarkable difference between the two ecclesiastical historians who in general bear so close a resemblance Sozomen (l. ix. c 1) ascribes to Pulcheria the government of the empire and the education of her brother whom he scarcely condescends to praise Socrates though he affectedly disclaims all hopes of favour or fame, composes an elaborate panegyric on the emperor and cautiously suppresses the merits of his sister (l. vii. c. 22 42) Philostorgius (l xii c 7) expresses the influence of Pulcheria in gentle and courtly language τὰς βασιλι δε σημειωσεις ὑπηρετο μὲγα καὶ διετιθυ ουσα Suidas (Excerpt p 53) gives a true character of Theodosius and I have followed the example of Tillemont (tom vi. p 25) in borrowing some strokes from the modern Greeks

73 Theodoret l v c 37 The bishop of Cyrrhus, one of the first men of his age for his learning and piety applauds the obedience of Theodosius to the divine laws

74 Socrates (l vii c. 21) mentions her name (Athenais the daughter of Leontius an Athenian sophist) her baptism marriage and poetical genius The most ancient account of her history is in John Malala (part ii p 20 21 edit Venet 1733 [p 354 355 ed Bonn]) and in the Paschal Chronicle (p 311 312 [ed Paris tom i p 576 577 ed Bonn]) Those authors had probably seen original pictures of the empress Eudocia The modern Greeks Zonaras Cedrenus etc have displayed the love rather than the talent of fiction From Nicephorus indeed I have ventured to assume her age The writer of a romance would not have imagined that Athenais was near twenty eight years old when she inflamed the heart of a young emperor

75 Socrates l vii c 21 Photius p 413–420 [p 128 129 ed Bekk] The Homeric cento is still extant and has been repeatedly printed but the claim of Eudocia to that insipid performance is disputed by the critics See Fabricius Biblioth Græc tom i p 357 The Ionia a miscellaneous dictionary of history and fable was compiled by another empress of the name of Eudocia who lived in the eleventh century and the work is still extant in manuscript

copious and florid, but he is accused of placing the lies of different ages on the same level of authenticity

77 In this short view of the disgrace of Eudocia I have imitated the caution of Evagrius (l i c 21) and Count Marcellinus (in Chron A D 440 and 444 [p 26]) The two authentic dates assigned by the latter overturn a great part of the Greek fictions and the celebrated story of the apple, etc , is fit only for the Arabian Nights, where something not very unlike it may be found

78 Priscus (in Excerpt Legat p 69 [ed Paris, p 208, ed Bonn]), a contemporary and a courtier, drily mentions her Pagan and Christian names without adding any title of honour or respect

79 For the two pilgrimages of Eudocia, and her long residence at Jerusalem, her devotion, alms, etc., see Socrates (l vii c 47) and Evagrius (l i. c. 20, 21, 22) The Paschal Chronicle may sometimes deserve regard, and, in the domestic history of Antioch, John Malala becomes a writer of good authority The Abbé Guenée, in a memoir on the fertility of Palestine, of which I have only seen an extract, calculates the gifts of Eudocia at 20,488 pounds of gold, above 800,000 pounds sterling

80 Theodoret, l v c 39 Tillemont, Mem Ecclés tom xii p 356–364 Assemanni, Bibliot Oriental tom iii p 396, tom iv p 61 Theodoret blames the rashness of Abdas, but extols the constancy of his martyrdom Yet I do not clearly understand the casuistry which prohibits our repairing the damage which we have unlawfully committed

81 Socrates (l vii c 18, 19, 20, 21) is the best author for the Persian war We may likewise consult the three Chronicles, the Paschal, and those of Marcellinus and Malala

82 This account of the ruin and division of the kingdom of Armenia is taken from the third book of the Armenian history of Moses of Chorene Deficient as he is in every qualification of a good historian his local information, his passions, and his prejudices are strongly expressive of a native and contemporary Procopius (de Ædificiis, l iii c 1–5) relates the same facts in a very different manner, but I have extracted the circumstances, the most probable in themselves and the least inconsistent with Moses of Chorene

83 The western Armenians used the Greek language and characters in their religious offices, but the use of that hostile tongue was prohibited by the Persians in the eastern provinces, which were obliged to use the Syriac, till the invention of the Armenian letters by Mesrobes in the beginning of the fifth century, and the subsequent version of the Bible into the Armenian language an event which relaxed the connection of the church and nation with Constantinople

84 Moses Choren l iii c 59, p 309 and p 358 [ed Whiston, Lond 1736] Procopius, de Ædeficiis, l iii c 5 Theodosiopolis stands, or rather stood, about thirty-five miles to the east of Arzeroum, the modern capital of Turkish Armenia See D'Anville, Géographie Ancienne, tom ii p 99, 100

85 Moses Choren l iii c 63, p 316 According to the institution of St Gregory, the Apostle of Armenia, the archbishop was always of the royal family, a circumstance which, in some degree, corrected the influence of the sacerdotal character, and united the mitre with the crown

86 A branch of the royal house of Arsaces still subsisted with the rank and possessions (as it should seem) of Armenian satraps See Moses Choren l iii c 65, p 321

87 Valarsaces was appointed king of Armenia by his brother the Parthian monarch immediately after the defeat of Antiochus Sidetes (Moses Choren l ii c 2, p 85), one hundred and thirty years before Christ Without depending on the various and contradictory periods of the reigns of the last kings we may be assured that the ruin of the Armenian kingdom happened after the council of Chalcedon, A D 431 (l. iii c. 61, p 312), and under Varanes, or Bahram, king of Persia (l iii c. 64, p 317) who reigned from A D 420 to 440 See Assemanni Bibliot Oriental tom iii p 396

1 Τὰ συνεχῆ κατὰ στόμα φιλήματα is the expression of Olympiodorus (apud Photium, p 196 [p 62 b, ed Bekk]), who means, perhaps to describe the same caresses which Mahomet bestowed on his daughter Phatemah Quando (says the prophet himself), quando subit mihi desiderium Paradisi, osculor eam et ingero linguam meam in os ejus. But this sensual indulgence was justified by miracle and mystery and the anecdote has been communicated to the public by the Reverend Father Maracci, in his Version and Confutation of the Koran, tom i p 32

4 The original writers are not agreed (see Muratori Annali d Italia tom iv p 139) whether Valentinian received the Imperial diadem at Rome or Ravenna In this uncertainty I am willing to believe that some respect was shown to the senate

6 See the first Novel of Theodosius by which he ratifies and communicates (A D 438) the Theodosian Code About 40 years before that time the unity of legislation had been proved by an exception The Jews who were numerous in the cities of Apulia and Calabria produced a law of the East to justify their exemption from municipal offices (Cod Theod l xvi tit viii leg 13) and the Western emperor was obliged to invalidate by a special edict the law quam constat meis partibus esse damnosam Cod. 7 Cassiodorus (Variar l xi Epist i p 238 [p 161 ed Venet]) has compared the regencies of Placidia and Amalasuntha He arraigns the weakness of the mother of Valentinian and praises the virtues of his royal mistress On this occasion flattery seems to have spoken the language of truth

8 Philostorgius l xii c 12 [14] and Godefroy's Dissertat p 493 etc and Renatus Frigeridus apud Gregor Turon L ii c 8 in tom ii p 163 The father of Aetius was Gaudentius an illustrious citizen of the province of Scythia and master general of the cavalry his mother was a rich and noble Italian From his earliest youth Aëtius as a soldier and a hostage had conversed with the barbarians

9 For the character of Boniface see Olympiodorus apud Phot p 196 [p 62 b ed Bekk] and St Augustin apud Tillemont Mémoires Ecclés tom xiii p 712–715 886 The bishop of Hippo at length deplored the fall of his friend who after a solemn vow of chastity had married a second wife of the Arian sect and who was suspected of keeping several concubines in his house

10 Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 3 4 p 182–186 [tom i p 319–328 ed Bonn]) relates the fraud of Aetius the revolt of Boniface and the loss of Africa This anecdote which is supported by some collateral testimony (see Ruinart Hist Persecut Vandal p 420 421) seems agreeable to the practice of ancient and modern courts and would be naturally revealed by the repentance of Boniface

11 See the Chronicles of Prosper and Idatius [Sirmond Op tom ii p 298] Salvian (de Gubernat Dei l vii p 246 Paris 1608) ascribes the victory of the Vandals to their superior piety They fasted they prayed they carried a Bible in the front of the Host with the design perhaps of reproaching the perfidy and sacrilege of their enemies

12 Gizericus (his name is variously expressed) staturâ mediocris et equi casû claudicans animo profundus sermone rarus luxuriæ contemptor irâ turbidus habendi cupidus ad solicitandas gentes providentissimus semina contentionum jacere odia miscere paratus Jornandes de Rebus Geticis c 33 p 675 This portrait which is drawn with some skill and a strong likeness must have been copied from the Gothic history of Cassiodorus

13 See the Chronicle of Idatius That bishop a Spaniard and a contemporary places the passage of the Vandals in the month of May of the year of Abraham (which commences in October) 2444 This date which coincides with A D 429, is confirmed by Isidore another Spanish bishop and is justly preferred to the opinion of those writers who have marked for that event one of the two preceding years See Pagi Critica tom ii p 205 etc

14 Compare Procopius (de Bell. Vandal L i c 5 p 190 [tom i p 334 ed Bonn]) and Victor Vitensis (de Persecutione Vandal. l i c i p 3 edit. Ruinart) We are assured by Idatius that Genseric evacuated Spain cum Vandalis omnibus eorumque familiis [Sirm Op tom ii p 299] and Possidius (in Vit Augustin c 28 apud Ruinart p 427) describes his army as manus ingens immanium gentium Vandalorum et Alanorum commixtam secum habens Gothorum gentem aliarumque diversarum personas

15 For the manners of the Moors see Procopius (de Bell Vandal L ii c 6 p 249 [tom i p 434 ed Bonn]) for their figure and complexion M de Buffon (Histoire Naturelle tom iii p 430) Procopius says in general that the Moors had joined the Vandals before the death of Valentinian (de Bell Vandal l i c 5 p 190 [tom i p 334 ed Bonn]) and it is probable that the independent tribes did not embrace any uniform system of policy

16 See Tillemont Mémoires Ecclés tom xiii p 516–558 and the whole series of the persecution in the original monuments published by Dupin at the end of Optatus p 323–515

17 The Donatist bishops at the conference of Carthage amounted to 279 and they asserted that their whole number was not less than 400 The Catholics had 286 present 120 absent besides sixty four vacant bishoprics

18 The fifth title of the sixteenth book of the Theodosian Code exhibits a series of the Imperial laws against the Donatists from the year 400 to the year 428 Of these the 54th law promulgated by Honorius A D 414 is the most severe and effectual

19 St Augustin altered his opinion with regard to the proper treatment of heretics His pathetic declaration of pity and indulgence for the Manichæans has been inserted by Mr Locke (vol iii p 469) among the choice specimens of his common place book Another philosopher the celebrated Bayle (tom ii p 445–496) has refuted, with superfluous diligence and ingenuity the arguments

by which the bishop of Hippo justified, in his old age, the persecution of the Donatists

20 See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 586–592, 806 The Donatists boasted of thousands of these voluntary martyrs Augustin asserts, and probably with truth, that these numbers were much exaggerated, but he sternly maintains that it was better that some should burn themselves in this world than that all should burn in hell flames

21 According to St Augustin and Theodoret, the Donatists were inclined to the principles, or at least to the party, of the Arians, which Genseric supported Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom vi p 68

22 See Baronius, Annal Eccles A D 428, No 7, A D 439, No 35 The cardinal, though more inclined to seek the cause of great events in heaven than on the earth, has observed the apparent connection of the Vandals and the Donatists Under the reign of the barbarians, the schismatics of Africa enjoyed an obscure peace of one hundred years, at the end of which we may again trace them by the light of the Imperial persecutions See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom vi p 192, etc

23 In a confidential letter to Count Boniface, St. Augustin, without examining the grounds of the quarrel, piously exhorts him to discharge the duties of a Christian and a subject, to extricate himself without delay from his dangerous and guilty situation, and even, if he could obtain the consent of his wife, to embrace a life of celibacy and penance (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 890) The bishop was intimately connected with Darius, the minister of peace (id tom xiii p 928)

24 The original complaints of the desolation of Africa are contained—1 In a letter from Capreolus, bishop of Carthage, to excuse his absence from the council of Ephesus (ap Ruinart, p 428) 2 In the Life of St Augustin by his friend and colleague Possidius (ap Ruinart, p 427) 3 In the History of the Vandalic Persecution, by Victor Vitensis (l i c 1, 2, 3, edit Ruinart) The last picture, which was drawn sixty years after the event, is more expressive of the author's passions than of the truth of facts

25 See Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom ii part ii p 112 Leo African in Ramusio, tom i fol 70 L'Afrique de Marmol, tom ii p 434 437 Shaw's Travels, p 46, 47 The old Hippo Regius was finally destroyed by the Arabs in the seventh century but a new town, at the distance of two miles, was built with the materials, and it contained in the sixteenth century about three hundred families of industrious, but turbulent, manufacturers The adjacent territory is renowned for a pure air, a fertile soil, and plenty of exquisite fruits

26 The Life of St Augustin, by Tillemont fills a quarto volume (Mém Ecclés tom xiii) of more than one thousand pages and the diligence of that learned Jansenist was excited on this occasion by factious and devout zeal for the founder of his sect

27 Such at least is the account of Victor Vitensis (de Persecut Vandal l i c 3) though Gennadius seems to doubt whether any person had read, or even collected, all the works of St Augustin (see Hieronym Opera, tom i p 319, in Catalog Scriptor Eccles) They have been repeatedly printed, and Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclés tom iii p 158–257) has given a large and satisfactory abstract of them as they stand in the last edition of the Benedictines My personal acquaintance with the bishop of Hippo does not extend beyond the Confessions and the City of God

28 In his early youth (Confess i 23) St Augustin disliked and neglected the study of Greek, and he frankly owns that he read the Platonists in a Latin version (Confess vii 13) Some modern critics have thought that his ignorance of Greek disqualified him from expounding the Scriptures, and Cicero or Quintilian would have required the knowledge of that language in a professor of rhetoric

29 These questions were seldom agitated from the time of St Paul to that of St Augustin I am informed that the Greek fathers maintain the natural sentiments of the Semi-Pelagians, and that the orthodoxy of St Augustin was derived from the Manichæan school

30 The church of Rome has canonised Augustin and reprobated Calvin Yet, as the real difference between them is invisible even to a theological microscope, the Molinists are oppressed by the authority of the saint, and the Jansenists are disgraced by their resemblance to the heretic. In the meanwhile the Protestant Arminians stand aloof and deride the mutual perplexity of the disputants (see a curious Review of the Controversy by Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Universelle, tom xiv p 144–398) Perhaps a reasoner still more independent may smile in his turn when he peruses an Arminian Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans

31 Ducange, Fam Byzant p 67 On one side, the head of Valentinian on the reverse, Boniface with a scourge in one hand and a palm in the other, standing in a triumphal car, which is drawn by four horses, or, in another medal, by four stags, an unlucky emblem! I should doubt whether another example can be found of the head of a subject on the reverse of an Imperial medal See Science des Médailles, by the Pere Jobert tom i p 132–150, edit of 1739, by the Baron de la Bastie.

32 Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 3 p 185 [tom i p 325, ed Bonn]) continues the history of Boniface no farther than his return to Italy His death is mentioned by Prosper [Ann 432] and Marcellinus the expression of the latter that Aëtius the day before had provided himself with a longer spear implies something like a regular duel

33 See Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c. 4 p 186 [tom i p 327, ed Bonn] Valentinian published several humane laws to relieve the distress of his Numidian and Mauritanian subjects he discharged them in a great measure from the payment of their debts reduced their tribute to one eighth and gave them a right of appeal from th provincial magistrates to the præfect of Rome Cod Theod tom vi Novell p 11 12

34 Victor Vitensis de Persecut Vandal l ii c 5 p 26 The cruelties of Genseric towards his subjects are strongly expressed in Prosper s Chronicle A D 442

35 Possidius in Vit Augustin c. 28 apud Ruinart p 428

36 See the Chronicles of Idatius Isidore Prosper and Marcellinus They mark the same year but different days for the surprisal of Carthage

37 The picture of Carthage as it flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries is taken from the Expositio totius Mundi p 17 18 in the third volume of Hudson s Minor Geographers from Ausonius de Claris Urbibus p 228 229 and principally from Salvian de Gubernatione Dei l vii p 257 258 I am surprised that the Notitia should not place either a mint or an arsenal at Carthage but only a gynecæum or female manufacture

38 The anonymous author of the Expositio totius Mundi compares in his barbarous Latin the country and the inhabitants and after stigmatising their want of faith he coolly concludes Difficile autem inter eos inventitur bonus tamen in multis pauci boni esse possunt P 18

39 He declares that the peculiar vices of each country were collected in the sink of Carthage (l vii p 257) In the indulgence of vice the Africans applauded their manly virtue Et illi se magis viriles fortitudinis esse crederent qui maxime viros feminei usûs probrositate fregissent (p 268) The streets of Carthage were polluted by effeminate wretches who publicly assumed the countenance the dress and the character of women (p 264) If a monk appeared in the city the holy man was pursued with impious scorn and ridicule detestantibus ridentium cachinnis (p 289)

40 Compare Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 5 p 189 190 [tom i p 332 sqq ed Bonn] and Victor Vitensis de Persecut Vandal l i c 4

41 Ruinart (p 444–457) has collected from Theodoret and other authors the misfortunes real and fabulous of the inhabitants of Carthage

42 The choice of fabulous circumstances is of small importance yet I have confined myself to the narrative which was translated from the Syriac by the care of Gregory of Tours (de Gloriâ Martyrûm l i c 95 in Max Bibliothecâ Patrum tom xi p 856) to the Greek acts of their martyrdom (apud Photium p 1400 1401 [p 467 ed Bekk]) and to the Annals of the Patriarch Eutychius (tom i p 391 531 532 535 vers Pocock [Oxon 1658])

43 Two Syriac writers as they are quoted by Assemanni (Bibliot Oriental tom. i. p 336 338) place the resurrection of the Seven Sleepers in the year 736 (A D 425) or 748 (A D 437) of the era of the Seleucides Their Greek acts which Photius had read assign the date of the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Theodosius which may coincide either with A D 439 or 446 The period which had elapsed since the persecution of Decius is easily ascertained and nothing less than the ignorance of Mahomet or the legendaries could suppose an interval of three or four hundred years

44 James one of the orthodox fathers of the Syrian church was born A D 452 he began to compose his sermons A D 474 he was made bishop of Batnæ in the district of Sarug and province of Mesopotamia A D 519 and died A D 521 (Assemanni tom i p 288 289) For the homily de Pueris Ephesinis see p 335–339 though I could wish that Assemanni had translated the text of James of Sarug instead of answering the objections of Baronius

45 See the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (Mensis Julii tom vi p 375–397) This immense calendar of Saints in one hundred and twenty-six years (1644–1770) and in fifty volumes in folio, has advanced no farther than the 7th day of October The suppression of the Jesuits has most probably checked an undertaking which through the medium of fable and superstition communicates much historical and philosophical instruction

46 See Maracci Alcoran Sura xviii tom ii p 420–427 and tom i part iv p 103 With such an ample privilege Mahomet has not shown much taste or ingenuity He has invented the dog (Al Rakim) of the Seven Sleepers the respect of the sun who altered his course twice a day that he might not shine into the cavern and the care of God himself who preserved their bodies from putrefaction by turning them to the right and left

47 See D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 139 and Renaudot Hist Patriarch Alexandrin p 39 40

48 Paul the deacon of Aquileia (de Gestis Langobardorum l. i c 4 p 745 746 edit Grot) who lived towards the end of the eighth century has placed in a cavern under a rock on the shore of the ocean the Seven Sleepers of the North whose long repose was respected by the barbarians Their dress declared them to be Romans and the deacon conjectures that they were reserved by Providence as the future apostles of those unbelieving countries

Chapter XXXIV

1 The authentic materials for the history of Attila may be found in Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis, c 34–50, p 660–688, edit Grot) and Priscus (Excerpta de Legationibus, p 33–76, Paris, 1648 [p 140–220, ed Bonn]) I have not seen the Lives of Attila, composed by Juvencus Cælius Calanus Dalmatinus, in the twelfth century, or by Nicolas Olahus, archbishop of Gran, in the sixteenth See Mascou's History of the Germans, ix 23, and Maffei Osservazioni Litterarie, tom i p 88, 89 Whatever the modern Hungarians have added must be fabulous, and they do not seem to have excelled in the art of fiction They suppose that when Attila invaded Gaul and Italy, married innumerable wives, etc , he was one hundred and twenty years of age Thevrocz Chron p 1 c 22, in Script Hungar tom 1 p 76

2 Hungary has been successively occupied by three Scythian colonies —1 The Huns of Attila, 2 The Abares, in the sixth century, and, 3 The Turks or Magyars, A D 889, the immediate and genuine ancestors of the modern Hungarians, whose connection with the two former is extremely faint and remote The Prodromus and Notitia of Matthew Belius appear to contain a rich fund of information concerning ancient and modern Hungary I have seen the extracts in Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, tom xxii p 1–51, and Bibliothèque Raisonée, tom xvi p 127–175

3 Socrates, l vii c 43, Theodoret, l v c 37 Tillemont, who always depends on the faith of his ecclesiastical authors, strenuously contends (Hist des Emp tom vi p 136, 607) that the wars and personages were not the same

4 See Priscus, p 47, 48 [ed Par , pp 166–170, ed Bonn], and Hist des Peuples de l'Europe, tom vii. c. xii xiii xiv xv

5 Priscus, p 39 [p 150, ed Bonn] The modern Hungarians have deduced his genealogy, which ascends, in the thirty fifth degree, to Ham the son of Noah, yet they are ignorant of his father's real name. (De Guignes, Hist des Huns, tom ii p 297)

6 Compare Jornandes (c 35 p 661) with Buffon, Hist Naturelle, tom iii p 380 The former had a right to observe originis suæ signa restituens The character and portrait of Attila are probably transcribed from Cassiodorus

7 Abulpharag Dynast vers Pocock, p 281 [ed. Oxon 1663] Genealogical History of the Tartars, by Abulghazi Bahader Khan, part iii c. 15 part iv c. 3, Vie de Gengiscan par Petit de la Croix, l i. c. 1, 6 The relations of the missionaries who visited Tartary in the thirteenth century (see the seventh volume of the Histoire des Voyages) express the popular language and opinions Zingis is styled the son of God, etc etc.

8. Nec templum apud eos visitur, aut delubrum, ne tugurium quidem culmo tectum cerni usquam potest, sed gladius barbarico ritû humi figitur nudus, eumque ut Martem regionum quas circumcircant præsulem verecundius colunt Ammian Marcellin xxxi 2, and the learned Notes of Lindenbrogius and Valesius

9 Priscus relates this remarkable story, both in his own text (p 65 [p 201, ed Bonn]) and in the quotation made by Jornandes (c. 35, p 662) He might have explained the tradition or fable, which characterised this famous sword, and the name as well as attributes of the Scythian deity whom he has translated into the Mars of the Greeks and Romans

10 Herodot l iv c. 62 For the sake of economy, I have calculated by the smallest stadium In the human sacrifices they cut off the shoulder and arm of the victim, which they threw up into the air, and drew omens and presages from the manner of their falling on the pile

11 Priscus, p 55 [p 182, ed Bonn] A more civilised hero, Augustus himself, was pleased if the person on whom he fixed his eyes seemed unable to support their divine lustre Sueton in August c 79

12 The Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe, tom vii p 428, 429) attempts to clear Attila from the murder of his brother, and is almost inclined to reject the concurrent testimony of Jornandes and the contemporary Chronicles

13 Fortissimarum gentium dominus, qui inauditâ ante se potentiâ, solus Scythica et Germanica regna possedit Jornandes, c 49 p 684 Priscus, p 64, 65 [p 199–201, ed Bonn] M de Guignes by his knowledge of the Chinese, has acquired (tom ii p 295–301) an adequate idea of the empire of Attila

14 See Hist des Huns tom ii p 296 The Geougen believed that the Huns could excite at pleasure storms of wind and rain This phenomenon was produced by the stone Gezi to whose magic power the loss of a battle was ascribed by the Mahometan Tartars of the fourteenth century See Cherefeddin Ali Hist de Timur Bec, tom i p 82, 83

15 Jornandes c 35 p 661, c. 37 p 667 See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 129 138 Corneille has represented the pride of Attila to his subject kings and his tragedy opens with these two ridiculous lines —

> Ils ne sont pas venus nos deux rois! qu'on leur die
> Qu'ils se font trop attendre et qu'Attila s'ennuie

The two kings of the Gepidæ and the Ostrogoths are profound politicians and sentimental lovers and the whole piece exhibits the defects, without the genius, of the poet.

17 [Basic and Cursic are not cities but the names of the two commanders of the bands of Huns who invaded Persia]

18 See the original conversation in Priscus p 64 65 [ed Par p 198–201 ed Bonn]

19 Priscus p 331 His history contained a copious and elegant account of the war (Evagrius l i c 17) but the extracts which relate to the embassies are the only parts that have reached our times The original work was accessible however to the writers from whom we borrow our imperfect knowledge Jornandes Theophanes Count Marcellinus Prosper Tyro and the author of the Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l Europe tom vii c xv) has examined the cause the circumstances and the duration of this war and will not allow it to extend beyond the year four hundred and forty four

20 Procopius de Ædificiis, l iv c 5 [tom iii p 286 ed Bonn] These fortresses were afterwards restored strengthened and enlarged by the emperor Justinian but they were soon destroyed by the Abares who succeeded to the power and possessions of the Huns

21 Septuaginta civitates (says Prosper Tyro) depr*edatione* vastatæ The language of Count Marcell*nus is still* more forcible Pene totam Europam invasis ex is sque civitatibus atque castellis conrasit

22 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 106 107) has paid great attention to this memorable earthquake which was felt as far from Constantinople as Antioch and Alexandria and is celebrated by all the ecclesiastical writers In the hands of a popular preacher an earthquake is an engine of admirable effect

23 He represented to the emperor of the Moguls that the four provinces (Petcheli Chantong Chansi and Leaotong) which he already possessed m*ight annually* produce under a mild administration 500 000 ounces of silver 400 000 measures of rice and 800 000 pieces of silk Gaubil Hist de la Dynastie des Mongous p 58 59 Yelutchousay (such was the name of the mandarin) was a wise and virtuous minister who saved his country and civilised the conquerors See p 102 103

24 Particular instances would be endless but the curious reader may consult the Life of Gengiscan by Petit de la Croix the Histoire des Mongous and the fifteenth book of the History of the Huns

25 At Maru 1 300 000 at Herat 1 600 000 at Neisabour 1 747 000 D Herbelot Bibliotheque Orientale p 380 381 I use the orthography of D Anville s maps It must however be allowed that the Persians were disposed to exaggerate their losses and the Moguls to magnify their exploits

26 Cherefeddin Ali his servile panegyrist would afford us many horrid examples In his camp before Delhi Timur massacred 100 000 Indian prisoners who had smiled when the army of their countrymen appeared in sight (Hist de Timur Bec, tom iii. p 90) The people of Ispahan supplied 70 000 human skulls for the structure of several lofty towers (id tom i p 434) A similar tax was levied on the revolt of Bagdad (tom iii p 370) and the exact account which Cherfeddin was not able to procure from the proper officers is stated by another historian (Ahmed Arabsiada tom ii p 175 vers Manger) at 90 000 heads

27 The ancients Jornandes Priscus etc are ignorant of this epithet The modern Hungarians have imagined that it was applied by a hermit of Gaul to Attila who was pleased to insert it among the titles of his royal dignity Mascou ix 23 and Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 143

28 The missionaries of St Chrysostom had converted great numbers of the Scythians who dwelt beyond the Danube in tents and waggons Theodoret l v c. 31 Photius p 1517 [p 508 b ed Bekk] The Mahometans the Nestorians and the Latin Christians thought themselves secure of gaining the sons and grandsons of Zingis who treated the rival missionaries with impartial favour

29 The Germans who exterminated Varus and his legions had been particularly offended with the Roman laws and lawyers One of the barbarians after the effectual precautions of cutting out the tongue of an advocate and sewing up his mouth observed with much satisfaction that the viper could no longer hiss Florus iv 12

30 Priscus p 59 [p 190 ed Bonn] It should seem that the Huns preferred the Gothic and Latin languages to their own which was probably a harsh and barren idiom

31 Philip de Comines in his admirable picture of the last moments of Lewis XI (Mémoires l vi c 12) represents the insolence of his physician who in five months extorted 54 000 crowns and a rich bishopric from the stern avaricious tyrant

32 Priscus (p 61 [p 194 ed Bonn]) extols the equity of the Roman laws which protected the life of a slave Occidere solent (says Tacitus of the Germans) non discipl nâ et servitate sed impetu et irâ ut inimicum nisi quòd impune De Moribus Germ c 25 The Heruli who were the subjects of

Attila, claimed and exercised the power of life and death over their slaves See a remarkable instance in the second book of Agathias

33 See the whole conversation in Priscus, p 59–62 [p 189–197, ed Bonn]

34 Nova iterum Orienti assurgit ruina quum nulla ab Occidentalibus ferrentur auxilia Prosper Tyro composed his Chronicle in the West, and his observation implies a censure

35 According to the description, or rather invective, of Chrysostom, an auction of Byzantine luxury must have been very productive Every wealthy house possessed a semicircular table of massy silver, such as two men could scarcely lift, a vase of solid gold of the weight of forty pounds, cups, dishes, of the same metal, etc

36 The articles of the treaty, expressed without much order or precision, may be found in Priscus (p 34, 35, 36, 37, 53, etc [ed Par , p 142–148, 178, etc., ed Bonn]) Count Marcellinus dispenses some comfort by observing—1 That Attila himself solicited the peace and presents which he had formerly refused, and, 2 That, about the same time, the ambassadors of India presented a fine large tame tiger to the emperor Theodosius

37 Priscus, p 35, 36 [p 143, 144, ed Bonn] Among the hundred and eighty two forts or castles of Thrace enumerated by Procopius (de Ædificus, l iv c xi tom. ii p 92, edit Paris [tom iii p 306, ed Bonn]), there is one of the name of Esimontou, whose position is doubtfully marked, in the neighbourhood of Anchialus and the Euxine Sea The name and walls of Azimuntium might subsist till the reign of Justinian, but the race of its brave defenders had been carefully extirpated by the jealousy of the Roman princes

38 The peevish dispute of St Jerom and St Augustin, who laboured by different expedients to reconcile the seeming quarrel of the two apostles, St Peter and St Paul, depends on the solution of an important question (Middleton's Works vol ii p 5–10), which has been frequently agitated by catholic and protestant divines, and even by lawyers and philosophers of every age.

39 Montesquieu (Considerations sur la Grandeur, etc., c. xix) has delineated with a bold and easy pencil, some of the most striking circumstances of the pride of Attila and the disgrace of the Romans He deserves the praise of having read the Fragments of Priscus, which have been too much disregarded.

40 See Priscus, p 69 71, 72, etc [p 208 213 ed Bonn] I would fain believe that this adventurer was afterwards crucified by the order of Attila, on a suspicion of treasonable practices but Priscus (p 57 [p 185, 186 ed Bonn]) has too plainly distinguished two persons of the name of Constantius, who from the similar events of their lives, might have been easily confounded

41 In the Persian treaty, concluded in the year 422, the wise and eloquent Maximin had been the assessor of Ardaburius (Socrates, l vii c 20)

When Marcian ascended the throne, the office of Great Chamberlain was bestowed on Maximin, who is ranked in a public edict among the four principal ministers of state (Novell ad Calc Cod Theod. p 31 [tit ii]) He executed a civil and military commission in the eastern provinces, and his death was lamented by the savages of Æthiopia, whose incursions he had repressed. See Priscus, p 40, 41 [p 153, 154, ed Bonn]

42 Priscus was a native of Panium in Thrace, and deserved by his eloquence an honourable place among the sophists of the age. His Byzantine history, which related to his own times, was comprised in seven books See Fabricius Biblioth Græc tom vi p 235, 236 Notwithstanding the charitable judgment of the critics, I suspect that Priscus was a Pagan

43 The Huns themselves still continued to despise the labours of agriculture they abused the privilege of a victorious nation, and the Goths, their industrious subjects, who cultivated the earth dreaded their neighbourhood, like that of so many ravenous wolves (Priscus, p 45 [p 163, ed Bonn]) In the same manner the Sarts and Tadgics provide for their own subsistence, and for that of the Usbec Tartars, their lazy and rapacious sovereigns See Genealogical History of the Tartars, p 423, 455, etc.

44. It is evident that Priscus passed the Danube and the Theiss, and that he did not reach the foot of the Carpathian hills Agria, Tokay, and Jazberin are situate in the plains circumscribed by this definition M de Buat (Histoire des Peuples, etc., tom vii p 461) has chosen Tokay Otrokosci (p 180, apud Mascou, ix 23), a learned Hungarian, has preferred Jazberin, a place about thirty six miles westward of Buda and the Danube.

45 The royal village of Attila may be compared to the city of Karacorum the residence of the successors of Zingis which, though it appears to have been a more stable habitation did not equal the size or splendour of the town and abbey of St Denys in the 13th century (see Rubruquis, in the Histoire Générale des Voyages tom vii p 286) The camp of Aurengzebe as it is so agreeably described by Bernier (tom ii p 217–235), blended the manners of Scythia with the magnificence and luxury of Hindostan

46 When the Moguls displayed the spoils of Asia in the diet of Toncal the throne of Zingis was still covered with the original black felt carpet on which he had been seated when he was raised to the command of his warlike countrymen See Vie de Gengiscan l iv c 9.

47 If we may believe Plutarch (in Demetrio tom v p 24) it was the custom of the Scythians when they indulged in the pleasures of the table to awaken their languid courage by the martial harmony of twanging their bow-strings.

48 The curious narrative of this embassy, which required few observations, and was not susceptible of any collateral evidence may be found in Priscus p 49–70 [ed Par p 170–209 ed Bonn] But I have not confined myself to the same order and I had previously extracted the historical circumstances which were less intimately connected with the journey and business of the Roman ambassadors

49 M de Tillemont has very properly given the succession of chamberlains who reigned in the name of Theodosius Chrysaphius was the last and according to the unanimous evidence of history the worst of these favourites (see Hist des Empereurs tom. vi. p 117–119 Mém Ecclés tom. xv p 438) His partiality for his godfather the heresiarch Eutyches engaged him to persecute the orthodox party

50 This secret conspiracy and its important consequences may be traced in the fragments of Priscus p 37 38 39 54 70 71 72 [p 146–150 180 210–214 ed Bonn] The chronology of that historian is not fixed by any precise date but the series of negotiations between Attila and the East ern empire must be included within the three or four years which are terminated A D 450 by the death of Theodosius

51 Theodorus the Reader (see Vales Hist. Eccles tom iii p 563) and the Paschal Chronicle mention the fall without specifying the injury but the consequence was so likely to happen and so unlikely to be invented that we may safely give credit to Nicephorus Callistus a Greek of the fourteenth century

52 Pulcheriæ nutû (says Count Marcellinus) suâ cum avaritiâ interemptus est She abandoned the eunuch to the pious revenge of a son whose father had suffered at his instigation

53 Procopius, de Bell Vandal l i c. 4 [tom i p 325 sqq ed Bonn] Evagrius l ii c i Theophanes p 90 91 [ed Par tom i p 161–164, ed. Bonn] Novell ad Calcem Cod Theod. tom vi p 30 The praises which St Leo and the catholics have bestowed on Marcian are diligently transcribed by Baronius as an encouragement for future princes

1 See Priscus p 39 72 [p 213 214 ed Bonn]

2 The Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle which introduces this haughty message during the lifetime of Theodosius, may have anticipated the date but the dull annalist was incapable of inventing the original and genuine style of Attila

3 The second book of the Histoire Critique de l Etablissement de la Monarchie Françoise tom. i p 189–424 throws great light on the state of Gaul when it was invaded by Attila but the ingenious author the Abbé Dubos too often bewilders himself in system and conjecture

4 Victor Vitensis (de Persecut Vandal l i c 6 p 8 edit Ruinart) calls him acer consilio et strenuus in bello but his courage when he became unfortunate was censured as desperate rashness and Sebastian deserved or obtained the epithet of praeceps (Sidon Apollinar Carmen ix 181) His adventures at Constantinople in Sicily Gaul Spain and Africa are faintly marked in the Chronicles of Marcellinus and Idatius In his distress he was always followed by a numerous train since he could ravage the Hellespont and Propontis and seize the city of Barcelona

5 Reipublicæ Romanæ singulariter natus qui superbiam Suevorum Francorumque barbariem immensis cœdibus servire Imperio Romano coegisset Jornandes de Rebus Geticis c 34 p 660

6 This portrait is drawn by Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus a contemporary historian known only by some extracts which are preserved by Gregory of Tours (l ii c 8 in tom ii p 163) It was probably the duty or at least the interest of Renatus to magnify the virtues of Aëtius but he would have shown more dexterity if he had not insisted on his patient forgiving disposition

7 The embassy consisted of Count Romulus of Promotus president of Noricum and of Romanus the military duke They were accompanied by Tatullus an illustrious citizen of Petovio in the same province and father of Orestes who had married the daughter of Count Romulus See Priscus p 57 65 [p 185 198 ed Bonn] Cassiodorus (Variar i 4) mentions another embassy which was executed by his father and Carpilio the son of Aëtius and as Attila was no more he could safely boast of their manly intrepid behaviour in his presence

8 Deserta Valentinæ urbis rura Alanis partienda traduntur Prosper Tyronis Chron in Historiens de France tom i p 639 A few lines afterwards Prosper observes that lands in the ulterior Gaul were assigned to the Alani Without admitting the correction of Dubos (tom i p 300) the reasonable supposition of two colonies or garrisons of Alani will confirm his arguments and remove his objections

9 See Prosper Tyro p 639 Sidonius (Panegyr Avit 246) complains in the name of Auvergne his native country—

Litorius Scythicos equites tunc forte subacto
Celsus Aremorico Geticum rapiebat in agmen
Per terras Arverne tuas qui proxima quæque
Discursu flammis ferro feritate rapinis
Delebant pacis fallentes nomen inane

Another poet Paulinus of Perigord confirms the complaint

Nam socium vix ferre queas qui durior hoste.
See Dubos tom i p 330.

10 Theodoric II, the son of Theodoric I, declares to Avitus his resolution of repairing, or expiating, the fault which his grandfather had committed

Quæ noster, peccavit avus, quem fuscat id unum,
Quod te, Roma, capit

Sidon Panegyric Avit 505

This character, applicable only to the great Alaric, establishes the genealogy of the Gothic kings, which has hitherto been unnoticed

11 The name of Sapaudia, the origin of Savoy, is first mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus [l xv c. 11], and two military posts are ascertained by the Notitia within the limits of that province, a cohort was stationed at Grenoble in Dauphiné, and Ebredunum, or Iverdun, sheltered a fleet of small vessels which commanded the lake of Neufchâtel See Valesius, Notit Galliarum, p 503 D'Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p 284, 579

12 Salvian has attempted to explain the moral government of the Deity, a task which may be readily performed by supposing that the calamities of the wicked are judgments, and those of the righteous, trials

13 ——Capto terrarum damna patebant
Litorio in Rhodanum proprios producere fines,
Theudoridæ fixum, nec erat pugnare necesse,
Sed migrare Getis Rabidam trux asperat iram
Victor, quod sensit Scythicum sub mœnibus hostem
Imputat, et nihil est gravius, si forsitan unquam
Vincere contingat, trepido

Panegyr Avit 300, etc

Sidonius then proceeds, according to the duty of a panegyrist, to transfer the whole merit from Aëtius to his minister Avitus

14 Theodoric II revered, in the person of Avitus, the character of his preceptor

——Mihi Romula dudum
Per te jura placent parvumque edicere jussit
Ad tua verba pater, docili quo prisca Maronis
Carmine molliret Scythicos mihi pagina mores

Sidon Panegyric Avit 495, etc

15 Our authorities for the reign of Theodoric I are, Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, c. 34 36 and the Chronicles of Idatius and the two Prospers inserted in the Historians of France, tom i p 612-640 To these we may add Salvian de Gubernatione Dei, l vii p 243, 244, 245 and the Panegyric of Avitus by Sidonius

16 Reges Crinitos [super] se creavisse de prima et ut ita dicam, nobiliori suorum familia (Greg Turon l ii c 9 p 166 of the second volume of the Historians of France) Gregory himself does not mention the Merovingian name, which may be traced, however, to the beginning of the seventh century, as the distinctive appellation of the royal family, and even of the French monarchy An ingenious critic has deduced the Merovingians from the great Maroboduus, and he has clearly proved that the prince who gave his name to the first race was more ancient than the father of Childeric See Mémoires de l Académie des Inscriptions, tom xx p 52-90, tom xxx p 557-587

17 This German custom, which may be traced from Tacitus to Gregory of Tours, was at length adopted by the emperors of Constantinople From a MS of the tenth century, Montfaucon has delineated the representation of a similar ceremony, which the ignorance of the age had applied to king David See Monumens de la Monarchie Françoise, tom i Discours Préliminaire

18 Cæsaries prolixa crinium flagellis per terga dimissis, etc See the Preface to the third volume of the Historians of France and the Abbé Le Bœuf (Dissertat tom iii p 47-79) This peculiar fashion of the Merovingians has been remarked by natives and strangers by Priscus (tom i p 608 [p 152, ed Bonn]), by Agathias (tom ii p 49 [l i c 3, p 19, ed Bonn]), and by Gregory of Tours (l iii 18, vi 24, viii 10, tom ii p 196, 278, 316)

19 See an original picture of the figure, dress, arms, and temper of the ancient Franks, in Sidonius Apollinaris (Panegyr, Majorian 238-254), and such pictures, though coarsely drawn, have a real and intrinsic value Father Daniel (Hist de la Milice Françoise, tom i p 2-7) has illustrated the description

20 Dubos, Hist Critique, etc, tom i p 271, 272 Some geographers have placed Dispargum on the German side of the Rhine See a note of the Benedictine Editors to the Historians of France, tom ii p 166

22 Gregor Turon, l ii c 9 in tom ii p 166, 167, Fredegar Epitom c 9 p 395 Gesta Reg Francor c 5 in tom ii p 544 Vit St Remig ab Hincmar, in tom iii p 373

23 —— Francus qua Cloio patentes

Panegyr Majorian 212

The precise spot was a town or village called Vicus Helena and both the name and the place are discovered by modern geographers at Lens See Vales Notit Gall p 246 Longuerue, Description de la France tom ii p 88

24 See a vague account of the action in Sidonius Panegyr Majorian 212-230 The French critics, impatient to establish their monarchy in Gaul, have drawn a strong argument from the silence of Sidonius, who dares not insinuate that the vanquished Franks were compelled to repass the Rhine Dubos tom i p [illegible]

25 Salvian (de Gubernat Dei l vi) has expressed in vague and declamatory language the misfortunes of these three cities which are distinctly ascertained by the learned Mascou Hist of the Ancient Germans ix 21

26 Priscus in relating the contest does not name the two brothers the second of whom he had seen at Rome a beardless youth with long flowing hair (Historians of France tom i p 607 608 [p 152 ed Bonn]) The Benedictine Editors are inclined to believe that they were the sons of some unknown king of the Franks who reigned on the banks of the Neckar but the arguments of M de Foncemagne (Mém de l Académie tom viii p 464) seem to prove that the succession of Clodion was disputed by his two sons and that the younger was Meroveus the father of Childeric

27 Under the Merovingian race the throne was hereditary but all the sons of the deceased monarch were equally entitled to their share of his treasures and territories See the Dissertations of M de Foncemagne in the sixth and eighth volumes of the Mémoires de l Académie

28 A medal is still extant which exhibits the pleasing countenance of Honoria with the title of Augusta and on the reverse the improper legend of Salus Reipublicæ round the monogram of Christ See Ducange Famil Byzantin p 67 73

29 See Priscus p 39 40 [p 151 152 ed Bonn] It might be fairly alleged that if females could succeed to the throne Valentinian himself who had married the daughter and heiress of the younger Theodosius would have asserted her right to the Eastern empire

30 The adventures of Honoria are imperfectly related by Jornandes de Successione Regn c 97 and de Reb Get c 42 p 674 and in the Chronicles of Prosper and Marcellinus but they cannot be made consistent or probable unless we separate by an interval of time and place her intrigue with Eugenius and her invitation of Attila

33 The most authentic and circumstantial account of this war is contained in Jornandes (de Reb Geticis c. 36–41 p 662–672) who has sometimes abridged and sometimes transcribed the larger history of Cassiodorus Jornandes a quotation which it would be superfluous to repeat may be corrected and illustrated by Gregory of Tours l ii c 5 6 7 and the Chronicles of Idatius Isidore and the two Prospers All the ancient testimonies are collected and inserted in the Historians of France but the reader should be cautioned against a supposed extract from the Chronicle of Idatius (among the fragments of Fredegarius tom ii p 462) which often contradicts the genuine text of the Gallician bishop

34 The ancient legendaries deserve some regard as they are obliged to connect their fables with the real history of their own times See the Lives of St. Lupus St Anianus the bishops of Metz Ste Genevieve etc in the Historians of France tom i p 644 645 649 tom iii p 369

35 The scepticism of the Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples tom vii p 539 540) cannot be reconciled with any principles of reason or criticism Is not Gregory of Tours precise and positive in his account of the destruction of Metz? At the distance of no more than an hundred years could he be ignorant could the people be ignorant of the fate of a city the actual residence of his sovereigns the kings of Austrasia? The learned Count who seems to have undertaken the apology of Attila and the barbarians appeals to the false Idatius parcens civitatibus Germaniæ et Galliæ and forgets that the true Idatius had explicitly affirmed plurimæ civitates effractæ among which he enumerates Metz

36 ——Vix liquerat Alpes
Aetius tenue et rarum sine milite ducens
Robur in auxiliis Geticum male credulus agmen
Incassum propriis præsumens adfore castris
Panegyr Avit 328 etc

37 The policy of Attila of Aëtius and of the Visigoths is imperfectly described in the Panegyric of Avitus and the thirty sixth chapter of Jornandes The poet and the historian were both biased by personal or national prejudices The former exalts the merit and importance of Avitus orbis Avite salus etc ! The latter is anxious to show the Goths in the most favourable light Yet their agreement when they are fairly interpreted is a proof of their veracity

38 The review of the army of Aëtius is made by Jornandes c 36 p 664 edit Grot tom. ii p 23 of the Historians of France with the notes of the Benedictine editor The Læti were a promiscuous race of barbarians born or naturalised in Gaul and the Riparii or Ripuarii derived their name from their posts on the three rivers the Rhine the Meuse and the Moselle the Armoricans possessed the independent cities between the Seine and the

Loire. A colony of Saxons had been planted in the diocese of Bayeux, the Burgundians were settled in Savoy, and the Breones were a warlike tribe of Rhætians, to the east of the lake of Constance

39. Aurelianensis urbis obsidio, oppugnatio, irruptio, nec direptio Sidon Apollin l viii Epist 15, p 246 The preservation of Orleans might easily be turned into a miracle, obtained and foretold by the holy bishop

40 The common editions read XCM, but there is some authority of manuscripts (and almost any authority is sufficient) for the more reasonable number of XVM

41 Châlons, or Duro Catalaunum, afterwards Catalauni, had formerly made a part of the territory of Rheims, from whence it is distant only twenty seven miles See Vales Notit Gall p 136, D'Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p 212, 279

42 The name of Campania, or Champagne, is frequently mentioned by Gregory of Tours, and that great province, of which Rheims was the capital, obeyed the command of a duke Vales Notit p 120–123

43 I am sensible that these military orations are usually composed by the historian, yet the old Ostrogoths, who had served under Attila, might repeat his discourse to Cassiodorus, the ideas, and even the expressions, have an original Scythian cast and I doubt whether an Italian of the sixth century would have thought of the hujus certaminis gaudia

44. The expressions of Jornandes, or rather of Cassiodorus, are extremely strong Bellum atrox, multiplex, immane, pertinax, cui simile nulla usquam narrat antiquitas ubi talia gesta referuntur, ut nihil esset quod in vitâ suâ conspicere potuisset egregius, qui hujus miraculi privaretur aspectu [c. 40 p 668] Dubos (Hist Critique, tom i p 392, 393) attempts to reconcile the 162,000 of Jornandes with the 300,000 of Idatius and Isidore, by supposing that the larger number included the total destruction of the war, the effects of disease, the slaughter of the unarmed people, etc

45. The Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples, etc, tom vii p 554–573), still depending on the false, and again rejecting the true, Idatius, has divided the defeat of Attila into two great battles the former near Orleans, the latter in Champagne in the one, Theodoric was slain, in the other, he was revenged

46 Jornandes de Rebus Geticis c. 41, p 671 The policy of Aëtius and the behaviour of Torismond are extremely natural and the patrician, according to Gregory of Tours (l ii c. 7, p 163), dismissed the prince of the Franks by suggesting to him a similar apprehension The false Idatius ridiculously pretends that Aëtius paid a clandestine nocturnal visit to the kings of the Huns and of the Visigoths from each of whom he obtained a bribe of ten thousand pieces of gold as the price of an undisturbed retreat

47 These cruelties, which are passionately deplored by Theodoric, the son of Clovis (Gregory of Tours, l iii c 10, p 190), suit the time and circumstances of the invasion of Attila His residence in Thuringia was long attested by popular tradition, and he is supposed to have assembled a couroultai, or diet, in the territory of Eisenach See Mascou, ix 30, who settles with nice accuracy the extent of ancient Thuringia, and derives its name from the Gothic tribe of the Thervingi

48 Machinis constructis, omnibusque tormentorum generibus adhibitis Jornandes, c 42, p 673 In the thirteenth century the Moguls battered the cities of China with large engines constructed by the Mahometans or Christians in their service, which threw stones from 150 to 300 pounds weight In the defence of their country the Chinese used gunpowder, and even bombs, above an hundred years before they were known in Europe yet even those celestial, or infernal, arms were insufficient to protect a pusillanimous nation See Gaubil, Hist des Mongous, p 70, 71, 155 157, etc

49 The same story is told by Jornandes and by Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c. 4, p 187, 188 [tom i p 330, ed Bonn]) nor is it easy to decide which is the original But the Greek historian is guilty of an inexcusable mistake in placing the siege of Aquileia after the death of Aëtius

50 Jornandes, about an hundred years afterwards, affirms that Aquileia was so completely ruined, ita ut vix ejus vestigia, ut appareant, reliquerint See Jornandes de Reb Geticis, c 42, p 673 Paul Diacon l ii c 14, p 785 [Grot Hist Goth] Liutprand, Hist l iii c 2 The name of Aquileia was sometimes applied to Forum Julii (Cividad del Friuli), the more recent capital of the Venetian province.

51 In describing this war of Attila, a war so famous but so imperfectly known, I have taken for my guides two learned Italians who considered the subject with some peculiar advantages Sigonius, de Imperio Occidentali, l xiii in his Works tom i p 495–502 and Muratori Annali d Italia, tom iv p 229–236, 8vo edition

52 This anecdote may be found under two different articles (μεδιόλανον and κόρυκος) of the miscellaneous compilation of Suidas

Appendix ad Phædrum Fab xxv

The lion in Phædrus very foolishly appeals from pictures to the amphitheatre and I am glad to observe that the native taste of La Fontaine (l iii fable x) has omitted this most lame and impotent conclusion

54 Paul the Deacon (de Gestis Langobard l ii c 14 [123], p 784) describes the provinces of Italy about the end of the eighth century Venetia non solum in paucis insulis quas nunc Venetias dicimus constat sed ejus terminus a Pannoniæ finibus usque Adduam fluvium protelatur [illegible] The history of that province till the age of Charlemagne forms the first and most interesting part of the Verona Illustrata (p 1–388) in which the Marquis Scipio Maffei has shown himself equally capable of enlarged views and minute disquisitions

55 This emigration is not attested by any contemporary evidence but the fact is proved by the event and the circumstances might be preserved by tradition The citizens of Aquileia retired to the Isle of Gradus those of Padua to Rivus Altus or Rialto where the city of Venice was afterwards built etc

56 The topography and antiquities of the Venetian islands from Gradus to Clodia or Chioggia are accurately stated in the Dissertatio Chorographica de Italiâ Medii Ævi p 151–155

57 Cassiodor Variar l. xii Epist. 24 Maffei (Verona Illustrata part i p 240–254) has translated and explained this curious letter in the spirit of a learned antiquarian and a faithful subject who considered Venice as the only legitimate offspring of the Roman republic He fixes the date of the epistle and consequently the præfecture, of Cassiodorus A D 523 and the Marquis s authority has the more weight as he had prepared an edition of his works and actually published a dissertation on the true orthography of his name See Osservazioni Letterarie tom. ii p 290–339

58 See in the second volume of Amelot de la Houssaie, Histoire du Gouvernement de Venise, a translation of the famous Squittenio This book which has been exalted far above its merits is stained in every line with the disingenuous malevolence of party but the principal evidence genuine and apocryphal is brought together and the reader will easily choose the fair medium

59 Sirmond (Not ad Sidon Apollin p 19) has published a curious passage from the Chronicle of Prosper Attila redintegratis viribus quas in Gallia amiserat Italiam ingredi per Pannonias intendit nihil duce nostro Aetio secundum prioris belli opera prospiciente etc He reproaches Aetius with neglecting to guard the Alps and with a design to abandon Italy but this rash censure may at least be counterbalanced by the favourable testimonies of Idatius and Isidore

60 See the original portraits of Avienus and his rival Basilius delineated and contrasted in the epistles (i 9 p 22) of Sidonius He had studied the characters of the two chiefs of the senate but he attached himself to Basilius as the more solid and disinterested friend

61 The character and principles of Leo may be traced in one hundred and forty-one original epistles which illustrate the ecclesiastical history of his long and busy pontificate from A D 440 to 461 See Dupin Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom. iii part ii p 120–165

63 The Marquis Maffei (Verona Illustrata, part i p 95 129 221 part ii. p 2 6) has illustrated with taste and learning this interesting topography He places the interview of Attila and St Leo near Ariolica or Ardelica now Peschiera at the conflux of the lake and river ascertains the villa of Catullus in the delightful peninsula of Sirmio and discovers the Andes of Virgil in the village of Bandes precisely situate quâ se subducere colles incipiunt where the Veronese hills imperceptibly slope down into the plain of Mantua

64 Si statim infesto agmine urbem petiissent grande discrimen esset sed in Venetiâ quo fere tractu Italia mollissima est ipsâ soli cœlique clementiâ robur elanguit Ad hoc panis usû carnisque coctæ et dulcedine vini mitigatos etc This passage of Florus (iii 3) is still more applicable to the Huns than to the Cimbri and it may serve as a commentary on the celestial plague with which Idatius and Isidore have afflicted the troops of Attila

65 The historian Priscus had positively mentioned the effect which this example produced on the mind of Attila Jornandes c. 4 p 673

67 Attila ut Priscus historicus refert, extinctionis suæ tempore puellam Ildico nomine decoram valde sibi [in] matrimonium post innumerabiles uxores socians Jornandes c 49 p 683 684 He afterwards adds (c. 50 p 686) Filii Attilæ quorum per licentiam libidinis pœne populus fuit Polygamy has been established among the Tartars of every age The rank of plebeian wives is regulated only by their personal charms and the faded matron prepares without a murmur the bed which is destined for her blooming rival But in royal families the daughters of Khans communicate to their sons a prior right of inheritance See Genealogical History p 406 407 408

68 The report of her guilt reached Constantinople where it obtained a very different name and Marcellinus observes that the tyrant of Europe was slain in the night by the hand and the knife of a woman Corneille who has adapted the genuine account to his tragedy describes the irruption of blood in forty bombast lines and Attila exclaims with ridiculous fury

——S il ne veut s arrêter (his blood)
(Dit il) on me payera ce qui m en va coûter

69 The curious circumstances of the death and funeral of Attila are related by Jornandes (c 49 p 683 684 685) and were probably transcribed from Priscus

70 See Jornandes, de Rebus Geticis, c 50, p 685, 686, 687, 688 His distinction of the national arms is curious and important Nam ibi admirandum reor fuisse spectaculum, ubi cernere erat cunctis, pugnantem Gothum ense furentem, Gepidam in vulnere suorum cuncta tela frangentem, Suevum pede, Hunnum sagittâ præsumere, Alanum gravi, Herulum levi, armaturâ, aciem instruere. I am not precisely informed of the situation of the river Netad

71 Two modern historians have thrown much new light on the ruin and division of the empire of Attila—M de Buat, by his laborious and minute diligence (tom viii. p 3–31, 68–94) and M de Guignes, by his extraordinary knowledge of the Chinese language and writers See Hist des Huns, tom. ii p 315–319

72 Placidia died at Rome, November 27, A.D 450. She was buried at Ravenna, where her sepulchre, and even her corpse, seated in a chair of cypress-wood, were preserved for ages The empress received many compliments from the orthodox clergy, and St Peter Chrysologus assured her that her zeal for the Trinity had been recompensed by an august trinity of children See Tillemont, Hist. des Emp tom vi p 240

73 Aëtium Placidus mactavit semivir amens, is the expression of Sidonius (Panegyr Avit 359) The poet knew the world, and was not inclined to flatter a minister who had injured or disgraced Avitus and Majorian, the successive heroes of his song

74 With regard to the cause and circumstances of the deaths of Aëtius and Valentinian, our information is dark and imperfect Procopius (de Bell Vandal. l. i c. 4, p 186, 187, 188 [tom i p 327–331, ed. Bonn]) is a fabulous writer for the events which precede his own memory His narrative must therefore be supplied and corrected by five or six Chronicles, none of which were composed in Rome or Italy, and which can only express, in broken sentences, the popular rumours as they were conveyed to Gaul, Spain, Africa, Constantinople, or Alexandria

75 This interpretation of Vettius a celebrated augur, was quoted by Varro in the xviiith book of his Antiquities Censorinus, de Die Natali, c. 17, p 90, 91, edit Havercamp

76 According to Varro, the twelfth century would expire A D 447, but the uncertainty of the true era of Rome might allow some latitude of anticipation or delay The poets of the age, Claudian (de Bell Getico, 265) and Sidonius (in Panegyr Avit 357), may be admitted as fair witnesses of the popular opinion

See Dubos, Hist Critique, tom. i p 340–346

77 The fifth book of Salvian is filled with pathetic lamentations and vehement invectives His immoderate freedom serves to prove the weakness, as well as the corruption, of the Roman government His book was published after the loss of Africa (A D 439), and before Attila's war (A D 451)

78 The Bagaudæ of Spain, who fought pitched battles with the Roman troops, are repeatedly mentioned in the Chronicle of Idatius Salvian has described their distress and rebellion in very forcible language. Itaque nomen civium Romanorum nunc ultro repudiatur ac fugitur, nec vile tamen [tantum] sed etiam abominabile pœne habetur Et hinc est ut etiam hi qui ad barbaros non confugiunt, barbari tamen esse coguntur, scilicet ut est pars magna Hispanorum, et non minima Gallorum De Bagaudis nunc mihi sermo est, qui per malos judices et cruentos spoliati, afflicti, necati postquam jus Romanæ libertatis amiserant, etiam honorem Romani nominis perdiderunt Vocamus rebelles, vocamus perditos quos esse compulimus criminosos De Gubernat Dei, l v p 158, 159

1 Sidonius Apollinaris composed the thirteenth epistle of the second book to refute the paradox of his friend Serranus, who entertained a singular though generous enthusiasm for the deceased emperor This epistle, with some indulgence, may claim the praise of an elegant composition and it throws much light on the character of Maximus

2 Clientum prævia, pedisequa, circumfusa, populositas, is the train which Sidonius himself (l i. epist 9) assigns to another senator of consular rank

> Districtus ensis cui super impiâ
> Cervice pendet, non Siculæ dapes
> Dulcem elaborabunt saporem
> Non avium citharæque cantus
> Somnum reducent
> Horat Carm iii 1

Sidonius concludes his letter with the story of Damocles which Cicero (Tusculan v 20, 21) had so inimitably told.

4 Notwithstanding the evidence of Procopius Evagrius, Idatius Marcellinus etc., the learned Muratori (Annali d Italia, tom iv p 249) doubts the reality of this invitation and observes with great truth, "Non si può dir quanto sia facile il popolo a sognare e spacciar voci false But his argument from the interval of time and place is extremely feeble The figs which grew near Car-

fiscalium solutionum oneribus attritas etc Novell Majorian tit iv p 34

42 The learned Greaves (vol. i p 329 330 331) has found by a diligent inquiry that aurei of the Antonines weighed one hundred and eighteen and those of the fifth century only sixty eight English grains Majorian gives currency to all gold coin excepting only the Gallic solidus from its deficiency not in the weight but in the standard

43 The whole edict (Novell. Majorian tit vi p 35) is curious Antiquarum ædium dissipatur speciosa constructio et ut [earum] aliquid reparetur magna diruuntur Hinc jam occasio nascitur ut etiam unusquisque privatum ædificium construens per gratiam judicum præsumere de publicis locis necessaria et transferre non dubitet etc With equal zeal but with less power Petrarch in the fourteenth century repeated the same complaints (Vie de Petrarque tom i p 326 327) If I prosecute this History I shall not be unmindful of the decline and fall of the city of Rome —an interesting object to which my plan was originally confined

44 The emperor chides the lenity of Rogatian consular of Tuscany in a style of acrimonious reproof which sounds almost like personal resentment (Novell tit ix p 37) The law of Majorian which punished obstinate widows was soon afterwards repealed by his successor Severus (Novell Sever tit i p 37)

45 Sidon Panegyr Majorian 385–440

46 The review of the army and passage of the Alps contain the most tolerable passages of the Panegyric (470–552) M de Buat (Hist des Peuples etc tom viii p 49–55) is a more satisfactory commentator than either Savaron or Sirmond

47 Τὰ μὲ ὅπλοις τα δὲ λόγοις is the just and forcible distinction of Priscus (Excerpt Legat p 42 [p 156 ed Bonn]) in a short fragment which throws much light on the history of Majorian Jornandes has suppressed the defeat and alliance of the Visigoths which were solemnly proclaimed in Gallicia and are marked in the Chronicle of Idatius

48 Florus l ii c 2 He amuses himself with the poetical fancy that the trees had been transformed into ships and indeed the whole transaction as it is related in the first book of Polybius deviates too much from the probable course of human events

49 Interea duplici texis dum littore classem
Inferno superoque mari cadit omnis in æquor
Silva tibi etc
Sidon Panegyr Majorian 441–461

The number of ships which Priscus fixes at 300 is magnified by an indefinite comparison with the fleets of Agamemnon Xerxes and Augustus

50 Procopius de Bell Vandal l. i c 7 p 194 [tom i p 341 ed Bonn] When Genseric conducted his unknown guest into the arsenal of Carthage the arms clashed of their own accord Majorian had tinged his yellow locks with a black colour

51 Spoliisque potitus
Immensis robur luxû jam perdidit omne,
Quo valuit dum pauper erat.
Panegyr Majorian. 330

He afterwards applies to Genseric unjustly as it should seem the vices of his subjects

52 He burnt the villages and poisoned the springs (Priscus p 42 [p 156 ed Bonn]) Dubos (Hist Critique tom i p 475) observes that the magazines which the Moors buried in the earth might escape his destructive search Two or three hundred pits are sometimes dug in the same place and each pit contains at least four hundred bushels of corn Shaw's Travels p 139

53 Idatius who was safe in Gallicia from the power of Ricimer boldly and honestly declares Vandali per proditores admoniti etc. he dissembles however the name of the traitor

54 Procop de Bell. Vandal l i c. 7 p 194 [tom i p 342 ed Bonn] The testimony of Idatius is fair and impartial Majorianum de Galliis Romam redeuntem et Romano imperio vel nomini res necessarias ordinantem Richimer livore percitus et invidorum consilio fultus fraude interficit circumventum [Sirmondi Op tom ii. p 311] Some read Suevorum and I am unwilling to efface either of the words as they express the different accomplices who united in the conspiracy against Majorian

55 See the Epigrams of Ennodius No cxxxv inter Sirmond Opera tom i p 1903 It is flat and obscure but Ennodius was made bishop of Pavia fifty years after the death of Majorian and his praise deserves credit and regard

56 Sidonius gives a tedious account (l i. Epist xi p 25–31) of a supper at Arles to which he was invited by Majorian a short time before his death He had no intention of praising a deceased emperor but a casual disinterested remark Subrisit Augustus ut erat auctoritate servatâ cum se communioni dedisset joci plenus outweighs the six hundred lines of his venal panegyric.

57 Sidonius (Panegyr Anthem. 317) dismisses him to heaven —

Auxerat Augustus naturæ lege Severus
Divorum numerum

And an old list of the emperors composed about the time of Justinian praises his piety and fixes his residence at Rome (Sirmond Not ad Sidon, p. 111 112)

58 Tillemont who is always scandalised by the virtues of infidels attributes this advantageous portrait of Marcellinus (which Suidas has preserved) to the partial zeal of some Pagan historian (Hist des Empereurs tom vi. p 330)

59 Procopius de Bell Vandal. l i c 6 p 191 [tom. i p 336 ed Bonn] In various circumstances of the life of Marcellinus it is not easy to reconcile the Greek historian with the Latin Chronicles of the times

60 I must apply to Ægidius the praises which Sidonius (Panegyr Majorian 553) bestows on a nameless master-general, who commanded the rear guard of Majorian Idatius, from public report, commends his Christian piety, and Priscus mentions (p 42 [p 156, 157, ed Bonn]) his military virtues

61 Greg Turon l ii c 12, in tom ii p 168 The Père Daniel, whose ideas were superficial and modern, has started some objections against the story of Childeric (Hist de France, tom i Preface Historique, p lxxviii etc), but they have been fairly satisfied by Dubos (Hist Critique, tom i p 460–510), and by two authors who disputed the prize of the Academy of Soissons (p 131–177, 310–339) With regard to the term of Childeric's exile, it is necessary either to prolong the life of Ægidius beyond the date assigned by the Chronicle of Idatius, or to correct the text of Gregory, by reading quarto anno, instead of octavo

62 The naval war of Genseric is described by Priscus (Excerpta Legation p 42 [p 157, ed Bonn]), Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 5, p 189, 190, and c 22, p 228 [tom i p 332, sqq , and p 399, ed Bonn]), Victor Vitensis (de Persecut Vandal l i c 17, and Ruinart, p 467–481), and in the three panegyrics of Sidonius, whose chronological order is absurdly transposed in the editions both of Savaron and Sirmond (Avit Carm vii 441–451 Majorian Carm v 327–350, 385–440 Anthem Carm ii 348–386) In one passage the poet seems inspired by his subject, and expresses a strong idea by a lively image —

——Hinc Vandalus hostis
Urget et in nostrum numerosa classe quotannis
Militat excidium conversoque ordine fati
Torrida Caucaseos infert mihi Byrsa furores
[Carm ii 347]

63 The poet himself is compelled to acknowledge the distress of Ricimer —

Praeterea invictus Ricimer, quem publica fata
Respiciunt, proprio solus vix Marte repellit
Piratam per rura vagum
[Carm ii 352]

Italy addresses her complaint to the Tiber and Rome, at the solicitation of the river god transports herself to Constantinople, renounces her ancient claims, and implores the friendship of Aurora, the goddess of the East This fabulous machinery, which the genius of Claudian had used and abused, is the constant and miserable resource of the muse of Sidonius

64 The original authors of the reigns of Marcian, Leo, and Zeno are reduced to some imperfect fragments, whose deficiencies must be supplied from the more recent compilations of Theophanes, Zonaras and Cedrenus

65 St Pulcheria died A D 453 four years before her nominal husband and her festival is celebrated on the 10th of September by the modern Greeks she bequeathed an immense patrimony to pious, or at least to ecclesiastical uses See Tillemont Memoires Ecclés tom xv p 181–184

66 See Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 4, p 185 [tom i p 325, ed Bonn]

67 From this disability of Aspar to ascend the throne, it may be inferred that the stain of Heresy was perpetual and indelible, while that of Barbarism disappeared in the second generation

68 Theophanes, p 95 [ed Par , tom i p 170, ed Bonn] This appears to be the first origin of a ceremony which all the Christian princes of the world have since adopted, and from which the clergy have deduced the most formidable consequences

69 Cedrenus (p 346 [ed Par tom i p 607, ed Bonn]), who was conversant with the writers of better days, has preserved the remarkable words of Aspar, Βασιλεῦ τὸν ταύτην τὴν ἁλουργίδα περιβεβλημένον οὐ χρὴ διαψεύδεσθαι

70 The power of the Isaurians agitated the Eastern empire in the two succeeding reigns of Zeno and Anastasius but it ended in the destruction of those barbarians, who maintained their fierce independence about two hundred and thirty years

71 ——Tali tu civis ab urbe
Procopio genitore micas cui prisca propago
Augustis venit a proavis

The poet (Sidon Panegyr Anthem 67–306) then proceeds to relate the private life and fortunes of the future emperor, with which he must have been very imperfectly acquainted

72 Sidonius discovers, with tolerable ingenuity, that this disappointment added new lustre to the virtues of Anthemius (210, etc) who declined one sceptre and reluctantly accepted another (22, etc)

73 The poet again celebrates the unanimity of all orders of the state (15–22), and the Chronicle of Idatius mentions the forces which attended his march

74 Interveni etenim nuptiis Patricii Ricimeris, cui filia perennis Augusti in spem publicae securitatis copulabatur The journey of Sidonius from Lyons and the festival of Rome are described with some spirit L i Epist 5 p 9–13 Epist 9, p 21

75 Sidonius (l i Epist 9 p 23 24) very fairly states his motive, his labour, and his reward "Hic ipse Panegyricus, si non judicium, certe eventum, boni operis accepit" He was made bishop of Clermont A D 471 Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom xvi p 750

76 The palace of Anthemius stood on the banks of the Propontis In the ninth century Alexius, the son in law of the emperor Theophilus obtained permission to purchase the ground and ended his days in a monastery which he founded on that delightful spot Ducange, Constantinopolis Christiana p 117, 152

strinxit in tantum ut non ea facienda cum inter positione juramenti idem promitteret Imperator Gelasius Epistol ad Andronicum apud Baron A D 467 No 3 The cardinal observes with some complacency that it was much easier to plant heresies at Constantinople than at Rome

78 Damascius in the Life of the philosopher Isidore apud Photium p 1040 [p 340a ed Bekk] Damascius who lived under Justinian composed another work consisting of 570 præter natural stories of souls dæmons apparitions the dotage of Platonic Paganism

79 In the poetical works of Sidonius which he afterwards condemned (l ix Epist 16 p 285) the fabulous deities are the principal actors If Jerom was scourged by the angels for only reading Virgil the bishop of Clermont for such a vile imitation deserved an additional whipping from the Muses

80 Ovid (Fast l ii 267–452) has given an amusing description of the follies of antiquity which still inspired so much respect that a grave magistrate running naked through the streets was not an object of astonishment or laughter

81 See Dionys Halicarn l i [c 79] p 25 65 edit Hudson The Roman antiquaries Donatus (l. ii c 18 p 173 174) and Nardini (p 386 387) have laboured to ascertain the true situation of the Lupercal

82 Baronius published from the MSS of the Vatican this epistle of Pope Gelasius (A D 496 No 28–45) which is entitled Adversus Andromachum Senatorem cæterosque Romanos qui Lupercalia secundum morem pristinum colenda constituebant Gelasius always supposes that his adversaries are nominal Christians and that he may not yield to them in absurd prejudice he imputes to this harmless festival all the calamities of the age

83 Itaque nos quibus totius mundi regimen commisit superna provisio Pius et triumphator semper Augustus filius noster Anthemius licet Divi ia Majestas et nostra creatio pietati ejus plenam Imperii commiserit potestatem etc Such is the dignified style of Leo whom Anthemius respectfully names Dominus et Pater meus Princeps sacratissimus Leo See Novell Anthem tit ii iii p 38 ad calcem Cod Theod

84 The expedition of Heraclius is clouded with difficulties (Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 640) and it requires some dexterity to use the circumstances afforded by Theophanes without injury to the more respectable evidence of Procopius

85 The march of Cato from Berenice in the province of Cyrene was much longer than that of Heraclius from Tripoli He passed the deep sandy desert in thirty days and it was found necessary to provide besides the ordinary supplies a great number of skins filled with water and several Psylli who were supposed to possess the art of sucking the wounds which had been made by the serpents of their native country See Plutarch in Caton Uticens [c 56] tom iv p 275 Strabon Geograph l xvii p 1193 [p 836 ed Casaub]

86 The principal sum is clearly expressed by Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c. 6 p 191 [tom i p 335 ed Bonn]) the smaller constituent parts which Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom. vi p 396) has laboriously collected from the Byzantine writers are less certain and less important The historian Malchus laments the public misery (Excerpt ex Suida in Corp Hist Byzant p 58) but he is surely unjust when he charges Leo with hoarding the treasures which he extorted from the people [p 270 ed Bonn]

87 This promontory is forty miles from Carthage (Procop l i c 6 p 192 [De Bell. Vandal tom i p 377 ed Bonn]) and twenty leagues from Sicily (Shaw s Travels p 89) Scipio landed farther in the bay at the fair promontory see the animated description of Livy xxix 26 27

88 Theophanes (p 100 [tom i p 179 ed. Bonn]) affirms that many ships of the Vandals were sunk The assertion of Jornandes (de Successione Regn) that Basiliscus attacked Carthage must be understood in a very qualified sense

89 Damascius in Vit Isidor apud Phot p 1048 [p 342 ed Bekk] It will appear by comparing the three short chronicles of the times that Marcellinus had fought near Carthage and was killed in Sicily

90 For the African war see Procopius (de Bell. Vandal l i c. 6 p 191 192 193 [tom i p 335, sqq ed bonn]) Theophanes (p 99 100 101 [ed Par tom i p 179 sqq, ed Bonn]) Cedrenus (p 349 350 [tom i p 613 ed Bonn]) and Zonaras (tom ii l xiv p 50 51) Montesquieu (Considérations sur la Grandeur etc c xx tom. iii p 497) has made a judicious observation on the failure of these great naval armaments

91 Jornandes is our best guide through the reigns of Theodoric II and Euric (de Rebus Geticis c. 44, 45 46 47 p 675–681) Idatius ends too soon and Isidore is too sparing of the information which he might have given on the affairs of Spain The events that relate to Gaul are laboriously illustrated in the third book of the Abbé Dubos Hist Critique tom i p 424–620

92 See Mariana Hist Hispan tom i l. v c 5, p 162

93 An imperfect but original picture of Gaul, more especially of Auvergne is shown by Sidonius who as a senator and afterwards as a bishop was deeply interested in the fate of his country See l. v [vii] Epist i 5 9 etc

94 Sidonius l iii Epist 3 p 65–68 Greg Tur on l ii c 24 in tom ii p 174 Jornandes c 45 p 679 Perhaps Ecdicius was only the son in law of Avitus his wife s son by another husband.

95 Si nullæ a republicâ vires nulla præsidia si nullæ quantum rumor est Anthemii principis opes statuit et auctore nobilitas seu patriam dimitere seu capillos (Sidon l ii Epist i p 33)

The last words (Sirmond, Not p 25) may likewise denote the clerical tonsure, which was indeed the choice of Sidonius himself

96 The history of these Britons may be traced in Jornandes (c 45, p 678), Sidonius (l iii Epistol 9, p 73, 74), and Gregory of Tours (l ii c 18, in tom ii p 170) Sidonius (who styles these mercenary troops argutos, armatos, tumultuosos, virtute, numero, contubernio, contumaces) addresses their general in a tone of friendship and familiarity

97 See Sidonius, l i Epist 7, p 15–20, with Sirmond's notes This letter does honour to his heart as well as to his understanding The prose of Sidonius, however vitiated by a false and affected taste, is much superior to his insipid verses

98 When the Capitol ceased to be a temple, it was appropriated to the use of the civil magistrate, and it is still the residence of the Roman senator The jewellers, etc , might be allowed to expose their precious wares in the porticoes

99 Hæc ad regem Gothorum, charta videbatur emitti pacem cum Græco Imperatore dissuadens, Britannos super Ligerim sitos impugnari oportere demonstrans, cum Burgundionibus jure gentium Gallias dividi debere confirmans

100 Senatûsconsultum Tiberianum (Sirmond, Not p 17), but that law allowed only ten days between the sentence and execution, the remaining twenty were added in the reign of Theodosius

101 Catilina seculi nostri Sidonius, l ii Epist 1, p 33, l v Epist 13, p 143, l vii Epist 7, p 185 He execrates the crimes and applauds the punishment of Seronatus, perhaps with the indignation of a virtuous citizen, perhaps with the resentment of a personal enemy

102 Ricimer, under the reign of Anthemius, defeated and slew in battle Beorgor, king of the Alani (Jornandes, c 45, p 678) His sister had married the king of the Burgundians, and he maintained an intimate connection with the Suevic colony established in Pannonia and Noricum

103 Galatam concitatum Sirmond (in his notes to Ennodius [tom i p 1650]) applies this appellation to Anthemius himself The emperor was probably born in the province of Galatia, whose inhabitants, the Gallo-Grecians, were supposed to unite the vices of a savage and a corrupted people

104 Epiphanius was thirty years bishop of Pavia (A D 467–497 see Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xvi p 788) His name and actions would have been unknown to posterity if Ennodius one of his successors, had not written his Life (Sirmond, Opera, tom i p 1647–1692) in which he represents him as one of the greatest characters of the age

105 Ennodius (p 1659–1664) has related this embassy of Epiphanius and his narrative verbose and turgid as it must appear, illustrates some curious passages in the fall of the Western empire

106 Priscus Excerpt Legation p 74 [p 219 ed Bonn] Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 6 p 191 [tom i p 336, ed Bonn] Eudoxia and her daughter were restored after the death of Majorian Perhaps the consulship of Olybrius (A D 464) was bestowed as a nuptial present

107 The hostile appearance of Olybrius is fixed (notwithstanding the opinion of Pagi) by the duration of his reign The secret connivance of Leo is acknowledged by Theophanes and the Paschal Chronicle We are ignorant of his motives, but in this obscure period our ignorance extends to the most public and important facts

108 Of the fourteen regions, or quarters, into which Rome was divided by Augustus, only one, the Janiculum, lay on the Tuscan side of the Tiber But, in the fifth century, the Vatican suburb formed a considerable city, and in the ecclesiastical distribution, which had been recently made by Simplicius, the reigning pope, two of the seven regions or parishes of Rome depended on the church of St Peter See Nardini Roma Antica, p 67 It would require a tedious dissertation to mark the circumstances in which I am inclined to depart from the topography of that learned Roman

109 Nuper Anthemii et Ricimeris civili furore subversa est Gelasius (in Epist ad Andromach apud Baron A D 496, No 42), Sigonius (tom i l xiv de Occidentali Imperio, p 542, 543), and Muratori (Annali d Italia tom iv p 308 309), with the aid of a less imperfect MS of the Historia Miscella, have illustrated this dark and bloody transaction

110 Such had been the sæva ac deformis urbe totâ facies, when Rome was assaulted and stormed by the troops of Vespasian (see Tacit Hist iii 82, 83), and every cause of mischief had since acquired much additional energy The revolution of ages may bring round the same calamities but ages may revolve without producing a Tacitus to describe them

111 See Ducange, Familiæ Byzantin p 74 75 Areobindus, who appears to have married the niece of the emperor Justinian, was the eighth descendant of the elder Theodosius

112 The last revolutions of the Western empire are faintly marked in Theophanes (p 102 [tom i p 184 ed Bonn]) Jornandes (c 45 p 679), the Chronicle of Marcellinus, and the Fragments of an anonymous writer, published by Valesius at the end of Ammianus (p 716 717 [tom ii p 303 sq, ed Bipont] If Photius had not been so wretchedly concise we should derive much information from the contemporary histories of Malchus and Candidus See his Extracts, p 172–179 [p 54–56 ed Bekk]

113 See Greg Turon l ii c 28 in tom ii p 175 Dubos Hist Critique tom i p 613 By the murder or death of his two brothers Gundobald acquired the sole possession of the kingdom of Burgundy, whose ruin was hastened by their discord

which Anthemius had promised decessoris Anthemii fidem absolvit See l. viii Ep 7 p 224 [l. v Ep 16 p 146]

115 Epiphanius was sent ambassador from Nepos to the Visigoths for the purpose of ascertaining the fines Imperii Italici (Ennodius in Sirmond tom i p 1665–1669) His pathetic discourse concealed the disgraceful secret which soon excited the just and bitter complaints of the bishop of Clermont

116 Malchus apud Phot p 172 [p 54 b ed Bekk] Ennod Epigram lxxxii in Sirmond Oper tom i p 1879 Some doubt may however be raised on the identity of the emperor and the archbishop

117 Our knowledge of these mercenaries who subverted the Western empire is derived from Procopius (de Bell Gothico l i c i p 308 [tom ii. p 6 ed Bonn]) The popular opinion and the recent historians represent Odoacer in the false light of a stranger and a king who invaded Italy with an army of foreigners his native subjects

118 Orestes qui eo tempore quando Attila ad Italiam venit se illi junxit et ejus notarius factus fuerat Anonym. Vales p 716 [Amm Marc tom ii p 303 ed Bipon] He is mistaken in the date but we may credit his assertion that the secretary of Attila was the father of Augustulus

119 See Ennodius (in Vit Epiphan Sirmond tom i p 1669 1670) He adds weight to the narrative of Procopius though we may doubt whether the devil actually contrived the siege of Pavia to distress the bishop and his flock

120 Jornandes c 53 54 p 692–695 M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l Europe tom. viii p 221–228) has clearly explained the origin and adventures of Odoacer I am almost inclined to believe that he was the same who pillaged Angers and commanded a fleet of Saxon pirates on the ocean Greg Turon l ii c 18 in tom ii. p 170

121 Vade ad Italiam vade vilissimis nunc pellibus coopertus sed multis cito plurima largiturus Anonym Vales p 717 [Amm Marc ii p 305 ed. Bipon] He quotes the Life of St Severinus which is extant and contains much unknown and valuable history it was composed by his disciple Eugippius (A D 511) thirty years after his death. See Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom. xvi p 168–181

122 Theophanes who calls him a Goth affirms that he was educated nursed (τράφ ντος) in Italy (p 102 [tom i p 184, ed Bonn]) and as this strong expression will not bear a literal interpretation it must be explained by long service in the Imperial guards

123 Nomen regis Odoacer assumpsit cum tamen neque purpurâ nec regalibus uteretur insignibus. Cassiodor in Chron. A.D 476 He seems to have assumed the abstract title of a king without applying it to any particular nation or country

124. Malchus whose loss excites our regret has preserved (in Excerpt. Legat. p 93 [ed Par p 235, ed Bonn]) this extraordinary embassy from the senate to Zeno The anonymous fragment (p 717) and the extract from Candidus (apud Phot. p 176 [p 55 ed Bekk]) are likewise of some use.

125 The precise year in which the Western empire was extinguished is not positively ascertained The vulgar era of A D 476 appears to have the sanction of authentic chronicles. But the two dates assigned by Jornandes (c 46 p 680) would delay that great event to the year 479 and though M de Buat has overlooked his evidence, he produces (tom viii p 261–288) many collateral circumstances in support of the same opinion

126 See his medals in Ducange (Fam Byzantin p 81) Priscus (Excerpt. Legat p 57 [p 185 ed Bonn]) Maffei (Osservazioni Letterarie tom ii p 314) We may allege a famous and similar case The meanest subjects of the Roman empire assumed the illustrious name of Patricius which by the conversion of Ireland has been communicated to a whole nation

127 Ingrediens autem Ravennam deposuit Augustulum de regno cujus infantiam misertus concessit ei sanguinem et quia pulcher erat tamen donavit ei reditum sex millia solidos et misit eum intra Campaniam cum parentibus suis libere vivere Anonym Vales p 716 [Amm Marc. tom ii. p 303 ed Bipon] Jornandes says (c 46 p 680) in Lucullano Campaniæ castello exsilii pœna damnavit

128 See the eloquent Declamation of Seneca (Epist lxxxvi) The philosopher might have recollected that all luxury is relative and that the elder Scipio whose manners were polished by study and conversation was himself accused of that vice by his ruder contemporaries (Livy xxix 19)

129 Sylla in the language of a soldier praised his peritia castrametandi (Plin Hist Natur xviii 7) Phædrus who makes its shady walks (læta viridia) the scene of an insipid fable (ii 5) has thus described the situation —

Cæsar Tiberius quum petens Neapolim,
In Misenensem villam venisset suam
Quæ monte summo posita Luculli manu
Prospectat Siculum et despicit Tuscum mare.

130 From seven myriads and a half to two hundred and fifty myriads of drachmæ. Yet even in the possession of Marius it was a luxurious retirement The Romans derided his indolence they soon bewailed his activity See Plutarch in Caius Marius

131 Lucullus had other villas of equal though various magnificence at Baiæ Naples Tusculum etc He boasted that he changed his climate with the storks and cranes Plutarch in the life of Lucullus

132 Severinus died in Noricum A.D 482 Six years afterwards his body which scattered miracles as it passed was transported by his disciples into Italy The devotion of a Neapolitan lady invited the saint to the Lucullan villa in the place of Augustulus who was probably no more See Ba

ronius (Annal Eccles A D 496, No 50, 51) and Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom xvi p 178–181), from the original Life by Eugippius The narrative of the last migration of Severinus to Naples is likewise an authentic piece

133 The consular Fasti may be found in Pagi or Muratori The consuls named by Odoacer, or perhaps by the Roman senate, appear to have been acknowledged in the Eastern empire

134 Sidonius Apollinaris (l 1 Epist 9, p 22, edit Sirmond) has compared the two leading senators of his time (A D 468), Gennadius Avienus and Cæcina Basilius To the former he assigns the specious, to the latter the solid, virtues of public and private life A Basilius junior, possibly his son, was consul in the year 480

135 Epiphanius interceded for the people of Pavia, and the king first granted an indulgence of five years, and afterwards relieved them from the oppression of Pelagius, the Prætorian præfect (Ennodius, in Vit St Epiphan, in Sirmond Oper tom 1 p 1670–1672)

136 See Baronius, Annal Eccles A D 483, No 10–15 Sixteen years afterwards the irregular proceedings of Basilius were condemned by pope Symmachus in a Roman synod

137 The wars of Odoacer are concisely mentioned by Paul the Deacon (de Gest. Langobard l. i c. 19, p 757, edit Grot) and in the two Chronicles of Cassiodorus and Cuspinian The Life of St Severinus, by Eugippius, which the Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples, etc , tom viii. c. 1, 4, 8, 9) has diligently studied, illustrates the ruin of Noricum and the Bavarian antiquities

138 Tacit Annal iii 54 The Recherches sur l'Administration des Terres chez les Romains (p 351–361) clearly state the progress of internal decay

139 A famine, which afflicted Italy at the time of the irruption of Odoacer, king of the Heruli, is eloquently described in prose and verse by a French poet (Les Mois, tom ii p 174, 206, edit in 12mo) I am ignorant from whence he derives his information, but I am well assured that he relates some facts incompatible with the truth of history

143 Such are the topics of consolation, or rather of patience, which Cicero (ad Familiares, lib ix Epist. 17) suggests to his friend Papirius Pætus, under the military despotism of Cæsar The argument, however, of "vivere pulcherrimum duxi," is more forcibly addressed to a Roman philosopher, who possessed the free alternative of life or death

1 The origin of the monastic institution has been laboriously discussed by Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom i p 1419–1426) and Helyot (Hist des Ordres Monastiques, tom i p 1–66) These authors are very learned and tolerably honest, and their difference of opinion shows the subject in its full extent Yet the cautious Protestant, who distrusts any Popish guides, may consult the seventh book of Bingham's Christian Antiquities

2 See Euseb Demonstrat Evangel. (l. i p 20, 21, edit Græc Rob Stephani, Paris, 1545) In his Ecclesiastical History, published twelve years after the Demonstration, Eusebius (l ii c 17) asserts the Christianity of the Therapeutæ but he appears ignorant that a similar institution was actually revived in Egypt.

3 Cassian (Collat xviii 5 [Max. Bibl Patr t vii. p 2081]) claims this origin for the institution of the Cœnobites, which gradually decayed till it was restored by Antony and his disciples

4 Ὠφελιμώτατον γάρ τι χρῆμα εἰς ἀνθρώπους ἐκ θεοῦ ἥκουσα ἡ τοιαύτη φιλοσοφία These are the expressive words of Sozomen, who copiously and agreeably describes (l i. c. 12 13, 14) the origin and progress of this monkish philosophy (see Suicer Thesaur Eccles tom ii. p 1441) Some modern writers, Lipsius (tom iv p 448 Manuduct ad Philosoph Stoic iii. 13) and La Mothe de Vayer (tom. ix de la Vertu des Payens, p 228–262), have compared the Carmelites to the Pythagoreans, and the Cynics to the Capucins

5 The Carmelites derive their pedigree in regular succession from the prophet Elijah (see the Theses of Beziers, A D 1682, in Bayle's Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Œuvres tom i p 82, etc., and the prolix irony of the Ordres Monastiques, an anonymous work, tom i p 1–433 Berlin, 1751) Rome and the inquisition of Spain silenced the profane criticism of the Jesuits of Flanders (Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tom i p 28–300), and the statue of Elijah the Carmelite has been erected in the church of St Peter (Voyages du P Labat tom iii p 87)

6 Plin. Hist Natur v 15. 8 Γράμματα μὲ μάθ οὐκ ἠνέσχετο Athanas tom ii in Vit St Anton p 452 [p 795 ed Ben ed 1698 cf c 72 p 849] and the assertion of his total ignorance has been received by many of the ancients and moderns But Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés tom vii p 666) shows by some probable arguments that Antony could read and write in the Coptic his native tongue and that he was only a stranger to the Greek letters The philosopher Synesius (p 51 [ed Par 1612]) acknowledges that the natural genius of Antony did not require the aid of learning

9 Aruræ autem erant ei trecentæ uberes et valde optimæ (Vit Patr l v [l i] p 36) If the Arura be a square measure of an hundred Egyptian cubits (Rosweyde Onomasticon ad Vit Patrum p 1014 1015 [p 1009]) and the Egyptian cubit of all ages be equal to twenty two English inches (Greaves vol i. p 233) the arura will consist of about three quarters of an English acre

10 The description of the monastery is given by Jerom (tom i p 248 249 in Vit Hilarion [tom ii p 31, ed Vallars]) and the P Sicard (Mis sions du Levant tom v p 122–200) Their ac counts cannot always be reconciled the father painted from his fancy and the Jesuit from his experience

12 Tabenne is a small island in the Nile in the diocese of Tentyra or Dendera between the mod ern town of Girge and the ruins of ancient Thebes (D Anville p 194) M de Tillemont doubts whether it was an isle but I may conclude from his own facts that the primitive name was after wards transferred to the great monastery of Bau or Pabau (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 678 688)

16 The introduction of the monastic life into Rome and Italy is occasionally mentioned by Je rom tom i p 119 120 199

17 See the Life of Hilarion by St Jerom (tom. i. p 241 252 [tom ii p 15 24 ed Vall]) The stories of Paul Hilarion and Malchus by the same author are admirably told and the only de fect of these pleasing compositions is the want of truth and common sense

18 His original retreat was in a small village on the banks of the Iris not far from Neo-Cæsarea The ten or twelve years of his monastic life were disturbed by long and frequent avocations Some critics have disputed the authenticity of his ascetic rules but the external evidence is weighty and they can only prove that it is the work of a real or affected enthusiast See Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom ix p 636–644 Helyot Hist des Ordres Mo nastiques tom i p 175–181

24 This small though not barren spot Iona Hy or Columbkill only two miles in length and one mile in breadth has been distinguished—1 By the monastery of St Columba founded A D 566 whose abbot exercised an extraordinary juris diction over the bishops of Caledonia 2 By a classic library which afforded some hopes of an entire Livy and 3 By the tombs of sixty kings Scots Irish and Norwegians who reposed in holy ground See Usher (p 311 360–370) and Buchanan (Rer Scot l ii p 15 edit Ruddiman)

25 Chrysostom (in the first tome of the Bene dictine edition) has consecrated three books to the praise and defence of the monastic life He is en couraged by the example of the ark to presume that none but the elect (the monks) can possibly be saved (l i p 55, 56) Elsewhere, indeed, he becomes more merciful (l iii p 83, 84), and allows different degrees of glory, like the sun, moon, and stars In his lively comparison of a king and a monk (l iii p 116–121), he supposes (what is hardly fair) that the king will be more sparingly rewarded, and more rigorously punished

26 Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom i p 1426–1469) and Mabillon (Œuvres Posthumes, tom ii p 115–158) The monks were gradually adopted as a part of the ecclesiastical hierarchy

27 Dr Middleton (vol i p 110) liberally censures the conduct and writings of Chrysostom, one of the most eloquent and successful advocates for the monastic life

28 Jerom's devout ladies form a very considerable portion of his works the particular treatise, which he styles the Epitaph of Paula (tom i p 169–192 [Ep 108, tom i p 684, ed Vallars]), is an elaborate and extravagant panegyric The exordium is ridiculously turgid —"If all the members of my body were changed into tongues, and if all my limbs resounded with a human voice, yet should I be incapable," etc

29 Socrus Dei esse cœpisti (Jerom tom i p 140, ad Eustochium), Rufinus (in Hieronym Op tom iv p 223), who was justly scandalised, asks his adversary, From what Pagan poet he had stolen an expression so impious and absurd?

30 Nunc autem veniunt plerumque ad hanc professionem servitutis Dei, et ex conditione servili, vel etiam liberati, vel propter hoc a Dominis liberati sive liberandi et ex vitâ rusticanâ, et ex opificum exercitatione, et plebeio labore Augustin de Oper Monach c. 22, ap Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom iii p 1094 The Egyptian, who blamed Arsenius, owned that he led a more comfortable life as a monk than as a shepherd See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xiv p 679

31 A Dominican friar (Voyages du P Labat, tom i. p 10), who lodged at Cadiz in a convent of his brethren, soon understood that their repose was never interrupted by nocturnal devotion, 'quoiqu on ne laisse pas de sonner pour l édification du peuple"

32 See a very sensible preface of Lucas Holstenius to the Codex Regularum The emperors attempted to support the obligation of public and private duties but the feeble dykes were swept away by the torrent of superstition and Justinian surpassed the most sanguine wishes of the monks (Thomassin, tom i p 1782–1799 and Bingham, l vii. c 3 p 253)

33 The monastic institutions particularly those of Egypt, about the year 400 are described by four curious and devout travellers—Rufinus (Vit Patrum, l. ii iii p 424–536) Posthumian (Sulp. Sever Dialog i.), Palladius (Hist Lausiac. in Vit Patrum p 709 863 [783]), and Cassian (see in tom vii Bibliothec. Max Patrum, his four first books of Institutes, and the twenty four Collations or Conferences)

34 The example of Malchus (Jerom tom i p 256 [tom ii p 44, ed Vallars]), and the design of Cassian and his friend (Collation xxiv i), are incontestable proofs of their freedom, which is elegantly described by Erasmus in his Life of St Jerom See Chardon, Hist des Sacremens, tom vi. p 279–300

35 See the Laws of Justinian (Novell cxxiii No 42 [Auth Coll ix tit vii]), and of Lewis the Pious (in the Historians of France, tom vi p 427), and the actual jurisprudence of France, in Denissart (Decisions, etc , tom iv p 855, etc.)

36 The ancient Codex Regularum, collected by Benedict Anianinus, the reformer of the monks in the beginning of the ninth century, and published in the seventeenth by Lucas Holstenius, contains thirty different rules for men and women Of these seven were composed in Egypt, one in the East one in Cappadocia, one in Italy, one in Africa, four in Spain, eight in Gaul or France, and one in England

37 The rule of Columbanus, so prevalent in the West inflicts one hundred lashes for very slight offences (Cod Reg part ii p 174 [tom i p 178, ed 1759]) Before the time of Charlemagne the abbots indulged themselves in mutilating their monks, or putting out their eyes—a punishment much less cruel than the tremendous vade in pace (the subterraneous dungeon, or sepulchre), which was afterwards invented See an admirable discourse of the learned Mabillon (Œuvres Posthumes, tom ii p 321–336), who, on this occasion, seems to be inspired by the genius of humanity For such an effort, I can forgive his defence of the holy tear of Vendome (p 361–399)

38 Sulp Sever Dialog i 12, 13 p 532, etc [ed Lugd B 1647] Cassian Institut l iv c 26, 27 ' Præcipua ibi virtus et prima est obedientia " Among the Verba seniorum (in Vit Patrum, l v p 617), the fourteenth libel or discourse is on the subject of obedience, and the Jesuit Rosweyde, who published that huge volume for the use of convents, has collected all the scattered passages in his two copious indexes

39 Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol iv p 161) has observed the scandalous valour of the Cappadocian monks, which was exemplified in the banishment of Chrysostom 40 Cassian has simply though copiously described the monastic habit of Egypt (Institut l i.), to which Sozomen (l iii c. 14) attributes such allegorical meaning and virtue.

43 Some partial indulgences were granted for the hands and feet ' Totum autem corpus nemo

unguet nisi causâ infirmitatis nec lavabitur aquâ nudo corpore nisi languor perspicuus sit (Regul Pachom xcii part 1 p 78 [tom 1 p 31])

44 St Jerom in strong but indiscreet language expresses the most important use of fasting and abstinence Non quod Deus universitatis Creator et Dominus intestinorum nostrorum rugitû et inanitate ventris pulmonisque ardore delectetur sed quod aliter pudicitia tuta esse non possit (Op tom 1 p 137 ad Eustochium [Ep 22 tom 1 p 94 ed Vallars]) See the twelfth and twenty second Collations of Cassian de Castitate and de Illusionibus Nocturnis

45 Edacitas in Græcas gula est in Gallis natura (Dialog 1 c. 4, p 521) Cassian fairly owns that the perfect model of abstinence cannot be imitated in Gaul on account of the aerum temperies and the qualitas nostræ fragilitatis (Institut iv 11) Among the Western rules that of Columbanus is the most austere he had been educated amidst the poverty of Ireland as rigid perhaps and inflexible as the abstemious virtue of Egypt The rule of Isidore of Seville is the mildest on holidays he allows the use of flesh

46 Those who drink only water and have no nutritious liquor ought at least to have a pound and a half (twenty four ounces) of bread every day State of Prisons p 40 by Mr Howard

47 See Cassian Collat ii 19 20 21 The small loaves or biscuit of six ounces each had obtained the name of Paximacia (Rosweyde Onomasticon p 1045 [1033]) Pachomius however allowed his monks some latitude in the quantity of their food but he made them work in proportion as they ate (Pallad in Hist Lausiac c 38 39 in Vit Patrum l vi 1 p 736 737)

48 See the banquet to which Cassian (Collation viii 1) was invited by Serenus an Egyptian abbot

49 See the Rule of St Benedict cap 39 40 (in Cod Reg part ii p 41 42 [tom 1 p 109 ed 1759]) Licet legamus vinum omnino monachorum non esse sed quia nostris temporibus id monachis persuaderi non potest he allows them a Roman hemina a measure which may be ascertained from Arbuthnot s Tables

50 Such expressions as my book my cloak my shoes (Cassian Institut l iv c 13) were not less severely prohibited among the Western monks (Cod Regul part ii p 174 [tom 1 p 178] 235 288) and the Rule of Columbanus punished them with six lashes The ironical author of the Ordres Monastiques who laughs at the foolish nicety of modern convents seems ignorant that the ancients were equally absurd

51 Two great masters of ecclesiastical science the P Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom iii p 1090–1139) and the P Mabillon (Etudes Monastiques tom. 1 p 116–155) have seriously examined the manual labour of the monks which the former considers as a merit and the latter as a duty

52 Mabillon (Etudes Monastiques tom 1 p. 47–55) has collected many curious facts to justify the literary labours of his predecessors both in the East and West Books were copied in the ancient monasteries of Egypt (Cassian Institut l. iv c 12) and by the disciples of St Martin (Sulp. Sever in Vit Martin c 7 p 473) Cassiodorus has allowed an ample scope for the studies of the monks and we shall not be scandalised if their pen sometimes wandered from Chrysostom and Augustin to Homer and Virgil

53 Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom. iii p 118 145 146 171–179) has examined the revolution of the civil canon and common law Modern France confirms the death which monks have inflicted on themselves and justly deprives them of all right of inheritance.

54 See Jerom (tom 1 p 176 183) The monk Pambo made a sublime answer to Melania who wished to specify the value of her gift — Do you offer it to me or to God? If to God HE who suspends the mountains in a balance need not be informed of the weight of your plate (Pallad Hist Lausiac c 10 in the Vit Patrum l viii p 715)

55 Τὸ πολὺ μέρος της γης ω ικειωσαντο προφασει το μεταδιδόναι πάντα πτωχοις πάντας (ως ειπε) πτωχοὺς καταστήσαντες Zosim l v [c. 23] p 325. Yet the wealth of the Eastern monks was far surpassed by the princely greatness of the Benedictines.

56 The sixth general council (the Quinisext in Trullo Canon xlvii in Beveridge tom 1 p 213) restrains women from passing the night in a male or men in a female monastery The seventh general council (the second Nicene Canon xx. in Beveridge tom 1 p 325) prohibits the erection of double or promiscuous monasteries of both sexes but it appears from Balsamon that the prohibition was not effectual On the irregular pleasures and expenses of the clergy and monks see Thomassin tom iii p 1334–1368

57 I have somewhere heard or read the frank confession of a Benedictine abbot My vow of poverty has given me an hundred thousand crowns a year my vow of obedience has raised me to the rank of a sovereign prince. I forget the consequences of his vow of chastity

58 Pior an Egyptian monk allowed his sister to see him but he shut his eyes during the whole visit See Vit Patrum l iii p 504. Many such examples might be added

59 The 7th 8th 29th 30th 31st 34th 57th 60th 86th and 95th articles of the Rule of Pachomius impose most intolerable laws of silence and mortification

60 The diurnal and nocturnal prayers of the monks are copiously discussed by Cassian in the third and fourth books of his Institutions and he constantly prefers the liturgy which an angel had dictated to the monasteries of Tabennœ

61 Cassian from his own experience describes the acedia or listlessness of mind and body to which a monk was exposed when he sighed to find himself alone Sæpiusque egreditur et ingreditur cellam, et Solem velut ad occasum tardius properantem crebrius intuetur (Institut x 2)

62 The temptations and sufferings of Stagirius were communicated by that unfortunate youth to his friend St Chrysostom See Middleton's Works, vol i p 107–110 Something similar introduces the life of every saint, and the famous Inigo, or Ignatius, the founder of the Jesuits (Vida d'Inigo de Guiposcoa, tom i p 29–38) may serve as a memorable example

63 Fleury, Hist Ecclesiastique, tom vii p 46 I have read somewhere in the Vitæ Patrum, but I cannot recover the place, that several, I believe many, of the monks, who did not reveal their temptations to the abbot, became guilty of suicide.

64 See the seventh and eighth Collations of Cassian, who gravely examines why the dæmons were grown less active and numerous since the time of St Antony Rosweyde's copious index to the Vitæ Patrum will point out a variety of infernal scenes The devils were most formidable in a female shape

65 For the distinction of the Cænobites and the Hermits especially in Egypt, see Jerom (tom i p 45, ad Rusticum [Ep 125, tom i p 932, ed Vallars]), the first Dialogue of Sulpicius Severus, Rufinus (c 22, in Vit Patrum l ii p 478), Palladius (c 7, 69 in Vit Patrum, l viii p 712 758), and, above all, the eighteenth and nineteenth Collations of Cassian These writers, who compare the common and solitary life, reveal the abuse and danger of the latter

66 Suicer Thesaur Ecclesiast tom ii p 205 218 Thomassin (Discipline de l Eglise tom i p 1501, 1502) gives a good account of these cells When Gerasimus founded his monastery in the wilderness of Jordan, it was accompanied by a Laura of seventy cells

67 Theodoret, in a large volume (the Philotheus in Vit Patrum, l ix p 793–863) has collected the lives and miracles of thirty Anachorets Evagrius (l i c 21) more briefly celebrates the monks and hermits of Palestine

68 Sozomen, l vi c 33 The great St Ephrem composed a panegyric on these βοσκοὶ or grazing monks (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom viii p 292)

69 The P Sicard (Missions du Levant tom ii p 217–233) examined the caverns of the Lower Thebais with wonder and devotion. The inscriptions are in the old Syriac character which was used by the Christians of Abyssinia

70 See Theodoret (in Vit Patrum l ix p 848–854), Antony (in Vit Patrum l i p 170–177), Cosmas (in Asseman Bibliot Oriental tom i p 239–253), Evagrius (l i c 13 14) and Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom xv p 347 392)

71 The narrow circumference of two cubits or three feet which Evagrius assigns for the summit of the column, is inconsistent with reason with facts and with the rules of architecture The people who saw it from below might be easily deceived.

72 I must not conceal a piece of ancient scandal concerning the origin of this ulcer It has been reported that the Devil, assuming an angelic form, invited him to ascend, like Elijah, into a fiery chariot The saint too hastily raised his foot, and Satan seized the moment of inflicting this chastisement on his vanity

73 I know not how to select or specify the miracles contained in the Vitæ Patrum of Rosweyde, as the number very much exceeds the thousand pages of that voluminous work An elegant specimen may be found in the Dialogues of Sulpicius Severus and his Life of St Martin He reveres the monks of Egypt yet he insults them with the remark that they never raised the dead whereas the bishop of Tours had restored three dead men to life

74 On the subject of Ulphilas and the conversion of the Goths see Sozomen, l vi c 37 Socrates l iv c 33 Theodoret l iv c 37 Philostorg l ii c 5 The heresy of Philostorgius appears to have given him superior means of information

75 A mutilated copy of the four Gospels in the Gothic version was published A D 1665 and is esteemed the most ancient monument of the Teutonic language though Wetstein attempts by some frivolous conjectures to deprive Ulphilas of the honour of the work Two of the four additional letters express the W and our own Th See Simon, Hist Critique du Nouveau Testament, tom ii p 219–223 Mill Prolegom p 151, edit Kuster Wetstein Prolegom tom i p 114

76 Philostorgius erroneously places this passage under the reign of Constantine but I am much inclined to believe that it preceded the great emigration

77 We are obliged to Jornandes (de Reb Get c 51 p 688) for a short and lively picture of these lesser Goths Gothi minores populus immensus cum suo Pontifice ipsoque primate Wulfila The last words if they are not mere tautology, imply some temporal jurisdiction

79 Mosheim has slightly sketched the progress of Christianity in the North from the fourth to the fourteenth century The subject would afford materials for an ecclesiastical and even philosophical history

80 To such a cause has Socrates (l vii c 30) ascribed the conversion of the Burgundians whose Christian piety is celebrated by Orosius (l vii c 19 [32])

81 See an original and curious epistle from Daniel the first bishop of Winchester (Beda Hist Eccles Anglorum l v c 18 p 203 edit Smith) to St Boniface who preached the gospel among the savages of Hesse and Thuringia Epistol Bonifacii lxvii in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum tom xiii p 93

82 The sword of Charlemagne added weight

the argument but when Daniel wrote this epistle (A D 723) the Mahometans who reigned from India to Spain might have retorted it against the Christians

83 The opinions of Ulphilas and the Goths inclined to semi Arianism since they would not say that the Son was a creature though they held communion with those who maintained that heresy Their apostle represented the whole controversy as a question of trifling moment which had been raised by the passions of the clergy Theodoret l iv c 37

84. The Arianism of the Goths has been imputed to the emperor Valens Itaque justo Dei judicio ipsi eum vivum incenderunt qui propter eum etiam mortui vitio erroris arsuri sunt Orosius L vii c 33 p 554 This cruel sentence is confirmed by Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom vi p 604–610) who coolly observes un seul homme entraîna dans l enfer un nombre infini de Septentrionaux etc Salvian (de Gubern Dei l v p 150 151) pities and excuses their involuntary error

85 Orosius affirms in the year 416 (l vii c 41 p 580) that the churches of Christ (of the catholics) were filled with Huns Suevi Vandals Burgundians

86 Radbod king of the Frisons was so much scandalised by this rash declaration of a missionary that he drew back his foot after he had entered the baptismal font See Fleury Hist Ecclés tom ix p 167

87 The epistles of Sidonius bishop of Clermont under the Visigoths and of Avitus bishop of Vienne under the Burgundians explain sometimes in dark hints the general dispositions of the catholics The history of Clovis and Theodoric will suggest some particular facts

88 Genseric confessed the resemblance by the severity with which he punished such indiscreet allusions Victor Vitensis i 7 p 10

89 Such are the contemporary complaints of Sidonius bishop of Clermont (l vii c. 6 p 182 etc edit Sirmond) Gregory of Tours who quotes this Epistle (l ii c 25 in tom ii p 174) extorts an unwarrantable assertion that of the nine vacancies in Aquitain some had been produced by episcopal martyrdoms

90 The original monuments of the Vandal persecution are preserved in the five books of the history of Victor Vitensis (de Persecutione Vandalicâ) a bishop who was exiled by Hunneric in the Life of St Fulgentius who was distinguished in the persecution of Thrasimund (in Biblioth Max Patrum tom ix p 4–16) and in the first book of the Vandalic War by the impartial Procopius (c 7 8 p 196 197 198 199 [ed Paris tom i p 344 sqq ed Bonn]) Dom Ruinart the last editor of Victor has illustrated the whole subject with a copious and learned apparatus of notes and supplement (Paris 1694)

91 Victor iv 2 p 65 Hunneric refuses the name of Catholics to the Homoousians He describes, as the veri Divinæ Majestatis cultores his own party who professed the faith confirmed by more than a thousand bishops in the synods of Rimini and Seleucia

92 Victor ii 1 p 21, 22 Laudabilior videbatur In the MSS which omit this word the passage is unintelligible See Ruinart Not p 164

93 Victor ii 2 p 22 23 [21 22] The clergy of Carthage called these conditions periculosæ and they seem indeed to have been proposed as a snare to entrap the catholic bishops

94 See the narrative of this conference and the treatment of the bishops in Victor ii 13–18 p 35–42 and the whole fourth book p 63–71 The third book p 42–62 is entirely filled by their apology or confession of faith

95 See the list of the African bishops in Victor p 117–140 and Ruinart s notes p 215–397 The schismatic name of Donatus frequently occurs and they appear to have adopted (like our fanatics of the last age) the pious appellations of Deodatus Deogratias Quidvultdeus Habetdeum etc

96 Fulgent Vit c. 16–29 Thrasimund affected the praise of moderation and learning and Fulgentius addressed three books of controversy to the Arian tyrant whom he styles piissime Rex Biblioth Maxim Patrum tom ix p 41 Only sixty bishops are mentioned as exiles in the Life of Fulgentius they are increased to one hundred and twenty by Victor Tunnunensis and Isidore but the number of two hundred and twenty is specified in the Historia Miscella and a short authentic chronicle of the times See Ruinart p 570 571

97 See the base and insipid epigrams of the Stoic who could not support exile with more fortitude than Ovid Corsica might not produce corn wine, or oil but it could not be destitute of grass water and even fire

98 Si ob gravitatem cœli interissent vile damnum Tacit Annal ii 85 In this application Thrasimund would have adopted the reading of some critics utile damnum

99 See these preludes of a general persecution in Victor ii c 3 4 7 and the two edicts of Hunneric l ii p 35 l iv p 64

100 See Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 7 [c 8] p 197 198 [tom i p 344 sqq ed. Bonn] A Moorish prince endeavoured to propitiate the God of the Christians by his diligence to erase the marks of the Vandal sacrilege

101 See this story in Victor ii 8–12 p 30–34 Victor describes the distress of these confessors as an eye witness

102 See the fifth book of Victor His passionate complaints are confirmed by the sober testimony of Procopius and the public declaration of the emperor Justinian Cod l i tit xxvii

103 Victor ii 18 p 41

104 Victor v 4 p 74, 75 His name was Victorianus and he was a wealthy citizen of Adrumetum who enjoyed the confidence of the king

by whose favour he had obtained the office, or at least the title, of proconsul of Africa

105 Victor, i 6, p 8, 9 After relating the firm resistance and dexterous reply of Count Sebastian, he adds, quare alio [alius] generis argumento postea bellicosum virum occidit

106 Victor, v 12, 13 Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom vi p 609

107 Primate was more properly the title of the bishop of Carthage, but the name of patriarch was given by the sects and nations to their principal ecclesiastic See Thomassin, Discipline de l'Elgise, tom i p 155, 158

108 The patriarch Cyrila himself publicly declared that he did not understand Latin (Victor, ii 18, p 42) Nescio Latine, and he might converse with tolerable ease, without being capable of disputing or preaching in that language His Vandal clergy were still more ignorant, and small confidence could be placed in the Africans who had conformed

109 Victor, ii 1, 2, p 22

110 Victor, v 7, p 77 He appeals to the ambassador himself, whose name was Uranius

111 Astutiores, Victor, iv 4, p 70 He plainly intimates that their quotation of the Gospel, "Non jurabitis in toto," was only meant to elude the obligation of an inconvenient oath The forty-six bishops who refused were banished to Corsica, the three hundred and two who swore were distributed through the provinces of Africa

112 Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspæ, in the Byzacene province, was of a senatorial family and had received a liberal education He could repeat all Homer and Menander before he was allowed to study Latin, his native tongue (Vit Fulgent c 1) Many African bishops might understand Greek, and many Greek theologians were translated into Latin

113 Compare the two prefaces to the Dialogue of Vigilius of Thapsus (p 118, 119 edit Chiflet) He might amuse his learned reader with an innocent fiction, but the subject was too grave, and the Africans were too ignorant

114. The P Quesnel started this opinion which has been favourably received But the three following truths, however surprising they may seem are now universally acknowledged (Gerard Vossius tom vi p 516-522 Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom viii p 667-671) 1 St Athanasius is not the author of the creed which is so frequently read in our churches 2 It does not appear to have existed within a century after his death 3 It was originally composed in the Latin tongue and consequently, in the Western provinces Gennadius patriarch of Constantinople, was so much amazed by this extraordinary composition that he frankly pronounced it to be the work of a drunken man Petav Dogmat Theologica tom ii l vii c 8 p 687

115 1 John v 7 See Simon Hist Critique du Nouveau Testament, part i c xviii p 203-218 and part ii c ix. p 99-121, and the elaborate Prolegomena and Annotations of Dr Mill and Wetstein to their editions of the Greek Testament In 1689 the papist Simon strove to be free, in 1707, the Protestant Mill wished to be a slave, in 1751, the Arminian Wetstein used the liberty of his times and of his sect

116 Of all the MSS now extant, above fourscore in number, some of which are more than 1200 years old (Wetstein ad loc) The orthodox copies of the Vatican of the Complutensian editors, of Robert Stephens, are become invisible, and the two MSS of Dublin and Berlin are unworthy to form an exception See Emlyn s Works, vol ii p 227-255, 269-299 and M de Missy s four ingenious letters, in tom viii and ix. of the Journal Britannique

117 Or, more properly, by the four bishops who composed and published the profession of faith in the name of their brethren They styled this text luce clarius (Victor Vitensis de Persecut Vandal l iii c 11, p 54) It is quoted soon afterwards by the African polemics Vigilius and Fulgentius

118 In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Bibles were corrected by Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, and by Nicolas cardinal and librarian of the Roman church, secundum orthodoxam fidem (Wetstein, Prolegom p 84, 85) Notwithstanding these corrections, the passage is still wanting in twenty five Latin MSS (Wetstein ad loc.), the oldest and the fairest two qualities seldom united, except in manuscripts

119 The art which the Germans had invented was applied in Italy to the profane writers of Rome and Greece. The original Greek of the New Testament was published about the same time (A D 1514, 1516 1520) by the industry of Erasmus and the munificence of Cardinal Ximenes The Complutensian Polyglot cost the cardinal 50 000 ducats See Maittaire Annal Typograph tom ii p 2-8, 125-133 and Wetstein, Prolegomena, p 116-127

120 The three witnesses have been established in our Greek Testaments by the prudence of Erasmus the honest bigotry of the Complutensian editors the typographical fraud or error of Robert Stephens in the placing a crotchet and the deliberate falsehood or strange misapprehension of Theodore Beza

126 See the two general historians of Spain Mariana (Hist de Rebus Hispaniæ tom 1 l v c 12–15 p 182–194) and Ferreras (French translation tom ii p 206–247) Mariana almost forgets that he is a Jesuit to assume the style and spirit of a Roman classic Ferreras an industrious compiler reviews his facts and rectifies his chronology

129 The catholics who admitted the baptism of heretics repeated the rite or as it was afterwards styled the sacrament of confirmation to which they ascribed many mystic and marvellous prerogatives both visible and invisible See Chardon Hist des Sacremens tom 1 p 405–552

130 Osset or Julia Constantia was opposite to Seville on the northern side of the Bætis (Plin Hist Natur iii 3) and the authentic reference of Gregory of Tours (Hist Francor l vi c 43 p 288) deserves more credit than the name of Lusitania (de Gloriâ Martyr c 24) which has been eagerly embraced by the vain and superstitious Portuguese (Ferreras Hist d Espagne tom ii p 166)

131 This miracle was skilfully performed An Arian king sealed the doors and dug a deep trench round the church without being able to intercept the Easter supply of baptismal water

132 Ferreras (tom ii p 168–175 A D 550) has illustrated the difficulties which regard the time and circumstances of the conversion of the Suevi They had been recently united by Leovigild to the Gothic monarchy of Spain

133 This addition to the Nicene or rather the Constantinopolitan creed was first made in the eighth council of Toledo A D 653 but it was expressive of the popular doctrine (Gerard Vossius tom vi p 527 de tribus Symbolis)

135 Paul Warnefrid (de Gestis Langobard l iv c. 44 p 853 edit Grot) allows that Arianism still prevailed under the reign of Rotharis (A D 636–652) The pious deacon does not attempt to mark the precise era of the national conversion which was accomplished however before the end of the seventh century

139 Isidore at that time archbishop of Seville mentions disapproves and congratulates the zeal of Sisebut (Chron Goth p 728 [ed Grot]) Baronius (A D 614 No 41) assigns the number on the evidence of Aimoin (l iv c. 22) but the evidence is weak and I have not been able to verify the quotation (Historians of France tom iii p 127)

140 Basnage (tom viii c 13 p 388–400) faithfully represents the state of the Jews but he might have added from the canons of the Spanish councils and the laws of the Visigoths many curious circumstances essential to his subject though they are foreign to mine

Chapter XXXVIII

1 In this chapter I shall draw my quotations from the Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France Paris 1738–1767 in eleven volumes in folio By the labour of Dom Bouquet and the other Benedictines all the original testimonies as far as A D 1060 are disposed in chronological order and illustrated with learned notes Such a national work which will be continued to the year 1500, might provoke our emulation

2 Tacitus The Histories iv 73 74 To abridge Tacitus would indeed be presumptuous but I may select the general ideas which he applies to the present state and future revolutions of Gaul

3 Eadem semper causa Germanis transcendendi in Gallias, libido atque avaritia, et mutandæ sedis amor, ut relictis paludibus et solitudinibus suis, fecundissimum hoc solum vosque ipsos possiderent Nam pulsis Romanis quid aliud quam bella omnium inter se gentium exsistent?

4 Sidonius Apollinaris ridicules, with affected wit and pleasantry, the hardships of his situation (Carm xii in tom i p 811)

5 See Procopius de Bell Gothico, l i c 12, in tom ii p 31 [tom ii p 64, ed Bonn] The character of Grotius inclines me to believe that he has not substituted the Rhine for the Rhone (Hist Gothorum p 175) without the authority of some MS

6 Sidonius, l viii Epist 3 9, in tom i p 800 Jornandes de Rebus Geticis (c. 47, p 680) justifies in some measure this portrait of the Gothic hero

7 I use the familiar appellation of Clovis, from the Latin Chlodovechus or Chlodovæus But the Ch expresses only the German aspiration, and the true name is not different from Luduin or Lewis (Mém de l Academie des Inscriptions, tom xx. p 68)

8 Greg Turon l ii c 12, in tom ii p 168 Basina speaks the language of nature the Franks, who had seen her in their youth, might converse with Gregory in their old age, and the bishop of Tours could not wish to defame the mother of the first Christian king

9 The Abbé Dubos (Hist Critique de l'Etablissement de la Monarchie Françoise dans les Gaules, tom i p 630-650) has the merit of defining the primitive kingdom of Clovis and of ascertaining the genuine number of his subjects

10 Ecclesiam incultam ac negligentiâ civium Paganorum prætermissam, veprium densitate oppletam, etc Vit St Vedasti, in tom iii p 372 This description supposes that Arras was possessed by the Pagans many years before the baptism of Clovis

11 Gregory of Tours (l v c. i tom ii p 232) contrasts the poverty of Clovis with the wealth of his grandsons Yet Remigius (in tom iv p 52) mentions his paternas opes, as sufficient for the redemption of captives

12 See Gregory (l ii c 27 37, in tom iii p 175 181, 182) The famous story of the vase of Soissons explains both the power and character of Clovis As a point of controversy, it has been strangely tortured by Boulainvilliers Dubos and the other political antiquarians

13 The Duke of Nivernois a noble statesman, who has managed weighty and delicate negotiations ingeniously illustrates (Mém de l Acad des Inscriptions tom xx p 147-184) the political system of Clovis

14 M Biet (in a Dissertation which deserved the prize of the Academy of Soissons p 178-226) has accurately defined the nature and extent of the kingdom of Syagrius and his father but he too readily allows the slight evidence of Dubos (tom ii p 54-57) to deprive him of Beauvais and Amiens

15 I may observe that Fredegarius in his epitome of Gregory of Tours (tom ii p 398 [c 15]), has prudently substituted the name of Patricius for the incredible title of Rex Romanorum

16 Sidonius (l v Epist 5 in tom i p 794), who styles him the Solon the Amphion, of the barbarians, addresses this imaginary king in the tone of friendship and equality From such offices of arbitration, the crafty Deioces had raised himself to the throne of the Medes (Herodot l i c 96-100)

17 Campum sibi præparari jussit M Biet (p 226-251) has diligently ascertained this field of battle at Nogent, a Benedictine abbey, about ten miles to the north of Soissons The ground was marked by a circle of Pagan sepulchres and Clovis bestowed the adjacent lands of Leuilly and Coucy on the church of Rheims

18 See Cæsar Comment de Bell Gallic ii 4, in tom i p 220, and the Notitiæ, tom i p 126 The three Fabricæ of Soissons were, Scutaria, Balistaria, and Clinabaria The last supplied the complete armour of the heavy cuirassiers

19 The epithet must be confined to the circumstances and history cannot justify the French prejudice of Gregory (l ii c. 27, in tom ii p 175), ut Gothorum pavere mos est

20 Dubos has satisfied me (tom i p 277-286) that Gregory of Tours, his transcribers or his readers have repeatedly confounded the German kingdom of Thuringia beyond the Rhine and the Gallic city of Tongria on the Meuse, which was more anciently the country of the Eburones, and more recently the diocese of Liege

21 Populi habitantes juxta Lemannum lacum Alemanni dicuntur Servius, ad Virgil Georgic. iv 278 Dom Bouquet (tom i p 817) has only alleged the more recent and corrupt text of Isidore of Seville

22 Gregory of Tours sends St Lupicinus inter illa Jurensis deserti secreta, quæ, inter Burgundiam Alamanniamque sita, Aventicæ adjacent civitati in tom i p 648 M de Watteville (Hist de la Confédération Helvétique tom i p 9 10) has accurately defined the Helvetian limits of the duchy of Alemannia, and the Transjurane Burgundy They were commensurate with the dioceses of Constance and Avenche, or Lausanne and are still discriminated in modern Switzerland by the use of the German or French language

23 See Guilliman de Rebus Helveticis l i c 3 p 11 12 Within the ancient walls of Vindonissa the castle of Hapsburg the abbey of Konigsfield and the town of Bruck have successively arisen The philosophic traveller may compare the monuments of Roman conquest of feudal or Austrian tyranny of monkish superstition and of industrious freedom If he be truly a philosopher he will applaud the merit and happiness of his own times

24 Gregory of Tours (l ii c 30 37 in tom 176 177 182) the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 551) and the epistle of Theodoric (Cassiodor Variar l ii Ep 41 in tom iv p 4) represent the defeat of the Alemanni Some of their tribes settled in Rhætia under the protection of Theodoric whose successors ceded the colony and their country to the grandson of Clovis The state of the Alemanni under the Merovingian kings may be seen in Mascou (Hist of the Ancient Germans xi 8 etc Annotation xxxvi) and Guilliman (de Reb Helvet l ii c 10–12 p 72–80)

25 Clotilda or rather Gregory supposes that Clovis worshipped the gods of Greece and Rome The fact is incredible and the mistake only shows how completely in less than a century the national religion of the Franks had been abolished and even forgotten

26 Gregory of Tours relates the marriage and conversion of Clovis (l ii c 28–31 in tom ii p 175–178) Even Fredegarius or the nameless Epitomiser (in tom ii p 398–400) the author of the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 548–552) and Aimoin himself (l i c 13–16 in tom iii p 37–40) may be heard without disdain Tradition might long preserve some curious circumstances of these important transactions

27 A traveller who returned from Rheims to Auvergne had stolen a copy of his Declamations from the secretary or bookseller of the modest archbishop (Sidonius Apollinar l ix Epist 7) Four epistles of Remigius which are still extant (in tom iv p 51 52 53) do not correspond with the splendid praise of Sidonius

28 Hincmar one of the successors of Remigius (A D 845–88) has composed his Life (in tom iii p 373–380) The authority of ancient MSS of the church of Rheims might inspire some confidence which is destroyed however by the selfish and audacious fictions of Hincmar It is remarkable enough that Remigius who was consecrated at the age of twenty two (A D 457) filled the episcopal chair seventy four years (Pagi Critica in Baron tom ii p 384 572)

29 A vial (the Saint Ampoulle) of holy or rather celestial o l was brought down by a white dove for the baptism of Clovis and it is still used and renewed in the coronation of the kings of France Hincmar (he asp red to the primacy of Gaul) is the first author of this fable (in tom iii p 377) whose slight foundations the Abbé de Vertot (Mémoires de l Academie des Inscript ons tom ii p 619–633) has undermined with profound respect and consummate dexterity

30 Mitis depone colla Sicamber adora quod incendisti incende quod adorasti Greg Turon l ii c 31 in tom ii p 177

31 Si ego ib dem cum Francis meis fuissem injurias ejus vindicassem This rash expression which Gregory has prudently concealed is celebrated by Fredegarius (Epitom c 21 in tom ii p 400) Aimoin (l i c 16 in tom iii p 40) and the Chroniques de St Denys (L i c 20 in tom iii. p 171) as an admirable effusion of Christian zeal

32 Gregory (l ii c 40–43 in tom ii p 183–185) after coolly relating the repeated crimes and affected remorse of Clovis concludes perhaps undesignedly with a lesson which ambition will never hear— His ita transactis obiit

33 After the Gothic victory Clovis made rich offerings to St Martin of Tours He wished to redeem his war horse by the gift of one hundred pieces of gold but the enchanted steed could not move from the stable till the price of his redemption had been doubled This miracle provoked the king to exclaim Vere B Martinus est bonus in auxilio sed carus in negotio (Gesta Francorum in tom ii p 554, 555)

34 See the epistle from Pope Anastasius to the royal convert (in tom iv p 50 51) Avitus bishop of Vienne addressed Clovis on the same subject (p 49) and many of the Latin bishops would assure him of their joy and attachment

35 Instead of the Αρβόρυχ an unknown people who now appear in the text of Procopius [Bell. Goth l i c 12] Hadrian de Valois has restored the proper name of the Αρμόρ χοι and this easy correction has been almost universally approved Yet an unprejudiced reader would naturally suppose that Procopius means to describe a tribe of Germans in the alliance of Rome and not a confederacy of Gallic cities which had revolted from the empire

36 This important digression of Procopius (de Bell Gothic l i c 12 in tom ii p 29–36 [tom ii p 62 sqq ed Bonn]) illustrates the origin of the French monarchy Yet I must observe 1 That the Greek historian betrays an inexcusable ignorance of the geography of the West 2 That these treaties and privileges which should leave some lasting traces are totally invisible in Gregory of Tours the Salic laws etc

37 Regnum circa Rhodanum aut Ararium cum provinciâ Massiliensi retinebant Gr g Turon l ii c 32 in tom ii p 178 The province of Mar s illes as far as the Durance was afterwards ceded to the Ostrogoths and the signatures of twenty five bishops are supposed to represent the kingdom of Burgundy A D 519 (Concil Epaon in tom iv p 104 105) Yet I would except Vindonissa The bishop who lived under the Pagan Alemanni would naturally resort to the synods of the next Christian kingdom Mascou (in his four first annotations) has explained many circumstances relative to the Burgundian monarchy

38 Mascou (Hist of the Germans xi 10) who very reasonably distrusts the testimony of Gregory of Tours has produced a passage from Avitus (Epist v) to prove that Gundobald affected to deplore the tragic event which his subjects affected to applaud

39 See the original conference (in tom iv p 99–102) Avitus the principal actor and probably the secretary of the meeting was bishop of Vienne A short account of his person and works may be found in Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, tom v p 5-10)

40 Gregory of Tours (l iii c. 19, in tom ii p 197) indulges his genius, or rather transcribes some more eloquent writer, in the description of Dijon —a castle, which already deserved the title of a city It depended on the bishops of Langres till the twelfth century, and afterwards became the capital of the dukes of Burgundy Longuerue, Description de la France, part i p 280

41 The Epitomiser of Gregory of Tours (in tom ii p 401) has supplied this number of Franks, but he rashly supposes that they were cut in pieces by Gundobald The prudent Burgundian spared the soldiers of Clovis, and sent these captives to the king of the Visigoths, who settled them in the territory of Toulouse

42 In this Burgundian war I have followed Gregory of Tours (l ii c. 32, 33, in tom ii p 178, 179), whose narrative appears so incompatible with that of Procopius (de Bell Goth l i c. 12, in tom ii p 31, 32 [tom ii p 63, sqq, ed Bonn]), that some critics have supposed two different wars The Abbé Dubos (Hist Critique, etc, tom ii p 126-162) has distinctly represented the causes and the events

43 See his Life or legend (in tom iii p 402) A martyr! how strangely has that word been distorted from its original sense of a common witness! St Sigismond was remarkable for the cure of fevers

44 Before the end of the fifth century, the church of St Maurice, and his Thebaean legion, had rendered Agaunum a place of devout pilgrimage A promiscuous community of both sexes had introduced some deeds of darkness which were abolished (A D 515) by the regular monastery of Sigismond Within fifty years, his angels of light made a nocturnal sally to murder their bishop and his clergy See, in the Bibliothèque Raisonnée (tom xxxvi p 435-438), the curious remarks of a learned librarian of Geneva

45 Marius, bishop of Avenche (Chron in tom ii p 15), has marked the authentic dates, and Gregory of Tours (l iii c 5 6, in tom ii p 188 189) has expressed the principal facts, of the life of Sigismond and the conquest of Burgundy Procopius (in tom ii p 34 [tom ii p 65 ed Bonn]) and Agathias (in tom ii p 49) show their remote and imperfect knowledge

46 Gregory of Tours (l ii c. 37, in tom ii p 181) inserts the short but persuasive speech of Clovis Valde moleste fero quod hi Ariani partem teneant Galliarum (the author of the Gesta Francorum in tom ii p 553 adds the precious epithet of [illegible]), eamus cum Dei adjutorio et superatis eis redigamus terram in ditionem nostram

47 Tunc rex projecit a se in directum Bipennem suam quod est francisca etc (Gesta Franc in tom ii p 554) The form and use of this weapon are clearly described by Procopius (in tom ii p 37 [Bell Goth l ii c [illegible] tom ii p 247, 248, ed Bonn]) Examples of its [illegible] appellation in Latin and French may be found in the Glossary of Ducange and the large Dictionnaire de Trevoux

48 It is singular enough that some important and authentic facts should be found in a Life of Quintianus, composed in rhyme in the old patois of Rouergue (Dubos, Hist Critique, etc., tom ii p 179)

49 Quamvis fortitudini vestrae confidentiam tribuat parentum vestrorum innumerabilis multitudo, quamvis Attilam potentem reminiscamini Visigotharum viribus inclinatum, tamen quia populorum ferocia corda longa pace mollescunt, cavete subito in aleam mittere, quos constat tantis temporibus exercitia non habere. Such was the salutary but fruitless advice of peace, of reason, and of Theodoric (Cassiodor l iii Ep 2 [ed Rotom 1679])

50 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xv c 13) mentions and approves the law of the Visigoths (l ix tit 2, in tom iv p 425), which obliged all masters to arm and send or lead into the field a tenth of their slaves

51 This mode of divination, by accepting as an omen the first sacred words which in particular circumstances should be presented to the eye or ear, was derived from the Pagans and the Psalter or Bible was substituted to the poems of Homer and Virgil From the fourth to the fourteenth century, these sortes sanctorum as they are styled, were repeatedly condemned by the decrees of councils, and repeatedly practised by kings, bishops, and saints See a curious dissertation of the Abbé du Resnel in the Mémoires de l Academie, tom. xix p 287-310

52 After correcting the text or excusing the mistake of Procopius, who places the defeat of Alaric near Carcassonne, we may conclude, from the evidence of Gregory, Fortunatus and the author of the Gesta Francorum that the battle was fought in campo Vocladensi, on the banks of the Clain, about ten miles to the south of Poitiers Clovis overtook and attacked the Visigoths near Vivonne and the victory was decided near a village still named Champagné St Hilaire See the Dissertations of the Abbé le Bœuf tom i p 304-331

53 Angoulême is in the road from Poitiers to Bordeaux and although Gregory delays the siege I can more readily believe that he confounded the order of history than that Clovis neglected the rules of war

54 Pyrenaeos montes usque Perpinianum subjecit is the expression of Rorico which betrays his recent date since Perpignan did not exist before the tenth century (Marca Hispanica, p 458) This florid and fabulous writer (perhaps a monk of Amiens—see the Abbé le Bœuf Mém de l Académie tom xvii p 228-245) relates in the [illegible] character of a shepherd the general history of his countrymen the Franks but his narrative ends with the death of Clovis

55 The author of the Gesta Francorum positively affirms that Clovis fixed a body of Franks

the Saintonge and Bourdelois and he is not injudiciously followed by Ronco electos milites atque fortissimos cum parvulis atque mulieribus Yet it should seem that they soon mingled with the Romans of Aquitain till Charlemagne introduced a more numerous and powerful colony (Dubos Hist Critique tom ii p 215)

56 In the composition of the Gothic war I have used the following materials with due regard to their unequal value —Four epistles from Theodoric king of Italy (Cassiodor l iii Epist 1–4 in tom iv p 3–5) Procopius (de Bell Goth l i c 12 in tom. ii p 32 33) Gregory of Tours (l ii c 35 36 37 in tom ii p 181–183) Jornandes (de Reb Geticis c 58 in tom ii p 28), Fortunatus (in Vit St Hilarii in tom iii p 380) Isidore (in Chron Goth in tom ii p 702) the Epitome of Gregory of Tours (in tom ii p 401) the author of the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 553–555) the Fragments of Fredegarius (in tom ii p 463) Aimoin (l i c 20 in tom iii p 41 4?) and Rorico (l iv in tom iii p 14–19)

57 The Fasti of Italy would naturally reject a consul the enemy of their sovereign but any ingenious hypothesis that might explain the silence of Constantinople and Egypt (the Chronicle of Marcellinus and the Paschal) is overturned by the similar silence of Marius bishop of Avenche who composed his Fasti in the kingdom of Burgundy If the evidence of Gregory of Tours were less weighty and positive (l ii c 38 in tom ii p 183) I could believe that Clovis like Odoacer received the lasting title and honours of Patrician (Pagi Critica tom ii p 474 492)

58 Under the Merovingian kings Marseilles still imported from the East paper wine oil linen silk precious stones spices etc The Gauls or Franks traded to Syria and the Syrians were established in Gaul See M de Guignes Mém de l Académie tom xxxvii p 471–475

59 Οὐ γάρ ποτε ὤο το Γαλλίας ξ τῷ ἀσφαλει κεκτῆσθαι Φραγγ μὴ το αὐ ο ρα ορος τὸ ἔργον ἐπισφραγίσα ος τουτὸ] γε This strong declaration of Procopius (de Bell. Gothic l iii cap 33 in tom ii p 41 [tom. ii p 417 ed Bonn]) would almost suffice to justify the Abbé Dubos

60 The Franks who probably used the mints of Trèves Lyons and Arles imitated the coinage of the Roman emperors of seventy two solidi or pieces to the pound of gold But as the Franks established only a decuple proportion of gold and silver ten shillings will be a sufficient valuation of their solidus of gold It was the common standard of the barbaric fines and contained forty denarii or s lver threepences Twelve of these denarii made a solidus or shilling the twentieth part of the ponderal and numeral livre or pound of silver which has been so strangely reduced in modern France. See Le Blanc Traité Historique des Monnoyes de France p 37–43 etc.

61 Agathias in tom ii p 47 [p 17 ed Bonn] Gregory of Tours exhibits a very different picture. Perhaps it would not be easy within the same historical space, to find more vice and less virtue. We are continually shocked by the union of savage and corrupt manners

62 M de Foncemagne has traced in a correct and elegant dissertation (Mém de l Académie tom viii p 505–528) the extent and limits of the French monarchy

63 The Abbé Dubos (Histoire Critique tom. i p 29–36) has truly and agreeably represented the slow progress of these studies and he observes that Gregory of Tours was only once printed before the year 1560 According to the complaint of Heineccius (Opera tom iii Sylloge iii p 248 etc) Germany received with indifference and contempt the codes of barbaric laws which were published by Heroldus Lindebrogius etc At present those laws (as far as they relate to Gaul) the history of Gregory of Tours and all the monuments of the Merovingian race appear in a pure and perfect state in the first four volumes of the Historians of France

64 In the space of [about] thirty years (1728–1765) this interesting subject has been agitated by the free spirit of the Count de Boulainvilliers (Mémoires Historiques sur l Etat de la France particularly tom i p 15–49) the learned ingenuity of the Abbé Dubos (Histoire Critique de l Etablissement de la Monarchie Françoise dans les Gaules, 2 vols in 4to) the comprehensive genius of the President de Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws particularly l xxviii xxx xxxi) and the good sense and diligence of the Abbé de Mably (Observations sur l Histoire de France 2 vols 12mo)

65 I have derived much instruction from two learned works of Heineccius—the History and the Elements of the Germanic law In a judicious preface to the Elements he considers and tries to excuse the defects of that barbarous jurisprudence

66 Latin appears to have been the original language of the Salic law It was probably composed in the beginning of the fifth century before the era (A D 421) of the real or fabulous Pharamond The preface mentions the four cantons which produced the four legislators and many provinces—Franconia Saxony Hanover Brabant etc.—have claimed them as their own See an excellent Dissertation of Heineccius de Lege Salica tom iii Sylloge iii p 247–267

67 Eginhard in Vit Caroli Magni c 29 in tom v p 100 By these two laws most critics understand the Salic and the Ripuarian The former extended from the Carbonarian forest to the Loire (tom iv p 151 [Lex Sal. tit L.]) and the latter might be obeyed from the same forest to the Rhine (tom iv p 232)

68 Consult the ancient and modern prefaces of the several codes in the fourth volume of the Historians of France The original prologue to the Salic law expresses (though in a foreign dialect) the genuine spirit of the Franks more forcibly than the ten books of Gregory of Tours.

69. The Ripuarian law declares and defines this indulgence in favour of the plaintiff (tit xxxi in tom iv p 240), and the same toleration is understood or expressed in all the codes except that of the Visigoths of Spain Tanta diversitas legum (says Agobard in the ninth century) quanta non solum in [singulis] regionibus, aut civitatibus, sed etiam in multis domibus habetur Nam plerumque contingit ut simul eant aut sedeant quinque homines, et nullus eorum communem legem cum altero habeat (in tom vi p 356) He foolishly proposes to introduce an uniformity of law as well as of faith

70 Inter Romanos negotia causarum Romanis legibus præcipimus terminari Such are the words of a general constitution promulgated by Clotaire, the son of Clovis, and sole monarch of the Franks (in tom iv p 116), about the year 560

71 This liberty of choice has been aptly deduced (The Spirit of Laws, l xxviii 2) from a constitution of Lothaire I (Leg Langobard l ii tit lvii in Codex Lindebrog p 664), though the example is too recent and partial. From a various reading in the Salic law (tit xliv not xlv), the Abbé de Mably (tom i p 290–293) has conjectured that at first a barbarian only, and afterwards any man (consequently a Roman), might live according to the law of the Franks I am sorry to offend this ingenious conjecture by observing that the stricter sense (barbarum) is expressed in the reformed copy of Charlemagne, which is confirmed by the Royal and Wolfenbüttel MSS The looser interpretation (hominem) is authorised only by the MS of Fulda, from whence Heroldus published his edition See the four original texts of the Salic law, in tom iv p. 147, 173, 196, 220

72 In the heroic times of Greece, the guilt of murder was expiated by a pecuniary satisfaction to the family of the deceased (Feithius Antiquitat Homer l ii c. 8) Heineccius, in his preface to the Elements of Germanic Law, favourably suggests that at Rome and Athens homicide was only punished with exile It is true but exile was a capital punishment for a citizen of Rome or Athens

73 This proportion is fixed by the Salic (tit xliv in tom iv p 147) and the Ripuarian (tit vii xi xxxvi in tom iv p 237, 241) laws, but the latter does not distinguish any difference of Romans Yet the orders of the clergy are placed above the Franks themselves, and the Burgundians and Alemanni between the Franks and the Romans

74 The Antrustiones qui in truste Dominica sunt, leudi, fideles, undoubtedly represent the first order of Franks, but it is a question whether their rank was personal or hereditary The Abbé de Mably (tom i p 334–347) is not displeased to mortify the pride of birth (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 25) by dating the origin of French nobility from the reign of Clotaire II (A D 615)

75 See the Burgundian laws (tit ii in tom iv p 257) the code of the Visigoths (l vi tit v in tom iv p 393), and the constitution of Childebert, not of Paris, but most evidently of Austrasia (in tom iv p 112) Their premature severity was sometimes rash and excessive Childebert condemned not only murderers but robbers, quomodo sine lege involavit, sine lege moriatur, and even the negligent judge was involved in the same sentence The Visigoths abandoned an unsuccessful surgeon to the family of his deceased patient, ut quod de eo facere voluerint habeant potestatem (l xi tit i in tom iv p 435)

76 See in the sixth volume of the works of Heineccius, the Elementa Juris Germanici, l ii p ii No 261, 262, 280–283 Yet some vestiges of these pecuniary compositions for murder have been traced in Germany as late as the sixteenth century

77 The whole subject of the Germanic judges, and their jurisdiction, is copiously treated by Heineccius (Element Jur Germ l iii No 1–72) I cannot find any proof that, under the Merovingian race, the scabini, or assessors, were chosen by the people

78 Gregor Turon l viii c. 9, in tom ii p 316 Montesquieu observes (Esprit des Loix, l xxviii c 13) that the Salic law did not admit these negative proofs so universally established in the barbaric codes Yet this obscure concubine (Fredegundis), who became the wife of the grandson of Clovis, must have followed the Salic law

79 Muratori, in the Antiquities of Italy, has given two Dissertations (xxxviii xxxix) on the judgments of God It was expected that fire would not burn the innocent, and that the pure element of water would not allow the guilty to sink into its bosom

80 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxviii c 17) has condescended to explain and excuse "la manière de penser de nos pères" on the subject of judicial combats He follows this strange institution from the age of Gundobald to that of St Lewis and the philosopher is sometimes lost in the legal antiquarian

81 In a memorable duel at Aix la Chapelle (A D 820), before the emperor Lewis the Pious his biographer observes, secundum legem propriam utpote quia uterque Gothus erat equestri pugnâ [prœlio] congressus est (Vit Lud Pii c 33, in tom vi p 103) Ermoldus Nigellus (l iii 543–628 in tom vi p 48–50), who describes the duel, admires the ars nova of fighting on horseback, which was unknown to the Franks

82 In his original edict published at Lyons (A D 501) Gundobald establishes and justifies the use of judicial combat (Leg Burgund tit xlv in tom ii p 267 268) Three hundred years afterwards Agobard bishop of Lyons solicited Lewis the Pious to abolish the law of an Arian tyrant (in tom vi p 356 358) He relates the conversation of Gundobald and Avitus

homicidia injusta, et crudeles ac perversi eventus judiciorum [tom vi p 357] Like a prudent rhetorician he suppresses the legal privilege of hiring champions

84 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws xxviii c 14) who understands why the judicial combat was admitted by the Burgundians Ripuarians Alemanni Bavarians Lombards Thuringians Frisons and Saxons is satisfied (and Agobard seems to countenance the assertion) that it was not allowed by the Salic law Yet the same custom at least in cases of treason is mentioned by Ermoldus Nigellus (l iii 543 in tom vi p 48) and the anonymous biographer of Lewis the Pious (c 46 in tom vi p 112) as the mos antiquus Francorum more Francis solito etc expressions too general to exclude the noblest of their tribes

85 Cæsar de Bell Gall l i c 31 in tom i p 213

86 The obscure hints of a division of lands occasionally scattered in the laws of the Burgundians (tit liv No 1 2 in tom iv p 271 272) and Visigoths (l x tit i No 8 9 16 in tom iv p 428 429 430) are skilfully explained by the President Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 7 8 9) I shall only add that among the Goths the division seems to have been ascertained by the judgment of the neighbourhood that the barbarians frequently usurped the remaining third and that the Romans might recover their right unless they were barred by a prescription of fifty years

87 It is singular enough that the President de Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 7) and the Abbé de Mably (Observations tom i p 21 22) agree in this strange supposition of arbitrary and private rapine. The Count de Boulainvilliers (Etat de la France tom i p 22 23) shows a strong understanding through a cloud of ignorance and prejudice

88 See the rustic edict or rather code of Charlemagne which contains seventy distinct and minute regulations of that great monarch (in tom v p 652–657) He requires an account of the horns and skins of the goats allows his fish to be sold and carefully directs that the larger villas (Capitaneæ) shall maintain one hundred hens and thirty geese and the smaller (Mansionales) fifty hens and twelve geese Mabillon (de Re Diplomaticâ) has investigated the names the number and the situation of the Merovingian villas

89 From a passage of the Burgundian law (tit i No 4 [3] in tom. iv p 257) it is evident that a deserving son might expect to hold the lands which his father had received from the royal bounty of Gundobald The Burgundians would firmly maintain their privilege and their example might encourage the beneficiaries of France

90 The revolutions of the benefices and fiefs are clearly fixed by the Abbé de Mably His accurate distinction of times gives him a merit to which even Montesquieu is a stranger

91 See the Salic law (tit. lxii. in tom. iv p 156) The origin and nature of these Salic lands, which in times of ignorance were perfectly understood now perplex our most learned and sagacious critics

92 Many of the two hundred and six miracles of St Martin (Greg Turon in Maximâ Bibliothecâ Patrum tom xi p 896–932) were repeatedly performed to punish sacrilege Audite hæc omnes (exclaims the bishop of Tours) potestatem habentes after relating how some horses ran mad that had been turned into a sacred meadow

93 Heinec Element Jur German l ii. p i No 8

94 Jonas bishop of Orleans (A D 821–826 Cave Hist Litteraria p 443) censures the legal tyranny of the nobles Pro feris quas cura hominum non aluit sed Deus in commune mortalibus ad utendum concessit pauperes a potentioribus spoliantur flagellantur ergastulis detruduntur et multa alia patiuntur Hoc enim qui faciunt, lege mundi se facere juste posse contendunt De Institutione Laicorum l ii c 23 apud Thomassin Discipline de l Eglise tom iii p 1348

95 On a mere suspicion Chundo a chamberlain of Gontram king of Burgundy was stoned to death (Greg Turon l x c. 10 in tom ii. p 369) John of Salisbury (Policrat l. i c 4) asserts the rights of nature and exposes the cruel practice of the twelfth century See Heineccius Elem. Jur Germ l. ii p i, No 51–57

96 The custom of enslaving prisoners of war was totally extinguished in the thirteenth century by the prevailing influence of Christianity but it might be proved from frequent passages of Gregory of Tours etc that it was practised without censure under the Merovingian race and even Grotius himself (de Jure Belli et Pacis l iii c. 7) as well as his commentator Barbeyrac have laboured to reconcile it with the laws of nature and reason

97 The state professions etc of the German, Italian and Gallic slaves during the middle ages, are explained by Heineccius (Element Jur Germ. l i No 28–47) Muratori (Dissertat xiv xv) Ducange (Gloss sub voce Servi) and the Abbé de Mably (Observations tom ii p 3 etc p 237 etc)

98 Gregory of Tours (l vi c 45 in tom ii p 289) relates a memorable example in which Chilperic only abused the private rights of a master Many families which belonged to his domus fiscales in the neighbourhood of Paris were forcibly sent away into Spain

99 Licentiam habeatis mihi qualemcunque volueritis disciplinam ponere vel venumdare aut quod vobis placuerit de me facere Marculf Formul l ii 28 in tom iv p 497 The Formula of Lindenbrogius (p 559) and that of Anjou (p 565) are to the same effect Gregory of Tours (l. vii c 45 in tom ii p 311) speaks of many persons who sold themselves for bread in a great famine

in Cæsar [The Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans]), yet he relates his unsuccessful siege of Gergovia with less frankness than we might expect from a great man to whom victory was familiar He acknowledges, however, that in one attack he lost forty six centurions and seven hundred men (de Bell Gallico, l vi [vii] c 44–53, in tom i p 270–272)

101 Audebant se quondam fratres Latio dicere, et sanguine ab Iliaco populos computare (Sidon Apollinar l vii Epist 7, in tom i p 799) I am not informed of the degrees and circumstances of this fabulous pedigree

102 Either the first or second partition among the sons of Clovis had given Berry to Childebert (Greg Turon l iii c 12, in tom ii p 192) Velim (said he), Arvernam Lemanem, quæ tantæ jo*cunditatis gratiâ refulgere dicitur, oculis cernere* (l iii c 9, p 191) The face of the country was concealed by a thick fog when the king of Paris made his entry into Clermont

103 For the description of Auvergne, see Sidonius (l iv Epist 21, in tom i p 793), with the notes of Savaron and Sirmond (p 279 and 51 of their respective editions) Boulainvilliers (Etat de la France, tom ii p 242–268), and the Abbé de la Longuerue (Description de la France, part i p 132–139)

104 Furorem gentium, quæ de ulteriore Rheni amnis parte venerant, superare non poterat (Greg Turon l iv c 50, in tom ii 229), was the excuse of another king of Austrasia (A D 574) for the ravages which his troops committed in the neighbourhood of Paris

105 From the name and situation, the Benedictine editors of Gregory of Tours (in tom ii p 192) have fixed this fortress at a place named Chastel Merliac, two miles from Mauriac, in the Upper Auvergne In this description I translate infra as if I read intra the two prepositions are perpetually confounded by Gregory or his transcribers and the sense must always decide

106 See these revolutions and wars of Auvergne in Gregory of Tours (l ii c. 37, in tom ii p 183, and l iii c. 9 12, 13 p 191, 192, de Miraculis St Julian c 13 in tom ii p 466) He frequently betrays his extraordinary attention to his native country

107 The story of Attalus is related by Gregory of Tours (l iii c. 15 in tom ii p 193–195) His editor the P Ruinart confounds this Attalus who was a youth (puer) in the year 532 with a friend of Sidonius of the same name who was count of Autun fifty or sixty years before Such an error, which cannot be imputed to ignorance is excused in some degree by its own magnitude

108 This Gregory, the great-grandfather of Gregory of Tours (in tom ii p 197, 490) lived ninety two years of which he passed forty as count of Autun and thirty two as bishop of Langres According to the poet Fortunatus he displayed equal merit in these different stations —

Nobilis antiquâ decurrens prole parentum,
Nobilior gestis, nunc super astra manet
Arbiter ante ferox, dein pius ipse sacerdos,
Quos domuit judex, fovit amore patris

109 As M de Valois and the P Ruinart are determined to change the Mosella of the text into Mosa, it becomes me to acquiesce in the alteration Yet, after some examination of the topography, I could defend the common reading

110 The parents of Gregory (Gregorius Florentius Georgius) were of noble extraction (natalibus illustres), and they possessed large estates (latifundia) both in Auvergne and Burgundy He was born in the year 539, was consecrated bishop of Tours in 573, and died in 593 or 595, soon after he had terminated his history See his Life by Odo, abbot of Clugny (in tom ii p 129–135), and a new Life in the Mémoires de l Académie, etc., tom xxvi p 598–637

111 Decedente atque immo potius pereunte ab urbibus Gallicanis liberalium culturâ literarum, etc (in præfat in tom ii p 137), is the complaint of Gregory himself, which he fully verifies by his own work His style is equally devoid of elegance and simplicity In a conspicuous station he still remained a stranger to his own age and country and in a prolix work (the five last books contain ten years) he has omitted almost everything that posterity desires to learn I have tediously acquired, by a painful perusal the right of pronouncing this unfavourable sentence

112 The Abbé de Mably (tom i p 247–267) has diligently confirmed this opinion of the President de Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c. 13)

113 See Dubos, Hist Critique de la Monarchie Françoise, tom ii l vi c 9, 10 The French antiquarians establish as a principle that the Romans and barbarians may be distinguished by their names Their names undoubtedly form a reasonable presumption yet, in reading Gregory of Tours I have observed Gondulphus of Senatorian or Roman extraction (l vi c. 11, in tom ii p 273), and Claudius, a barbarian (l vii c 29 p 303)

114 Eunius Mummolus is repeatedly mentioned by Gregory of Tours, from the fourth (c. 42, p 224) to the seventh (c 40 p 310) book The computation by talents is singular enough but if Gregory attached any meaning to that obsolete word, the treasures of Mummolus must have exceeded £100,000 sterling

115 See Fleury Discours iii sur l Histoire Ecclésiastique

116 The bishop of Tours himself has recorded the complaint of Chilperic the grandson of Clovis Ecce pauper remansit fiscus noster, ecce divitiæ nostræ ad ecclesias sunt translatæ nulli penitus nisi soli episcopi regnant (l vi c 46, in tom ii p 291)

117 See the Ripuarian Code (tit xxxvi in tom iv p 241) The Salic law does not provide for the safety of the clergy and we might suppose, on the

behalf of the more civilised tribe that they had not foreseen such an impious act as the murder of a priest Yet Prætextatus archbishop of Rouen was assassinated by the order of queen Fredegundis before the altar (Greg Turon l viii c 31 in tom ii p 326)

118 M Bonamy (Mém de l Académie des Inscriptions tom xxiv p 582–670) has ascertained the Lingua Romana Rustica which through the medium of the Romance has gradually been polished into the actual form of the French language Under the Carlovingian race the kings and nobles of France still understood the dialect of their German ancestors

119 Ce beau systême a été trouvé dans les bois Montesquieu The Spirit of Laws l xi c 6

120 See the Abbé de Mably Observations etc tom i p 34–56 It should seem that the institution of national assemblies which are coeval with the French nation has never been congenial to its temper

121 Gregory of Tours (l viii c 30 in tom ii p 325–326) relates with much indifference the crimes the reproof and the apology Nullus Regem metuit nullus Ducem nullus Comitem reveretur et si fortassis alicui ista displicent et ea pro longævitate vitæ estræ emendare conatur statim seditio in populo statim tumultus exoritur et in tantum unusquisque contra seniorem sævâ intentione grassatur ut vix se credat evadere si tandem silere nequiverit

122 Spain in these dark ages has been peculiarly unfortunate The Franks had a Gregory of Tours the Saxons or Angles a Bede the Lombards a Paul Warnefrid etc But the history of the Visigoths is contained in the short and imperfect Chronicles of Isidore of Seville and John of Biclar

123 Such are the complaints of St Boniface the apostle of Germany and the reformer of Gaul (in tom iv p 94) The fourscore years which he deplores of licence and corruption would seem to insinuate that the barbarians were admitted into the clergy about the year 660

124 The acts of the councils of Toledo are still the most authentic records of the church and constitution of Spain The following passages are particularly important —iii 17 18 iv 75 v 2 3 4 5 8 vi 11 12 13 14 17 18 vii 1 xiii 2 3 6 I have found Mascou (Hist of the Ancient Germans xv 29 and Annotations xxvi and xxxiii) and Ferreras (Hist Générale de l Espagne tom ii) very useful and accurate guides

125 The Code of the Visigoths regularly divided into twelve books has been correctly published by Dom Bouquet (in tom iv p 283–460) It has been treated by the President De Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxviii c 1) with excessive severity I dislike the style I detest the superstition but I shall presume to think that the civil jurisprudence displays a more civilised and enlightened state of society than that of the Burgundians or even of the Lombards

126 See Gildas de Excidio Britanniæ c 11–25 p 4–9 edit Gale Nennius Hist Britonum c 28 35–65 p 105–115 edit Gale Bede Hist Ecclesiast Gentis Anglorum l i c 12–16 p 49–53 c 22 p 58 edit Smith Chron Saxonicum p 11–13 etc edit Gibson The Anglo-Saxon laws were published by Wilkins London 1731 in folio and the Leges Wallicæ by Wotton and Clarke London 1730 in folio

127 The laborious Mr Carte and the ingenious Mr Whitaker are the two modern writers to whom I am principally indebted The particular historian of Manchester embraces under that obscure title a subject almost as extensive as the general history of England

128 This invitation which may derive some countenance from the loose expressions of Gildas and Bede is framed into a regular story by Witikind a Saxon monk of the tenth century (see Cousin Hist de l Empire d Occident tom ii p 356) Rapin and even Hume have too freely used this suspicious evidence without regarding the precise and probable testimony of Nennius Interea venerunt tres Chiulæ à Germaniâ in exilio pulsæ in quibus erant Hors et Hengist [c 28]

129 Nennius imputes to the Saxons the murder of three hundred British chiefs a crime not unsuitable to their savage manners But we are not obliged to believe (see Jeffrey of Monmouth l viii c 9–12) that Stonehenge is their monument which the giants had formerly transported from Africa to Ireland and which was removed to Britain by the order of Ambrosius and the art of Merlin

130 All these tribes are expressly enumerated by Bede (l i c 15 p 52 l v c 9 p 190) and though I have considered Mr Whitaker s remarks (Hist of Manchester vol ii p 538–543) I do not perceive the absurdity of supposing that the Frisians etc were mingled with the Anglo-Saxons.

131 Bede has enumerated seven kings—two Saxons a Jute and four Angles—who successively acquired in the heptarchy an indefinite supremacy of power and renown But their reign was the effect not of law but of conquest and he observes, in similar terms that one of them subdued the Isles of Man and Anglesey and that another imposed a tribute on the Scots and Picts (Hist Eccles l ii c 5 p 83)

132 See Gildas de Excidio Britanniæ c i p i edit Gale

133 Mr Whitaker (History of Manchester vol. ii p 503 516) has smartly exposed this glaring absurdity which had passed unnoticed by the general historians as they were hastening to more interesting and important events

134 At Beran birig or Barbury castle near Marlborough The Saxon Chronicle assigns the name and date Camden (Britannia vol i p 128) ascertains the place and Henry of Huntingdon (Scriptores post Bedam p 314) relates the circumstances of this battle They are probable and char

racteristic, and the historians of the twelfth century might consult some materials that no longer exist

135 Cornwall was finally subdued by Athelstan (A D 927–941), who planted an English colony at Exeter, and confined the Britons beyond the river Tamar See William of Malmesbury, l ii in the Scriptores post Bedam, p 50 The spirit of the Cornish knights was degraded by servitude and it should seem, from the romance of Sir Tristram, that their cowardice was almost proverbial

136 The establishment of the Britons in Gaul is proved in the sixth century by Procopius [Bell Goth iv 20], Gregory of Tours, the second council of Tours (A D 567), and the least suspicious of their chronicles and lives of saints The subscription of a bishop of the Britons to the first council of Tours (A D 461, or rather 481), the army of Riothamus, and the loose declamation of Gildas (alii transmarinas petebant regiones, c 25, p 8), may countenance an emigration as early as the middle of the fifth century Beyond that era the Britons of Armorica can be found only in romance and I am surprised that Mr Whitaker (Genuine History of the Britons, p 214–221) should so faithfully transcribe the gross ignorance of Carte, whose venial errors he has so rigorously chastised

137 The antiquities of Bretagne, which have been the subject even of political controversy, are illustrated by Hadrian Valesius (Notitia Galliarum, sub voce Britannia Cismarina, p 98–100), M d'Anville (Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, Corisopiti, Curiosolites, Osismii, Vorganium, p 248, 258, 508, 720, and Etats de l Europe, p 76–80), Longuerue (Description de la France tom i p 84–94), and the Abbé de Vertot (Hist Critique de l Etablissement des Bretons dans les Gaules, 2 vols in 12mo Paris 1720) I may assume the merit of examining the original evidence which they have produced

138 Bede, who in his chronicle (p 28) places Ambrosius under the reign of Zeno (A D 474–491), observes that his parents had been 'purpurâ indutı' which he explains, in his ecclesiastical history, by 'regium nomen et insigne ferentibus' (l i c. 16, p 53) The expression of Nennius (c 44 p 110, edit Gale) is still more singular 'Unus de consulibus gentis Romanicæ est pater meus'

139 By the unanimous though doubtful conjecture of our antiquarians Ambrosius is confounded with Natanleod who (A D 508) lost his own life and five thousand of his subjects in a battle against Cerdic the West Saxon (Chron Saxon p 17, 18)

140 As I am a stranger to the Welsh bards Myrdhin, Llomarch and Taliessin my faith in the existence and exploits of Arthur principally rests on the simple and circumstantial testimony of Nennius (Hist Brit c 62 63 p 114) Mr Whitaker (Hist of Manchester, vol ii p 31–71) has framed an interesting and even probable narrative of the wars of Arthur [illegible] to allow the reality of the round table

141 The progress of romance and the state of learning in the middle ages are illustrated by Mr Thomas Warton, with the taste of a poet and the minute diligence of an antiquarian I have derived much instruction from the two learned dissertations prefixed to the first volume of his History of English Poetry

142 Hoc anno (490) Ælla et Cissa obsederunt Andredes Ceaster, et interfecerunt omnes qui id incolerent, adeo ut ne unus Brito ibi superstes fuerit (Chron Saxon p 15), an expression more dreadful in its simplicity than all the vague and tedious lamentations of the British Jeremiah

143 Andredes Ceaster, or Anderida, is placed by Camden (Britannia, vol i p 258) at Newenden, in the marshy grounds of Kent, which might be formerly covered by the sea, and on the edge of the great forest (Anderida) which overspread so large a portion of Hampshire and Sussex

144 Dr Johnson affirms that few English words are of British extraction Mr Whitaker, who understands the British language, has discovered more than three thousand, and actually produces a long and various catalogue (vol ii p 235–329) It is possible indeed, that many of these words may have been imported from the Latin or Saxon into the native idiom of Britain

145 In the beginning of the seventh century the Franks and the Anglo-Saxons mutually under*stood each other's language, which was derived* from the same Teutonic root (Bede l i c 25, p 60)

146 After the first generation of Italian or Scottish missionaries, the dignities of the church were filled with Saxon proselytes

147 Carte's History of England vol i p 195 He quotes the British historians but I much fear that Jeffrey of Monmouth (l vi c 15) is his only witness

148 Bede, Hist Ecclesiast l i c. 15 p 52 The fact is probable and well attested yet such was the loose intermixture of the German tribes that we find, in a subsequent period, the law of the Angli and Warini of Germany (Lindenbrog Codex p 479–486)

149 See Dr Henry's useful and laborious History of Great Britain vol ii p 388

150 Quicquid (says John of Tinemouth) inter Tynam et Tesam fluvios extitit sola eremi vastitudo tunc temporis fuit et [illegible] nullius ditioni servivit, eo quod sola indomitorum et silvestrium animalium spelunca et habitatio fuit (apud Carte vol i p 195) From [illegible] Nicholson English Historical Library, p [illegible] I understand that fair copies of John of Tinemouth's [illegible] are preserved in the libraries of Oxford Lambeth etc

151 See the mission of [illegible] in Bede, Hist Eccles l iv c [illegible] p [illegible]

152 From the [illegible] of Bede (l [illegible] p [illegible]) and William of Malmesbury (l [illegible] p [illegible]) it appears that the Anglo-Saxons [illegible]

the first to the last age persisted in this unnatural practice Their youths were publicly sold in the market of Rome

153 According to the laws of Ina they could not be lawfully sold beyond the seas

154 The life of a Wallus or Cambricus homo who possessed a hyde of land is fixed at 120 shillings by the same laws (of Ina tit xxxii in Leg Anglo-Saxon p 20) which allowed 200 shillings for a free Saxon and 1200 for a Thane (see likewise Leg Anglo-Saxon p 71) We may observe that these legislators the West Saxons and Mercians continued their British conquests after they became Christians The laws of the four kings of Kent do not condescend to notice the existence of any subject Britons

155 See Carte s Hist of England vol i p 278

156 At the conclusion of his history (A D 731) Bede describes the ecclesiastical state of the island and censures the implacable though impotent hatred of the Britons against the English nation and the catholic church (l v c 23 p 219)

157 Mr Pennant s Tour in Wales (p 426–449) has furnished me with a curious and interesting account of the Welsh bards In the year 1568 a session was held at Caerwys by the special command of queen Elizabeth and regular degrees in vocal and instrumental music were conferred on fifty five minstrels The prize (a silver harp) was adjudged by the Mostyn family

158 Regio longe lateque diffusa milite magis quam credibile sit referta Partibus equidem in illis miles unus quinquaginta generat sortitus more barbaro denas aut amplius uxores This reproach of William of Poitiers (in the Historians of France tom xi p 88) is disclaimed by the Benedictine editors

159 Giraldus Cambrensis confines this gift of bold and ready eloquence to the Romans the French and the Britons The malicious Welshman insinuates that the English taciturnity might possibly be the effect of their servitude under the Normans

160 The picture of Welsh and Armorican manners is drawn from Giraldus (Descript Cambriæ c 6–15 inter Script Camden p 886–891) and the authors quoted by the Abbé de Vertot (Hist Critique tom ii p 259–266)

161 See Procopius de Bell Gothic l iv c 20 p 620–625 [ed Paris tom ii p 559 sqq ed Bonn] The Greek historian is himself so confounded by the wonders which he relates that he weakly attempts to distinguish the islands of Brittia and Britain which he has identified by so many inseparable circumstances

162 Theodebert grandson of Clovis and king of Austrasia was the most powerful and warlike prince of the age and this remarkable adventure may be placed between the years 534 and 547 the extreme terms of his reign His sister Theudechildis retired to Sens where she founded monasteries and distributed alms (see the notes of the Benedictine editors in tom ii p 216) If we may credit the praises of Fortunatus (l vi carm 5 in tom ii p 507) Radiger was deprived of a most valuable wife

163 Perhaps she was the sister of one of the princes or chiefs of the Angles who landed in 527 and the following years between the Humber and the Thames and gradually founded the kingdoms of East Anglia and Mercia The English writers are ignorant of her name and existence but Procopius may have suggested to Mr Rowe the character and situation of Rodogune in the tragedy of the Royal Convert

164 In the copious history of Gregory of Tours we cannot find any traces of hostile or friendly intercourse between France and England except in the marriage of the daughter of Caribert king of Paris quam in Cantia regis cujusdam filius matrimonio copulavit (l ix c 26 in tom ii p 348) The bishop of Tours ended his history and his life almost immediately before the conversion of Kent

General Observations

1 Such are the figurative expressions of Plutarch (Opera tom. ii p 318 edit Wechel [Frankf 1620]) to whom on the faith of his son Lamprias (Fabricius Bibliot Græc tom iii p 341) I shall boldly impute the malicious declamation περὶ τῆς Ῥωμαίων τύχης The same opinions had prevailed among the Greeks two hundred and fifty years before Plutarch and to confute them is the professed intention of Polybius (Hist l i [c 63] p 90 edit Gronov Amstel 1670)

2 See the inestimable remains of the sixth book of Polybius and many other parts of his general history particularly a digression in the seventeenth book [l xviii. c 12–15] in which he compares the phalanx and the legion

3 Sallust de Bell Jugurthin c 4 Such were the generous professions of P Scipio and Q Maximus The Latin historian had read and most probably transcribes Polybius their contemporary and friend

4 While Carthage was in flames Scipio repeated two lines of the Iliad which express the destruction of Troy acknowledging to Polybius his friend and preceptor (Polyb [Fragm l xxxix sub fin] in Excerpt de Virtut et Vit tom ii p 1455–1465) that while he recollected the vicissitudes of human affairs he inwardly applied them to the future calamities of Rome (Appian in Libycis [l viii c 132] p 136 edit Toll)

5 See Daniel ii 31–40 And the fourth king dom shall be strong as iron, forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things" The remainder of the prophecy (the mixture of iron and clay) was accomplished, according to St Jerom, in his own time Sicut enim in principio nihil Romano Imperio fortius et durius, ita in fine rerum nihil imbecillius quum et in bellis civilibus et adversus diversas nationes, aliarum gentium barbararum auxilio indigemus (Opera, tom v p 572)

6 The French and English editors of the Genealogical History of the Tartars have subjoined a curious, though imperfect, description of their present state We might question the independence of the Calmucks, or Eluths, since they have been recently vanquished by the Chinese, who, in the year 1759, subdued the lesser Bucharia, and advanced into the country of Badakshan, near the sources of the Oxus (Mémoires sur les Chinois, tom i p 325-400) But these conquests are precarious, nor will I venture to ensure the safety of the Chinese empire

7 The prudent reader will determine how far this general proposition is weakened by the revolt of the Isaurians, the independence of Britain and Armorica, the Moorish tribes, or the Bagaudæ of Gaul and Spain (vol i p 414, vol iv pp 130, 178, 252)

8 America now contains about six millions of European blood and descent and their numbers, at least in the North, are continually increasing Whatever may be the changes of their political situation, they must preserve the manners of Europe and we may reflect with some pleasure that the English language will probably be diffused over an immense and populous continent

10 It would be an easy, though tedious, task to produce the authorities of poets, philosophers, and historians I shall therefore content myself with appealing to the decisive and authentic testimony of Diodorus Siculus (tom i l i p 11, 12, l iii [c. 14 sqq] p 184, etc , edit Wesseling) The Ichthyophagi, who in his time wandered along the shores of the Red Sea, can only be compared to the natives of New Holland (Dampier s Voyages, vol i p 464-469) Fancy, or perhaps reason, may still suppose an extreme and absolute state of nature far below the level of these savages, who had acquired some arts and instruments

11 See the learned and rational work of the President Goguet, de l Origine des Loix, des Arts, et des Sciences He traces from facts or conjectures (tom i p 147-337, edit 12mo) the first and most difficult steps of human invention

12 It is certain, however strange, that many nations have been ignorant of the use of fire Even the ingenious natives of Otaheite, who are destitute of metals, have not invented any earthen vessels capable of sustaining the action of fire and of communicating the heat to the liquids which they contain

Chapter XXXIX

1 Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 13 14, p 629, 630, edit Grot) has drawn the pedigree of Theodoric from Gapt, one of the Anses or Demigods, who lived about the time of Domitian Cassiodorus, the first who celebrates the royal race of the Amali (Variar viii 5, ix 25 x 2 xi 1) reckons the grandson of Theodoric as the xviith in descent Peringsciöld (the Swedish commentator of Cochlæus Vit Theodoric p 271 etc Stockholm [illegible]) labours to connect this genealogy with the legends or traditions of his native country

2 More correctly on the banks of the lake Pelso (Nieusiedler-see) near Carnuntum, almost on the same spot where Marcus Antoninus composed, [illegible]

Meditations (Jornandes c 52 p 689 Severin Pannonia Illustrata p 22 Cellarius Geograph Antiq tom. 1 p 350)

3 The four first letters of his name (ΘΕΟΔ) were inscribed on a gold plate and when it was fixed on the paper the king drew his pen through the intervals (Anonym Valesian ad calcem Amm Marcellin p 722 [tom ii p 313 ed Bipon]) This authentic fact with the testimony of Procopius or at least of the contemporary Goths (Gothic l i c 2 p 312 [ed Paris tom ii p 14 ed Bonn]) far outweighs the vague praises of Ennodius (Sirmond Opera tom i p 1596) and Theophanes (Chronograph p 112 [ed Par p 202 203 ed Bonn])

4 Statura est quæ resignet proceritate regnantem (Ennodius p 1614) The bishop of Pavia (I mean the ecclesiastic who wished to be a bishop) then proceeds to celebrate the complexion eyes hands etc of his sovereign

5 The state of the Ostrogoths and the first years of Theodoric are found in Jornandes (c 52-56 p 689-696) and Malchus (Excerpt Legat p 78-80 [ed Par p 244-248 ed Bonn]) who erroneously styles him the son of Walamir

6 Theophanes (p 111 [p 200 ed Bonn]) inserts a copy of her sacred letters to the provinces ἴστε ὅτι τὸ βασίλειο ἡμέτερόν ἐσ ι αἱ ὅτ προχει ρησάμεθα βασ λέα Τρασκαλλ σα ν etc Such female pretensions would have astonished the slaves of the first Cæsars

8 Suidas tom i p 332 333 edit Kuster

9 The contemporary histories of Malchus and Candidus are lost but some extracts or fragments have been saved by Photius (lxxviii lxxix p 100-102 [p 54-56 ed Bekk]) Constantine Porphyrogenitus (Excerpt Leg p 78-97) and in various articles of the Lexicon of Suidas The Chronicles of Marcellinus (Imago Historiæ) are originals for the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius and I must acknowledge almost for the last time my obligations to the large and accurate collections of Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom vi p 472-652)

10 In ipsis congressionis tuæ foribus cessit invasor cum profugo per te sceptra redderentur de salute dubitanti Ennodius then proceeds (p 1596 1597 tom i Sirmond) to transport his hero (on a flying dragon?) into Æthiopia beyond the tropic of Cancer The evidence of the Valesian Fragment (p 717) Liberatus (Brev Eutych c 25 p 118) and Theophanes (p 11 [p 203 ed Bonn]) is more sober and rational

11 This cruel practice is specially imputed to the Triarian Goths less barbarous as it should seem than the Walamirs but the son of Theodemir is charged with the ruin of many Roman cities (Malchus Excerpt Leg p 95 [ed Par p 238 ed Bonn])

12 Jornandes (c. 56 57 p 696) displays the services of Theodoric confesses his rewards but dissembles his revolt of which such curious details have been preserved by Malchus (Excerpt Legat p 78-97 [p 244 sqq ed Bonn]) Marcellinus a domestic of Justinian under whose ivth consulship (A D 534) he composed his Chronicle (Scaliger Thesaurus Temporum P ii p 34-57) betrays his prejudice and passion in [apud] Græciam debacchantem Zenonis munificentiâ pene pacatus beneficiis nunquam satiatus etc. [p 368 369 and 370 ed Sirmond]

16 Jornandes (c 57 p 696 697) has abridged the great history of Cassiodorus See compare and reconcile Procopius (Gothic l i c 1) the Valesian Fragment (p 718 [ad Calcem Amm. Marc tom ii p 306 ed Bip]) Theophanes (p 113 [p 203 ed Bonn]) and Marcellinus (in Chron)

17 Theodoric's march is supplied and illustrated by Ennodius (p 1598-1602) when the bombast of the oration is translated into the language of common sense

18 Tot reges etc (Ennodius p 1602) We must recollect how much the royal title was multiplied and degraded and that the mercenaries of Italy were the fragments of many tribes and nations

19 See Ennodius p 1603 1604 Since the orator in the king's presence could mention and praise his mother we may conclude that the magnanimity of Theodoric was not hurt by the vulgar reproaches of concubine and bastard

20 This anecdote is related on the modern but respectable authority of Sigonius (Op tom i p 580 De Occident Imp l xv) his words are curious — Would you return? etc She presented and almost displayed the original recess

23 The sonorous and servile oration of Ennodius was pronounced at Milan or Ravenna in the years 507 or 508 (Sirmond, tom i p 1615) Two or three years afterwards the orator was rewarded with the bishopric of Pavia, which he held till his death in the year 521 (Dupin, Bibliot Eccles tom v p 11–14. See Saxii Onomasticon, tom ii p 12)

24. Our best materials are occasional hints from Procopius and the Valesian Fragment, which was discovered by Sirmond and is published at the end of Ammianus Marcellinus The author's name is unknown, and his style is barbarous, but in his various facts he exhibits the knowledge, without the passions, of a contemporary The President Montesquieu had formed the plan of a history of Theodoric, which at a distance might appear a rich and interesting subject

25 The best edition of the Variarum Libri xii is that of Joh Garretius (Rotomagi 1679, in Opp Cassiodor 2 vols in fol), but they deserved and required such an editor as the Marquis Scipio Maffei, who thought of publishing them at Verona The Barbara Eleganza (as it is ingeniously named by Tiraboschi) is never simple, and seldom perspicuous

26 Procopius, Gothic l i c 1, Variarum, ii Maffei (Verona Illustrata, P i p 228) exaggerates the injustice of the Goths, whom he hated as an Italian noble The plebeian Muratori crouches under their oppression

27 Procopius, Goth l iii c. 4 and 21 [tom ii p 295 and 366, ed Bonn] Ennodius describes (p 1612, 1613) the military arts and increasing numbers of the Goths

28 When Theodoric gave his sister to the king of the Vandals she sailed for Africa with a guard of 1000 noble Goths, each of whom was attended by five armed followers (Procop Vandal l i c 8 [tom i p 346 ed Bonn]) The Gothic nobility must have been as numerous as brave

29 See the acknowledgment of Gothic liberty (Var v 30)

30 Procopius Goth l i c. 2 [tom ii p 14, ed Bonn] The Roman boys learnt the language (Var viii 21) of the Goths Their general ignorance is not destroyed by the exceptions of Amalasuntha, a female, who might study without shame, or of Theodatus whose learning provoked the indignation and contempt of his countrymen

32 The view of the military establishment of the Goths in Italy is collected from the Epistles of Cassiodorus (Var i 24 40 iii 3 24 48 iv 13 14 v 26 27 viii 3 4 25) They are illustrated by the learned Mascou (Hist of the Germans L xi 40–44 Annotation xiv)

33 See the clearness and vigour of his negotiations in Ennodius (p 1607) and Cassiodorus (Var iii 1, 2, 3, 4 iv 13 v 43, 44) who gives the different styles of friendship, counsel, expostulation, etc

34. Even of his table (Var vi 9) and palace (vii 5) The admiration of strangers is represented as the most rational motive to justify these vain expenses, and to stimulate the diligence of the officers to whom these provinces were intrusted

35 See the public and private alliances of the Gothic monarch, with the Burgundians (Var i 45, 46), with the Franks (ii 40), with the Thuringians (iv 1), and with the Vandals (v 1), each of these epistles affords some curious knowledge of the policy and manners of the barbarians

36 His political system may be observed in Cassiodorus (Var iv 1, ix 1), Jornandes (c. 58, p 698, 699), and the Valesian Fragment (p 720, 721 [Amm tom ii p 311, ed Bip]) Peace, honourable peace, was the constant aim of Theodoric

37 The curious reader may contemplate the Heruli of Procopius (Goth l ii c. 14), and the patient reader may plunge into the dark and minute researches of M de Buat (Hist des Peuples Anciens, tom ix p 348–396)

38 Variarum, iv 2 The spirit and forms of this martial institution are noticed by Cassiodorus, but he seems to have only translated the sentiments of the Gothic king into the language of Roman eloquence

39 Cassiodorus, who quotes Tacitus to the Æstians, the unlettered savages of the Baltic (Var v 2), describes the amber for which their shores have ever been famous as the gum of a tree hardened by the sun and purified and wafted by the waves When that singular substance is analysed by the chemists, it yields a vegetable oil and a mineral acid

40 Scanzia, or Thule, is described by Jornandes (c 3, p 610–613) and Procopius (Goth l ii c. 15) Neither the Goth nor the Greek had visited the country both had conversed with the natives in their exile at Ravenna or Constantinople

52 Procopius affirms that no laws whatsoever were promulgated by Theodoric and the succeeding kings of Italy (Goth l ii c 6 [tom ii p 170 ed Bonn]) He must mean in the Gothic language A Latin edict of Theodoric is still extant in one hundred and fifty four articles

53 The image of Theodoric is engraved on his coins his modest successors were satisfied with adding their own name to the head of the reigning emperor (Murato i Antiquitat Italiæ Medii Ævi tom. ii dissert xxvii p 577–579 Giannone Istoria Civile di Napoli tom. i. p 166)

54 The alliance of the emperor and the king of Italy are represented by Cassiodorus (Var i i ii 1 2 3 vi 1) and Procopius (Goth. l. ii. c 6 l iii c. 21 [tom. ii p 369 ed Bonn]) who celebrate the friendship of Anastasius and Theodoric but the figurative style of compliment was interpreted in a very different sense at Constantinople and Ravenna

55 To the seventeen provinces of the Notitia Paul Warnefrid the deacon (De Reb Longobard l. ii c 14–22) has subjoined an eighteenth the Apennine (Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum, tom i. p 431–433) But of these Sardinia and Corsica were possessed by the Vandals and the two Rhætias as well as the Cottian Alps seem to have been abandoned to a military government. The state of the four provinces that now form the kingdom of Naples is laboured by Giannone (tom i p 172 178) with patriotic diligence

56 See the Gothic history of Procopius (l. i. c. i l. ii c 6) the Epistles of Cassiodorus (passim but especially the fifth and sixth books [vi and vii] which contain the formulæ or patents of offices) and the Civil History of Giannone (tom. i l. ii iii) The Gothic counts which he places in every Italian city are annihilated however by Maffei (Verona Illustrata P i l viii. p 227) for those of Syracuse and Naples (Var vi 22 23) were special and temporary commissions

57 Two Italians of the name of Cassiodorus, the father (Var i 24 [4] 40) and the son (ix 24, 25) were successively employed in the administration of Theodoric The son was born in the year 479 his various epistles as quæstor master of the offices and Prætorian præfect extend from 509 to 539 and he lived as a monk about thirty years. (Tiraboschi Storia della Letteratura Italiana tom iii p 7–24 Fabricius Biblioth Lat Med Ævi tom i p 357 358 edit Mansi)

58 See his regard for the senate in Cochlœus (Vit Theod viii p 72–80)

59 No more than 120 000 modii or four thousand quarters (Anonym Valesian p 721 [Amm ii p 310 ed Bip] and Var i 35 vi 18 xi 5 39)

60 See his regard and indulgence for the spectacles of the circus the amphitheatre and the theatre in the Chronicle and Epistles of Cassiodorus (Var i 20 27 30 31 3 iii 51 iv 51, illustrated by the fourteenth Annotation of Mascou's History) who has contrived to sprinkle the subject with ostentatious though agreeable learning

61 Anonym Vales p 721 [l c ed Bip] Marius Aventicensis in Chron In the scale of public and personal merit the Gothic conqueror is at least as much above Valentinian as he may seem inferior to Trajan

62 Vit Fulgentii in Baron Annal Eccles A.D 500 No 10

63 Cassiodorus describes in his pompous style the Forum of Trajan (Var vii 6) the theatre of Marcellus (iv 51) and the amphitheatre of Titus (v 42) and his descriptions are not unworthy of the reader's perusal According to the modern prices the Abbé Barthelemy computes that the brickwork and masonry of the Coliseum would now cost twenty millions of French livres (Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxviii p 585, 586) How small a part of that stupendous fabric!

64 For the aqueducts and cloacæ see Strabo (l v p 360 [p 235, ed Casaub]), Pliny (Hist Nat xxxvi 24 [§ 3]), Cassiodorus (Var iii 30, 31, vi 6), Procopius (Goth. l i c 19), and Nardini (Roma Antica, p 514–522) How such works could be executed by a king of Rome is yet a problem

65 For the Gothic care of the buildings and statues, see Cassiodorus (Var i 21, 25, ii 34, iv 30, vii 6, 13, 15), and the Valesian Fragment (p 721 [Amm tom ii p 310, ed Bip])

66 Var vii 15 These horses of Monte Cavallo had been transported from Alexandria to the baths of Constantine (Nardini, p 188) Their sculpture is disdained by the Abbé Dubos (Réflexions sur la Poésie et sur la Peinture, tom i section 39), and admired by Winckelman (Hist de l'Art, tom ii p 159)

67 Var x 30 They were probably a fragment of some triumphal car (Cuper de Elephantis, ii 10)

68 Procopius (Goth l iv c. 21 [tom ii p 571, ed Bonn]) relates a foolish story of Myron's cow, which is celebrated by the false wit of thirty-six Greek epigrams (Antholog l iv p 302–306, edit Hen Steph, Auson Epigram lviii–lxviii)

69 See an epigram of Ennodius (ii 3, p 1893, 1894) on this garden and the royal gardener

70 His affection for that city is proved by the epithet of "Verona tua," and the legend of the hero under the barbarous name of Dietrich of Bern (Peringsciold ad Cochlœum, p 240), Maffei traces him with knowledge and pleasure in his native country (l ix p 230–236)

71 See Maffei (Verona Illustrata Part i p 231, 232, 308, etc) He imputes Gothic architecture, like the corruption of language, writing, etc., not to the barbarians, but to the Italians themselves Compare his sentiments with those of Tiraboschi (tom iii p 61)

72 The villas climate and landscape of Baiæ (Var ix 6 see Cluver Italia Antiq l iv c 2, p. 1119 etc.) Istria (Var xii 22 26), and Comum (Var xi 14, compare with Pliny's two villas ix 7), are agreeably painted in the epistles of Cassiodorus

73 In Liguria numerosa agricolarum progenies (Ennodius, p 1678, 1679 1680) St Epiphanius of Pavia redeemed by prayer or ransom 6000 captives from the Burgundians of Lyons and Savoy Such deeds are the best of miracles

74 The political economy of Theodoric (see Anonym Vales p 721 [Amm tom ii p 311, ed. Bip] and Cassiodorus in Chron) may be distinctly traced under the following heads iron mine (Var iii 23) gold mine (ix 3) Pomptine marshes (ii 32 33) Spoleto (ii 21) corn (i 34, x 27 28 xi 11, 12) trade (vi 7 vii 9 23) fair of Leucothoe or St Cyprian in Lucania (viii 33) plenty (xii 4) the cursus, or public post (i 29 ii 31, iv 47, v 5, vi 6, vii 33), the Flaminian way (xii 18)

75 LX modii tritici in solidum ipsius tempore fuerunt, et vinum xxx amphoras in solidum (Fragment Vales [p 311, ed Bip]) Corn was distributed from the granaries at xv or xxv modii for a piece of gold, and the price was still moderate.

76 See the Life of St Cæsarius in Baronius (A.D 508, No 12, 13, 14) The king presented him with 300 gold solidi, and a discus of silver of the weight of sixty pounds

77 Ennodius in Vit St Epiphanii, in Sirmond Op tom i p 1672–1690 Theodoric bestowed some important favours on this bishop, whom he used as a counsellor in peace and war

78 Devotissimus ac si catholicus (Anonym Vales p 720 [p 310, ed Bip]), yet his offering was no more than two silver candlesticks (cerostrata) of the weight of seventy pounds, far inferior to the gold and gems of Constantinople and France (Anastasius in Vit Pont. in Hormisda, p 34, edit. Paris [tom i p 93 ed Rom 1718])

79 The tolerating system of his reign (Ennodius, p 1612, Anonym Vales p 719 [p 308, ed Bip], Procop Goth l i c. 1, l ii c. 6) may be studied in the Epistles of Cassiodorus, under the following heads bishops (Var i 9 viii 15 24 xi 23) immunities (i 26 ii 29 30), church lands (iv 17, 20), sanctuaries (ii 11, iii 47) church plate (xii 20) discipline (iv 44), which prove at the same time that he was the head of the church as well as of the state.

80 We may reject a foolish tale of his beheading a catholic deacon who turned Arian (Theodor Lector No 17) Why is Theodoric surnamed Afer? From Vafer? (Vales ad loc.) A light conjecture

81 Ennodius, p 1621, 1622, 1636 1638 His libel was approved and registered (synodaliter) by a Roman council (Baronius A D 503 No 6 Franciscus Pagi in Breviar Pont Rom tom i p 242)

82 See Cassiodorus (Var viii 15, ix 15, 16) Anastasius (in Symmacho p 31 [p 84 ed. Rom]), and the seventeenth Annotation of Mascou Baronius Pagi and most of the catholic doctors confess with an angry growl this Gothic usurpation

83 He disabled them—a licentia testandi and all Italy mourned—lamentabili justitio I wish to believe that these penalties were enacted against the rebels who had violated their oath of allegiance but the testimony of Ennodius (p 1675, 1678) is the more weighty as he lived and died under the reign of Theodoric

84 Ennodius in Vit Epiphan. p 1689 1690 Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ l i pros iv p 45 46 47 [illegible] Respect but weigh the passions of the saint and the senator and fortify or alleviate their complaints by the various hints of Cassiodorus (ii 8 iv 36 viii 5)

85 Immanium expensarum pondus [illegible] pro ipsorum salute, etc. yet these are no more than words

86 The Jews were settled at Naples (Procopius Goth l i c 8 [tom ii p 44 ed Bonn]) at Genoa (Var ii 27 iv 33) Milan (v 37) Rome (iv 43) See likewise Basnage Hist des Juifs tom viii c. 7 p 254

87 Rex avidus communis exitii etc (Boethius l i p 55) rex dolum Romanis tendebat (Anonym Vales p 723) These are hard words they speak the passions of the Italians and those (I fear) of Theodoric himself

88 I have laboured to extract a rational narrative from the dark concise and various hints of the Valesian Fragment (p 722 723 724 [p 313 sqq ed Bip]) Theophanes (p 145 [tom i p 61 ed Bonn]) Anastasius (in Johanne p 35 [p 94 ed Rom]) and the Hist Miscella (p 103 edit Muratori [Milan 1723]) A gentle pressure and paraphrase of their words is no violence Consult likewise Muratori (Annali d Italia tom iv p 471–478) with the Annals and Breviary (tom i p 259–263) of the two Pagis, the uncle and the nephew

89 Le Clerc has composed a critical and philosophical Life of Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius (Biblist Choisie tom xvi p 168–275) and both Tiraboschi (tom iii) and Fabricius (Bibliot Latin) may be usefully consulted The date of his birth may be placed about the year 470 and his death in 524 in a premature old age (Consol Phil Metrica i p 5)

90 For the age and value of this MS now in the Medicean library at Florence see the Cenotaphia Pisana (p 430–447) of Cardinal Noris

91 The Athenian studies of Boethius are doubtful (Baronius A D 510 No 3 from a spurious tract De Disciplina Scholarum) and the term of eighteen years is doubtless too long but the simple fact of a visit to Athens is justified by much internal evidence (Brucker Hist Crit Philosoph tom iii p 524–527) and by an expression (though vague and ambiguous) of his friend Cassiodorus (Var i 45), longè positas Athenas introisti

92 Bibliothecæ comptos ebore ac vitro parietes etc (Consol Phil l i pros v p 74) The Epistles of Ennodius (vi 6 vii 13 viii 1 31 37 40) and Cassiodorus (Var i 39 iv 6 ix 21) afford many proofs of the high reputation which he enjoyed in his own times It is true that the bishop of Pavia wanted to purchase of him an old house at Milan and praise might be tendered and accepted in part of payment

93 Pagi Muratori etc are agreed that Boethius himself was consul in the year 510 his two sons in 522 and in 487 perhaps his father A desire of ascribing the last of these consulships to the philosopher had perplexed the chronology of his life In his honours alliances children he celebrates his own felicity—his past felicity (p 109 110)

94 Si ego scissem tu i e cisses Boethius adopts this answer (l. i pros 4, p 53) of Julius Canus whose philosophic death is described by Seneca (De Tranquillitate Animi c 14)

95 The characters of his two delators Basilius (Var ii 10 11 iv 22) and Opilio (v 41 viii 16) are illustrated not much to their honour in the Epistles of Cassiodorus which likewise mention Decoratus (v 31) the worthless colleague of Boethius (l iii pros 4 p 193)

96 A severe inquiry was instituted into the crime of magic (Var iv 22 23 ix 18) and it was believed that many necromancers had escaped by making their gaolers mad for mad I should read drunk

97 Boethius had composed his own Apology (p 53) perhaps more interesting than his Consolation We must be content with the general view of his honours principles persecution etc (l i pros 4, p 42–62) which may be compared with the short and weighty words of the Valesian Fragment (p 723 [Amm tom ii p 314 ed Bip]) An anonymous writer [Sinner Catalog MSS Bibliot Bern tom i p 287) charges him home with honourable and patriotic treason

98 He was executed in Agro Calventiano (Calvenzano between Marignano and Pavia) Anonym Vales p 723 [p 315 ed Bip] by order of Eusebius count of Ticinum or Pavia The place of his confinement is styled the baptistery an edifice and name peculiar to cathedrals It is claimed by the perpetual tradition of the church of Pavia The tower of Boethius subsisted till the year 1584, and the draught is yet preserved (Tiraboschi tom iii p 47 48)

99 See the Biographia Britannica ALFRED tom i p 80 2nd edition The work is still more honourable if performed under the learned eye of Alfred by his foreign and domestic doctors For the reputation of Boethius in the middle ages consult Brucker (Hist Crit Philosoph tom iii p 565 566)

100 The inscription on his new tomb was composed by the preceptor of Otho the Third the learned pope Silvester II who like Boethius himself was styled a magician by the ignorance of the times The catholic martyr had carried his head in his hands a considerable way (Baronius A.D 526 No 17 18) yet on a similar tale a lady of my acquaintance once observed La distance n y fait rien il n y a que le premier pas qui coûte.

101 Boethius applauds the virtues of his father in law (l i pros 4 p 59 l ii pros 4, p 118) Procopius (Goth l i c i [tom ii p 11 ed Bonn]) the Valesian Fragment (p 724 [p 316 ed B p]) and the Historia Miscella (l xv p 105[1] [103[2]]) agree in praising the superior innocence or sanctity of Symmachus and in the estimation of the legend the guilt of his murder is equal to the imprisonment of a pope

102 In the fanciful eloquence of Cassiodorus the variety of sea and river fish are an evidence of extensive dominion and those of the Rhine of Sicily and of the Danube were served on the table of Theodoric (Var xii 44) The monstrous turbot of Domitian (Juvenal, Satir iv 39) had been caught on the shores of the Hadriatic.

103 Procopius, Goth l i c i [tom ii p 11, ed Bonn] But he might have informed us whether he had received this curious anecdote from common report, or from the mouth of the royal physician

104 Procopius, Goth l i c 1, 2, 12, 13 This partition had been directed by Theodoric, though it was not executed till after his death Regni hereditatem superstes reliquit (Isidor Chron p 721, edit Grot)

105 Berimund, the third in descent from Hermanric, king of the Ostrogoths, had retired into Spain, where he lived and died in obscurity (Jornandes, c 33, p 202, edit Muratori) See the discovery, nuptials, and death of his grandson Eutharic (c 58, p 220) His Roman games might render him popular (Cassiodor in Chron), but Eutharic was asper in religione (Anonym Vales p 722, 723 [p 313 ed Bip])

106 See the counsels of Theodoric, and the professions of his successor, in Procopius (Goth l i c 1, 2), Jornandes (c. 59 [p 700, 701, ed Grot]), and Cassiodorus (Var viii 1–7) These epistles are the triumph of his ministerial eloquence

107 Anonym Vales p 724 [p 316, ed Bip] Agnellus de Vitis Pont Raven in Muratori Script Rerum Ital tom ii P i p 67 Alberti Descrizione d'Italia, p 311

108 This legend is related by Gregory I (Dialog iv 30 [tom ii p 420, ed Bened]), and approved by Baronius (A D 526, No 28), and both the pope and cardinal are grave doctors, sufficient to establish a probable opinion

109 Theodoric himself, or rather Cassiodorus, had described in tragic strains the volcanos of Lipari (Cluver Sicilia, p 406–410), and Vesuvius ([Var] iv 50)

Chapter XL

1 There is some difficulty in the date of his birth (Ludewig in Vit Justiniani, p 125), none in the place—the district Bederiana—the village Tauresium, which he afterwards decorated with his name and splendour (D'Anville, Hist de l'Acad etc., tom xxxi p 287–292)

2 The names of these Dardanian peasants are Gothic, and almost English Justinian is a translation of uprauda (upright), his father Sabatius (in Græco-barbarous language stipes) was styled in his village Istock (Stock), his mother Bigleniza was softened into Vigilantia.

3 Ludewig (p 127–135) attempts to justify the Anician name of Justinian and Theodora, and to connect them with a family from which the house of Austria has been derived

4 See the Anecdotes of Procopius (c 6) with the notes of N Alemannus The satirist would not have sunk, in the vague and decent appellation of γεωργος the βουκολος and συφορβος of Zonaras Yet why are these names disgraceful?—and what German baron would not be proud to descend from the Eumæus of the Odyssey?

5 His virtues are praised by Procopius (Persic L i c 11 [tom i p 5[illegible], ed Bonn]) The quæstor Proclus was the friend of Justinian and the enemy of every other adoption

6 Manichæan signifies Eutychian Hear the furious acclamations of Constantinople and Tyre, the former [illegible] days after the decease of Anastasius [illegible] the eunuch's death (Baronius A D 518 P ii No 15 [illegible] the Councils tom v p 18[illegible])

7 His power, character and intentions are perfectly explained in the Comte de Buat (tom ix p 54–81) He was great grandson of Aspar [illegible] tary prince in the Lesser Scythia, and count of the Gothic fœderati of Thrace The Bessi, whom he could influence, are the minor Goths of Jornandes (c 51)

8 Justiniani patricii factione dicitur interfectus fuisse (Victor Tununensis Chron in Thesaur, Temp Scaliger, P ii p 7) Procopius (Anecdot c. 7 [c 6, tom iii p 46, ed Bonn]) styles him a tyrant, but acknowledges the ἀδελφοκτονία, which is well explained by Alemannus

9 In his earliest youth (plane adolescens) he had passed some time as a hostage with Theodoric For this curious fact Alemannus (ad Procop Anecdot c 9 p 34 [tom iii p 393, ed Bonn] of the first edition) quotes a MS history of Justinian by his preceptor Theophilus Ludewig (p 143) wishes to make him a soldier

10 The ecclesiastical history of Justinian will be shown hereafter See Baronius A D 518–521, and the copious article Justinianus in the index to the seventh volume of his Annals

11 The reign of the elder Justin may be found in the three Chronicles of Marcellinus, Victor, and John Malala (tom ii p 130–150 [ed Oxon l xvii p 410–424 ed Bonn]), the last of whom (in spite of Hody, Prolegom No 14, 39 edit Oxon) lived soon after Justinian [illegible] vol iv p [illegible]) in the Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius [illegible] [illegible] (p [illegible] [illegible] Bonn and Zonaras [illegible] p [illegible] [illegible] an original

278) Their religion an honourable problem be trays occasional conformity with a secret attach ment to Paganism and Philosophy

13 In the seven first books two Persic two Van dalic and three Gothic Procopius has borrowed from Appian the division of provinces and wars the eighth book though it bears the name of Gothic is a miscellaneous and general supplement down to the spring of the year 553 from whence it is continued by Agathias till 559 (Pagi Critica A D 579 No 5)

14. The literary fate of Procopius has been somewhat unlucky 1 His books de Bello Gothico were stolen by Leonard Aretin and published (Ful ginii 1470 Venet 1471 apud Janson Mattaire Annal Typograph tom 1 edit posterior p 290 304 279 299) in his own name (see Vossius de Hist Lat l iii c 5 and the feeble defence of the Venice Giornale de Letterati tom xix p 207) 2 His works were mutilated by the first Latin translators Christopher Persona (Giornale tom xix p 340–348) and Raphael de Volaterra (Huet de Claris Interpretibus p 166) who did not even consult the MS of the Vatican library of which they were præfects (Aleman in Præfat Anecdot) 3 The Greek text was not printed till 1607 by Hoeschelius of Augsburg (Dictionnaire de Bayle tom ii p 782) 4 The Paris edition was imper fectly executed by Claude Maltret a Jesuit of Toulouse (in 1663) far distant from the Louvre press and the Vatican MS from which however he obta ned some supplements His promised com mentaries etc have never appeared The Aga thias of Leyden (1594) has been wisely reprinted by the Paris editor with the Latin version of Bon aventura Vulcanius a learned interpreter (Huet p 176)

16 Κύρο παιδεία (says he Præfat ad l de Ædi ficiis περὶ τισμά ω) is no more than Κύρ υ παιδία —a pun! In these five books Procopius affects a Christian as well as a courtly style

17 Procopius discloses himself (Præfat ad An ecdot c 1 2 5) and the anecdotes are reckoned as the ninth book by Suidas (tom iii p 186 ed Kuster) The silence of Evagrius is a poor objection Baronius (A D 548 No 24) regrets the loss of this secret history it was then in the Vati can library in his own custody and was first published sixteen years after his death with the learned but partial notes of Nicholas Alemannus (Lugd 1623)

18 Justinian an ass—the perfect likeness of Do mitian—Anecdot c 8—Theodora s lovers driven from her bed by rival dæmons—her marriage fore told with a great dæmon—a monk saw the prince of the dæmons instead of Justinian on the throne —the servants who watched beheld a face without features a body walking without a head etc etc

Procopius declares his own and his friends belief in these diabolical stories (c 12)

19 Montesquieu (Considérations sur la Gran deur et la Décadence des Romains c xx) gives credit to these anecdotes as connected 1 with the weakness of the empire and 2 with the instability of Justinian s laws

20 For the life and manners of the empress Theodora see the Anecdotes more especially c 1–5 9 10–15 16 17 with the learned notes of Alemannus—a reference which is always implied

21 Comito was afterwards married to Sittas duke of Armenia the father perhaps at least she might be the mother of the empress Sophia Two nephews of Theodora may be the sons of Anastasia (Aleman p 30 31)

22 Her statue was raised at Constantinople on a porphyry column See Procopius (de Ædif l. 1 c 11) who gives her portrait in the Anecdotes (c 10 [tom iii p 69 ed Bonn]) Aleman (p 47) produces one from a mosaic at Ravenna loaded with pearls and jewels and yet handsome

23 A fragment of the Anecdotes (c 9) some what too naked was suppressed by Alemannus though extant in the Vatican MS nor has the defect been supplied in the Paris or Venice edi tions La Mothe le Vayer (tom viii p 155) gave the first hint of this curious and genuine passage (Jortin s Remarks vol iv p 366) which he had received from Rome and it has been since pub lished in the Menagiana (tom iii p 254–259) with a Latin version

24 After the mention of a narrow girdle (as none could appear stark naked in the theatre) Procopius thus proceeds ἀ απεπτωκυιά τε ἐ τῷ ἐδ φ ι υπτία ἔ ιτο Θη ς δὲ τινες κρ θ ς αυτῇ ὕπερθ των αἰδοίω ἐῤῥίπτουν ἃς δὴ οἱ χῆνες οἳ ἐς τουτο παρεσκ ασμένοι ἐτύγχαν ν τ ς στόμασι ἐνθένδε α ἀ μίαν ἀνελόμ ησθιο I have heard that a learned prelate now deceased was fond of quot ing this passage in conversation

25 Theodora surpassed the Crispa of Ausonius (Epigram lxxi) who imitated the capitalis luxus of the females of Nola See Quintilian Institut viii 6 and Torrentius ad Horat Sermon l 1 sat 2 v 101 At a memorable supper thirty slaves waited round the table ten young men feasted with The odora Her charity was uni ersal

Et lassata viris necdum satiata recessit

26 Ἡ δε κἀκ τω τριω τρυπημάτω ἐργαζομένη ἐν ἀλει τῃ φύσ δυσφορο μὲ η δ δὴ μὴ καὶ τους τιτ θους αὐτῃ ὑρυτερον ἢ ν εἶσι τρυπῳη ὅπως δυνατὴ εἴη καὶ ἐ ί η ἐργάζ σθα She wished for a fourth altar on which she might pour libations to the god of love

27 Anonym de Antiquitat C P l iii 132 in Banduri Imperium Orient tom 1 p 47 Ludewig (p 154) argues sensibly that Theodora would not have immortalised a brothel but I apply this fact to her second and chaster residence at Constanti nople

v leg 7, tit xxvii leg 1) under the years 336 and 454. The new edict (about the year 521 or 522, Aleman p 38, 96) very awkwardly repeals no more than the clause of mulieres scenicæ, libertinæ, tabernariæ See the novels 89 and 117, and a Greek rescript from Justinian to the bishops (Aleman p 41)

29 I swear by the Father, etc., by the Virgin Mary, by the four Gospels, quæ in manibus teneo, and by the Holy Archangels Michael and Gabriel, puram conscientiam germanumque servitium me servaturum, sacratissimis DDNN Justiniano et Theodoræ conjugi ejus (Novell viii tit 3) Would the oath have been binding in favour of the widow? Communes tituli et triumphi, etc (Aleman p 47, 48)

30 "Let greatness own her, and she's mean no more," etc

Without Warburton's critical telescope, I should never have seen, in this general picture of triumphant vice, any personal allusion to Theodora

31 Her prisons, a labyrinth, a Tartarus (Anecdot c 4), were under the palace. Darkness is propitious to cruelty, but it is likewise favourable to calumny and fiction

32 A more jocular whipping was inflicted on Saturninus, for presuming to say that his wife, a favourite of the empress, had not been found ἄτρητος (Anecdot c. 17 [tom iii p 104, ed Bonn])

33 Per viventem in sæcula excoriari te faciam Anastasius de Vitis Pont Roman in Vigilio, p 40

34 Ludewig p 161–166 I give him credit for the charitable attempt, although he hath not much charity in his temper

35 Compare the Anecdotes (c 17) with the Edifices (l i c. 9) How differently may the same fact be stated! John Malala (tom ii p 174, 175 [p 440, 441, ed Bonn]) observes, that on this or a similar occasion, she released and clothed the girls whom she had purchased from the stews at five aurei apiece

36 Novel viii 1 An allusion to Theodora Her enemies read the name Dæmonodora (Aleman p 66 [Procop tom iii p 415 ed Bonn])

37 St. Sabas refused to pray for a son of Theodora lest he should prove a heretic worse than Anastasius himself (Cyril in Vit St Sabæ, apud Aleman p 70, 109 [Procop tom iii p 421, 462, ed Bonn])

39 Theodora Chalcedonensis synodi inimica canceris plagâ toto corpore perfusa vitam prodigiose finivit (Victor Tunnunensis in Chron) On such occasions an orthodox mind is steeled against pity Alemannus (p 12 13) understands the [illegible] of Theophanes as civil language which does not imply either piety or repentance yet two years after her death St Theodora is celebrated by Paul Silentiarius (in Proem ver 58 [illegible])

40 As she persecuted the popes and rejected a council, Baronius exhausts the names of Eve, Dalila, Herodias, etc , after which he has recourse to his infernal dictionary civis inferni—alumna dæmonum—satanico agitata spiritu—œstro percita diabolico, etc etc (A D 548, No 24)

41 Read and feel the twenty-third book of the Iliad, a living picture of manners, passions, and the whole form and spirit of the chariot-race West's Dissertation on the Olympic Games (sect xii–xvii) affords much curious and authentic information

42 The four colours, albati, russati, prasini, veneti, represent the four seasons, according to Cassiodorus (Var iii 51), who lavishes much wit and eloquence on this theatrical mystery Of these colours, the three first may be fairly translated, white, red and green Venetus is explained by cæruleus, a word various and vague it is properly the sky reflected in the sea, but custom and convenience may allow blue as an equivalent (Robert Stephan sub voce Spence's Polymetis, p 228)

43 See Onuphrius Panvinius de Ludis Circensibus, l i c. 10 11, the seventeenth Annotation on Mascou's History of the Germans, and Aleman ad c vii

44 Marcellin in Chron p 47 [anno 501] Instead of the vulgar word veneta, he uses the more exquisite terms of cærulea and cerealis Baronius (A D 501, No 4, 5, 6) is satisfied that the blues were orthodox, but Tillemont is angry at the supposition, and will not allow any martyrs in a playhouse (Hist des Emp tom vi p 554)

45 See Procopius (Persic. l i c. 24) In describing the vices of the factions and of the government, the public is not more favourable than the secret historian Aleman (p 26 [tom iii p 373 ed Bonn]) has quoted a fine passage from Gregory Nazianzen, which proves the inveteracy of the evil

46 The partiality of Justinian for the blues (Anecdot c 7 [tom iii p 53 ed Bonn]) is attested by Evagrius (Hist Eccles l iv c 32), John Malala (tom ii p 138 139 [p 152 ed Oxon lib xviii p 425, ed Bonn]), especially for Antioch, and Theophanes (p 142 [p 256 ed Bonn])

47 A wife (says Procopius) who was seized and almost ravished by a blue-coat threw herself into the Bosphorus The bishops of the second Syria (Aleman p 26 [tom iii p 374 ed. Bonn]) deplore a similar suicide the guilt or glory of female chastity and name the heroine

48 The doubtful credit of Procopius (Anecdot c 17) is supported by the less partial Evagrius, who confirms the fact and specifies the names The tragic fate of the prefect of Constantinople is related by John Malala (tom ii p 139 [p 416, ed Bonn])

49 See John Malala (tom ii p 147 [p 4[illegible] ed Bonn]) yet he owns that Justinian was attached to the blues The seeming discord of the emperor and Theodora is perhaps viewed with too much jealousy and refinement by Procopius (Anecd [illegible]

50 This dialogue which Theophanes has preserved exhibits the popular language as well as the manners of Constantinople in the sixth century Their Greek is mingled with many strange and barbarous words for which Ducange cannot always find a meaning or etymology

53 Marcellinus says in general terms innumeris populis in circo trucidatis Procopius numbers 30 000 victims [tom 1 p 129 ed Bonn] and the 35 000 of Theophanes are swelled to 40 000 by the more recent Zonaras [tom ii p 63] Such is the usual progress of exaggeration

55 See the Book of Genesis (xii 10) and the administration of Joseph The annals of the Greeks and Hebrews agree in the early arts and plenty of Egypt but this antiquity supposes a long series of improvement and Warburton who is almost stifled by the Hebrew calls aloud for the Samaritan chronology (Divine Legation vol iii p 29 etc)

58 See in Ovid (de Arte Amandi iii 269 etc) a poetical list of twelve colours borrowed from flowers the elements etc. But it is almost impossible to discriminate by words all the nice and various shades both of art and nature

59 By the discovery of cochineal etc we far surpass the colours of antiquity Their royal purple had a strong smell and a dark cast as deep as bull's blood—obscuritas rubens (says Cassiodorus Var l 1 c 2) nigredo sanguinea The President Goguet (Origine des Loix et des Arts part ii l ii c. 2 p 184–215) will amuse and satisfy the reader I doubt whether his book especially in England is as well known as it deserves to be

60 Historical proofs of this jealousy have been occasionally introduced and many more might have been added but the arbitrary acts of despotism were justified by the sober and general declarations of law (Codex Theodosian l. x tit 21 leg 3 Codex Justinian l xi tit 8 leg 5) An inglorious permission and necessary restriction was applied to the mimæ the female dancers (Cod. Theodos l xv tit 7 leg 11)

61 In the history of insects (far more wonderful than Ovid's Metamorphoses) the silkworm holds a conspicuous place The bombyx of the isle of Ceos as described by Pliny (Hist Natur xi 26 27 with the notes of the two learned Jesuits Hardouin and Brotier) may be illustrated by a similar species in China (Mémoires sur les Chinois tom ii p 575 598) but our silkworm as well as the white mulberry tree were unknown to Theophrastus and Pliny

68 The blind admiration of the Jesuits confounds the different periods of the Chinese history They are more critically distinguished by M de

Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom i part i in the Tables, part ii in the Geography Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxxii xxxvi xlii xliii), who discovers the gradual progress of the truth of the annals and the extent of the monarchy, till the Christian era He has searched with a curious eye the connections of the Chinese with the nations of the West but these connections are slight, casual, and obscure, nor did the Romans entertain a suspicion that the Seres or Sinæ possessed an empire not inferior to their own

69 The roads from China to Persia and Hindostan may be investigated in the relations of Hackluyt and Thevenot (the ambassadors of Sharokh, Anthony Jenkinson, the Père Greuber, etc See likewise Hanway's Travels, vol i p 345-357) A communication through Thibet has been lately explored by the English sovereigns of Bengal

71 The knowledge, or rather ignorance, of Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, Arrian, Marcian, etc, of the countries eastward of Cape Comorin, is finely illustrated by D'Anville (Antiquité Géographique de l'Inde, especially p 161-198) Our geography of India is improved by commerce and conquest, and has been illustrated by the excellent maps and memoirs of Major Rennell If he extends the sphere of his inquiries with the same critical knowledge and sagacity, he will succeed and may surpass the first of modern geographers

72 The Taprobane of Pliny (vi 24), Solinus (c 56), and Salmas Plinianæ Exercitat (p 781, 782), and most of the ancients, who often confound the islands of Ceylon and Sumatra, is more clearly described by Cosmas Indicopleustes yet even the Christian topographer has exaggerated its dimensions His information on the Indian and Chinese trade is rare and curious (l ii p 138 l xi p 337, 338, edit Montfaucon [Coll Nova Patrum, tom ii Paris, 1706])

73 See Procopius, Persic (l ii c. 20 [l i c 19]) Cosmas affords some interesting knowledge of the port and inscription of Adulis (Topograph Christ l ii p 139 140-143), and of the trade of the Axumites along the African coast of Barbaria or Zingi (p. 138, 139), and as far as Taprobane (l xi p 339)

77 Cosmas, surnamed Indicopleustes, or the Indian navigator, performed his voyage about the year 522, and composed at Alexandria, between 535 and 547, Christian Topography (Montfaucon, Præfat c i), in which he refutes the impious opinion that the earth is a globe, and Photius had read this work (Cod xxxvi p 9, 10 [p 7, ed Bekk]), which displays the prejudices of a monk, with the knowledge of a merchant the most valuable part has been given in French and in Greek by Melchisedec Thevenot (Relations Curieuses, part i), and the whole is since published in a splendid edition by Père Montfaucon (Collectio Nova Patrum, Paris, 1706, 2 vols in fol tom ii p 113-346) But the editor, a theologian, might blush at not discovering the Nestorian heresy of Cosmas, which has been detected by La Croze (Christianisme des Indes, tom i p 40-56)

78 Evagrius (l iii c 39 40) is minute and grateful, but angry with Zosimus for calumniating the great Constantine In collecting all the bonds and records of the tax, the humanity of Anastasius was diligent and artful fathers were sometimes compelled to prostitute their daughters (Zosim Hist l ii c. 38, p 165, 166, Lipsiæ, 1784 [p 104 ed Bonn] Timotheus of Gaza chose such an event for the subject of a tragedy (Suidas tom iii p 475), which contributed to the abolition of the tax (Cedrenus, p 357 [ed Par tom i p 627 ed Bonn])—an happy instance (if it be true) of the use of the theatre

94 The chronology of Procopius is loose and obscure but with the aid of Pagi I can discern that John was appointed Prætorian præfect of the East in the year 530 that he was removed in January 532—restored before June 533—banished in 541—and recalled between June 548 and April 1 549 Aleman (p 96 97 [Procop tom iii p 449 450 ed Bonn]) gives the list of his ten successors—a rapid series in a part of a single reign

95 This conflagration is hinted by Lucian (in Hippia c 2) and Galen (l iii de Temperamentis tom i p 81 edit Basil) in the second century A thousand years afterwards it is positively affirmed by Zonaras (l ix p 424) on the faith of Dion Cassius by Tzetzes (Chiliad ii 119 etc) Eustathius (ad Iliad E p 338) and the scholiast of Lucian. See Fabricius (Biblioth Græc l iii c. 22 tom ii p 551 552 [ed Hamb 1716]) to whom I am more or less indebted for several of these quotations

HYPERTHYROIDISM (GRAVES DISEASE), DIFFUSE AND NODULAR TOXIC GOITER MALIGNANT EXOPHTHALMOS

PARRY[1] and later Graves described a clinical syndrome characterized by exophthalmos diffuse goiter and symptoms which we now know to be due to hyperthyroidism On the Continent Basedow[3] independently described this same disorder It has become apparent that the hypermetabolic symptoms resulting from overproduction of thyroid hormone may or may not be associated with the eye signs so characteristic of Graves disease Indeed it has often been noted that thyrotoxicosis found in conjunction with a nodular goiter is usually not characterized by the presence of exophthalmos whereas protrusion of the eyes is a very frequent manifestation of diffuse toxic goiter Furthermore, the eye signs noted in Graves disease may be found in conjunction with the euthyroid or even the hypothyroid state

As a result of the various combinations of symptoms and signs that may be encountered clinically separate and distinct names have been given to the various forms of the disease Explanation of these terms is therefore necessary Hyperthyroidism and thyrotoxicosis are synonomous and refer to the metabolic manifestations due to excessive production of thyroid hormone The term toxic goiter refers to thyrotoxicosis associated with enlargement of the thyroid gland of a diffuse or nodular character Graves disease in the sense originally described is a syndrome characterized by thyrotoxicosis, ophthalmopathy and diffuse thyroid enlargement Common usage however has applied the term to all forms of thyrotoxicosis with or without eye signs and even to the pure ophthalmic syndrome Toxic nodular goiter refers to thyrotoxicosis associated with a nodular goiter Plummer[6] advanced the hypothesis that this type of goiter presented a different clinical picture than did diffuse toxic enlargement and that the manifestations of toxicity were due entirely to overactivity in the nodule Most observers in the past however have felt that the hyperthyroidism was a manifestation of overactivity of the entire gland the nodule representing a residuum of previous irregular hyperplasia and involution Studies with radioactive iodine have revealed that some instances of toxic nodular goiter are actually due to overactivity of the nodule itself In most instances however the hyperthyroidism is the result of increased activity of the entire gland the nodular areas being relatively inactive[6,171,172] The syndrome associated solely with eye signs has been variously referred to as hyperophthalmic Graves disease[4] exophthalmic ophthalmoplegia[7] and malignant exophthalmos[91]

It is convenient for purposes of discussion to refer to all of these syndromes as manifestations of Graves disease In the discussion that follows however the special considerations involved in each type of syndrome will be more fully developed

Etiology —The etiology of Graves disease is unknown It has been repeatedly noted however that psychic trauma may precede the onset of the disease [7–10, 57] Conrad[10] has claimed that she has been able to elicit a history of emotional upset in 94 per cent of patients with hyperthyroidism However, most observers although not employing detailed psychiatric technics have been unable to obtain as high an incidence of preceding emotional stress It is of interest that the incidence of Graves disease was extremely low in the armed forces in spite of the fact that careful search was made for evidences of this disorder Nevertheless at home, the onset of thyrotoxicosis was often preceded by the receipt of unfavorable news concerning relatives The army personnel of course represents a highly selected population carefully screened by physical and psychiatric tests It is equally possible that the circumstances and type of stress encountered in military life may not be conducive to the production of this illness Ham and his group[214] have suggested that Graves' disease tends to occur in individuals frustrated in early life but who make continued efforts towards a premature self sufficiency and when these efforts fail develop chronic anxieties

The question arises concerning the status of the adrenal cortex in thyrotoxicosis There is evidence which would point to the presence of some impairment of adrenal cortical function in this disease Clinically patients with Graves disease may manifest asthenia and pigmentation resembling that observed in Addison s disease In addition the presence of a diffuse lymphadenopathy lymphocytosis and often an increase in circulating eosinophils as well as a decrease in the urinary excretion of the neutral 17 ketosteroids suggests impairment of adrenal cortical function However this is not invariable since the urinary excretion of the 11 oxygenated steroids is often normal and may even be increased and the chloride content of sweat is frequently reduced except in severe Graves disease [215] It is possible that the presence or absence of impairment of adrenal cortical function may be related to the severity of the hyperthyroidism LeCompte[4] has described a reduction in the width of the adrenal cortex in Graves disease

Graves disease may occur at any age The greatest frequency however is noted between the ages of twenty and forty years The incidence of the disorder is far greater in females than in males In regions where goiter is non-endemic the female preponderance is in a ratio of 4 to 1 [11] In endemic areas this ratio is much lower being 4 to 3 [12] an incidence similar to that of nontoxic goiter in the same region [1] suggesting a relationship between toxic and nontoxic goiter [12] It was claimed by McClendon and Hathaway[14] that the geographic distribution in the United States of simple goiter and hyperthyroidism was similar However in Sweden no such correlation was noted [15] Finally it is evident that there is no dearth of thyrotoxicosis in non-endemic areas A familial incidence of the disorder has been noted by various observers [17, 106] There is some seasonal variation in the occurrence of thyrotoxicosis the greatest incidence generally occurring during the spring and falling off appreciably during the fall months.[44]

Of great interest is the report of Iversen[15] on an epidemic wave of thyrotoxicosis in Denmark during World War II. Although Plummer[19] had previously reported an epidemic rise in the incidence of thyrotoxicosis in Olmsted County, Minnesota, in the years 1924 to 1927, it is possible that this represented simply an increase in frequency of hospitalization of the afflicted individuals. The Danish epidemic was apparently unrelated to the stress of German occupation since no such increase occurred in occupied Belgium, Holland, or Norway. It was probably unrelated to diet and in due time the epidemic spontaneously subsided. A suitable etiologic explanation for the epidemic is still lacking.

The Pathology of Graves' Disease.—In diffuse goiter associated with Graves' disease the thyroid is firm, enlarged, and hyperplastic. Grossly it may be red in color as a result of the marked vascularity.[0] The cut surface of the gland appears meaty and no colloid is visible. The microscopic examination reveals the cells to be tall columnar. Cytologic evidences of the hyperplasia include hypertrophy of the Golgi apparatus[0] and an increased number of mitochondria.[1] The follicles contain scant amounts of a pale staining colloid. The follicular epithelium is elevated and folded in papillary like projections that encroach on the lumen of the acini. Distributed throughout the highly vascular interstitium there are large and small lymphoid follicles. If the gland is removed following the administration of iodine to the patient, marked involutionary changes occur. The height of the follicular epithelium is reduced, the cells appear cuboidal and colloid is abundant and dark staining. The acini are larger and the solid islands of epithelium which are noted in the untreated gland are less abundant.

In the thyroid of the patient with toxic nodular goiter the hyperplasia and hypertrophy may be diffuse, or localized to the nodule or even to the extranodular tissue. Following iodine therapy involutionary changes are observed wherever hyperplasia had previously been present. Enlargement of the thymus, lymph nodes, and spleen are frequently observed.[23] This is part of the hyperplasia of lymphatic tissue so commonly encountered in hyperthyroidism. The pituitary gland may be enlarged and the percentage of chromophobe cells in the adenohypophysis is often increased, while the percentage of eosinophils is decreased. The basophil cells according to Kraus[22] frequently show vacuolization. Means,[13] however, found no abnormalities in the hypophysis in 4 patients and Holst[13] was unable to find any significant changes in the group he studied. No constant changes have been noted in the parathyroid glands. Rarely the gonads may show some atrophic changes.[13] The findings in the adrenal cortex are of interest. Although in the experimental animal exogenous thyroid intoxication results in adrenal cortical hypertrophy, in the thyrotoxic patient the adrenal cortex is narrowed.[4] At postmortem examination the heart is enlarged and hypertrophied in approximately half the cases.[4,6,27] However, studies by Friedberg and Sohval[8] would indicate that the cardiac hypertrophy observed in hyperthyroidism is generally associated with other etiologic factors, except in those instances in which auricular fibrillation is present The histologic findings in the heart are inconstant and not particularly characteristic of hyperthyroidism It is possible that the lymphocytic and histiocytic infiltration, as well as the myocardial necrosis and fibrosis so often observed represent the result of ancillary pathologic processes, such as coronary sclerosis rather than hyperthyroidism [9–31]

In approximately 90 per cent of the patients with thyrotoxicosis the liver may show marked fatty changes with focal and sometimes central areas of necrosis [32–35] These changes may be extensive enough to result in atrophy and occasionally in cirrhosis The cirrhotic changes are characterized by dilatation of the portal canals with a periportal lymphocytic infiltration A network of thin strands of connective tissue unite the affected canals and impart a fine nodularity to the liver Beaver and Pemberton[36] have studied the liver at postmortem examination in 107 patients with thyrotoxicosis They found that the hepatic lesions were predominantly of three types The most common lesion was that of acute degenerative changes with fatty infiltration and focal and central necrosis The next most common change observed was that of atrophy which was present in two thirds of the patients In these instances the average weight of the livers was 1 316 grams Subacute toxic atrophy and cirrhosis which was the third type of alteration encountered was present in over half the cases It is important to emphasize that these observations were made in patients who died of hyperthyroidism and therefore probably represent extreme changes More recent studies in which liver puncture biopsies were performed for the most part failed to reveal these changes[3, 318]

Although lymphocytic infiltration of the skeletal musculature has been reported these changes are by no means constant Such lymphocytic infiltration may also be observed in the musculature of the eyeball[39-3] Studies conducted in our laboratory[40] have demonstrated that exophthalmos in the guinea pig induced by the administration of thyrotropin is associated with a marked increase in the mucoprotein and water content of the retro-orbital tissue A similar substance is found in the pretibial myxedema sometimes encountered in patients in association with postoperative severe exophthalmos[41 4 L.B 324-1.6]

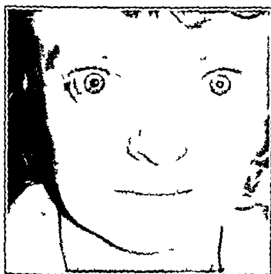

FIG 96 —Recurrent Graves disease with severe exophthalmos

The Signs and Symptoms of Graves Disease — The signs and symptoms observed in Graves disease are mostly the result of the excessive production of thyroid hormone by the thyroid gland Our present conception of the pathogenesis of diffuse toxic goiter envisages the excessive production of thyrotropin which stimulates the thyroid gland to hypertrophy and hyperplasia with the resultant elaboration of more thyroid hormone than is necessary for purely physiologic needs In addition to the fundamental action of thyrotropin there is some evidence to indicate that this or related fractions exercises a direct effect on some tissues other than that of the thyroid gland[317] Malignant exophthalmos and pretibial myxedema probably represent such effects while the other clinical manifestations of Graves disease are due to the presence of excessive amounts of thyroid hormone However Werner[18] holds the opinion that diffuse toxic goiter arises from mechanisms not mediated through the adenohypophysis The clinical symptomatology associated with toxic adenoma in contrast to that observed in diffuse toxic goiter would suggest that all of the manifestations in the former group were due to the thyroid hormone alone.

In comparing the clinical manifestations of diffuse toxic goiter and toxic adenoma the symptoms and the goiter appear concomitantly in the former usually prior to the age of thirty five. The thyroid is diffusely enlarged and the eye signs and the nervous and emotional symptoms are marked. Tachycardia is common but auricular fibrillation is infrequent. In toxic nodular goiter on the other hand there is usually a history of goiter antedating the onset of the symptoms. The patients are usually past the age of forty. The eye signs and emotional manifestations are minimal but auricular fibrillation and heart disease are common. The frequency with which recurrence occurs following surgery is much less in the latter group than in the former. However inasmuch as many of the manifestations in both diffuse and toxic nodular goiter are similar we shall discuss the manifestations of both types of syndrome together pointing out where necessary the details in which they differ.

Although the thyrotoxic patient may be of any age the group most frequently affected is between twenty and forty years of age. The disease is much more common in females, being 4 times as frequent as in males. There is no characteristic bodily habitus. We have observed both obese and emaciated patients with thyrotoxicosis. For the most part their nutritional status appears to be adequate probably because the ravenous appetite so often present in this disorder has prevented more than a moderate weight loss. The typical facies is characterized by prominent or bulging eyes and an anxious unblinking expression. The hands tremble, the skin is warm and moist and the patients tend to speak volubly and rapidly. They fidget constantly and are rarely at rest. This clinical picture is that of a patient with diffuse toxic goiter.

In toxic nodular goiter the clinical manifestations may be similar except for the absence of the striking eye signs. In this group the eyes may be bright and glittering but exophthalmos is uncommon. The so-called apathetic Graves' disease in which the symptoms of hyperthyroidism are subdued is much more frequently encountered in toxic nodular goiter than in toxic diffuse goiter.

In thyrotoxicosis the hair and skin are thin and of a smooth, silky texture.[46] The skin is warm and moist, and sweating is increased. These patients usually manifest intolerance to heat and prefer cold to hot weather. An erythema is commonly noted over the pressure areas particularly over the elbows, knuckles and thenar and hypothenar eminences of the palms. Dermatographia can generally be readily elicited. Although in 50 per cent of the patients increased pigmentation of the skin is noted the mucous membranes remain free.[46] Vitiligo occurs in approximately 10 per cent. Alopecia of the scalp may occur during the course of the illness and Williams[5] has pointed out that the axillary hair is markedly decreased. Premature graying of the hair may be encountered. The nails may exhibit longitudinal or transverse grooves. In the male gynecomastia is occasionally seen. This may be due to the associated liver damage with impaired estrogen detoxification.

Goiter is usually present, although instances of functional thyroid hyperactivity without anatomic enlargement do occur. It should be emphasized that the gland may be intrathoracic and hence may not present at its usual location. In such instances it could be detected by roentgen examination, or profile studies with radioactive iodine.[164] In diffuse enlargement of the thyroid the gland remains smooth and becomes firm to the touch. The increase in size is usually symmetrical, but one lobe may be larger than the other. In toxic nodular goiter the gland is irregularly enlarged. In toxic goiter, the gland becomes markedly vascular and a thrill may be palpable or a bruit audible. Such findings are of great confirmatory value in establishing the diagnosis. However, they are not always present nor necessarily pathognomonic since a bruit is occasionally heard over a nontoxic goiter. A thrill, however, is rarely felt in the absence of thyrotoxicosis.[13] Lerman[13] found a bruit to be present in 77 per cent and a thrill in 38 per cent of patients with thyrotoxicosis. Pressure symptoms may result from enlargement of the thyroid, although this occurs more commonly in association with the nodular variety. Such symptoms, however, are much less frequent in toxic than in nontoxic goiter. Evidences of pressure are cough, some difficulty in breathing and swallowing, and compression of the trachea and occasionally of the esophagus. Hoarseness is unusual, although a recurrent nerve type of paralysis of the vocal cord occasionally occurs. This manifestation is far more common in malignancy and inflammatory disease of the thyroid than in thyrotoxicosis.

The presence of a goiter is so frequent in hyperthyroidism that if none is readily apparent, one should search for an aberrant location of the gland. Not only may the gland reside anywhere along its embryologic course from the base of the tongue to its adult location in front of the trachea, but it may be found in a retrosternal or intrathoracic position.

The Circulation in Hyperthyroidism – The augmented metabolic requirements of the patient with thyrotoxicosis increase the burden on the circulation. In an effort to compensate for the increment in the metabolic needs of the tissues, both the cardiac output and the circulatory rate are markedly increased. The increase in the cardiac output is effected chiefly by an acceleration in the heart rate and minimally, if at all, by an increase in stroke volume.[49,51] It is for this reason that patients with hyperthyroidism have a marked tachycardia which is present while the patient is awake and asleep.[50] The systolic and mean pressure in the right ventricle and pulmonary artery are increased while the diastolic pressure remains unaltered. Associated with these changes there is an increase in the pulmonary blood flow, although no change occurs in the pulmonary vascular resistance. Despite the increase in cardiac output there is no change in the hepatic blood flow.[219] Since the oxygen requirement of the body may be increased as much as 50 to 100 per cent, the cardiac output may be doubled. It may, however, be augmented even more than the increase in oxygen requirement would suggest, for the arteriovenous difference is almost always reduced in thyrotoxicosis.[51] The circulation time is markedly accelerated and in the absence of heart failure is generally less than ten seconds when measured from arm to tongue.[52,53] Although Blumgart and his coworkers[53] have reported a direct correlation between the circulatory rate and the basal metabolic rate this is not consistently observed The circulating blood volume is increased by approximately 10 per cent[54] In Graves disease, the blood flow through the skin is increased In normal subjects only 3 per cent of the cardiac output is routed through the skin, while in hyperthyroidism 6 per cent of the output flows through the cutaneous vessels Direct observation of these vessels by means of capillary microscopy reveals the marked dilatation[48] which is probably at least in part the result of increased tissue metabolism The venous return is increased and contributes to the augmented cardiac output The work of the heart is performed much less efficiently in a patient with thyrotoxicosis than in the normal subject[36 57] Exercise or any factors which increase the cardiac load are carried out only at the cost of excessive increases in cardiac output and oxygen consumption It is for this reason that heart failure is more likely to occur in the thyrotoxic patient when hypertension or coronary artery disease further lessen the efficiency of the heart

The subjective symptoms of which the patients with hyperthyroidism frequently complain are palpitation exertional dyspnea and precordial pain Palpitation may accompany the tachycardia or may represent premature contractions or paroxysmal episodes of auricular fibrillation or rarely auricular flutter It is possible that the sensation experienced may reflect the hyperactivity of the ventricular muscle A throbbing sensation in the neck due to the marked pulsation of the neck vessels is a frequent complaint Since the ordinary oxygen needs of the resting thyrotoxic patient are increased and the vital capacity is decreased[58] minimal or moderate exertion will be reflected in dyspnea which is not necessarily the result of heart failure This is particularly true in places of high altitude where dyspnea is one of the most common complaints noted in thyrotoxicosis The precordial pain which is sometimes encountered is usually mild and of a dull and aching character This symptom was complained of in 16 per cent of the group of patients reported by Lerman and Means[28] At times true angina pectoris may occur This may be due to episodes of paroxysmal arrhythmia or it may be the result of the increased strain of the thyrotoxicosis on a heart with coronary arteriosclerosis Both types of angina may be alleviated by the treatment of the thyrotoxicosis

On examination the cardiac apical impulse is easily detected because of its forcefulness Clinically in uncomplicated thyrotoxicosis the heart is usually not enlarged but the sounds are loud and thumping in character The first apical sound is often accentuated and may be confused with that heard in mitral stenosis Both basal sounds are increased in intensity and a systolic murmur may be audible over the whole precordium In addition there is dilatation of the pulmonary artery which can be demonstrated by a teleoroentgenogram of the heart The systolic blood pressure is usually increased and the diastolic pressure is slightly decreased with a resultant high pulse pressure The carotid vessels pulsate forcibly and reflect this increase in the pulse pressure usually suggests the coexistence of some other form of heart disease, although it may occur in the presence of continuous auricular fibrillation or heart failure. The electrocardiogram in hyperthyroidism is usually characterized by prominent P waves in all leads.[6] The T-waves may be high but this is an inconstant feature.

On fluoroscopic and roentgenologic examination the heart is usually found to be normal in size The pulsations of the left ventricle are forceful the pulmonary artery segment is prominent but no enlargement of any of the cardiac chambers is demonstrable The presence of cardiac enlargement

Paroxysmal auricular fibrillation was encountered in 10 per cent of a series of 7000 patients with hyperthyroidism, and continuous auricular fibrillation occurred in 6 per cent.[59,60] The latter is generally, although not always, preceded by paroxysmal episodes. Auricular fibrillation occurs much more commonly in toxic nodular goiter than in diffuse goiter. It is relatively uncommon before the age of forty-five years and is rare under the age of thirty; it occurs with a somewhat greater frequency in males. Episodes of paroxysmal auricular fibrillation, particularly in the younger age group, should raise the suspicion of the presence of hyperthyroidism. In the older age group the incidence of auricular fibrillation increases in proportion to the duration of the thyrotoxicosis.[59,60] Neither paroxysmal nor continuous auricular fibrillation respond satisfactorily to treatment with either quinidine or digitalis unless the underlying hyperthyroidism is brought under control. Following the successful treatment of the thyrotoxicosis, the episodes of paroxysmal auricular fibrillation will generally eventually cease, although such episodes occurring at infrequent intervals may continue for years. One-third of the patients with continuous auricular fibrillation will be spontaneously restored to normal rhythm following the successful treatment of the hyperthyroidism, and in a considerable percentage of the remainder normal sinus rhythm will be established with the aid of quinidine.

The development of congestive heart failure is rare in uncomplicated thyrotoxicosis and particularly uncommon in patients under the age of forty. When other forms of heart disease complicate hyperthyroidism, heart failure has been reported to occur in 25 per cent of the patients.[6] This is in contrast to an over-all incidence of only 4.4 per cent in a series of 1000 patients which included various age groups and both complicated and uncomplicated thyrotoxicosis.[60] The incidence of congestive failure markedly increases after the onset of auricular fibrillation. One half of this latter group manifests congestive failure, an incidence which is four times as great as that observed in patients with normal rhythm.[59] Similarly, half the patients with heart failure and thyrotoxicosis have auricular fibrillation.[60] Lahey and Hurxthal[61] found that with the correction of the hyperthyroid state, cardiac compensation could be permanently restored in 95 per cent of their patients. The usual therapeutic measures employed for heart failure are relatively ineffective until the thyrotoxicosis is controlled. It is perhaps important to emphasize that the clinical picture of hyperthyroidism may be overshadowed by intractable congestive failure. Such masked hyperthyroidism should be suspected where heart failure or irregularities of cardiac rhythm which are usually amenable to proper therapy fail to respond. Yohalem, Bartro and Silver[219] studied the urinary excretion of radioactive iodine and the serum protein bound iodine in 55 patients with continuous auricular fibrillation in whom overt clinical evidence of thyrotoxicosis was lacking. In 8 patients of this group the twenty-four hour urinary excretion of I^{131} was less than 20 per cent, and in another 5 patients was between 20 and 30 per cent. In 8 of these 13 patients, the serum protein bound iodine was above 8 micrograms per cent. It would seem then that 15 per cent of this group of 55 patients with auricular fibrillation had masked hyperthyroidism.

Hepatic Manifestations.—Jaundice is rarely encountered in hyperthyroidism. Since this complication appears in the severe thyrotoxic state its rarity today may be due to the early institution of treatment. At the Lahey Clinic jaundice was encountered in 0.5 per cent of patients with hyperthyroidism[68] while in our hospital it occurred in 2 of 26 fatal cases of thyrotoxicosis.[69] However evidence of impaired hepatic function has been reported in 90 per cent of patients with Graves' disease when a battery of liver function tests are employed.[69] This however is by no means a constant finding[316] and perhaps depends on the duration and severity of the thyrotoxicosis. Thiamine deficiency so often present in hyperthyroidism may contribute to the functional impairment of the liver.

Gastrointestinal Symptoms.—The appetite is usually ravenously increased although anorexia has been noted in some patients. Despite the increase in appetite and food intake weight loss is almost always present. Nausea and vomiting are uncommon but looseness of the bowels and even diarrhea is frequent. Achlorhydria is present in one third of the patients but free hydrochloric acid may return with the successful treatment of the hyperthyroidism.[66,67]

The Blood in Hyperthyroidism.—The red blood cell count and hemoglobin are usually at normal levels. The total white blood cell count is often somewhat reduced and the differential study reveals a relative lymphocytosis.[64] An absolute increase in the monocytes has been reported.[6] A reduction in the neutrophilic leukocytes usually occurs but the eosinophils may be increased to 3 to 6 per cent. Lymphadenopathy is frequent in hyperthyroidism and although the spleen is usually enlarged it is not often palpable.

Genitourinary Manifestations.—Mild menstrual disturbances are often noted in hyperthyroidism and oligomenorrhea or even amenorrhea may be present.[30] Menorrhagia is less frequently observed. Sterility is somewhat increased in both males and females with hyperthyroidism.

Renal function is unimpaired and despite the increase in the urinary excretion of calcium renal calculi are only rarely encountered.[39]

The Skeletal System in Hyperthyroidism.—Hyperthyroidism is frequently associated with decalcification and osteoporosis. As a consequence of the bony alterations collapse of one or more vertebrae may occur. Thyroidectomy or the medical correction of the thyrotoxicosis will result in amelioration of the bone pain but usually there is little or no x-ray evidence of recalcification. The x-ray picture encountered in hyperthyroidism is that of bone atrophy. The cortex becomes thin and there may be multiple small eroded areas of the trabeculae[31] but there are no cysts or giant cell tumors and no dilated Haversian canals are seen. The serum calcium phosphorus and alkaline phosphatase levels are usually normal but occasionally the serum calcium level may be elevated.[137,3] However anatomically cases have been reported in which in addition to evidences of osteoporosis extensive osteitis fibrosa is found[138] Albright and Reifenstein[46] believe that most of the skeletal manifestations may represent the secondary effects of nitrogen wastage and in those patients in the menopause are the effects of senile osteoporosis

Neuropsychiatric and Muscular Manifestations in Hyperthyroidism — The thyrotoxic individual is markedly hyperkinetic It has been suggested by Waldenstrom[78] that the depletion of the body stores of iodine produces many of the neurologic phenomena of hyperthyroidism including paraphasia acalculia, psychosis with hallucinations bulbar palsy coma myoencephalopathy, and choreoathetotic movements These occur especially he says in thyroid crisis and are markedly ameliorated by the administration of iodine Psychoses may be precipitated by the onset of thyrotoxicosis It is particularly important that these patients be treated promptly since cure or amelioration of the psychotic state often follows the successful treatment of the thyrotoxicosis It seems likely that hyperthyroidism per se does not produce a psychosis but allows a dormant psychotic state to become manifest Indeed no special type of psychosis was noted in a large series of patients with hyperthyroidism studied by Dunlap and Moersch[1] The most commonly encountered types were toxic exhaustion occurring chiefly in the young patients with exophthalmic goiter acute delirium noted frequently in the older individuals with nodular toxic goiter and manic depressive states Rawson and Schwab[139] have reported acceleration of cortical rhythm in the electroencephalographic tracing in hyperthyroidism while Condon and his coworkers[33] noted patterns resembling those seen in epilepsy although no convulsive seizures occurred With adequate treatment for the hyperthyroidism the electroencephalographic pattern altered towards normal

Muscle disorders are frequently associated with hyperthyroidism[7, 84, 90, 93] In acute thyrotoxic myopathy there may occur a rapidly developing bulbar palsy and a generalized weakness often ending in early death Thyroidectomy or alleviation of the hyperthyroidism is often followed by recovery[70, 74] It has been suggested that the myopathies like some of the neurologic manifestations result from depletion of the body iodine stores and may be improved by the administration of iodine[76] Thyrotoxic periodic paralysis has been reported with cure following thyroidectomy[77] In chronic thyrotoxic myopathy[5, 150] there is noted symmetrical wasting of the limbs and extremities especially of the proximal portions Coarse muscular fibrillations are observed and the tendon reflexes are diminished Creatinuria is usually found Lymphocytic infiltrations of the muscles similar to that seen in myasthenia gravis have been reported although prostigmine is of no value in treatment Complete recovery is to be expected after cure of the hyperthyroidism[5] When myasthenia gravis is present in association with thyrotoxicosis the former is aided by prostigmine but not by thyroidectomy[7, 80] Myotonia, on the other hand has been reported in myxedema Following treatment of the hypothyroidism the signs of the myotonia disappear[70, 81] The most important muscular disorder encountered in hyperthyroidism however is that of exophthalmic ophthalmoplegia[72]

The Eye —The eye signs may be classified as 1 the lid signs 2 the external changes in the lids or eyes 3 the extraocular palsies and ptoses, and 4 exophthalmos The lid signs may occur in either diffuse or nodular toxic goiter, as well as in simple nontoxic adenoma and occasionally in individuals free from thyroid disease The external changes which are less common in occurrence than the lid signs are observed more frequently in diffuse toxic goiter but are also seen in toxic adenoma The rare extraocular palsies and ptoses are found almost exclusively in diffuse toxic goiter This is equally true of exophthalmos [73 75 6 83-86] The lid signs are several in number Widening of the palpebral fissure on fixation (Dalrymple s sign) is due to lid retraction It is noted in 9 per cent of patients with toxic adenoma and in 18 per cent of patients with diffuse goiter [83] Lid-lag (Von Graefe s sign) is much more frequent occurring in 4 out of 5 patients with diffuse toxic goiter in 2 out of 3 with toxic nodular goiter and in 1 out of 3 patients with simple nontoxic goiter [83] Infrequent blinking (Stellwag) absence of gaze (Jeffroy) difficulty in eversion of the lid (Gifford) and tremor of the closed lid (Rosenbach) are other lid signs observed less frequently The exact mechanism for the production of these signs is unknown Among the possibilities suggested are those of central nervous system changes similar to those encountered in encephalitis and instability of the autonomic innervation of the eye In any event any explanation must account for the relaxation of the orbicularis oculi the contraction of the levator palebrae, and the tonic contraction of the involuntary smooth muscles of the lids

The external ocular changes include weakness of convergence (Moebius) pigmentation of the skin of the lids (Jellinek) dilatation of the pupil following the instillation of adrenalin into the conjunctival sac (Loewi) and excessive lacrimation The genesis of these signs is similarly obscure The extraocular palsies are rare occurring in approximately one third of 1 per cent of patients with diffuse toxic goiter [70 76] They may be divided into two groups The first group consists of single or multiple extraocular palsies associated with exophthalmos and severe thyrotoxicosis Complete bilateral or unilateral ophthalmoplegia with or without ptosis may occur Following correction of the hyperthyroidism the exophthalmos and palsies usually improve In this group there is a tendency for the muscles of elevation to be impaired first but any muscle may be involved and different muscles in each eye may become paretic The other group of ocular palsies and exophthalmos occurs in association with mild hyperthyroidism and even occasionally without hyperthyroidism The eye manifestations in this group either stay unimproved or as is more generally the case become worse after treatment of the hyperthyroidism This type of disorder has been variously referred to as exophthalmic ophthalmoplegia [7] malignant exophthalmos [91] progressive exophthalmos following thyroidectomy [89] and Graves disease with dissociation of thyrotoxicosis and ophthalmopathy [87]

The genesis of the muscle palsies of the first group has not definitely been determined It has been suggested that they may result from stretching of the extraocular muscles However often a considerable degree of exophthalmos may be present without weakness of any of the muscles Organic changes in the muscles consisting of lymphocytic infiltration and myo-

fibrosis have been described, but these alterations appear to be rare in this group Mulvany s explanation[88] that the fibers undergo wasting with loss of striation, granulation of the sarcoplasm, and reduplication of the sarcolemmal nuclei does not appear to be tenable The suggestion that this type of disorder is a manifestation of myasthenia gravis is also not acceptable since prostigmine is without effect on the involved muscles

The syndrome of malignant exophthalmos is an extremely serious one In contrast to the incidence of ordinary exophthalmic goiter it is more common in men than in women and is usually noted in middle life As has been previously mentioned the metabolic manifestations in association with the eye signs may be minimal or absent Indeed, the eye symptoms are usually markedly aggravated following subtotal thyroidectomy and, to a lesser extent perhaps with the use of the non surgical measures for the treatment of the thyrotoxicosis The exophthalmos may become so marked that closure of the lids is impossible The cornea being uncovered and unprotected becomes dry and opaque, and secondary ulceration may occur. In extreme cases the eyes may be lost and even after enucleation the orbital contents may continue to swell and enlarge The recognition of this disorder is therefore important Although the presence of the syndrome may become obvious after thyroidectomy has been performed, it is essential that the diagnosis be established prior to that stage The important points are emphasized by Woods[6] as follows

In the early stages the degree of protrusion may be slight but it usually progresses until it becomes extreme It may be unequal on the two sides Whether the exophthalmos is slight or extreme it is usually accompanied by chemosis swelling of the lids reduction in motility of the eye and disturbances in muscle coordination symptoms of epiphora hyperemia and edema of the conjunctivæ photophobia a sensation of hard resistance when the effort is made to reduce the exophthalmos by pressure on the globes The extraocular paralyses and disturbances of muscle coordination have certain peculiarities especially emphasized by Brain[2] These are the frequent involvement of muscle groups moving the eyes in one plane especially elevation Only rarely is the ophthalmoplegia total usually isolated muscles or combinations of the recti and obliques being affected The usual thyrotoxic lid signs are absent edema being the main symptom Impairment of vision from optic neuritis is relatively common The pupillary reactions are normal Ptosis is more common than retraction of the lids Frequently marked proliferation beyond the lid margin is observed According to Means and his associates[76 87] this syndrome is characterized by only a slight enlargement of the thyroid, meager evidences of hyperthyroidism marked ocular symptoms particularly that of orbital edema and a rapid subsidence of the metabolic signs and symptoms following the administration of iodine The eye muscles on pathologic examination exhibit a hypertrophic myositis with interstitial fibrosis, edema and lymphocytic infiltration[92 93] It is probable that the palsies result from the stretching and fibrosis of the muscles It is important to bear in mind that the exophthalmos may occasionally be unilateral In those instances the differentiation from a retro-orbital tumor must be considered X rays of the orbit in the latter instance will show destruction of the bone or foramina, whereas in malignant exophthalmos no bony alteration occurs

The pathogenesis of exophthalmos is still a matter of dispute although it has been vigorously pursued by many investigators [75, 6, 91, 103, 313]. It is apparently not due to the thyroid hormone itself since the disorder is frequently noted in the presence of the euthyroid state and may be aggravated concomitantly with the development of the hypothyroid state. Moreover it is occasionally helped by the administration of thyroid extract. A more commonly accepted explanation is the one which envisages the syndrome as resulting from an overproduction of an adenohypophyseal hormone possibly thyrotropin or more likely an as yet unidentified pituitary fraction found in association with the thyrotropin [317]. The administration of crude thyrotropin to the guinea pig will produce a transient exophthalmos which is more marked in the thyroidectomized animal [98, 100].

Exophthalmos in general is present in over half of all patients with diffuse toxic goiter [75, 6]. The degree may be roughly measured by an exophthalmometer. In normal subjects the degree of protrusion of the eye when measured by this instrument may be as much as 16 mm, but in individuals with myopia may be greater. In diffuse toxic goiter the exophthalmometric readings usually vary between 16 and 24 mm. When exophthalmos is greater than 24 mm exposure of the cornea and its sequelæ may follow. Severe exophthalmos may rarely result in papilledema and optic atrophy. Although it has long been taught that the nonmalignant forms of exophthalmos recede following treatment of the hyperthyroidism, recent studies would indicate that this is rather infrequent and more often a slight increase probably occurs [96, 97]. The apparent clinical improvement in the degree of exophthalmos is probably due to disappearance of the stare.

It is quite generally accepted that in clinical and experimental exophthalmos one or all of the following changes may be encountered: hypertrophy of the orbital contents, a hypertrophic myositis, relaxation of the striated extraocular muscles, edema of the orbital contents, dilatation of the orbital blood vessels and contraction of the smooth muscles of the orbit or lids. It seems unlikely that contraction of the smooth muscles of the orbit plays much of a role in human exophthalmos inasmuch as these muscles are only vestigial remnants. It is equally unlikely that either dilatation of the vessels or relaxation of the striated musculature is important. Although hypertrophy of the orbital contents could theoretically produce exophthalmos, it is more likely that edema plays a more significant part. Smelser[98, 100] was able to produce exophthalmos in the guinea pig by the use of thyrotropin. The changes were more marked in the thyroidectomized animal and were less following the administration of thyroxin. The experimental exophthalmos was not prevented by extirpation of the cervical sympathetics nor of Mueller's muscle. The orbital contents with the exception of the lacrimal gland participated in the increase in weight. These structures included the fatty connective tissue, the extraocular muscles and the dorsal lacrimal gland. Histologically, the edema was marked and permeated the connective tissue. The changes were quite similar to those noted in clinical exophthalmos. These findings were subsequently confirmed by Paulson[99] and Aird[91]. Rundle and Pochin[304] working with human material reported that the water content of the fat free tissue was normal but that the fat content of the orbit was markedly increased On the other hand Pochin[305] found results similar to those of Sinclser following the injection of pituitary extracts in the guinea pig This problem was further investigated in our laboratory [40] We found an increase in the hexosamine and water content of the orbital tissues in the exophthalmos of guinea pigs treated with thyrotropin This would suggest that the edema of the orbital tissues was probably due to the hydrophilic action of the increased mucoprotein content

A possible explanation for the relatively high incidence of malignant exophthalmos in men may be found in the report of Marine [10] He observed that in the rabbit exophthalmos secondary to thyrotropin administration may be checked by castration and accelerated by testosterone [10] This might also explain the beneficial effects occasionally noted following the use of stilbestrol Dobyns [307] however failed to confirm these observations [97]

The effects of the treatment of the hyperthyroidism on the exophthalmos encountered in Graves disease has been reported by several observers Careful serial measurements would seem to controvert the casual and commonly accepted impression that the exophthalmos of most patients with hyperthyroidism improves following subtotal thyroidectomy The disappearance of lid retraction and associated eye signs conveys this impression of improvement but when careful exophthalmetric readings are employed 75 to 97 per cent of the patients exhibit an increase in protrusion of the eyeballs [278,307] Following x ray treatment of the thyrotoxicosis however Soley[278] found a further progression of the exophthalmos in only 20 per cent Dobyns[307] found that of 11 patients treated with thiouracil 7 showed an increase in exophthalmos of over 1 mm [131,30] Beierwaltes[301] separated his patients with thyrotoxicosis into two groups those with malignant exophthalmos and those with the nonmalignant variety Both groups were treated with thiouracil Of the latter group only 10 per cent showed progression of the exophthalmos while all 7 patients with malignant exophthalmos showed progression With the use of radioactive iodine Soley and his associates [71] found an increase in exophthalmos of 1.5 mm or more in 30 per cent of 50 patients as compared to 26 per cent following x ray therapy and 50 to 60 per cent following subtotal thyroidectomy The incidence of malignant exophthalmos is fortunately so uncommon that a large statistical series concerned with the effects of various forms of therapy has not as yet been accumulated However the evidence would tend to indicate that malignant exophthalmos probably progresses following any definitive therapy directed at the thyrotoxicosis Whether the progression is less with the use of radioactive iodine or x ray therapy as compared to subtotal thyroidectomy or treatment with the goitrogens is not certain Most observers feel however that the prognosis is least favorable following subtotal thyroidectomy In the nonmalignant variety the use of comparatively slow acting therapeutic agents such as x ray therapy radioactive iodine and the goitrogens seems to be associated with less risk of inducing further exophthalmos than does the use of surgery

The treatment of malignant exophthalmos is dependent on the stage at which the diagnosis is established Subtotal thyroidectomy should be avoided and medical measures should be employed to treat the thyrotoxicosis. The administration of thyroid hormone, stilbestrol, and even more rarely iodine, may sometimes arrest or improve the disorder [13, 133, 1 4] The rationale for these modes of therapy is based on their supposed ability to inhibit the secretion of thyrotropin and on the part of iodine to inactivate it [133] Studies with the use of cortisone and ACTH suggest that these agents may be beneficial in some instances of exophthalmos [311 3 6] X-ray directed at the hypophysis has been employed with variable success [109 1] but is worth trying. If the eye signs are progressive, various surgical procedures may be necessary to save the eye. These include wedge excision of the conjunctiva, lateral tarsorrhaphy, and orbital decompression [9]

The Relationship of Diabetes Mellitus to Thyrotoxicosis.—The intestinal absorption of carbohydrates, including glucose and galactose, is accelerated by the thyroid hormone [111] The fasting blood sugar in hyperthyroidism is usually normal, although in some instances it may be slightly increased [11] Following the oral administration of glucose the blood sugar level at the end of one half hour is higher and subsequently falls more slowly than is observed in normal individuals. At the end of two hours, however, the blood sugar generally returns to a normal level [113] These abnormalities frequently disappear following thyroidectomy [114] Mild spontaneous glycosuria may be found in 40 per cent of the patients with diffuse toxic goiter and in 25 per cent of the patients with toxic adenoma [115] The high postprandial blood sugar level is probably related to the rapid intestinal absorption as well as to the depletion of liver glycogen. This latter results in a form of mild "starvation diabetes" which is unrelated to ordinary diabetes mellitus, since the thyroid has no direct effect on intermediary carbohydrate metabolism. Glucose is burned normally in patients with thyrotoxicosis and, indeed, following the ingestion of glucose [11] the respiratory quotient frequently rises more than in normal individuals. It has been demonstrated experimentally that the administration of thyroid extract facilitates the induction of alloxan and pituitary diabetes as well as the diabetes of the partially depancreatized animal [110] Thyroidectomy inhibits the development of experimental diabetes [110] In the experimental animal, diabetes increased by the administration of thyroid extract is characterized by a greater polyuria, a more severe loss of weight, and a greater insulin requirement than in the comparable non-thyroid treated diabetic animal. From a consideration of these factors it is therefore not astonishing that diabetes mellitus is exacerbated by the development of hyperthyroidism. Although hyperthyroidism is no more frequent in the diabetic than in the non-diabetic, diabetes is twice or even three times as common in patients with hyperthyroidism as in the euthyroid group. The incidence of diabetes mellitus is greater in patients with toxic adenoma than in those with diffuse toxic goiter. This probably is related to the older age of the former group [116] When the two diseases are associated, hyperthyroidism precedes the diabetes in 70 per cent of the patients [110]

Since the fasting and postprandial blood sugar levels are frequently elevated in the patient with thyrotoxicosis, the criteria ordinarily employed for the diagnosis of diabetes mellitus must be altered. The diagnosis of diabetes complicating hyperthyroidism should not be made when the fasting blood sugar level is below 130 mgm per cent or the maximum following the oral administration of glucose is less than 200 mgm per cent. In thyrotoxicosis the insulin requirement for the control of the diabetes is increased and hypoglycemia when it occurs due to insulin overdosage, is usually more severe because of the depletion of liver glycogen. The successful treatment of the hyperthyroidism results in amelioration of the diabetes. The prognosis of the patient with diabetes mellitus with cured hyperthyroidism is no different from that of the ordinary diabetic.[116]

Pregnancy in Relation to Hyperthyroidism.—The thyroid frequently enlarges during pregnancy. Although the basal metabolic rate is normal or slightly depressed during the first six months of gestation, it rises thereafter to somewhat above normal levels at term and then returns rapidly to the pre-pregnancy level.[117] The serum protein bound iodine rises during normal pregnancy to 9 to 11 micrograms per cent in the absence of any evidences of thyrotoxicosis. Hyperthyroidism is a rather infrequent complication of pregnancy, being encountered in less than 0.2 per cent.[117, 119, 120] Although the administration of thyroid extract is often advocated as a treatment for sterility, the fecundity of patients with hyperthyroidism is not noteworthy. Mussey[118] reported only 42 pregnancies in 7,228 female patients with hyperthyroidism (0.6 per cent). The severity of the hyperthyroidism may increase or decrease during pregnancy, but generally it remains unaltered. The fetus is usually unaffected by the thyrotoxic state of the mother, although a case of a cretin born to a hyperthyroid mother has been reported.[121] The incidence of toxemias of pregnancy appears to be somewhat increased in patients with thyrotoxicosis, as does the frequency of spontaneous abortion.[117, 122] Thyrotoxicosis per se does not constitute an indication for interruption of pregnancy. With proper treatment, the hyperthyroid state may be readily controlled and the pregnancy carried to a successful termination. Thyroidectomy is well tolerated.[118, 119, 122, 227] The risk attendant upon the surgery in these instances is no greater than that in the non-pregnant hyperthyroid women. In general, where surgery is decided upon, it is preferably performed during the first half of gestation. Today, hyperthyroidism occurring at any stage of pregnancy may be safely and satisfactorily treated with the goitrogens.[210, 214, 223] With these agents the hyperthyroidism may be well controlled, and if the mother is maintained at euthyroid levels no deleterious effects occur in the child.[210, 214] In a few instances some thyroidal enlargement has been observed in the newborn infant, but this subsides at a later date.[122] Breast feeding, however, should be avoided since the thiourea compounds are excreted in the milk.[123] The use of radioactive iodine is perhaps fraught with some hazard since the fetal thyroid begins to collect iodine during the fourteenth week of life.[126] Theoretically, it would therefore be possible to treat the mother with radioactive isotopes before this period with safety to the fetus. However, at present it is wiser to reserve this form of therapy to the nonpregnant thyrotoxic patients.

Pretibial (Localized) Myxedema.—Pretibial myxedema is relatively uncommon.[127] The lesion occurs almost invariably in patients with severe or malignant exophthalmos.[220] The frequency of this syndrome bears no relationship to the severity of the thyrotoxicosis, and indeed often occurs after subtotal thyroidectomy [4, 130, 135, 136] It appears in painless symmetrical patches of variable size but of definite outline on the anterior aspects of the lower half of the legs or the dorsal surfaces of the feet It has been described on the face, eyelids, and scrotum The skin overlying the lesions is thickened and pigskin like in appearance and red, cyanotic or yellow white in color It does not pit on pressure but will dimple following the local injection of hyaluronidase [41, 128] This would suggest that in part at least the involved area is infiltrated with a mucoproteinous material containing hyaluronic acid The microscopic examination of the lesion reveals the presence of edema and a mucoid degeneration of the corium secondary to a basophilic alteration of the collagen and elastin [134, 13]

The cause of the development of pretibial myxedema is unknown Because of its frequent association with severe exophthalmos, it is probable that they have a common underlying mechanism The treatment for pretibial myxedema as for severe exophthalmos is unsatisfactory Occasionally the former will subside spontaneously Any measures which reduce the basal metabolic rate will generally increase the severity of the lesions [4] Iodine thyroid extract and thyroxine however are equally ineffective The systemic and local use of generous amounts of cortisone may result in some remission of the lesions [3, 9]

Thyroid Storm — The extreme manifestations of thyrotoxicosis are exhibited in the clinical picture known as thyroid storm In this state the overwhelming thyroid intoxication results in marked restlessness delirium tachycardia vomiting and diarrhea dehydration and hyperpyrexia Death frequently ensues In some patients however the manifestations may be chiefly those of prostration hypotonia and mental apathy and the temperature may not rise above 101° F Thyroid storm may follow stress of any sort in a patient with thyrotoxicosis It is more likely to occur in severe hyperthyroidism Ordinarily storm is divided into two main categories referred to as medical and surgical storm We must emphasize that this is an artificial classification since the clinical manifestations are the same in both groups Medical storm may occur when the thyrotoxicosis becomes increasingly more severe or when a coincidental infection sets in Surgical storm may follow thyroidectomy for Graves disease or follow any surgical procedure however minor [143] Following thyroidectomy storm is more likely to occur if the hyperthyroidism has been inadequately controlled before operation This is particularly true where the nutrition is poor and there has been a failure to gain weight [139] The presence of a complicating illness such as infection or heart disease further increases the risk It has been suggested that part of the picture of storm reflects the effect of thyroxine on the heart and the sensitivity of the thyrotoxic heart to epinephrine-like compounds [144, 146] The cerebral symptoms encountered resemble those observed in anoxic anoxia The brain in hyperthyroidism appears to be markedly sensitive to anoxia [147, 148] Waldenstrom [9] has suggested that the acute myeloencephalopathies constitute a variety of apathetic storm which he attributes to depletion of the body iodine stores Others[140] have postulated that storm is associated with hypothyroxinemia and that both thyrotoxicosis[149] and thyroid storm

may be improved following the administration of thyroxine The evidence for these theses is meager

The pathologic findings in thyroid storm are minimal apart from those ordinarily encountered in hyperthyroidism Not infrequently bronchopneumonia is present Central necrosis and fatty degeneration of the liver were observed in 10 of 11 patients in one series[14] It is important to note the high incidence of cardiovascular disease in fatal cases of thyroid storm

The Treatment of Storm — Thyroid storm usually occurs within four to sixteen hours following subtotal thyroidectomy In thyrotoxic patients subjected to non thyroidal surgery delayed storm may occur as a consequence of a late postoperative complication Prophylaxis is the single most important measure in reducing the incidence of thyroid storm Patients with hyperthyroidism particularly those who are severely toxic must be treated promptly and vigorously until brought to euthyroid levels The treatment of thyrotoxicosis is discussed in detail elsewhere but it is important to emphasize at the moment that where radioactive iodine is employed for treatment it should be followed by iugolization or the administration of a goitrogen in order that amelioration of the disease be brought about promptly In the presence of any infection the administration of antibiotics in adequate dosage is indicated If surgery is to be carried out it must await satisfactory control of the hyperthyroid state

The active treatment of storm is as follows The patient is promptly placed in an oxygen tent and iodine is administered both orally and intravenously The former is given in the form of Lugol s solution in a dose of 30 to 40 drops and repeated every four to six hours In addition 1.0 gram of sodium iodide is given intravenously with similar frequency As the acute symptoms subside these medications are decreased in dosage and administered less often *Although propyl thiouracil has been recom*mended by some in the treatment of thyroid storm it is unlikely that this will have any immediate effect on the crisis but will decrease the amount of circulating thyroid hormone during the period following the acute episode The antibiotics are routinely used even if infection is not obviously present It is desirable to employ wet packs ice bags and other physical measures for decreasing the body temperature and increasing the dissipation of body heat A continuous intravenous drip of 5 per cent glucose in normal saline is administered to combat the dehydration and to increase the glycogen content of the liver Blood transfusions are given if indicated The use of adrenal cortical replacement therapy represents an important measure in the management of thyroid storm[13 18] For this purpose 100 mgm. of hydrocortisone should be given intravenously every four to six hours during the acute manifestations of the syndrome Adequate sedation plays an important role in the treatment of storm Enough sedation including morphine paraldehyde choral hydrate bromides or barbiturates is employed to control the restlessness and agitation

The Diagnosis of Hyperthyroidism — The diagnosis of hyperthyroidism is usually clinically evident and where it is obscure the laboratory procedures described in the previous chapter should be resorted to[151–156 182–187 331] It is important to differentiate hypermetabolic states without hyperthyroidism from true thyrotoxicosis In the former there is an increase in the basal metabolic rate, but none of the clinical manifestations of hyperthyroidism are present Such cases are encountered in 1 disorders of the blood forming organs severe anemia polycythemia leukemia multiple myeloma Hodgkin's disease lymphosarcoma, 2 cardiac disorders congestive heart failure some cases of hypertension arteriovenous aneurysm, 3 malignant tumors with or without metastases 4 extensive skin diseases with erythroderma and 5 Paget s disease of bone Patients with pheochromocytoma will often manifest an increase in the basal metabolic rate which may be associated with true mild hyperthyroidism or with hypermetabolism without clinical hyperthyroidism Silver and his colleagues[157] studied a group of patients with hypermetabolism and found that the plasma protein bound iodine and the urinary excretion of radioactive iodine were well within the normal range despite elevations of the metabolic rate to levels as high as +91 per cent

Neurocirculatory asthenia must be differentiated from Graves disease The former is characterized by dyspnea, precordial pain palpitation exhaustion and an inability to adjust to mental or physical strain There are of course no organic evidences of heart disease Moschcowitz and Bernstein [93] have suggested that neurocirculatory asthenia is a precursor of Graves' disease but most observers deny this Where the clinical differentiation is not certain the determination of the protein bound iodine or tracer studies with radioactive iodine will separate the two group

An important differential diagnosis of Graves disease is that of thyrotoxicosis due to the ingestion of thyroid extract Thyrotoxicosis factitia is differentiated from true hyperthyroidism by the fact that although the serum protein bound iodine is elevated in both groups the uptake of radioactive iodine is decreased and its urinary excretion markedly increased in the former state Following the ingestion of thyroid extract the functional activity of the thyroid gland is reduced and its behavior in respect to radioactive iodine may approach that of hypothyroidism The oral administration of considerable amounts of thyroid extract or triiodothyronine for a period of one to two weeks has been used to distinguish border line instances of hyperthyroidism from that of non toxic goiter In the former group the daily administration of as much as 9 grams of thyroid extract or 70 to 150 micrograms of triiodothyronine failed to result in a decrease in the thyroidal uptake of I_{131} below 20 per cent after 24 hours In the non toxic group this procedure generally results in a reduction in the uptake of radioactive iodine to levels below 20 per cent [33, 333]

The Treatment of Graves' Disease —Thyrotoxicosis may be treated either by medical or surgical means The latter usually consists of subtotal thyroidectomy after the patient has been suitably prepared The accepted modes of medical treatment include the use of iodine the thiourea derivatives or the administration of radioactive iodine

Although iodine had been employed in the treatment of hyperthyroidism as early as the nineteenth century its use in this disorder had fallen into disrepute Plummer [188] in 1923 again suggested its use particularly in the operative management of thyrotoxicosis From that time until the introduction of the thiourea derivatives it remained the drug of choice both for the preparation of patients for operation and for more prolonged conservative management The latter use was generally and commendably avoided except in instances of very mild hyperthyroidism and in patients with severe or potentially malignant exophthalmos The administration of iodine is followed within a few days by beginning subjective and objective improvement Within ten days to three weeks the tachycardia usually subsides a gain in weight takes place the patient becomes much less apprehensive and agitated and the basal metabolic rate has returned to a reasonable level [01] During iodine therapy the gland becomes somewhat firmer and histologic section at this time reveals considerable involutionary changes with a decrease in the hyperplasia The invaginated follicles become rounder and now contain colloid, and the lining epithelium becomes flatter [197] The Golgi apparatus changes in position from a site close to the blood supply to one nearer the follicles In addition to the decrease in the basal metabolic rate the blood cholesterol tends to rise and the serum protein bound iodine to fall However despite the improvement the patients still appear hyperthyroid and are by no means as well controlled as are those adequately prepared with the thiourea derivatives or after treatment with radioactive iodine or successful surgery The fall in the basal metabolic rate following the administration of iodine approximates the thyroxine decay curve [193–195] The maximum response to be expected is a fall of approximately 3 to 4.5 per cent a day [195 196] The mechanism by which these effects of iodine are brought about has not been entirely explained However some light has been thrown on this subject Rawson and his coworkers[198 00] have shown that thyrotropin is inactivated by iodine Our experimental studies however would suggest that iodine prevents the access of thyrotropin to the thyroid as a result of which thyrotropin appears in increasing amounts in the circulation [199] Chaikoff and Wolff have demonstrated that when the level of the inorganic iodine in the blood is elevated there is a decrease in the synthesis of organic iodine, although the gland is still capable of trapping inorganic iodine [189–191] It would seem likely therefore that there occurs a decrease in the conversion of diiodotyrosine to thyroid hormone [19] It is possible therefore that iodine exercises its therapeutic effects by either inactivating thyrotropin or preventing its access to the thyroid and by depressing the formation of organic iodine compounds It is important to note that iodine does not affect the circulating thyroid hormone This is evidenced by the fact that it exercises no influence on the symptoms of thyroid intoxication induced by the exogenous administration of thyroid hormone [01] The prolonged use of iodine in patients with hyperthyroidism may be associated with exacerbations of the disease Following withdrawal of the medication for a period of several weeks to several months the disease again becomes responsive to iodine medication Thompson and his coworkers demonstrated that the daily minimum completely effective dose of iodine was 6 mgm., or 1 drop of Lugol s solution Amounts less than this induced only a submaximal response while a larger dosage was of no greater therapeutic efficacy [02] The route of administration is a matter of indifference as is the chemical form in which it is given Thus potassium or sodium iodide, elementary iodine Lugol s solution, [03] or even diiodotyrosine, are equally effective [04]

Rienhoff[149] has reported that the administration of desiccated thyroid extract to patients with thyrotoxicosis will bring about a remission of the symptoms and enable these patients to be safely operated upon. Such glands however do not reveal the colloid involution which follows the use of more orthodox forms of iodine.[149] It is suggested by this author that the administration of thyroid extract in these instances causes thyroidal atrophy presumably as the result of the inhibition of thyrotropin. The amount of iodine in the dosage of thyroid extract employed (0.00132 mgm iodine per gram of thyroid) appears to be too small to exert any true iodine effect. The mechanism involved is further elucidated by the observation of Cortell and Rawson[19] who have shown that exogenous thyroxine not only inhibits the formation of thyrotropin but decreases the action of thyrotropin on the thyroid.

The question of iodine induced thyrotoxicosis (Jod Basedow) is a controversial one. Although such cases have been reported especially in areas of endemic goiter abroad, in our experience and in the experience of most observers in this country its occurrence is questionable.[312,313] The explanation for the development of Jod Basedow is based on the concept that a goiter long deprived of iodine when furnished with this substance produces thyroid hormone in excess and clinical thyrotoxicosis results. However when iodine prophylaxis for goiter was introduced into the United States no increase in thyrotoxicosis was noted. It seems more likely to us that in regions of endemic goiter where iodine deficiency has been long sustained those patients who ordinarily might have toxic goiter would presumably be unable to manufacture the hormone because of iodine lack. When iodine is then given for prophylaxis of the goiter the overt evidences of latent hyperthyroidism may then become manifest.

Lugol's solution is generally administered in a dosage of 1 to 10 minims 3 times a day. This may be given in milk or in orange juice to disguise the taste. In some instances hyperthyroidism can be controlled indefinitely by the administration of Lugol's solution. However such instances are comparatively few and are limited to the relatively mild case of thyrotoxicosis. Prior to the introduction of the thiourea derivatives most clinicians employed iodine chiefly for the preoperative preparation of the thyrotoxic patients. The introduction of the goitrogens and radioactive iodine into clinical medicine has to a great extent supplanted the use of iodine. It is still employed however in those patients who are prepared for operation with the thiourea derivatives. The gland of patients treated with the goitrogens is generally friable and vascular, thus increasing the technical difficulties attendant upon its removal. The administration of iodine for ten days prior to the operation in conjunction with the goitrogen will induce involution of the gland and facilitate the surgical procedure.[66]

The introduction of the thiourea derivatives constituted an important advance in the treatment of hyperthyroidism. Following the demonstration by Astwood and his group[207] and by the MacKenzies[08] of the goitrogenic and hypothyroid inducing potentialities of these drugs the application to clinical hyperthyroidism rapidly followed.[208] On the basis of experimental studies on the relative efficacy and toxicity of a large number of compounds thiouracil and thiourea were chosen for use in the earlier investigations in the treatment of clinical thyrotoxicosis.[29] Most of these studies centered on the use of thiouracil, while relatively few employed thiourea, in part perhaps because of the unpleasant breath imparted by the latter. It soon became apparent that these drugs in sufficient dosage would invariably reduce the metabolic rate to euthyroid or even hypothyroid levels. The chief difficulty, however, was the relatively high incidence of toxic reactions.[223, 779, 33, 42]

Within a few days after beginning of treatment with the thiourea derivatives the patient will note an increase in the sense of well being, although no objective evidence of improvement has yet occurred. Within two to four weeks the basal metabolic rate will return to normal levels and most of the clinical manifestations of thyrotoxicosis will subside. The tachycardia as a rule persists somewhat longer than the other signs and symptoms. The subsidence of the symptoms and the fall in basal metabolic rate usually proceed at a somewhat slower pace than is observed with the use of iodine. It is reported that the rate of fall of the basal metabolic rate is approximately one per cent a day, although in our experience it has been more rapid. In general it may require a period of four to six weeks or even longer to control the disease satisfactorily. The response is more rapid in young people, in patients with diffuse rather than nodular goiter and in hyperthyroidism of short duration. In contrast to the results obtained with iodine, with the thiourea derivatives the basal metabolic rate may be reduced to any desired level. This is of great importance where patients are to be prepared for operation. All such patients treated with the thiourea compounds may be brought to euthyroid levels and operated upon with the maximum protection against the development of thyroid storm. The administration of iodine before treatment with the goitrogens will delay the effect of the latter. Following the ingestion of the thiourea derivatives the goiter initially enlarges, but subsequently often becomes smaller. This initial enlargement is a matter of concern in patients with substernal goiters. Such patients when treated with these compounds must be carefully watched for the development of respiratory difficulties.

The thiourea compounds may be used for the definitive treatment of hyperthyroidism or for the preparation of the patient for subtotal thyroidectomy. In the latter instance the drug is administered until euthyroid levels are reached and the criteria for proper surgical preparation are fulfilled. This may take from four to six weeks or even longer. For the more definitive treatment of hyperthyroidism it has been found that these compounds must be continued for periods of time varying from twelve to eighteen months. If treatment is of shorter duration the symptoms usually recur on cessation of therapy, often within two to eight weeks.[775, 2, 3, 45] The incidence of permanent remissions increases with the more prolonged periods of therapy. Indeed, remissions up to four and five years have been reported.[46, 334] However, the longer the period of observation following cessation of therapy, the less the percentage of permanent cure. Meulengracht and Kjerulf-Jensen[2, 8] obtained prolonged remissions in 90 per cent of a series of 110 patients. Similar results in even larger series were reported by Poate[41] and Irish.[59] However, the percentage of prolonged remissions was far less in reports emanating from clinics in this country.[774]

[6, 60, 305] In general the most important factors in the induction of prolonged remissions appear to be the duration of treatment, and of even greater importance the degree of control of the hyperthyroidism. It is preferable to maintain the patient at slightly hypothyroid levels. The concomitant use of iodine appears to lessen the percentage of prolonged remissions.[308]

The major disadvantage associated with the use of the thiourea derivatives is the relatively high incidence of toxic reactions. The frequency of these reactions varies with the different agents. With thiouracil [9-33, 35-38, 43] toxic reactions are encountered in 6.7 to 18 per cent of the cases. These reactions are listed in Table 27 (Curtis and Swenson). In a series of almost 6000 patients treated in various clinics Van Winkle and his associates[39] reported an overall incidence of 13.1 per cent. Most of the untoward effects encountered are due not so much to overdosage with the drug but represent rather examples of hypersensitivity. The most important of the toxic reactions encountered are leukopenia and agranulocytosis, drug rash and drug fever. Leukopenia occurs in approximately 4 per cent of the patients treated with thiouracil, of whom one-quarter develop agranulocytosis. In addition other patients may suddenly develop agranulocytosis without previous evidence of leukopenia. It must be emphasized however that leukopenia does not necessarily herald agranulocytosis since the leukopenia frequently disappears despite continuation of therapy Agranulocytosis usually occurs between the fourth to eighth weeks of treatment but instances have been reported after as short a period as seven days of treatment and as long a time as a year of therapy In one instance agranulocytosis occurred six months after cessation of treatment Drug fever is encountered in 2 7 per cent and dermatitis in 3 3 per cent The fever almost invariably occurs on the tenth to the eighteenth day of treatment When the drug is withdrawn the temperature promptly falls but rises again if it is readministered Other less common toxic effects include lymphadenopathy swelling of the salivary glands, arthritis and rarely periarteritis nodosa Jaundice and liver damage have been observed chiefly in association with agranulocytosis

Thiouracil is administered in a dosage of 400 to 600 mgm a day until the basal metabolic rate falls to within the normal range It is then given in a maintenance dosage which varies in different patients from 50 to 200 mgm daily The drug is best given in divided doses 3 times a day and blood counts should be performed twice a week

Thiourea in large doses has been found to be effective but unfortunately frequently gives rise to toxic side effects identical with those observed with thiouracil However by employing iodine in conjunction with this compound Danowski and his associates [6, 31] were able to employ smaller amounts of this drug With the combined therapy they encountered only 2 instances of toxic reactions that of drug fever in a series of over 100 patients Unfortunately the hyperthyroidism was not controlled in all instances It is possible therefore that thiourea may be better tolerated than thiouracil but it is hardly the ideal goitrogen Thiourea is usually administered in a dosage of 1 to 3 grams a day When given in conjunction with iodine Danowski and his group [6, 31] obtained satisfactory results with 200 mgm a day

Methyl thiouracil has been extensively used for the treatment of thyrotoxicosis [238, 48, 264, 300] It is twice as active as thiouracil and can be given in doses of 200 to 400 mgm a day Bartels [46] reports toxic manifestations in 9 per cent of the patients of whom 1 5 per cent developed agranulocytosis The results described by other investigators have been somewhat more favorable [238, 48, 64, 300] The clinical effects are perhaps more rapidly induced with methyl thiouracil The usual precautionary measures must be employed with this agent as with the other goitrogens Blood studies with particular emphasis on the white blood cell count and differential studies should be done twice a week

Propyl thiouracil in our experience is a satisfactory compound for the treatment of hyperthyroidism The incidence of toxic reactions is approximately 2 per cent [34, 39, 47, 48, 0] Agranulocytosis is uncommon but does occur Bartels [46] reports the incidence of this complication to be 0 6 per cent The drug is usually administered in a dosage of 300 to 600 mgm a day in 3 divided doses and progressively reduced in amount when the basal metabolic rate returns to normal levels The usual maintenance dose varies from 50 to 150 mgm a day White blood cell counts and differential studies should be performed twice a week

Tapazole (1 Methyl 2 Mercaptoimidazole) Methimazole, Mercazole is very effective in the management of hyperthyroidism According to McGavack and his group[345] the initial daily dose varies from 15 to 60 mgm and the maintenance dose from 2.5 to 30 mgm The incidence of toxic reaction reported by this group is approximately 4 per cent

Iodo 2 thiouracil or Itrumil is used in an initial daily dose of 200 to 400 mgm with a daily maintenance dose of 50 to 200 mgm The incidence of toxic reactions with this agent is somewhat greater than that with tapazole [336]

Carbimazole (2 carbethoxythio-1 methylglyoxaline) neomercazole which is related to tapazole is used initially in a dosage of 30 to 50 mg daily and its maintenance dose is 5 to 10 mgm It is reported to be less toxic than tapazole particularly at high dosage levels [337] A good many other thiourea and thiouracil preparations including thiobarbital tetramethyl thiourea diethyl thiourea 5 6 dimethyl thiouracil 2 thio-4 5 dimethyl 6 methylethyl pyrimidine have been employed clinically but have not been found to be entirely satisfactory generally because of the frequency and severity of the toxic reactions [230 43 51 308]

Aminothiazol, introduced by the French for the treatment of thyrotoxicosis [94] was found to be unsatisfactory by English and American observers because of the frequency of toxic reactions [24 296 300] Paraxanthine[61] and and para aminobenzoic acid [63] have been advocated for the treatment of hyperthyroidism These agents however were found to be clinically ineffective by Williams [6 308]

The results of the surgical treatment of hyperthyroidism are excellent in the properly prepared patient Following preparation with the goitrogens with or without the adjuvant use of iodine the mortality rate need not exceed 0.24 per cent [3] Pemberton [2] reported 611 patients with diffuse toxic goiter who were subjected to subtotal thyroidectomy without any fatalities Of 496 cases of toxic nodular goiter operated upon 2 patients died The combined mortality rate of the two groups was 0 18 per cent Permanent cure is effected in 95 per cent of the patients [3] In 1000 cases operated upon since 1943 and reported by Cattell [3] the complications encountered were as follows postoperative hemorrhage 2 7 per cent tracheotomy 1 3 per cent hypothyroidism 4 5 per cent tetany 1 5 per cent recurrent laryngeal nerve injury 1 0 per cent recurrence of hyperthyroidism 2 4 per cent total mortality rate 0 2 per cent It is interesting to note the decrease in mortality from that of the iodine period 1923 to 1943 during which time 1 per cent of the patients died postoperatively The results obtained with surgery are of course in good part dependent on the competence of the surgeon The recurrence rate of hyperthyroidism after subtotal thyroidectomy has been reported to vary from 2 3 to 17 5 per cent [- 8]

The proper preparation of the patient for operation is as important and integral a part of the treatment as is the subsequent surgical procedure Proper preoperative preparation requires that the patient be brought to euthyroid levels that he gain weight and that the tachycardia subside The period of preparation varies considerably with the patient Haste must never be a consideration and the duration of the preoperative treatment may vary from four weeks to several months Most effective preparation is obtained with the use of one of the goitrogens In addition Lugol s solution is added to the regimen for ten days before the operation Both agents are continued for one week after the operation The use of ample sedation to allay the anxieties and fears of the patient as well as the ingestion of a high calorie diet augmented with orally administered members of the vitamin B Complex, are recommended as part of the preparatory regimen

Postoperative hypothyroidism or myxedema is easily treated It is important to be cognizant of the early signs such as a sensation of coldness aches and pain, fatigue and listlessness The administration of thyroid hormone will restore these patients to euthyroidism

Postoperative hemorrhage may occur even with the most meticulous and competent surgeon The symptoms suggesting hemorrhage in the wound are the presence of a mass and the sudden onset of dyspnea The suspicion of the diagnosis warrants immediate re-exploration of the neck and ligature of the bleeding vessel Tracheotomy may occasionally be necessary

Recurrent nerve injury results in the loss of voice or hoarseness At first a flaccid paralysis of the vocal cord is observed and the position of the affected cord is cadaveric Later spasticity occurs and the cord assumes a midline position It is for this reason that bilateral nerve injury results in respiratory obstruction At the Lahey Clinic exposure of the recurrent laryngeals during the operative procedure reduced the incidence of injury to these nerves by two-thirds [43] With unilateral recurrent nerve injury the voice may improve over a period of three to twelve weeks If the injury is due to edema full recovery generally takes place In patients with bilateral nerve injury respiratory obstruction does not occur for several hours Tracheotomy should be performed as soon as respiratory difficulties become evident. At a later date re-exploration of the neck is indicated in an attempt to correct the cause of the nerve injury Ultimately if no improvement is afforded by the secondary operation a plastic operation on the cords may provide an adequate airway [13]

The use of x ray therapy was for the most part abandoned following the introduction of iodine in the preoperative treatment of hyperthyroidism A considerable percentage of patients with hyperthyroidism can be cured by x-ray treatment Soley and Stone[26] in a series of 43 patients reported cure in more than one-half following x ray treatment Another 20 per cent were improved [6] In addition they claimed that radiation therapy had less of a deleterious effect on exophthalmos than did surgery Much earlier Means and Holmes[29] had reported cure in one third of their patients and improvement in another third Pfahler[77] collected several thousand cases from the literature and stated that cure was obtained in approximately two-thirds of the group and improvement in another 25 per cent However with the advent of radioactive iodine the x ray treatment has been entirely discarded

Radioactive iodine has proven to be an effective form of treatment for hyperthyroidism and it is possible that in most instances it may replace the other forms of therapy available today The isotope employed is I_{131} and the dosage is dependent on 1 the percentage uptake of iodine by the gland, and 2 the size of the gland. The former may be estimated by tracer studies. The latter obviously can be calculated only grossly. As a guide it is perhaps desirable to remember that a thyroid gland which is just barely palpable weighs approximately 25 to 30 grams. It is not by any means certain that the same dose of irradiation will produce the same degree of destruction in the thyroid glands of different individuals. Consequently any calculations based on these factors constitute only a rough approximation. Haines and his associates employ a formula for calculating the dosage required.[27]

Similar methods of calculation are employed by other investigators.[2, 3, 4, 281] However, most investigators employ an arbitrary dose of radioactive iodine per gram of estimated thyroid weight.[73, 281, 340] It is interesting to note that satisfactory results have been obtained with amounts of I_{131} which vary from 23 to 574 microcuries per gram of gland.[67] The amount which is generally employed is approximately 120-150 microcuries per gram of thyroid weight.[340] This has been estimated to represent approximately 3000 to 15,000 or more roentgen equivalents (r.e.p.) to the thyroid.[4]

Feitelberg and his coworkers[281] reported the results obtained in 184 patients with hyperthyroidism treated with radioactive iodine. The average total amount employed for the initial treatment was 8.2 millicuries. Of this group, 132 patients required one treatment, 43 required a second dose, and 9 patients required 3 treatments. Almost 100 per cent of the patients were cured of the disease. Improvement is gradual, but an appreciable change is usually not evident in less than three or four weeks after the administration of the radioactive iodine. Approximately four to twelve weeks elapse after treatment before maximum therapeutic results are evident. If at the end of this period satisfactory results are not achieved, a second dose of radioactive iodine is administered. Occasionally during the first two weeks after treatment an exacerbation of the symptoms and a rise in the serum protein bound iodine is noted. This may be due to destruction of the gland and the outpouring of the preformed thyroid hormone.[67, 273] At times, cough and soreness of the throat may occur. Radiation sickness is rare with I_{131}.[67] Permanent hypothyroidism or myxedema is reported in 5 to 7 per cent.[67, 81] Transient hypothyroidism occurs in an additional small number. In a panel discussion involving approximately 2000 patients with hyperthyroidism,[349] it was the consensus that (1) the cure rate is almost 100 per cent, (2) the average initial treatment dose varies from 1 to 8 millicuries depending upon the size of the gland and the age of the individual, the older patients in general requiring the larger amounts, (3) multiple doses at eight to 12 week intervals or longer are frequently required, (4) nodular toxic goiter requires a somewhat larger dose than is effective in diffuse toxic goiter, (5) hypothyroidism occurs in 7 to 13 per cent of the patients treated. Soley, Miller and Foreman[771] found an increase in the measured exophthalmos in 30 per cent of patients treated with radioactive iodine as compared to an incidence of 26 per cent following x-ray therapy and 40 to 50 per cent after subtotal thyroidectomy.

Malignant exophthalmos can occur after treatment with radioactive iodine.[240]

The question has been raised as to whether radioactive iodine may eventually exercise a carcinogenic effect. It is for that reason that many clinics restrict the use of this agent to patients over forty years of age. No proof that this has occurred has been produced to date. However, in a study concerned with the histologic changes in the human thyroid following various forms of internal and external irradiation, Lindsay, Dailey and Jones[241] report the following:

"(1) The lesions observed in thyroid glands irradiated with I_{131}, x rays, radon or neutrons were qualitatively similar. Acute epithelial injury associated with necrotizing vasculitis and thrombosis was the initial lesion resulting from high dosage irradiation. Follicular atrophy accompanied by perifollicular fibrosis was characteristic of the late reaction produced by irradiation.

(2) Bizarre thyroid epithelial cells with hyperchromatic nuclei were observed in many irradiated glands, particularly the hyperplastic ones. These cellular changes were believed due to overstimulation and exhaustion rather than to the direct effect of irradiation. Cellular changes due to irradiation were found only in glands subject to high dosage of irradiation and examined relatively soon after the exposure.

(3) A significantly high incidence of Hashimoto thyroiditis was found in hyperplastic thyroid glands irradiated with I_{131} or x rays. This lesion was regarded as one effect of irradiation of the hyperplastic gland. The epithelial proliferative reaction in 2 of these glands led to the late development of multiple adenomas."

The chief contraindications to the use of radioactive iodine are pregnancy and lactation, although the agent can perhaps be employed with a reasonable degree of safety prior to the 14th week of gestation since the fetal thyroid does not collect iodine prior to this time.

excluded on the basis of the presence of thyroid hyperactivity Carcinoma of the thyroid may occur in patients with Graves disease with a diffusely and smoothly enlarged gland Its incidence in this group is exceedingly low Ward[4] found only 1 such case in 1900 patients with diffuse toxic goiter but Pemberton and Black[8] found 14 cases in 3500 patients an incidence of 0 4 per cent Cole and his group[6] found an incidence of 0 2 per cent in 517 patients

The greatest incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid is to be found in patients with solitary nodular goiters When the group of nontoxic nodular goiter is further subdivided into those with solitary nodules and those with multiple nodules it is found that the frequency of carcinoma in nodular goiters is due in greater part to the great frequency with which it is encountered in the goiters with solitary nodules Thus in Crile s group[2] of 274 cases of nodular nontoxic goiter 3 4 per cent of the multinodular goiters had carcinoma in contrast to 24 5 per cent in the cases with solitary nodules In the 285 patients with nontoxic nodular goiter reported by Cole and his group[6] 24 4 per cent of the cases with solitary thyroid nodules and 9 8 per cent of the group with multiple nodules had carcinoma Of the patients with solitary nodules reported by Ward[4,5] 15 6 per cent had carcinoma in contrast to 4 8 per cent in the entire group of nodular goiters Nineteen per cent of the 156 patients with solitary nodules reported by Cope and his group[7] showed malignant changes

On the basis of these studies we would summarize the incidence of malignancy of the thyroid essentially as follows

1 Carcinoma of the thyroid may occur probably coincidentally in patients with diffuse toxic goiter (Graves disease) The incidence is exceedingly low in general being less than 0 5 per cent
2 Carcinoma of the thyroid may occur in patients with toxic nodular goiter Its incidence in this group is greater than that in the toxic diffuse goiter but is still low and in general is less than 2 per cent
3 The incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid in patients with multiple nodular nontoxic goiter varies in the literature from 3 to 10 per cent
4 The incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid in patients with a solitary nontoxic nodule varies in the literature from 15 to 25 per cent
5 On the basis of very limited reports the incidence of carcinoma in children with nontoxic nodular goiters is greater than 19 per cent[4,9]
6 The incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid in males with nodular goiters is considerably greater than that of females[4,5,6]

In evaluating the significance of the data cited above it must be remembered that these statistics are based on a highly selected group of patients The cases reported represent patients who have been operated upon and therefore have finally arrived at this stage through a rather extensive screening process By far and large although not always so they have been subjected to surgery for some compelling reason other than a prophylactic one In most instances the mass in the neck had grown or produced uncomfortable symptoms or aroused the suspicions of the referring physician In this sense such patients represent a selected population and the statistical conclusions achieved from their study are not necessarily representative of the group with nodular goiter as a whole

Chapter 27

TUMORS OF THE THYROID GLAND

Nodular Goiter. Benign and Malignant Thyroid Tumors. Endemic and Sporadic (Colloid) Goiter. Thyroglossal Duct Cysts. Amyloid Goiter.

Nodular Goiter.—The enlarged nodular thyroid gland may be the seat of hyperactivity or it may cause pressure symptoms because of its size and location, but its major significance is concerned with the possible presence of malignancy. Occasionally a carcinoma of the thyroid is readily recognized clinically. Often it is suspected because of the hard quality of the mass in question. Generally, however, the solitary nodule and the multinodular goiter present no particularly distinguishing features to suggest malignancy other than its statistical incidence. The incidence of malignancy of the thyroid differs in the various forms of goiter. In general it is much more common in the nodular goiters than in the smooth and diffusely enlarged glands. Similarly, it is more frequent in the nontoxic nodular goiters than in the toxic ones, and finally, it is considerably more common in the thyroids with solitary nodules than in the multinodular goiters.

The over-all incidence of carcinoma in nodular goiter varies approximately from 4 to 10 per cent. This group includes the multiple and solitary nodules and the toxic and nontoxic groups. Thus Brenizer and McKnight[1] report 2,324 cases of combined toxic and nontoxic nodular goiter, 4 per cent of whom were proven to have carcinoma of the thyroid. Of 1,135 similar cases reported by Horn and his group, 6.3 per cent had carcinoma. Crile[3] described 537 cases with an incidence of carcinoma of 5.6 per cent. Ward[4,5] reported 3,539 cases and Cole and his coworkers[6] 663 cases, with an incidence of malignancy respectively of 4.8 and 7.2 per cent. Cope and his group[7] reported that of 1,109 nodular goiters operated upon 10.1 per cent were found to have malignant lesions. When the group of cases with nodular goiter is subdivided into toxic and nontoxic divisions, it is obvious that the incidence of malignancy is considerably greater in the nontoxic group. Thus, in the patients cited by Horn and his group above, of the 1,135 cases 637 were instances of nontoxic nodular goiter and 9.8 per cent of this group had carcinoma, while of the 498 patients with toxic nodular goiter only 1.8 per cent had carcinoma. Similarly, in the patients reported by Cole and his group[6] of 378 cases of toxic nodular goiter only 1 per cent had carcinoma, in contrast to 17.15 per cent of 285 patients with nontoxic nodular goiter. Of 263 patients with toxic nodular goiter reported by Crile[3] none had carcinoma, while 10.9 per cent of the nontoxic group were thus afflicted. Thus, carcinoma of the thyroid occurs most infrequently in patients with nodular goiters who manifest evidence of hyperthyroidism. But the point to be emphasized is that it does occur and its possibility cannot be entirely were ostensibly normal clinically, found considerable variations among the different age groups The patients studied varied from birth to the age of eighty years The gland is tiny at birth weighing approximately 1 5 grams, and reaches a maximum weight of approximately 30 grams in early adult life From this point on it gradually decreases in size to an average weight of 20 grams at the age of eighty During the first few years of life the follicles in the gland are small round and of fairly even size and lined by cuboidal epithelium In the older age group the histologic appearance of the gland tends to revert back again to the infant type During both infancy and old age there is a considerable amount of inter acinar epithelium, which practically disappears during early adulthood

The structure of the thyroid gland is influenced to a considerable degree by various environmental factors such as diet and by the usual physio logic stresses[15] This is particularly noticeable during puberty when the physiologic needs for the thyroid hormones are increased Under such circumstances the development of hypertrophy and hyperplasia of the gland is common and is especially evident in girls of this age group Iodine lack such as occurs in endemic areas intensifie this problem The thyroid hormonal requirements vary from period to period and result in concom itant hyperplastic and involuntary changes Thus within a given period of time the gland may develop from a normal structure to a hypertrophied and hyperplastic one followed by involutionary changes either to the normal state again or by hyperinvolution to the stage of that of the colloid goiter[15] Marine has suggested that recurrent thyroid hyperplasia may eventually result in exhaustion atrophy[16 17] This is most clearly seen in the iodine deficiency states where a normal thyroid may become hyper trophied and hyperplastic in an effort to manufacture enough hormone in the presence of iodine lack and may eventually result in exhaustion atrophy on the one hand or a colloid goiter on the other Actually the same thyroid may show varying degrees of involution and hyper involution A previously hyperplastic gland may have involuted areas of a perfectly normal thyroid structure and in other regions of the same gland hyperinvolution may result in small colloid nodules[18 19] The physiologic and environmental variations in hormone requirements which occur with the onset of puberty and thereafter account for the fact that innocent thyroid nodules are uncommon before this period and progressively in crease in number and frequency thereafter as the individual grows older

The involutionary nodule constitutes the largest percentage of the nodules found in the single or multiple nodular goiter This type of nodule was found in approximately 40 per cent of a group of 96 patients with single nodules in the thyroid reported by Soley Lindsay and Dailey[9] Although colloid goiters are generally diffusely enlarged they are frequently irregular and nodular On histologic examination there are many normal areas as well as many acini greatly dilated lined with a flat epithelium and filled with dense colloid These represent involuted acini In addition there are scattered through such a colloid goiter many small areas of hyper plastic thyroid tissue Involutionary nodules are therefore the common type of nodules found in nontoxic nodular goiter and indeed they may be present singly or in numbers in otherwise normal glands These nodules

Not all patients with masses in the neck, particularly the small solitary nodules, seek medical advice and by no means are they always urged to be operated upon. When the nodule is small and soft it is a common practice to defer operation for observation. Consequently the ostensibly alarming frequency with which carcinoma of the thyroid occurs in the solitary nodule, for example, must be viewed in this perspective. Indiscriminate prophylactic surgery could prove to be a herculean undertaking, in view of the fact that in endemic areas the incidence of nodular goiter in autopsy material may be as high as 80 per cent.[10] Even in the New England nonendemic region 8.2 per cent of routine autopsy material revealed the presence of thyroid nodules 1 centimeter or more in size.[11] Such nodules are clinically palpable. Rogers, Asper and Williams[12] approached this problem somewhat differently. They reviewed the records of patients with goiter admitted to 3 large eastern general hospitals. There were 3,221 such patients with goiter admitted to these hospitals. A pathologic diagnosis of malignant neoplasm of the thyroid gland was made in 64 cases or 1.99 per cent. The histologic study was obtained either on autopsy or from surgical material. VanderLaan[13] reviewed the autopsy material in 3 Boston hospitals and found that carcinoma of the thyroid was a rare cause of death.

Autopsy material is as unsatisfactory a basis for statistical study of carcinoma of the thyroid as is surgical material. Patients with carcinoma of the thyroid do not necessarily die in hospitals and hence the unusually low statistical incidence of thyroid malignancy in this group is as misleading as the excessive incidence in the group of patients operated upon.

The problem of the incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid is a difficult one and it propounds a dilemma which cannot be readily resolved. Even if the disease is not as common as the surgeons would have us believe, it occurs with great enough frequency to warrant anxiety and careful judgment. In general it is a wise policy to regard solitary thyroid nodules with suspicion regardless of the age of the individual. Malignant changes are even more common in such nodules in young people than they are in the older age groups. Indeed, in nonendemic regions solitary nodules are rare in people under the age of thirty and when present should be regarded most suspiciously.[11] Single nodules therefore should in most cases be removed, particularly if they have grown in size and increased in firmness. The propriety of the prophylactic removal of multinodular goiters is more questionable. Since in the diffusely nodular goiter the entire gland is generally the seat of nodules, true prophylaxis should call for total thyroidectomy. This is a procedure which is not lightly decided upon and usually therefore partial or subtotal thyroidectomies are performed. Under these circumstances only partial protection is afforded and malignant changes may develop in the nodular tissue left behind.[8] Where the gland increases rapidly in size or produces pressure symptoms, or when a certain portion of the gland becomes larger, harder and perhaps more adherent, surgery should promptly be resorted to.

Benign Tumors of the Thyroid Gland. — The histology of the normal thyroid gland varies with the age of the individual. Rice[14] in a study of 500 thyroids obtained at autopsy from individuals whose thyroid glands both that of adenoma with varying degrees of acinar differentiation and that of involutionary nodules with some residual epithelial proliferation. Of importance however is the fact that most nodules in the thyroid are benign. Ninety to 97 per cent of multiple nodular goiters are benign goiters and 75 to 85 per cent of solitary nodules are benign. Of the benign solitary nodules approximately 40 per cent are involutionary nodules and therefore probably do not represent new growths while another 20 per cent represent adenomas of one type or another. The remaining group of nodules although benign are difficult to classify.

The uptake of radioactive iodine by the benign tumors varies essentially with the degree of differentiation of the tumor. According to Rawson and his coworkers[24] the highly undifferentiated tumors, such as the trabecular and tubular adenomas, collect only minimal amounts of the radioactive isotope. Those showing early differentiation such as the microfollicular adenoma show a greater avidity for radioactive iodine than do the highly undifferentiated tumors. Actually the uptake of the isotope by these tumors was in several instances greater than that of the uninvolved surrounding tissue although in others it was less. Tumors showing intermediate degrees of differentiation such as the micro and macro-follicular adenoma take up varying degrees of radioactive iodine. Some of these tumors take up less radioactive isotope than does the surrounding normal thyroid tissue and others as much or more. The involutionary nodules or colloid adenomas in general take up somewhat less iodine than does normal thyroid tissue. Hyperplastic benign tumors of a well-differentiated cell type may take up more radioactive iodine than does normal thyroid tissue and may cause clinical manifestations of hyperthyroidism.

Malignant Tumors of the Thyroid – In a comparatively small percentage of cases the pathologic recognition of malignant thyroid tumors may be difficult. This is in part due to the fact that the criteria for thyroid malignancy are not as well defined as they are for other organs and in part because the clinical course may be inconsistent with the histologic findings. There is no difference of opinion concerning the malignant character of 1 papillary adenocarcinomas 2 follicular and alveolar carcinomas 3 Hurthle-cell adenocarcinomas 4 solid adenocarcinomas 5 small and giant cell carcinomas 6 epidermoid carcinomas and 7 the sarcomas such as the fibro- and lympho-sarcomas.[20] It is important to emphasize that these tumors may not be present in a pure histologic form but rather that considerable pleomorphism occurs.[1] Nevertheless their general malignant character is readily recognizable. The degree of malignancy varies with the different types of tumor. Warren[20] classified the papillary, alveolar and Hurthle-cell adenocarcinomas as tumors of moderate malignancy while the small and giant cell carcinomas, the epidermoid carcinomas and the fibro and lympho-sarcomas are classed as highly malignant tumors.

In addition to these definitely malignant tumors there are ostensibly benign thyroid tumors which may sometimes show blood vessel invasion. In this category are the benign thyroid adenomas and the papillary cyst adenoma. Of 1 114 thyroid adenomas removed at operation Warren[21] found 5 instances of blood vessel invasion in 67 cases of trabecular and tubular adenomata and in 28 of 505 patients with microfollicular adenomata represent involution or hyperinvolution of one or several thyroid lobules which are surrounded by thickened fibrous tissue serving to encapsulate the nodule. On microscopic examination, these nodules are seen to consist of large distended colloid follicles lined with a flat epithelium and encapsulated by fibrous tissue. Incorporated within the nodular area may be found small nests of hypertrophied thyroid tissue. The involutionary nodule is frequently prone to bleeding with a sudden increase in size and the development of pain and tenderness. Subsequent cystic degeneration and calcification are not infrequently observed. In the areas immediately surrounding the involutionary nodules the acini are flattened and compressed. Wegelin[10] refers to the involutionary nodule as struma nodosa macro follicularis or macrofollicular nodules. This type of nodule in view of the nature of its development can hardly be classified as a true adenoma.

Other benign nodules found in the thyroid are classified by Wegelin[10] as follows: Struma nodosa trabecularis or trabecular adenoma. This adenoma consists of cords of cells with ill-defined cell borders closely packed together and resembling the least differentiated embryonal fetal thyroid. The struma nodosa tubularis or tubular adenoma consists of cell cords arranged in tubular form and somewhat less closely packed than the trabecular adenoma. The tubular adenoma is only slightly more mature in structure than the trabecular one. Both tumors are of low functional level as is evidenced by the fact that they take up radioactive iodine poorly[1] and both are frequently referred to as embryonal or fetal adenomas. The struma nodosa micro follicularis or the microfollicular adenoma resembles the thyroid of a newborn infant in appearance.[15] It is made up of small round follicles closely packed together containing little or no colloid and lined by cuboidal epithelium. This is a much more differentiated tumor than the ones described above and according to Rawson[15] is capable of concentrating considerable amounts of radioactive iodine and indeed of producing hyperthyroidism. This tumor is also sometimes referred to as a fetal adenoma. The struma nodosa micro et macro follicularis or the micro and macro follicular adenoma is made up of many small follicles lined with cuboidal epithelium and many large ones containing normal appearing colloid and lined with a flat to low cuboidal epithelium. The acini are widely separated by hyaline or fibrous material. These tumors take up radioactive iodine in amounts approximating that of normal thyroid tissue.[1] This tumor is sometimes referred to as a mixed adenoma.[15] The papillary cystadenoma is a benign tumor but it has been known on occasion to show blood vessel invasion and under such circumstances could be considered potentially malignant.[21, 22] These tumors according to Wegelin[10] and Rawson[15] result from diffuse or local hyperplastic changes. On microscopic examination they are seen to consist of hyperplasia of the lining epithelium of a cystic adenoma. The tumor is well encapsulated.

It must be emphasized that the classification of benign tumors outlined above is by no means absolute but is rather one of convenience. There is such considerable histologic overlapping and variation that no available classification today is entirely satisfactory. In 18 per cent of the cases studied by Soley and his coworkers[9] single nodules observed in the thyroid had to be grouped as unclassified since their histologic structure resembled

The thyroid papillary carcinoma typically produce cervical lymph node metastases but may metastasize more distantly. Bilateral cervical lymph node involvement and mediastinal, osseous, intraocular and intracranial metastases have been reported.[3]

Papillary adenocarcinomas of the thyroid frequently pursue an extremely prolonged clinical course. Patients commonly survive for from ten to twenty five years despite the recurrent cervical lymph node metastases and even in the presence of more distant metastases[3] and eventually die from totally unrelated causes. However not all patients run such an essentially benign course and death may result from local invasion of the larynx, trachea or esophagus or is the result of distant metastases to vital areas. Crile[3] reports 21 patients who have been followed for from five to twenty-one years or until their death. Only 3 have died from their disease, 1 with local recurrence in the thyroid and 2 from distant metastases. These 3 patients lived for nine, fifteen and nineteen years respectively after the original thyroidectomy. One patient who has refused all treatment is living and well twenty seven years after the appearance of lateral cervical nodules and twenty-one years after these nodules were proved to be papillary adenocarcinomas of the thyroid. Of 89 cases reported by McDermott and his group[6], 73 per cent survived for five years, 60 per cent for ten years and 45 per cent for twenty years or more.

Histologically the tumor is composed of small papillae of vascularized connective tissue projecting into the alveoli. The papillary projections may be covered with several layers of cuboidal or polyhedral epithelial cells varying considerably in size. Foci of solid masses of cells in which no lumen is discernible are encountereed in the gland. Mitosis is moderately common and colloid may be present in relatively small amounts.

Fitzgerald and Foote[30] investigated the ability of such tumors to take up radioactive iodine. Twenty nine patients with papillary adenocarcinomas were thus studied. Of this group 21 failed to take up any radioactive iodine while in 8 instances there was some concentration of the isotope either in the primary or metastatic lesions or both. In these 8 patients the tumor showed some histologic variations from the predominantly papillary form in that they demonstrated either follicle or alveolar formation or both. Rawson and his group[2] similarly found that the capacity of these tumors to take up radioactive iodine was minimal.

The treatment of papillary adenocarcinoma consists of the use of both surgery and postoperative irradiation. It is important to emphasize that with this type of tumor the presence of cervical lymph node metastases is no contraindication for operation. The operation must include the total removal of the thyroid lobe harboring the primary neoplasm and the removal of the involved cervical nodes. Subtotal lobectomy may result in a recurrence of the malignant tumor in the remnant of thyroid tissue.[6] Where the tumor is present in both lobes of the thyroid total thyroidectomy would appear to be indicated unless the malignant focus in one lobe is so small as to permit the preservation of a small amount of thyroid tissue. There is a good deal of difference of opinion as to whether extensive cervical dissection should be resorted to in patients with papillary tumors with cervical node involvement. Limited dissection in which the visibly in

No instances of blood vessel invasion were found among the cases of colloid adenomata. Actually, less than 3 per cent of all adenomata show blood vessel invasion. Ten per cent of the group showing this histologic abnormality, however, subsequently developed definite clinical evidence of malignancy.[4] Benign tumors of the thyroid, therefore, which have invaded local blood vessels may subsequently become malignant.

Papillary Adenocarcinomas. — These tumors are the least malignant and most common of all thyroid carcinomas. They tend to occur in the younger age groups and are frequent during the fourth and fifth decades of life. This is the tumor which is most often seen in young people with carcinoma of the thyroid. Of 25 patients twenty-one years of age or younger with thyroid malignancy reported by Frazell and Foote,[20] 20 had papillary adenocarcinomas. This type of tumor is approximately twice as common in females as in males.[5, 6] The papillary adenocarcinomas are generally small in size, varying from a few millimeters to 4 centimeters, but occasionally are considerably larger. A preexisting goiter is present in approximately three-quarters of the patients, according to the report of Frazell and Foote.

Cervical lymph node metastases are common with this tumor, and indeed not infrequently the metastatic disease in the nodes may obscure the presence of a minute primary tumor in the thyroid lobe on the affected side. Since the primary thyroid tumor may be small and inconspicuous, it was believed for a long time that the thyroid tissue present in the lateral cervical regions arose from thyroid anlagen, and this, hence, was referred to as lateral aberrant thyroid tumors. There was a good deal of difference of opinion as to whether these cervical masses were actually malignant. During the course of the years, however, the malignant character of these masses became more generally appreciated. Eberts[7] originally suggested that these cervical tumors were metastatic, and Pemberton[8] and King and Pemberton[9] have emphasized that the lateral cervical tumors represent metastatic lymph nodes secondary to a primary carcinoma of the corresponding thyroid lobe. In a review of 51 such cases, these authors found that the tissue in the cervical regions was histologically indistinguishable from that of a frank papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid gland, and in every case in which information was available a papillary adenocarcinoma was present in the corresponding thyroid lobe. In many of their patients, lymph node architecture was still evident around the papillary areas. In general, the lateral neck masses were found at those sites where lymph nodes are normally present. In a review of 112 cases of papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid reported by Black,[6] the conclusions of King and Pemberton were thoroughly substantiated. In 44 of these cases the cervical lymph nodes were involved, and in 16 patients of this group the lesions clinically were typical of lateral aberrant thyroid tumors. In every instance a primary tumor was found in the lobe of the thyroid on the affected side. Crile[3] found a primary tumor in the corresponding thyroid lobe in every one of 16 consecutive cases operated upon. Bilateral thyroid tumors were found in 4 instances.

It would seem, therefore, that lateral aberrant thyroid tumors represent metastatic lesions from a primary papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid isotope but the more differentiated the tumor and the more closely it resembles the normal thyroid follicular pattern the greater the likelihood of its concentrating radioactive iodine According to Rawson and his group [4] despite the fact that these tumors may contain recognizable follicular structures their functional capacity does not approach that of normal thyroid tissue

Solid Adenocarcinomas — The solid adenocarcinomas are the second most common form of thyroid cancer These tumors are more malignant than the alveolar carcinomas They occur in approximately equal proportion in males and females and the age incidence is somewhat similar to that of the alveolar carcinomas Frazell and Foote describe cases occurring in people varying in age from sixteen to seventy six the median age being forty nine years As with the other types of malignant tumors a preexisting goiter was present in most instances The solid adenocarcinomas are large bulky tumors often involving more than one lobe They are hard unencapsulated tumors with a tendency to infiltrate the surrounding tissue so that obstructive symptoms not uncommonly occur Histologically they consist of clumps of cells without lumens and in general with little or no tendency to form follicular or papillary processes.[20] Local spread to regional lymph nodes and pulmonary and bone metastases occur

The treatment consists of the complete surgical removal of the tumor tissue when possible followed by intensive x ray treatment According to Frazell and Foote however irradiation does not particularly influence the course of this type of tumor The ability of these tumors to take up radioactive iodine is dependent essentially on whether histologically they are predominantly solid or consist of ample alveolar follicular or papillary areas In 8 cases of predominantly solid tumors only 1 was capable of concentrating the radioactive isotope while all 4 of the mixed variety showed positive radioautographs [20] As with all types of thyroid neoplasms which take up radioactive iodine there is a great variability in the concentration of the isotope in different areas in the same tumor

Hurthle cell Carcinoma —The Hurthle-cell adenocarcinoma is a tumor of moderate malignancy occurring mostly in middle age and predominantly in women Frazell and Foote report 1 instance in a patient twenty-one years of age and 2 instances have been reported in infants [23 24] These tumors constitute about 10 per cent of the thyroid carcinomas They are generally small well encapsulated and histologically are made up of cells containing abundant cytoplasm staining brightly pink with hematoxylin and eosin The tumor may be made up of large polyhedral cells with acidophilic cytoplasm and of small polygonal cells [25] The latter cells may form alveoli or may be diffusely infiltrating These tumors pursue a prolonged clinical course grow slowly and metastasize late Although they generally tend to metastasize locally distant spread to lungs and bone may occur Of the 27 patients reported by Frazell and Foote [5] a third were alive and free of the disease after a five year follow up

The treatment of the Hurthle-cell tumor as of the other thyroid malignant neoplasms consists of the complete surgical excision of all tumor tissue and the use of postoperative irradiation Only infrequently do these

volved nodes in the neck and mediastinum are removed is recommended by some,[3,6] while others suggest extensive cervical dissection with the removal of lymphatic tissue from the clavicle to the mastoid process.[3,5,11] The results obtained with x-ray therapy alone are unsatisfactory,[3-5] but it has improved the prognosis when used postoperatively.[6] The recurrence of metastatic cervical nodes after operation calls for further surgical intervention with removal of the involved nodes.

The results obtained with use of radioactive iodine in the treatment of this tumor and its metastases are at present poor. Most thyroid papillary carcinomas fail to take up any radioactive iodine, while the few that do concentrate the isotope in only minimal amounts. Radioactive iodine is a valuable agent in the treatment of the papillary metastases or of other thyroidal carcinomatous metastases when the capacity of the metastatic lesions of the tumor for the uptake of the radioactive isotope is increased. This can be accomplished in two ways: (1) by the removal of competitive normal thyroid tissue by total surgical thyroidectomy or by irradiation of the thyroid; (2) by inducing hyperplasia of the thyroid tissue of the metastatic nodule by the use of thyrotropin or the goitrogens.

Alveolar and Follicular Adenocarcinoma.—Pure alveolar or follicular carcinomas are rare and occurred in approximately 7 per cent of the patients with thyroid carcinoma reported by Frazell and Foote. Some areas of alveolar or follicular structure, however, are seen in most thyroid tumors, but these areas constitute only a small part of the mass. The alveolar tumors usually occupy one lobe of the thyroid, are of moderate size, and as a rule are well encapsulated. Their histologic structure is orderly and resembles normal thyroid tissue or adenoma so closely as often to be regarded as benign until distant metastases occur. It is for this reason that they have been referred to as "benign metastasizing struma," a term which is a misnomer. The alveolar carcinomas involve the regional lymph nodes and may metastasize through the blood stream to the lungs and bones. The alveolar and follicular carcinomas are distinctly more malignant than are the papillary adenocarcinoma, but still fall into the group of relatively moderate malignancies. Patients may live for many years after the onset of the disease and even after the development of bone metastases. About 30 per cent of the patients reported by Frazell and Foote were alive and well five years after the first visit to their clinic. Of 45 cases reported by McDermott and his group,[65] 71 per cent survived five years, 48 per cent ten years, and 24 per cent twenty years or more. This type of tumor occurs only slightly more frequently in females and in a somewhat older age group than is the case with the papillary carcinomas. However, the alveolar carcinomas also occur in very young people as well as in very old ones. A preexisting goiter is common.

The treatment of this type of tumor consists of the complete excision of the tumor tissue before distant metastases occur, followed by roentgen therapy. Where postoperative irradiation is used, Dawson[1] advises that it be given in doses of 4000 to 6000 roentgens. The alveolar and follicular carcinomas of all thyroid cancers are most likely to take up radioactive iodine. Of 39 such cases studied by Fitzgerald and Foote,[30] 29 (or 74 per cent) showed evidence of concentration of the radioactive isotope in the tumor tissue. The alveolar areas as a rule do not tend to concentrate the

The neoplastic cells invade veins and venules muscle fat and fibrous tissue adjoining the thyroid sections Struma lymphomatosa is distinguished from sarcoma in that the lymphatic cell infiltration in the former is limited by bands of connective tissue separating the thyroid plates and lymph nodules are usually prominent and well formed In addition in struma lymphomatosa the typical cell is partly of the plasma cell type and oxyphilic follicles are distributed through the infiltrate Finally infiltration of structures adjoining the thyroid gland does not occur

The Use of Radioactive Iodine in the Treatment of Metastases from Carcinoma of the Thyroid —In 1942 Keston and his coworkers[39] reported the selective concentration of radioactive iodine in a metastatic lesion secondary to thyroid carcinoma This was the first time that concentration of the isotope was demonstrated in thyroid tumor tissue but no definite treatment was undertaken In 1946 Seidlin Marinelli and Oshry[40] reported the first case of carcinoma of the thyroid with metastases that was treated with radioactive iodine The metastatic lesions collected the isotope and a considerable degree of clinical improvement followed It promptly became evident that most metastatic lesions unfortunately failed to concentrate radioactive iodine Thus of 25 patients with carcinoma of the thyroid with metastases reported by Trunnell and his coworkers[41] only 1 had metastatic tumor tissue which could take up enough radioactive iodine to justify some enthusiasm for its therapeutic use At the Mount Sinai Hospital of 71 patients studied by Yohalem Feitelberg and their group[4] 16 could concentrate the isotope either in the metastases or in the thyroid carcinoma By far and large this is the general experience unless specific methods are employed to stimulate the metastatic tissue to greater functional capacity for the radioactive isotope

Seidlin and his coworkers[43] and independently but somewhat later Rawson and his group[44] demonstrated that the complete surgical removal of the thyroid gland or its destruction with x ray or radioactive iodine resulted in an increase in the uptake of the isotope by previously poorly functioning metastatic cancer In addition metastatic tissue which prior to treatment could take up no radioactive iodine was now capable of concentrating the isotope The surgical removal of the thyroid gland or its destruction was carried out in 23 patients with carcinoma of the thyroid with metastases by Trunnell and his group[41] One or more metastases in 12 of these patients were subsequently observed to concentrate more radioactive iodine than before removal of the gland Of 10 patients similarly treated Yohalem Feitelberg and their coworkers[4] found that 2 could now take up the radioactive isotope where none could be collected before This method therefore represents an important advance in the treatment of thyroid carcinoma with metastases with radioactive iodine Seidlin and his group[45] regard thyroidectomy as a basic step in the treatment of this disease This may be accomplished either by the surgical removal of the gland or by the use of x ray therapy or with radioactive iodine (I_{131}) Attempts were made to further increase the uptake of radioactive iodine by treatment with thyroid stimulating hormone of the adenohypophysis[44,46] and by the use of goitrogenic agents[41] The injection of 30 mgm a day of the thyroid stimulating hormone (TSH) for five or more days to tumors take up radioactive iodine, and then only in the alveolar areas and only in minimal amounts.[30]

Giant Cell Tumors.—The giant cell carcinomas are very malignant tumors which constitute about 15 per cent of the thyroid carcinomas. They occur in the older age group and the median age of the series reported by Frazell and Foote[25] was sixty-one years. The tumors are large and bulky, are highly infiltrative, extend locally in the neck and often produce obstruction of the trachea and esophagus. Histologically the tumor consists of anaplastic thyroid tissue growing in the form of giant cells.

The clinical course is usually rapidly downhill and death generally results from obstructive manifestations rather than from metastases. By the time these patients are seen, the disease is usually inoperable and their response to x ray therapy is negligible. Six patients studied by Fitzgerald and Foote[30] failed to concentrate any radioactive iodine.

The small cell carcinoma is an equally highly malignant tumor occurring as a rule in patients beyond the age of fifty years. This tumor, like the giant cell carcinoma, is very invasive and unresponsive to the available forms of therapy. However, instances of five or more years survival of giant and small cell carcinomas have been reported where the disease was recognized early and the tumor resectable.[6]

Epidermoid carcinoma of the thyroid is probably derived from remnants of the thyroglossal duct and is made up of squamous epithelium.[15] This highly malignant tumor is fortunately rare, but when it occurs it is invasive, metastasizes extensively and is almost impossible to eradicate surgically.[15]

Lymphosarcoma of the thyroid is a very rare disease. Of 15 000 patients subjected to thyroid surgery at the Crile clinic between the years 1924 and 1945 only 8 instances of lymphosarcoma were encountered.[36] This disease occurs predominantly in women and in the middle-aged group. There is generally a history of recent rapid enlargement of the thyroid, and only infrequently has a goiter been present for any considerable period of time. Difficulty in breathing, dysphagia and particularly unilateral vocal cord paralysis are quite common. The tumor is highly malignant, grows rapidly and is locally very invasive. These tumors are usually not surgically curable and although they are very sensitive to irradiation good results are rarely obtained.[36] Death usually occurs within a year after the onset of the disease.

The pathologic picture of lymphosarcoma of the thyroid may be confused with small cell carcinoma and indeed most thyroid sarcomas probably are anaplastic carcinomas.[37,38] Occasionally lymphosarcoma may be confused with struma lymphomatosa. The pathologic description of the cases reported by Dinsmore, Dempsey and Hazard[36] is as follows. The thyroid is extensively invaded in lymphosarcoma and the tumor is firm and tough in consistency. The cut surface is usually pale gray, yellowish gray or white in color, with occasional brownish or purplish patches. On microscopic examination, it is seen that the neoplastic tissue tends to almost completely replace normal thyroid parenchyma. The cells for the most part seem like small lymphocytes except for some irregularity of the dark staining nuclei. In addition there are areas of lymphoblasts and there are no reticulum fibers surrounding individual tumor cells or cell groups.

time as the metastatic tissue no longer takes up any of the radioactive isotope

Hazards of Treatment with Radioactive Iodine The use of radioactive iodine in the larger doses necessary for the treatment of carcinomatous metastases is sometimes followed by certain toxic manifestations which may be serious. Trunnell and his coworkers[44] observed some degree of depression of hematopoiesis in all their patients treated intensively. The earliest change usually encountered is a decrease in the absolute number of circulating lymphocytes. Later there may occur a thrombopenia and a reduction in hemoglobin and the red blood cell count. Bone marrow aspirations have been reported to show a decrease in the total cell count, a relative increase in erythroid activity, and a decrease in myeloid elements.[41]

Amenorrhea with hot flashes is occasionally induced by the administration of large doses of radioactive iodine. This complication occurred in 3 of Trunnell's patients.[44] In 2 of these patients the urinary gonadotropin excretion remained within the normal range. This would suggest that the amenorrhea was the result of the direct effect of the radiation on the ovary rather than on the adenohypophysis. Three patients developed clinical signs and symptoms of hyperthyroidism within two weeks after the radioactive iodine was administered. In all 3 the diagnosis was further confirmed by an elevation of the serum protein bound iodine.[44] The authors attribute this complication to the destruction of thyroid tissue with release of thyroid hormone.

Endemic and Sporadic Colloid Goiter

By endemic goiter we refer to the enlargement of the thyroid gland commonly found among the inhabitants of certain specific regions of the globe. Sporadic goiter has reference to a histologically and clinically similar condition, but occurring in isolated individuals anywhere. The term colloid goiter is really a pathologic description and refers only to one aspect in the pathologic development of the disease. The colloid goiter common during the adolescent period of life, particularly in females, is a similar process, although of a much milder degree. This occurs when the physiologic demands are greater than the thyroid gland can cope with under given environmental iodine conditions. Long ago Marine emphasized that iodine want induces thyroid hyperplasia and that the administration of iodine to such individuals will result in involution of the hyperplastic gland.

During the course of the past century a good deal of evidence has accumulated to indicate the close relationship which exists between endemic goiter and the iodine lack in those areas. The regions of endemic goiter include the Himalayan plateau of Asia, the Alps, Pyrenees, and the Carpathian mountain regions of Europe, the Andean plateau of South America, and the St. Lawrence, Great Lakes, and Rocky Mountain regions of North America. In these areas where goiter is so common the soil, water, and vegetation are relatively poor in iodine.[46] Goiter was apparently not present in England prior to the eighteenth century,[47] but the southwest corner has since become goitrous.[48] The most goitrous parts of the United several totally thyroidectomized patients and to one before thyroidectomy resulted in a considerable increase in the avidity of the metastatic lesion for radioactive iodine.[41, 43] Similarly, in 7 of 10 thyroidectomized patients there occurred an increase in the uptake of the isotope following the prolonged use of thiouracil or propylthiouracil.[44]

The beneficial effects which follow surgical or irradiation thyroidectomy are theoretically dependent on two factors. By eliminating normal thyroid tissue, an important source of competition for available radioactive iodine is thus removed. And secondly, the increased production of thyroid stimulating hormone which follows the removal or destruction of the thyroid increases the functional capacity of metastatic thyroid tissue to concentrate radioactive iodine. Thus, similarly, the injection of thyroid stimulating hormone or the oral ingestion of the goitrogens induces hyperplasia of thyroid tissue increasing its ability to take up the isotope.

The treatment of carcinomatous thyroid metastases with radioactive iodine includes the following measures. Tracer studies with radioactive iodine are conducted to determine whether the metastatic areas take up ample amounts of isotope. In the event that the uptake is minimal, the patient is subjected to one or more of the procedures described above in an effort to increase the concentration. The patient is then given I^{131} orally. The total dosage generally required for destruction of the metastatic lesions may vary from as little as 100 to as much as 1000 millicuries. Approximately 100 millicuries are administered every six to eight weeks until such derivatives are capable of producing thyroid enlargement. Since the various goitrogenic agents are present in foods which are common articles of diet, it is conceivable that in communities where such food is eaten in abundance goiter may result in the presence of a normal iodine content of both food and water.

Sporadic goiter is 5 or 6 times as common in females as in males. The ratio of females to males in endemic goiter becomes progressively less as the concentration of goiter in a particular region becomes greater. This is due not to the less frequent involvement of females in these areas but to the increasing number of males who are afflicted as more and more members of the community develop the disease. The peak of incidence occurs at an earlier age in boys than in girls. In general the peak for boys is reached between the ages of eleven and fourteen and for girls between fourteen and seventeen.[49]

The clinical picture of endemic goiter is dependent essentially on the severity and age of the endemic areas. Certain regions in Switzerland, for example, have been severely goitrous for many generations with continuous inbreeding of the population. The clinical picture encountered in such areas differs in degree from that observed in any of the goitrous regions in this country. In the milder endemic regions a swelling at the base of the neck becomes evident in some portion of the population long before puberty, and as the age of puberty approaches more and more members of the population are afflicted and the goiters become progressively larger. After puberty the colloid goiters in boys may become smaller and even disappear. In girls the goiter may increase in size to the age of seventeen or eighteen, and may either increase or decrease in size thereafter, but few if any will disappear.[49] The basal metabolic rate may be slightly reduced, but otherwise there are no significant clinical manifestations. The gland, which is generally soft and free from thrills or bruits, will increase somewhat in size during pregnancy but will otherwise exercise no effect on gestation. The offspring in the mild endemic areas such as exist in the United States at present is non-cretinous. In the severe endemic areas the children are involved at an earlier age, the goiters are much larger, and the incidence of endemic cretins and adults with severe hypothyroidism becomes progressively greater. Endemic congenital cretins are the result of several generations of endemic goiter.

The goiters are generally soft and smooth early in life, but as the individuals grow older and approach middle age the gland becomes irregular, lumpy, and nodular. The irregularity may be due to localized areas of involution with the formation of colloid nodules which are often encapsulated. Cysts containing sometimes a clear and rather thin fluid and in others evidence of recent or old hemorrhage may be present and produce nodular irregularities. As described elsewhere in this book, these nodular goiters may become hyperplastic with the development of clinical hyperthyroidism, and finally malignant neoplastic changes may take place.

In studies conducted on euthyroid patients with endemic goiter in Mendoza, Argentina, the thyroid gland showed a marked increase in the uptake of radioactive iodine, often exceeding 60 per cent in forty-eight hours.[63] Similar results were found in an area of endemic goiter in the States are the northwestern block of states together with Michigan Wisconsin and Colorado. The least goitrous include New England, New Jersey, Maryland and the southern states from the Atlantic Coast along the Gulf including Texas and New Mexico.[49] According to Olesen[50, 51] the over-all incidence of goiter in the endemic regions of the United States may be 10 to 30 times as great as that in the non goitrous areas. In the former, 10 to 27 per 1000 of population have enlarged palpable thyroids of varying degrees in contrast to less than 1 per 1000 of population in the eastern states. There is of course a good deal of difference in the incidence of endemic goiter in the various endemic areas and even in different communities within the same area. In general, however, goiter is considerably more common in the goitrous regions of the Alps and Himalayas than in the most goitrous belt in the United States or England.

Greenwald[47] denies the existence of any relationship between endemic goiter and iodine lack. In a detailed study and analysis of available data previously reported by various investigators he has emphasized these several points. (1) There is no decrease in the absolute iodine content of the goitrous thyroid glands. Indeed, the larger glands, according to Greenwald, tend to contain more iodine. (2) Although goiters have been produced in rats on certain iodine poor diets, the addition of small quantities of iodine comparable to that found in ordinary diets will not prevent nor lessen the thyroid enlargement. The administration of large quantities of iodine, however, will result in glands of normal microscopic appearance and size. (3) The prophylactic administration of iodine to humans has not reduced the incidence of new goiter to zero, and in some cases has had no effect or even increased the frequency. (4) Persons with goiter in this country do not show the usual signs of thyroid insufficiency. (5) The evidence that there is a deficiency in the iodine intake in goitrous regions is faulty in that neither the analytic technics nor the collection of food, water and excreta were well controlled. (6) In various regions of the world endemic colloid goiter suddenly appears and just as suddenly disappears.[66] (7) On the basis of his studies this investigator concludes that goiter is an infectious disease which bears no relationship to iodine lack.[66]

Most careful investigators, however, and the extensive studies available favor the role of iodine lack in the pathogenesis of endemic goiter, although other factors unquestionably are of importance.[60, 6] The factors most commonly considered are infection, pollution of water supply, the calcium content of water and food which may function as a goitrogen[6] and the presence of other goitrogens in food and medicines. The goitrogens are of course capable of producing enlargement of the thyroid gland, and such agents are present in many vegetables. Chesney, Clawson and Webster[53] demonstrated the goitrogenic action of cabbage and it was subsequently shown that goitrogenic properties of cabbage are seasonable, being present in fall and winter cabbage and absent in the spring and summer varieties.[54–56] Similar goitrogenic properties are attributed to related vegetables such as Brussels sprouts and cauliflower. Kennedy and Purves[57] have demonstrated goitrogenic properties in rape seed, and Sharpless, Pearsons and Prato[58] showed that soy beans are occasionally goitrogenic. Finally, certain medicaments such as potassium thiocyanate[59] and now the thiourea

Illustrative Case of Amyloid Goiter

A twenty seven year old man was admitted to the Mount Sinai Hospital in 1947 with a thirteen year history of recurrent episodes of rheumatoid arthritis. For six months prior to admission he had noted a swelling over the lower anterior region of the neck. He had been hospitalized elsewhere where a diagnosis of amyloid disease of the thyroid was established.

The physical examination revealed a chronically ill appearing man with a slight lid lag of the right eye. The sublingual and submandibular glands were increased in size. The thyroid was markedly and diffusely enlarged, firm and smooth. There was no thrill palpable nor any bruit audible over the gland. The spleen was readily felt but the liver was not palpable. There were spindle-shaped swellings of the phalangeal joints and atrophy of the muscles of the shoulder girdle and hands. In addition there was limitation of motion of the right knee and hip. The urinalysis revealed a considerable albuminuria with occasional hyaline and granular casts and 8 to 10 red blood cells per high power field. The specific gravity of the urine was fixed at 1010. The blood hemoglobin was 12 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 4.16 million per cubic millimeter. The sedimentation rate (Westergren) was accelerated being 123 mm per hour. The blood urea nitrogen was 16 mgm per cent. The basal metabolic rate was −17 per cent. The congo red test demonstrated 100 per cent retention.

Three months following his discharge from the hospital he was again admitted because of nervousness, insomnia, a weight loss of 15 pounds and cardiac palpitation.

The physical examination at this time revealed a marked stare in addition to the findings previously observed. The heart rate was rapid and a fine tremor of the outstretched hand was apparent. The hemoglobin was now 9 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 3.0 million per cubic millimeter. The circulation time (arm to tongue) was seven seconds. The blood urea nitrogen was increased to 30 mgm per cent. The basal metabolic rate ranged from +46 to +62 per cent. The twenty four hour urinary excretion of a tracer dose of I was only 2 per cent. The serum protein bound iodine was 24 micrograms per cent.

The diagnosis of hyperthyroidism was established and he was treated with a therapeutic dose of 11.25 millicuries of I followed by the administration of Lugol's solution. When the basal metabolic rate had returned to normal levels he was subjected to subtotal thyroidectomy because of the tremendous size of the gland. The pathological report of the specimen was as follows: Thyroid showing diffuse amyloid infiltration with glandular parenchyma showing evidence of recent and preceding hyperplasia. Amyloid in vessels and in basement membrane of the sebaceous glands of the skin. Postoperatively the basal metabolic rate fell to −1 per cent. He was discharged for further observation.

Thyroglossal Duct Cysts — Thyroglossal cysts may result from the persistence of the thyroglossal duct. The first manifestations of such a disorder are usually observed in infancy or childhood although rarely they first become apparent in adult life. The cyst is located in the midline anywhere along the part of the normal embryologic course of thyroid migration. It may drain internally through an opening at the foramen cecum but external drainage occurs only if the cyst becomes infected and ruptures or is incised surgically. When this occurs intermittent drainage from a permanent sinus results. The external sinus opening usually is located between the hyoid bone and the thyroid isthmus and the sinus tract may be palpated as a cord from the external opening to the level of the hyoid. Other cystic structures such as branchial cysts, must be differentiated

Venezuelan Andes[69] It should be noted that these values fall into ordinarily accepted hyperthyroid range although these patients did not have hyperthyroidism This increase in the avidity for radioactive iodine was attributed by the investigators to the iodine deficiency of the gland[68]

Treatment of Endemic and Sporadic Goiter — The tre*atment of the in*dividual with goiter consists of the administration of iodine and more important of thyroid extract The former may be given in amounts of 1 to 3 mgm of potassium iodide per week and the latter in a dosage of 1 0 to 3 0 grams of thyroid extract daily During the early stages of goiter when the gland is still hyperplastic the administration of iodine may result in considerable improvement With the development of the hyperinvolutary or colloid stage iodine exercises relatively little effect[49] It is of some interest that Stanbury and his group[68] found that the administration of iodine failed to decrease the uptake of radioactive iodine in patients with endemic goiter while administration of thyroid extract was quite effective in this respect Thyroid extract particularly in the presence of a low basal metabolic rate will frequently induce a decrease in the size of the gland Both agents should particularly be administered to pregnant women with goiter Surgical removal of the goiter is indicated when the gland is unduly enlarged when it produces pressure symptoms or when it suddenly increases in size

The prevention of goiter according to Kimball[60] is best carried out by the use of iodized salt and he recommends a concentration of 0 01 per cent or 1 part of sodium iodide to 10 000 parts of salt Actually the iodized salt in this country is so standardized that twice this recommended amount of iodine is present the concentration of sodium iodide being 0 02 and that of potassium iodide 0 023 per cent This will yield a daily iodine intake to the average salt consumer of slightly more than 1 mg a day Such amounts are considerably in excess of the daily iodine requirement According to Eggenberger[61] the daily iodine requirement is somewhere between 1 and 2 gamma per kilogram of body weight roughly 0 075 to 0 15 mg The question of whether the administration of excessive amounts of iodine to individuals with iodine deficient goiters is capable of producing thyrotoxicosis or Jod basedow is discussed in some detail elsewhere In any event this complication apparently so common on the continent is rare here

Amyloidosis of the Thyroid Gland (Amyloid Goiter)

In 1942 Walker[61] collected 56 cases of amyloid goiter from the literature and added 2 of his own He found that amyloid goiter was almost invariably associated with generalized amyloidosis and most frequently secondary to a chronic disease Amyloid of the thyroid alone was reported in only 2 instances Pathologic studies reveal that the amyloid is associated with a striking infiltration of the gland with fatty tissue The gland becomes enlarged and firm and at times may be clinically confused with carcinoma Although the amyloid infiltration may be marked thyroid insufficiency as a rule does not occur More recently Means[49,64] has encountered 2 cases one of which we have had the opportunity to study

Illustrative Case of Amyloid Goiter

A twenty seven year old man was admitted to the Mount Sinai Hospital in 1947 with a thirteen year history of recurrent episodes of rheumatoid arthritis For six months prior to admission he had noted a swelling over the lower anterior region of the neck He had been hospitalized elsewhere where a diagnosis of amyloid disease of the thyroid was established

The physical examination revealed a chronically ill appearing man with a slight lid lag of the right eye The sublingual and submandibular glands were increased in size The thyroid was markedly and diffusely enlarged firm and smooth There was no thrill palpable nor any bruit audible over the gland The spleen was readily felt but the liver was not palpable There were spindle shaped swellings of the phalangeal joints and atrophy of the muscles of the shoulder girdle and hands In addition there was limitation of motion of the right knee and hip The urinalysis revealed a considerable albuminuria with occasional hyaline and granular casts and 8 to 10 red blood cells per high power field The specific gravity of the urine was fixed at 1010 The blood hemoglobin was 12 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 4 16 million per cubic millimeter The sedimentation rate (Westergren) was accelerated being 123 mm per hour The blood urea nitrogen was 16 mgm per cent The basal metabolic rate was −17 per cent The congo red test demonstrated 100 per cent retention

The physical examination at this time revealed a marked stare in addition to the findings previously observed The heart rate was rapid and a fine tremor of the outstretched hand was apparent The hemoglobin was now 8 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 3 0 million per cubic millimeter The circulation time (arm to tongue) was seven seconds The blood urea nitrogen was increased to 50 mgm per cent The basal metabolic rate ranged from +46 to +62 per cent The twenty four hour urinary excretion of a tracer dose of I was only 2 per cent The serum protein bound iodine was 24 micrograms per cent

The diagnosis of hyperthyroidism was established and he was treated with a therapeutic dose of 11 25 millicuries of I followed by the administration of Lugol s solution When the basal metabolic rate had returned to normal levels he was subjected to subtotal thyroidectomy because of the tremendous size of the gland The pathologic report of the specimen was as follows Thyroid showing diffuse amyloid infiltration with glandular parenchyma showing evidence of recent and preceding hyperplasia Amyloid in vessels and in basement membrane of the sebaceous glands of the skin Postoperatively the basal metabolic rate fell to −1 per cent He was discharged for further observation

Thyroglossal Duct Cysts — Thyroglossal cysts may result from the persistence of the thyroglossal duct The first manifestations of such a disorder are usually observed in infancy or childhood although rarely they first become apparent in adult life The cyst is located in the midline anywhere along the part of the normal embryologic course of thyroid migration It may drain internally through an opening at the foramen cecum but external drainage occurs only if the cyst becomes infected and ruptures or is incised surgically When this occurs intermittent drainage from a permanent sinus results The external sinus opening usually is located between the hyoid bone and the thyroid isthmus and the sinus tract may be palpated as a cord from the external opening to the level of the hyoid Other cystic structures such as branchial cysts must be differentiated

from thyroglossal duct cysts The former do not occupy a midline position

The treatment of a thyroglossal cyst consists of the surgical excision of the entire sinus tract and cyst Inadequate removal will invariably be followed by recurrence

Section V The Thymus and Parathyroids

Chapter 28

THE THYMUS

The thymus consists of two lateral lobes placed in apposition along the mid line of the anterior mediastinum and extends normally from the fourth costal cartilage as high as the lower border of the thyroid gland It is covered anteriorly by the sternum and the origin of the sterno hyoid and sterno-thyroid muscles In the neck it lies on the front and sides of the trachea while below it rests on the pericardium It is separated from the aortic arch and great vessels by a layer of fascia The thymus is pink gray in color Its two lobes may be fused or separated by an intermediate lobe It is about 5 cm in length, 4 cm in breadth and about 6 mm in thickness The size and weight of the thymus vary with age[16]

	Weight in grams
At birth	10–20
Early childhood	20–30
At puberty	0–40
In young adults	20– 0
In adults	10–20
In the senile	5–10

It is thus apparent that the gland reaches its maximum size at puberty and thereafter shrinks

The entire gland is invested by a connective tissue capsule The numerous lobules of each lobe are held together by delicate areolar tissue and each primary lobule consists of numerous irregular small nodules or follicles The lobules vary in size from that of a pin head to that of a pea whereas the follicles are 1 to 2 mm in diameter These latter consist of a cortical and medullary portion In the cortical substance are densely packed masses of small cells called thymocytes which are morphologically identical with small lymphocytes The average diameter of these cells is about 6 mμ The nucleus which consists of 5 to 6 heavy chromatin particles is dark and fills almost the entire cell The cytoplasm however is scant In addition to these small cells there are also some larger cells that are histologically identical with medium and large lymphocytes Scattered among the round cells are elongated reticular cells the cytoplasm of which is difficult to delineate There are a few chromatin particles and 1 to 2 nucleoli enclosed within the smooth membrane surrounding the pale round nuclei of these cells Although there is no sharp demarcation between the zones of the thymus the thymocytes disappear rather abruptly as one proceeds from cortex to medulla. The medulla consists principally of reticular cells the lymphocytes being much fewer in number. In addition in the medulla there are rounded acidophilic structures varying from 30 to 100 micra in diameter which are called Hassall's bodies. They consist of concentrically arranged cells the outermost of which are connected with the reticular cells. In the centers of these bodies evidences of degeneration and hyalinization and even small cysts may be observed. At times calcium may be deposited in these areas. This inner medullary region is more vascular than the cortex and some connective tissue cells are seen around the vessels. Occasionally myelocytes and plasma cells may be seen but germinal follicles are rare. The reticular cells are epithelial in origin, being derived from an entodermal anlage. These cells are often difficult to distinguish histologically from connective tissue cells. However if the lymphocytes are destroyed by x ray their structure becomes more evident. Further proof of their epithelial origin is afforded by tissue culture studies. The thymic reticular cells differ from reticular cells elsewhere in that they do not collect intravital dyes although under certain circumstances they may store iron and lipoid and may contain dead lymphocytes. Reticular fibers are relatively scarce being located chiefly about the blood vessels where there are also some mesodermal reticular cells.

The identity of lymphocytes and thymocytes is accepted by most investigators. This is based not only on their morphologic similarities but also on the equal susceptibility of both to x ray, to cytolysis by sera obtained by the injection of thymus cells into rats and the ability of both to transform into macrophages. The mitochondria are similar in both types of cells. In tissue culture it can be demonstrated that the small round cells are not derived from the reticular cells. The fact that the thymocytes can be transformed into plasma cells and eosinophilic myelocytes would seem to prove the hematic and mesenchymal origin of these cells.

The arterial supply of the thymus is derived from the internal mammary and the superior and inferior thyroid vessels. These arteries are first distributed to the cortex. Return drainage of blood from the thymus is effected by large vessels which arise in the medulla and empty into the thyroid and left innominate veins. The lymphatics course chiefly in the interlobular connective tissue and drain into the anterior mediastinal sternal and tracheo bronchial lymph nodes. The nerve supply which is probably chiefly of a vasomotor nature is derived from the vagus and the sympathetic nervous system. These branches which are derived from the descendens hypoglossi and phrenic nerves reach the capsule but do not penetrate into the substance of the gland.

The thymus begins its development during the sixth week of fetal life (10 mm) as a pair of solid buds from the ventro lateral walls of the third pharyngeal pouches which fuse during the third month. At times the fourth pouches also give way to some thymic tissue. The lumen of the proliferating bud soon disappears and the epithelial sprouts invade the surrounding mesenchyme. The lobules arise from the branching of these epithelial strands. The thymocytes are derived from the inwandering of lymphoid cells which originate in part from the perivascular mesenchymal cells With the growth of the gland, the lymphocytic cells continue to enter the organ and to proliferate within the thymus The epithelium is converted into a reticular mesh filled with lymphoid cells and penetrated by blood vessels The medulla arises by a proliferation of the epithelial mass in the deeper portion of the lobules At the same time the lymphocytes in these areas degenerate or migrate Later Hassall s bodies are derived from the reticular cells by processes which as yet have not been completely clarified

The physiologic functions of the thymus are unknown The thymus as has been mentioned increases in size to the age of puberty and then regresses The cortex begins to involute at about the age of two to four years the medulla at puberty During the earliest phases of involution the lymphoid cells in the cortex begin to thin out and adipose tissue begins to replace the compressed reticular cells In the medulla the last elements to be replaced are the Hassall s bodies Although involution is a physiologic phenomenon it may be hastened or delayed by several factors The administration of corticotropin or various adrenal corticoids to the intact rat will produce a marked reduction in the size and weight of the gland Estrogen and to a lesser degree androgens whether administered exogenously or as the result of stimulation of the gonads by gonadotropin will also result in atrophy of the thymus These observations probably account for the reduction in size of the thymus that begins at puberty In contrast castration will prevent this involution The adrenal mechanism explains a wide variety of factors that cause shrinkage of the thymus Starvation toxins morphine etc are all types of stress that provoke the liberation of corticotropin and of the adrenal cortical steroids It thus becomes apparent that hypophysectomy or adrenalectomy will prevent the decrease in thymic size that follows stress In such animal preparations the thymus is usually large If in addition gonadectomy has been performed the thymus will be found to be maximum in size Growth hormone has a direct stimulating effect on thymic size even in the hypophysectomized animal On the other hand a pyridoxine deficient diet and such agents as nitrogen mustards or sodium cacodylate cause a direct toxic destruction of the thymus Removal of the thymus is apparently without observable effect in the experimental animal No definite evidence is available that there is any thymic hormone although it is possible that the breakdown products of the thymus resulting from adrenocortical activity may play some physiologic role Rowntree and his associates[2] reported that the administration of thymic extracts to successive generations of rats resulted in marked acceleration of somatic growth and precocious sexual development in each succeeding generation However this work has failed of confirmation

It has been claimed that the thymus may play a role in calcium metabolism and in regulation of skeletal growth since thymectomy may be followed by defective mineralization of bone as well as dwarfism[16] Gudernatsch[17] reported that the feeding of thymus tissue to tadpoles stimulated their growth but inhibited metamorphosis In pullets and chickens following thymectomy eggs are reported to be laid with uncalcified shells[18] Asher and his associates have claimed that thymic extracts contain a growth promoting principle that stimulates the sex organs However these claims as well as those of Bomskov on the effects of the thymus on carbohydrate metabolism have not been confirmed [16, 17]

It is apparent from this discussion that there are at present no demonstrable endocrine disorders of the thymus. This gland, however, is affected in certain of the diseases of the other endocrine glands and by some of the adaptative mechanisms of the organism. Infections, trauma and other stresses will result in a decrease in size of the thymus secondary to the elaboration of adrenocortical fractions. This was demonstrated by Selye [11] and by White and Dougherty [12] in the experimental animal and by Soffer, Gabrilove and their coworkers in man [10, 18]. The latter investigators induced marked reduction in the size of a thymic tumor in a patient with myasthenia gravis following the administering of corticotropin. In adrenal insufficiency and in hyperthyroidism the thymus is frequently enlarged. Thymic enlargement is also encountered in acromegaly, hypogonadism and myasthenia gravis. Ordinarily this hyperplasia or persistence of a non involuted thymus is asymptomatic but may occasionally produce signs of tracheal compression.

The concept of status thymo-lymphaticus has been the subject of a good deal of controversy [16]. The sudden deaths attributed to this condition are associated at postmortem examination with an enlarged thymus, lymphoid hyperplasia, hypoplasia of the aorta, decrease in the size of the adrenal glands and underdevelopment of the gonads. The report of Turnbull and Young[16] is interesting in relationship to these findings in that similar pathologic observations were encountered in individuals dying suddenly of trauma at any age. The conclusions arrived at by the Commission investigating this problem[16] was to the effect that the enlarged thymus played no specific role in sudden deaths.

Apart from the specific adaptative and physiologic involution of the thymus, aplasia or hypoplasia is rare. Inflammatory disease of the thymus is uncommon but may occur in the course of sepsis. Dubois abscess is in reality a cyst of the thymus due to persistent embryonic duct. Tumors of the thymus are uncommon. The usual types are lymphosarcoma derived from the lymphoid elements, benign thymoma and thymic carcinoma. Actually it is questionable as to whether most instances of so-called lymphosarcoma of the thymus are really lymphatic in origin. Many are probably instances of anaplastic carcinoma. Other less important tumors include dermoid cysts, spindle-cell sarcoma, lipoma, myxoma, fibroma and leukosarcoma. The important symptoms of thymic tumors are chiefly those due to pressure on adjacent structures such as tracheal compression and venous obstruction. As mentioned elsewhere in this text, instances of Cushing's syndrome have been reported in the presence of primary thymic carcinomas associated with bilateral adrenal cortical hyperplasia. Myasthenia gravis is frequently associated with thymic hyperplasia or tumor [4, 5]. Castleman and Norris[5] have reviewed this problem and found thymoma is present in almost 25 per cent of 330 cases of myasthenia gravis collected from the literature. Other observers have found an incidence of only 10 to 15 per cent. Thymomas in association with myasthenia gravis are more common in the age group between thirty and sixty and in males. Castleman and Norris[5] believe that the thymomas associated with myas-

thema gravis are benign in over 90 per cent In the remaining 10 per cent although local spread or implantation may occur the histology is that of a benign growth The tumors are almost invariably encapsulated and may consist chiefly of epithelial or lymphoid elements or a mixture of both Hassall s corpuscles are rarely observed in these tumors The histology of the thymus in most patients with myasthenia gravis unassociated with tumor is characterized by the presence of large numbers of germinal centers in the medulla It has been suggested that in the absence of tumor the thymus is frequently hyperplastic More recent pathologic studies however indicate that in most of the instances the thymus is perhaps no larger than is normally encountered at the various age groups[5] Nevertheless the surgical removal of non neoplastic thymic tissue was followed by improvement in the symptoms of myasthenia gravis in one-half the patients[5] although other observers have found the results to be considerably less encouraging with the possible exception of the group consisting of females under the age of thirty in whom the disease has been present for a comparatively short time[9]

Our group[10] reported shrinkage of a thymic tumor following the parenteral administration of ACTH This was associated with considerable improvement in the symptoms of myasthenia gravis The symptoms recurred and the thymic mass returned to its original size sometime after cessation of therapy Torda and Wolff[18] have reported improvement in patients with myasthenia gravis without tumor following treatment with ACTH Other investigators have similarly reported varying degrees of improvement following the administration of corticotropin[9]

Chapter 29

ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY AND DISEASES OF THE PARATHYROIDS

HYPOPARATHYROIDISM. PRIMARY HYPERPARATHYROIDISM (VON RECKLINGHAUSEN'S DISEASE OF BONE). SECONDARY HYPERPARATHYROIDISM

The Gross Anatomy and Embryology of the Parathyroid Glands.—The parathyroid glands are small, yellowish brown, oval bodies that are found in intimate contact with the inner posterior surface of the lateral lobes of the thyroid gland. Each one is enclosed within its own connective tissue sheath and lies within the capsule rather than in the substance of the thyroid. Four parathyroid glands are usually present as Gilmour[1] observed in almost 90 per cent of 428 human dissections. He did find, however, that the number may vary from 2 to 6. Each parathyroid body is approximately 6 to 8 mm. in length, 3 to 4 mm. in width, and 1 to 2 mm. in thickness. According to Pappenheimer and Wilens[2] the total average weight of these glands may vary from 67 to 200 mgm., but greater total weights have been encountered in normal individuals.

The parathyroids are divided into superior and inferior groups, each consisting of 2 glands. The former are ordinarily encountered at the level of the lower border of the cricoid cartilage behind the junction of the pharynx and esophagus. The inferior set is usually found near the lower edges of the lateral lobes of the thyroid, or in relation to the inferior thyroid veins. Embryologically these structures are derived from outpocketings of the third and fourth branchial pouches on each side. They then migrate with the thyroidal anlage. The derivatives of the third pouch travel farther caudad than do those of the fourth, and as a consequence form the inferior parathyroids. During fetal life these latter structures are often in close relationship to the thymus, and as a result may at times be found within the thymus or in the mediastinal thoracic cavity. It is for this reason that no exploratory procedure for a parathyroid tumor is complete unless the superior mediastinum is carefully searched.

The blood supply of the parathyroid glands is derived from branches of the superior and inferior thyroid arteries. The main vessel supplying each gland enters at the hilus and then forms branches that course along the connective tissue septa. These arteries then empty into the sinusoidal vessels found in intimate contact with the cords of the epithelium. These capillaries are without a basement membrane but are surrounded by reticular fibers that separate them from the epithelium. The parathyroid vein leaves the gland at the hilus and empties into the nearby veins draining the thyroid and adjacent neck structures. The nerve supply is derived from the cervical sympathetic and consists of unmyelinated fibers of the vasomotor type.

The Histology of the Parathyroid Glands.—Histologically the parathyroid glands consist of densely packed epithelial masses, strands and cords of cells throughout which course sinusoidal capillaries separated from the epithelium only by reticular fibers. There are two main types of cells, the principal or chief cells and the oxyphil or eosinophilic cells. The chief cells, which are said to be the only cells in the parathyroids up to the age of ten years, are pale and clear and granules are rarely noted in the cytoplasm. They vary in size from 6 to 8 microns in diameter and contain a nucleus which is large and vesicular. At times these cells are arranged in follicles in the lumen of which some colloid-like material is found. This colloid substance consists of a homogenous protein material which lacks iodine. Parathyroid colloid when it is present generally appears after puberty. The eosinophil or oxyphil cells are larger than the clear cells, being 11 to 14 microns in diameter and the granular cytoplasm stains deeply with acid dyes. The nuclei are small and dense. Both dark and light oxyphil cells have been described. It is generally believed that the oxyphil cells are physiologically inert although parathyroid adenomata consisting of eosinophil cells have been reported in hyperparathyroidism. These cases, however, are not accepted by Castleman and Mallory.[2] Mitochondria and Golgi apparatus are present in both types of cells and in addition the chief cells usually contain glycogen and neutral fat. Large vacuolated water-clear cells have also been described. When small these cells resemble chief cells and for this reason Castleman and Mallory[2] have suggested that they represent transitional cells to indicate their derivation from the chief cells. These investigators[2] have proposed a monophyletic theory of origin of all the cells of the parathyroid, the chief cell being the parent cell from which both the water-clear cell and the oxyphil cell are derived.

The Physiology of the Parathyroid Glands.—The physiologic actions of the parathyroid hormone are intimately concerned with the metabolism of calcium, phosphorus and bone. Calcium is normally ingested in the food and excreted through the urine and stool. Under normal circumstances the fecal loss exceeds that in the urine. This is in contrast to the far greater urinary excretion of calcium which is encountered in hyperparathyroidism. Since calcium is constantly being excreted by the organism, if the intake is greatly restricted a negative balance ensues. The daily adult requirement is approximately 1 gram. The availability of the ingested calcium depends on its absorption from the upper small intestine. Absorption of this electrolyte is favored by an increased acidity of the intestinal contents, a high vitamin D intake, a relatively low phosphorus content of the food and adequate digestion and absorption of fat. In general any agents or factors that will result in the precipitation of insoluble calcium salts, such as the presence of oxalates or phytic acid in the food, will decrease the absorption and therefore the availability of this ion. Under circumstances where the loss of calcium is excessive, such as occurs for example during lactation, a positive balance can only be obtained by greatly increasing the amount of calcium ingested.

Approximately 2 per cent of the body weight consists of calcium, almost all of which is found in the skeletal system. The normal calcium content of the serum varies from 9 to 11 mgm per cent Only negligible amounts are found in the red blood corpuscles In the serum calcium exists essentially in two forms Approximately 45 per cent of the total serum calcium is bound to protein in the ratio of 0 84 mgm of calcium per gram of protein[4] This moiety is nondiffusible and nonionized The remainder of the serum calcium is diffusible and almost entirely ionized A small portion of the diffusible fraction is perhaps bound in some sort of citrate like complex and is consequently nonionized McLean and Hastings[6] have devised a nomogram which enables one to calculate directly the level of ionized calcium if the total serum calcium and the total serum protein are known based on the formula

$$\frac{(Ca^{++})\ (Prot^{=})}{(Ca\ Prot)} = 10^{-2 \cdot m} \quad \text{at } T = 25\ C$$
$$pH = 7\ 35$$

Calcium is found in other body fluids such as the lymph aqueous humor ascitic and edema fluids and the cerbrospinal fluid in lower concentrations than is present in the serum The calcium content of the cerebrospinal fluid which is almost protein free is roughly equal to that of the diffusible fraction of serum However the concentration of calcium in this compartment is not affected by alterations in the plasma diffusible calcium concentration induced by the injection of calcium salts nor is it altered following parathyroidectomy The evidence would seem to indicate that the parathyroid hormone influences the diffusible rather than the non diffusible calcium fraction[24] and that it is this former fraction which is physiologically active[7 8] When the serum calcium level falls its urinary excretion decreases and ceases almost entirely when the serum level is below 7 mgm per cent[9]

The body contains phosphorus in both organic and inorganic forms The former fraction includes ester lipid and nucleic acid phosphorus The blood contains considerably greater amounts of organic than inorganic phosphorus the former being found for the most part in the cells The inorganic fraction ordinarily varies from 3 to 4 mgm per cent and is distributed equally between the cells and plasma It is with this latter fraction that we are particularly concerned In general phosphorus is absorbed from the small intestine in an inorganic form Its absorption and consequent availability is favored by a low calcium intake a high vitamin D intake and an increase in the acidity of the intestinal content Normally it is excreted chiefly in the urine and somewhat less in the stool The renal threshold for the serum phosphorus is 2 to 3 mgm per cent The serum phosphorus may fall temporarily following the ingestion of carbohydrate or the administration of insulin since this ion plays an important role in the intermediary metabolism of carbohydrate A reciprocal relationship exists between the concentration of the serum inorganic phosphorus and the serum calcium expressed by the formula $(Ca^{++})\ (PO_4^{\equiv}) = K$ Although at times both may be reduced as in rickets normally in adults the product of the concentrations of serum calcium and serum inorganic phosphorus does not exceed and remains approximately constant at a value of 30 to 40 This indeed was the basis for the rule enunciated by Howland and Kramer[10] to the effect that in children where the constant ordinarily varies from 40 to 55 a reduction to less than 30 will result in rickets and when the value exceeds 40 the disorder will heal

Bone consists of mineral impregnated osteoid tissue The latter consists of a protein ground substance composed chiefly of ossein and to a much lesser extent of osseomucoid and in albuminoid Osteocytes osteoblasts, and osteoclasts are the cells normally located in the osteoid tissue Approximately 80 per cent of the bone ash consists of $Ca_3(PO_4)_2$ 13 per cent of $CaCO_3$ and $Mg_3(PO_4)_2$ constitutes 2 per cent The remaining 5 per cent is made up of K, Na Cl Fe and Fl It has been suggested on the basis of x ray diffraction patterns and refractive indices that the bone salts exist for the major part in the form of N $Ca_3(PO_4)_2$ CaX_2 or $CaCO_3$ N $Ca_3(PO_4)_2$ (dahlite) [11,12]

Bone may be formed either in an intramembranous or endochondral fashion but the essential processes are the same in both instances Endochondral bone formation is characterized by a preliminary phase in which cartilage is broken down by osteoclasts and invaded by blood vessels Subsequently osteoblasts lay down osteoid tissue which then becomes impregnated with bone salts Intramembranous bone formation proceeds in the latter fashion without the preliminary cartilaginous phase Fully developed bone therefore consists of mineral impregnated osteoid tissue laid down in circular pattern surrounding the vascular supply Each pattern unit is referred to as a Haversian System Osteocytes or bone cells are enclosed within bone In areas where new bone is being formed osteoblasts may be observed in the periphery of the tissue while in regions of bone destruction osteoclasts are found These latter cells resemble foreign body giant cells in appearance The formation and destruction of normal bone goes on constantly and simultaneously The nature of this dynamic equilibrium under normal circumstances is determined by a variety of factors such as the age of the individual the physiological growth processes nutrition physical stress and strain etc

The function of the osteoblasts in the laying down of bone is a rather complicated one These cells not only form the ground substance but also secrete alkaline phosphatase The mechanism for the deposition of the mineral elements of bone is stilll not entirely settled It has been hypothecated that calcium phosphate and the other bone salts are precipitated in the bony matrix because their solubility products are exceeded at the site of crystallization [13] Albright[14] has suggested that the parathyroid hormone acts to maintain the serum concentration of calcium and of inorganic phosphorus at a level below their solubility product resulting in constant demineralization of bone Nevertheless it has been presumed by this author as well as by others that mineral deposition continues because of a local increase in ions brought about by the presence of the enzymes alkaline phosphatase[15] and phosphorylase occurring at the site of calcification [16] These enzymes then help liberate phosphate ions from organic sources Phosphate thus being present in great excess its calcium salt is readily precipitated Other mechanisms perhaps involving local alterations of pH may help explain the deposition of the carbonate salts

The serum alkaline phosphatase is derived for the major part from bone where it is secreted in large quantities by the osteoblasts at the sites of active bone formation In the absence of hepato-biliary disease the serum alkaline phosphatase may serve as an index of bone formation

Whether the osteoclasts actively destroy bone or act as phagocytes in cleaning up bone debris is still unknown However wherever and whenever bone destruction is proceeding these cells are found in great number Whether they are derived from osteocytes or represent foreign body giant cells or a specific type of cell is obscure

The Metabolic Effects of Parathyroid Hormone —When parathyroid hormone is administered to the experimental animal or to the human it is followed by an increase in the urinary excretion of phosphorus a decrease in level of the serum inorganic phosphorus an increase in the serum calcium level and an augmented urinary calcium excretion[17] In addition its prolonged use results in bony changes characterized primarily by osteoporosis and by osteitis fibrosa The biochemical antithesis of this is observed following the removal of the parathyroids There occurs a decrease in the urinary excretion of phosphorus an increase in the serum level of inorganic phosphorus associated with a fall in the serum calcium and a decrease in the urinary excretion of calcium Parathyroid hormone exercises no effect on the gastrointestinal absorption of calcium or its fecal excretion The two most widely accepted hypotheses proposed to explain these phenomena are that the parathyroid hormone primarily regulates the renal excretion of phosphate ion[14] or that it directly acts to withdraw bone salts from the bone[18 19 0] The arguments marshalled in favor of each of these theories have included facts which ostensibly directly support the proposed hypothesis as well as evidence incompatible with the opposing view Albright and his associates[1] have demonstrated that the increase in the urinary excretion of pho phorus is the first effect noted following the administration of parathyroid hormone In addition the urinary phosphate lo s in comparison to the urinary calcium loss is greater than that observed when decalcification of bone is experimentally induced by the administration of acidifying salts such as ammonium chloride[1] Although some observers have been unable to confirm their results Harrison and Harrison[20] demonstrated that the administration of parathyroid hormone resulted in a decrease in the renal tubular reabsorption of phosphate ion Albright and his associates[3] were subsequently able to prevent the sequelæ of parathyroid hormone administration on the urinary calcium and serum calcium by feeding phosphate and thereby preventing the fall in serum inorganic phosphorus

The evidence for the theory that the parathyroid hormone acts directly on bone is chiefly histologic Following the administration of this hormone marked osteoclastic proliferation in bone is observed There are clinical evidences which are incompatible with this suggestion such as the fact that patients with active parathyroid tumors need not necessarily develop bone disease[14] The level of the serum inorganic phosphorus moreover is reduced in this disorder as well as following the administration of parathyroid hormone in contrast to the high level which might be expected if this ion were constantly being liberated from bone However the obser

The Chemistry of Parathyroid Hormone.—The parathyroid hormone is probably a protein according to available evidence.[4] It is soluble in water, saline, aqueous alcohol, 94 per cent acetic acid, concentrated warm phenol and in warm 80 per cent glycerol, but is insoluble in absolute ethyl, methyl or butyl alcohol, ether, benzene, pyridine, carbon tetrachloride, methyl salicylate and anhydrous acetic acid. Ross and Wood[20] found two components to the hormone, one with a molecular weight of 15 000 to 25 000, the other with a molecular weight of 500 000 to 1 000 000. The hormone is fairly stable in a slightly acid media but is best preserved as a dry powder. It is stable to reducing agents but unstable to oxidizing agents. The U.S.P. XIV unit is defined as one hundreth of the amount necessary to increase the serum calcium in not less than ten dogs 8 to 16 kilograms in weight an average of 1 mgm. per cent within sixteen to eighteen hours after subcutaneous injection. More recently an assay method has been devised based on the fall of serum inorganic phosphorus in logarithmic proportion to the dose of parathyroid hormone administered.[21]

DISEASES OF THE PARATHYROID GLAND

Hypoparathyroidism.—Inadequate elaboration of the parathyroid hormone will result in hypoparathyroidism, the most overt manifestation of which is tetany. Although idiopathic hypoparathyroidism does occur, the most common cause of parathyroid insufficiency is the inadvertent removal or injury of the parathyroid glands occurring during the course of thyroid surgery. Postoperative hypoparathyroidism is encountered in approximately 1 per cent of the patients with Graves' disease subjected to thyroid surgery. In such instances the hypoparathyroidism may be either transient or permanent, depending upon whether the parathyroid bodies have actually been removed or subjected to injury from which recovery may take place. It might perhaps be mentioned that injury to the parathyroid bodies rarely if ever occurs following the use of radioactive iodine. In contrast to the relative frequency of postoperative hypoparathyroidism is the rarity of the idiopathic variety.[34] For example, by 1952 only 52 such instances had been reported in the literature.[108] In those patients in whom pathologic examination was subsequently carried out, no parathyroid tissue was found or else the glands were completely replaced by fat.[32,38] The explanation for this form of parathyroid insufficiency is at present not apparent, particularly since no convincing evidence exists to link the parathyroid with the other endocrine glands.[36,44] On several occasions, however, Addison's disease has been encountered in conjunction with hypoparathyroidism.[38,101] In addition to true idiopathic hypoparathyroidism it is possible that some instances of infantile tetany may fall into this category.[30] Pertinent to this consideration is the report of an occasional infant with evidences of hypoparathyroidism born to a mother with hyperparathyroidism.[50,107] In this case a possible explanation resides in the demonstration that parathyroid hormone can pass the fetal barrier and that the injection of parathyroid hormone to the experimental animal may result in parathyroid hypoplasia.[55]

vation by Dent[96] that phosphate loss results in osteomalacia and not in osteitis fibrosa cystica would suggest that the action of the parathyroid hormone is not entirely on phosphate diuresis. Further evidence to suggest a possible direct effect of parathyroid hormone on bone is provided by the studies of Engel[97] who found that the administration of the hormone to experimental animals resulted in the solution of the glycoprotein ground substance of bone with a secondary rise in the serum mucoproteins proportional to the amount of parathyroid hormone administered.

The problem as to the mechanism by which parathyroid hormone exercises its effect could perhaps in part be elucidated by a study of the effects of this hormone in the bilaterally nephrectomized animal.[4] The results obtained in such preparations are partially obscured by the metabolic effects incidental to renal insufficiency. The majority of investigators have found that the administration of parathyroid hormone fails to induce an increase in the serum calcium in such animals.[14-25] These results, however, have generally been obtained in those instances in which the serum phosphorus has been elevated. On the other hand, Ellsworth and Futcher[6] did report some elevation in the serum calcium level under these experimental conditions. Albright and Reifenstein[14] have pointed out that it is impossible to raise the serum calcium level with parathyroid extract in patients with renal insufficiency and resulting phosphate retention. These data by no means exclude the possible direct action of parathyroid hormone on bone. The fact that no elevation of serum calcium occurs following its administration in the nephrectomized animal and in the patient with renal insufficiency can at least theoretically be explained by the local precipitation of calcium occurring in the presence of a markedly elevated phosphorus. That parathyroid hormone does exercise some effect directly on bone is shown by the fact that its administration to the nephrectomized animal results in the production of the bony changes of osteitis fibrosa beyond those which could be explained on the basis of acidosis and renal insufficiency alone.[14, 27] It is probable that the hormone exercises its effects both by regulating the renal excretion of inorganic phosphorus and by its direct action on bone tissue.[98, 99] Studies by Tweedy and his associates with radioactive phosphorus and by Barnicot[9] with transplants of parathyroid tissue and bone would tend to support the dual action of this hormone.

The administration of excessive amounts of parathyroid hormone to the experimental animal will result in dehydration, renal failure and death. Shelling[2] has pointed out that in such experimental studies the characteristic features include a marked urinary diuresis with an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium, phosphorus and chlorides. There is an associated increase in the serum calcium level and a considerable reduction in serum sodium and chlorides. As the acute toxic state progresses, hemoconcentration becomes marked and extrarenal azotemia with a retention of nitrogenous products results. The animal becomes anuric and death finally ensues from acidosis, dehydration and circulatory collapse. At postmortem, extensive calcification is found in the kidneys, blood vessels, gastric mucosa, bronchioles and perialveolar regions of the lungs. In general, metatastic calcifications are noted in those parts of the body where marked changes in pH occur.

At a serum calcium level of between 7 0 and 8 0 mgm per cent the clinical manifestations of tetany may not be overt Under such circumstances evidences of tetany may be elicited by various tests The more common of these include 1 Chvostek s sign 2 Trousseau s sign 3 Erb s sign and 4 the peroneal sign The Chvostek sign is elicited by tapping the trunk of the facial nerve just anterior to the external auditory meatus or just below the zygomatic process A positive sign consists of the contraction of the muscles of the upper lip on the tapped side of the alæ nasæ or of the muscles of the eyelids Any one or all three of these manifestations may be present Trousseau's sign is obtained by pressure upon the blood vessels and nerves of the extremity with sufficient pressure to stop the circulation temporarily A positive sign is characterized by the production of carpopedal spasm Erb s sign consists of an increased excitability of the motor nerves to galvanic current and for clinical purposes the cathodal opening contraction is the most useful of these electrical reactions A contraction elicited with less than 5 milliamperes is usually pathognomonic of tetany The peroneal or Lust sign consists of the mechanical stimulation of the peroneal nerve by tapping it at the lateral aspect of the fibula below the head A positive test is evidenced by dorsal flexion and abduction of the foot This test has the same significance as the Chvostek reaction Of interest is an observation by Engel and his associates[6] in which they noted that if hypokalemia were associated with hypocalcemia tetany resulted only when the level of the serum potassium was elevated following the administration of this ion

Less characteristic manifestations of hypoparathyroidism include cataract formation and multiple ectodermal disorders such as dry scaly skin absence of hair and atrophy of nails[39 40 4] Prompt and early treatment of hypoparathyroidism will prevent cataract formation but once formed regression does not occur Convulsive seizures sometimes epileptiform in character may occur in hypoparathyroidism Whether such epilepsy is the result of hypoparathyroidism or represents true idiopathic epilepsy more readily precipitated by the hypoparathyroid state is a moot point[14 53 103] In either event the successful treatment of the hypoparathyroidism will result in an amelioration of the convulsive seizures

Gotta and Odoriz[43] conducted electroencephalographic studies in hypoparathyroidism These investigators reported the presence of slow waves occurring 2 to 3 per second either singly or in series enhanced by hyperventilation but unaffected by the parenteral administration of calcium The correction of the hypoparathyroid state results in a disappearance of the characteristic waves In the associated presence of epilepsy the electroencephalogram may be entirely normal or show the presence of the slow waves a generalized dysrhythmia or both Rarely evidences of increased intracranial pressure and papilledema are observed[38 103] When these are associated with convulsion the diagnosis of brain tumor may be mistakenly made Symmetrical bilateral punctate calcifications in the region of the basal ganglia are commonly noted on x ray examination of the skull[37] These will not be affected by successful treatment of the hypoparathyroidism

Signs and Symptoms of Hypoparathyroidism — The most obvious and overt manifestation of hypoparathyroidism is tetany which in this disease is dependent on the associated hypocalcemia and the resultant increased neuromuscular excitability The biochemical observations encountered in hypoparathyroidism consist primarily of a decrease in the urinary excretion of phosphorus a rise in the level of serum inorganic phosphorus, a fall in the serum calcium level, and a decrease in the urinary excretion of calcium Since calcium is an important regulator of neuromuscular function the reduction of the serum level of this ion will result in characteristic manifestations When the serum calcium falls to a critical level, usually between 7 0 and 8 0 mgm per cent some of the signs and symptoms of tetany may be elicited When the serum level falls below this point the full blown clinical picture is encountered The level of the total serum calcium however is not the sole determining factor in the production of tetany This manifestation can be precipitated by alkalosis in the presence of a normal total serum calcium level and prevented by acidosis when the serum calcium is at a level low enough ordinarily to be associated with tetany The explanation for these phenomena resides in the fact that changes in the pH of the blood alter the degree of ionization of calcium Since the available ionizable calcium determines its physiologic activity, the reduction of this fraction which occurs in alkalosis accounts for the occurrence of tetany even in the presence of a normal total serum calcium level On the other hand the decrease in the pH of the blood occurring in acidosis will increase the available ionizable calcium Finally the reduction in the total serum calcium which is so often found in hypoproteinemic states such as the nephrotic syndrome is infrequently associated with tetany In such cases the available ionizable calcium is normal although that fraction ordinarily bound to protein is reduced

The early manifestations of tetany consist of perioral paresthesia and numbness of the extremities followed by muscular spasms Subsequently carpopedal spasm laryngeal stridor and generalized convulsions may ensue Although tetany is seldom fatal the occurrence of laryngeal spasm may be of serious import Shelling[52] described this manifestation well

The most frequent symptoms of manifest tetany are carpopedal spasm laryngospasm and convulsions The second frequent sign of manifest tetany especially in children is laryngospasm the loud inspiratory crow is due to a spastic narrowing of the glottis The spasm may be mild and may occur but infrequently or the attacks may follow in rapid succession and be accompanied by great difficulty in breathing cyanosis coma and death In most instances however after a lapse of a few minutes and in spite of all signs of suffocation the spasm of the glottis relaxes air is heard entering the larynx and the cyanosis begins to disappear Spasm of both voluntary and involuntary musculature may be encountered Tachycardia irregularities in cardiac rhythm and prolongation of the QT intervals on electrocardiographic studies are evidences of the effects of hypocalcemia on the cardiac musculature while abdominal pain nausea and vomiting point to the involvement of the musculature of the gastrointestinal tract

tration of parathyroid hormone fails to induce an increase in the serum calcium a fall in serum phosphorus and an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium and phosphorus Two hundred units of parathyroid hormone are administered intravenously to the fasting patient The phosphorus content of the urine is measured hourly for periods of three hours prior to and five hours after the injection [46,47] Previous recent parathyroid hormone therapy must be excluded since refractoriness following the prolonged use of this fraction may normally occur This test is invalid in the presence of chronic renal disease since under such circumstances the urinary excretion of phosphorus may be impaired In addition false positive as well as false negative results have been reported with this procedure [98]

Patients with pseudohypoparathyroidism respond equally well to either the administration of dihydrotachysterol (AT 10) or vitamin D [49] The treatment therefore consists of the use of either AT 10 or vitamin D in addition to the oral administration of calcium These measures are employed in the same dosage as is used in the treatment of true hypoparathyroidism

Albright and his associates[106] have described a group of patients who present all the physical characteristics of pseudohypoparathyroidism but in whom the blood chemical findings are normal These investigators refer to this group of patients as instances of pseudo pseudohypoparathyroidism and suggest that a genetic disorder which is probably incomplete is responsible for this syndrome

Tetany in general may result from hypoparathyroidism from an inadequate intake or absorption of calcium as in rickets osteomalacia and steatorrhea from alkalosis induced by bicarbonate ingestion vomiting or hyperventilation from the excessive rise in serum inorganic phosphorus as in renal insufficiency from the administration of drugs that combine irreversibly with calcium ions such as oxalate and citrate and finally tetany may occur as a result of magnesium deprivation An inadequate intake of calcium or a defect in the absorption of this element as occurs in steatorrhea or avitaminosis D may result in the infant in rickets or in the adult in osteomalacia In these syndromes a low serum calcium is associated with either a normal or a slightly reduced serum phosphorus The serum alkaline phosphatase is moderately increased as a result of the excessive deposition of osteoid which fails to become calcified

In chronic renal insufficiency although the serum phosphorus is high and the serum calcium is low the urinary findings the elevated blood non protein nitrogen and the acidosis point to the underlying disease

Alkalotic tetany is usually easily differentiated by the presence of a normal serum calcium and phosphorus and a normal urinary excretion of these ions In hyperventilation the CO_2 content of the blood is reduced but the combining power is usually normal If the alkalosis is the result of the excessive ingestion of alkali the serum total base as well as the CO_2 combining power and content are increased In alkalosis due to vomiting the CO_2 content and combining power are elevated the serum chlorides are reduced while total base may be normal or slightly reduced

The Treatment of Hypoparathyroidism — The treatment of chronic hypoparathyroidism consists of the use of calcium salts and of either vita

The skeletal changes in hypoparathyroidism are generally slight. In adults the bones may show a mild increase in density, although rarely osteomalacia is found. In infants, if the disorder starts before dentition is complete, aplasia or hypoplasia of the teeth may result.

The frequency with which the various manifestations occur in idiopathic hypoparathyroidism have been summarized by Steinberg and Waldron.[106] Tetany and convulsion occurred in most of the 52 patients reported, while paraesthesias, constipation, vomiting, and psychoses occurred somewhat less commonly. Cataracts occurred in 52 per cent, poor dentition in 36.5 per cent, alterations in the skin, nails or hair in 25 per cent, papilledema in 13.5 per cent, fungus infections in 13.5 per cent, mental retardation in 17 per cent, physical retardation in 5.8 per cent, chronic conjunctivitis in 3.8 per cent, and syndactylism and polydactylism each 1.9 per cent.

Diagnosis of Hypoparathyroidism.—The diagnosis of hypoparathyroidism when suspected is established by the clinical and laboratory evidence of latent or manifest tetany, including the Chvostek, Trousseau, Erb and Lust signs and the characteristic biochemical alterations associated with this syndrome. These are: (1) a decrease in the serum calcium; (2) an increase in the serum phosphorus; (3) a decrease in the urinary excretion of calcium and phosphorus; (4) a normal or decreased serum alkaline phosphatase. When the serum calcium level is less than 7 to 8 mgm. per cent, calcinuria is absent. This may roughly and easily be determined by means of the Sulkowitch reagent. The intravenous calcium test of Howard, Hopkins and Connor[107] is helpful in establishing the diagnosis of hypoparathyroidism as well as hyperparathyroidism. In patients with hypoparathyroidism the intravenous infusion of 15 mgm. of calcium gluconate per kilogram of body weight over a four hour period results in a marked increase in the twenty-four hour urinary excretion of phosphorus as compared to the control day. This is in contrast to what occurs in normal individuals where following such a calcium load test there is a considerable reduction in the urinary excretion of phosphorus.

Differential Diagnosis.—Pseudohypoparathyroidism (Seabright Bantam Syndrome) and tetany due to causes other than true hypoparathyroidism must be differentiated from true hypoparathyroidism. In 1942, Albright[46] and his associates described 3 patients presenting a syndrome clinically and biochemically similar to hypoparathyroidism who failed, however, to respond to the administration of parathyroid hormone. Since then other similar cases have been reported,[45-47, 98-104] including several instances of multiple occurrence in the same family. These patients in addition to the usual clinical and biochemical features of hypoparathyroidism present certain characteristics. Their physical appearance is similar in that all are short and thickset and have rounded facies. In addition, they have a tendency to brachydactyly, especially of the metacarpals, as a result of early closure of the epiphyses. The metacarpals most likely to show shortening are those in which cartilage proliferation and epiphyseal formation are last to occur. In some instances excessive soft tissue calcification is observed. It has been suggested that this syndrome may be genetically determined and that the major defect lies in the excessive tubular reabsorption of phosphate.[105] The diagnosis is established by the observation that the admin-

Patients with pseudohypoparathyroidism respond equally well to either the administration of dihydrotachysterol (AT 10) or vitamin D [44] The treatment therefore consists of the use of either AT 10 or vitamin D in addition to the oral administration of calcium These measures are employed in the same dosage as is used in the treatment of true hypoparathyroidism

min D or dihydrotachysterol (AT 10) The usefulness of parathyroid hormone is limited to acute hypoparathyroidism since refractoriness to the fraction may develop In acute hypoparathyroidism such as occurs following thyroid surgery or the removal of a parathyroid adenoma the treatment of choice is the repeated intravenous use of calcium gluconate In addition as adjuvant therapy parathormone may be administered intramuscularly in dosages of 10 to 100 units a day either in one dose or in divided doses Its effect on the serum calcium level is observable within four hours and persists for approximately twenty to twenty four hours Unfortunately refractoriness to this hormone may occur within one to three weeks In acute emergencies calcium should be repeatedly administered intravenously preferably as the gluconate in dosage of 10 cc of a 10 to 20 per cent solution When considering the oral administration of calcium it should be remembered that calcium is best absorbed in the presence of a low phosphate acid ash diet Consequently the chloride or the lactate or gluconate rather than the phosphate salts are usually employed Milk is to be avoided because of its high phosphate content Aluminum hydroxide may be used as an adjuvant in doses of 1 to 2 teaspoonfuls 3 times a day This drug combines with and precipitates the phosphate thereby facilitating the absorption of calcium

Vitamin D has a dual action it enhances the intestinal absorption of calcium and possibly aids in the deposition of bone and to a much lesser extent increases the renal excretion of phosphate Dihydrotachysterol (AT-10) has similar actions but its phosphate regulating effect is more pronounced and the antirachitic action less potent One may therefore employ either of these two compounds in the treatment of hypoparathyroidism Vitamin D or calciferol (D_2) is given in doses of 50 000 to 300 000 international units daily Dihydrotachysterol (AT-10) is administered in daily dosages of 3 cc (3 75 mgm) or 6 capsules each containing 0 625 mgm until the presence of calcium is detected in the urine The dosage is then reduced approximately to 1 cc or 2 capsules 3 to 7 times a week The use of the Sulkowitch reagent is of great value in adjusting the dosage the proper dose being that sufficient to produce a moderate amount of calcium in the urine Benemid has been reported to lower the serum phosphorus level and to increase the urinary excretion of phosphorus in patients with hypoparathyroidism Although in the instances described there occurred no change in the serum calcium level there did occur a disappearance of the symptoms of tetany The drug was employed in a dosage of 1 to 4 grams a day administered orally [10]

Hyperparathyroidism

Hyperparathyroidism results from hyperfunction of one or more of the parathyroid glands This functional overactivity may be due to either diffuse hyperplasia of all of the parathyroids or more commonly a parathyroid tumor which is almost invariably benign For both theoretical and practical reasons it is important to distinguish these forms of primary hyperparathyroidism from secondary hyperparathyroidism such as may result from chronic renal insufficiency. Secondary hyperparathyroidism is always associated with diffuse hyperplasia of the parathyroid bodies.

Whatever the underlying pathologic cause of primary hyperparathyroidism, the physiologic and clinical sequelæ are similar and resemble the effects induced by the exogenous administration of excessive parathyroid hormone. This is characterized primarily by the increased urinary excretion of phosphorus and calcium, a decrease in the level of the serum inorganic phosphorus, and an increase in serum calcium level. The clinical manifestations are dependent on these phenomena which result in a disease picture chiefly referable to the skeletal system and urinary tract, to the symptoms of parathyroid intoxication, or to various combinations of these.

The most common cause of primary hyperparathyroidism is a parathyroid adenoma. The comparative incidence of tumor and hyperplasia in this disorder is reflected in the number of cases of each reported in the literature. Primary hyperparathyroidism due to adenoma was recorded in 322[7] instances, carcinoma in 7[58, 63] and diffuse hyperplasia in 27.[60, 64] Of 104 cases in a series studied at the Massachusetts General Hospital, 84 were due to a single tumor, 7 to two adenomata, and 10 to diffuse hypertrophy. In this group 3 instances of carcinoma were also encountered.[94]

Parathyroid adenomata consist for the most part of chief or water-clear cells.[3, 14, 59] Oxyphil adenomata have been reported in rare instances,[71, 7] although the actual existence of such tumors is subject to some question.[8] However, in the adenomata encountered all three types of cells, chief, water clear, and oxyphil, may be present. The oxyphil or eosinophil cells are present in only small numbers.[8] This is in contrast to diffuse primary hyperplasia in which the sole cells found are large water clear cells.[14, 60] Norris[57] collected 322 cases of functioning parathyroid adenomata from the literature. He noted that in only 6.2 per cent was more than one parathyroid tumor found. In 12 of these, however, advanced renal disease was present. Albright and Reifenstein[14] also reported the incidence of multiple tumors in their series to be 6 per cent. Multiple tumors, therefore, are uncommon. When more than two glands are involved it is probable that the underlying lesion is hyperplasia rather than tumor.[59]

In the series collected by Norris[57] the adenomata were equally distributed between the right and left glands but occurred far more commonly in the inferior group than in the superior parathyroid bodies in a ratio of approximately 5 to 1. In 10 per cent of the cases the adenoma was found in an aberrant location. In almost two thirds of this last group the tumor presented in the mediastinum and in slightly less than one third the tumor was embedded in the thyroid. The remainder were found behind the esophagus.

The age distribution in general varied from ten to eighty years. The maximum incidence occurred in the group between forty and fifty years and 70 per cent occurred between the ages of thirty to sixty years. There was a marked predominance in females, the ratio to males being 3 to 1.

The tumors varied in size from 0.4 to 120 grams, the average weight being 12.5 grams. They were ellipsoid in most instances, but some were bilobed. In general the tumors were yellowish brown or reddish brown in color, moderately soft, encapsulated and smooth. A rough quantitative proportion was found to exist between the size of the tumor and the degree of hyperparathyroidism

Of interest are the reports of adenomatous enlargement of the parathyroids in conjunction with adenohypophyseal and pancreatic islet cell tumors [61, 62, 109] The significance of such findings is at present not apparent particularly since no definitive experimental demonstration of any functional interrelationship between these glands has been established

Diffuse hypertrophy and hyperplasia of all the parathyroid glands causing primary hyperparathyroidism has been described [64, 65, 83] Eight such instances were found in the 89 cases reported from the Massachusetts General Hospital [14] In 1947 Rogers and Keating[60] reviewed 26 cases including 4 of their own This type of primary hyperparathyroidism can generally be differentiated both clinically and histologically from the diffuse hyperplasia encountered in secondary hyperparathyroidism The parathyroid cells in the former are large and water-clear, 10 to 40 microns in diameter and often arranged in alveolar fashion while in secondary hyperparathyroidism the cells are normal or slightly increased in size In the series of primary hyperplasia reported from the Massachusetts General Hospital the total weight of the parathyroids ranged from 20 to 160 times that of normal glands varying from 2.5 to 19.0 grams [14]

Carcinoma of the parathyroids is rare In 1948 Norris[58] was able to collect only 15 cases which were acceptable as true malignant parathyroid tumors Of these only 7 were endocrinologically active and resulted in hyperparathyroidism Since the report by Norris other instances have been recorded [63, 109, 110] At operation the most reliable clue to the presence of malignant change in the parathyroid tumor is a fibrous inflammation like reaction which surrounds the tumor and binds it to the adjacent structures Such changes are not observed in hyperplastic parathyroid bodies or in adenomas [110]

The Bone Changes in Primary Hyperparathyroidism — The bone changes in primary clinical hyperparathyroidism are almost identical with those observed in the experimental animal treated parenterally with parathyroid extract [52, 65] In general the changes consist of a generalized decalcification of bone a marked increase in the fibrous tissue of the bone marrow associated with the presence of increased numbers of osteoblasts and osteoclasts the presence of bone cysts and giant cell tumors and evidences of bone destruction and to a less marked degree of new bone formation The histologic characteristics of the bony changes have been summarized by Snapper as follows [59]

1 Osteoclastic destruction of bone trabeculæ due to hyperactivity and accumulation of osteoclasts sometimes leading to formation of giant cell tumors

2 Decalcification of the remnants of bone trabeculæ

3 Apart from this osteoclastic decalcification and perhaps on account of it, generalized proliferation of fibrous tissue is found in the bone marrow and cortex—the osteitis fibrosa described by von Recklinghausen

4 The thinned bone trabeculæ are often perforated by the proliferating fibrous tissue the so-called dissecting bone resorption

5 New formation of bone tissue as indicated by the proliferation of osteoblasts and the presence of osteoid seams

It is this last feature that accounts for the high serum alkaline phosphatase associated with these skeletal changes

It is now generally accepted that osteitis fibrosa is not pathognomonic of von Recklinghausen's disease This specific change is observed also in Paget's disease polyostotic fibrous dysplasia Graves disease renal osteodystrophy long standing acidosis and other disorders It would appear that this type of fibrous alteration is a nonspecific reaction to rapid decalcification of bone This is readily demonstrated in the experimental animal where rapid decalcification induced by acidosis results in osteitis fibrosa similar to that which follows the administration of parathyroid extract[66] Finally nonspecific agents such as chloroform and lead acetate may produce similar changes [84]

The giant cell tumors which occur in primary hyperparathyroidism are neither malignant nor neoplastic The tumors which are sometimes referred to as osteoclastomas[33] or osteoblastoma [34] consist of boneless masses of soft tissue composed of osteoblasts osteoclasts and the supporting cells of the bone marrow They probably represent areas where the rapid and marked destruction of bone is associated with a local increase in the osteoclasts and osteoblasts Frequently the lesions are brown in color due to the presence of blood pigments resulting from the phagocytosis of red cells

The most common locations for the giant cell tumors and bone cysts are the jaws and zygoma the metacarpals and metatarsals and the ends of long bones The bone cysts are probably degenerative in origin and are usually located at sites where previous trauma and hemorrhage have occurred It is questionable as to whether the cysts are the result of degenerative changes in giant cell tumors Following the successful treat ment of primary hyperparathyroidism the giant cell tumors generally disappear while the cysts persist although they may undergo calcification

The bones which show the greatest degree of change are usually the long tubular bones particularly in the diaphyses and next in order of frequency the vertebral column pelvis skull jaw bones thoracic flat bones and the short tubular bones

Symptoms of Primary Hyperparathyroidism —The symptoms and signs of hyperparathyrodism may include skeletal renal and gastrointestinal manifestations in a variety of combinations Not infrequently however the predominant clinical picture is referable to either the skeletal or the urinary system alone Occasionally evidence of acute parathyroid intoxication is encountered

The skeletal manifestations usually referred to as von Recklinghausen s disease are dependent on the marked negative calcium balance as well as on the direct effects of parathyroid hormone on bone The resultant de calcification and bony alterations result in indefinite skeletal pains which are often erroneously attributed to arthritis bursitis or more loosely neuritis ' Bone tenderness is commonly found Multiple pathologic fractures occur and deformities of the long bones pelvis and spine are thus produced The x ray is of particular value in von Recklinghausen s disease

Although all the bones of the skeleton are involved, the effects are more pronounced in some areas than in others. In general, there is thinning and scalloping of the cortex and widening of the marrow spaces. In addition, there is a porous appearance of bone due to dilatation of the Haversian canals, as well as decalcification and spontaneous fractures.[5, 9] The compression and collapse of the softened vertebral bodies result in shortening of the patients and the appearance of fish bone biconcave vertebræ on x-ray examination. Bone cysts and giant cell tumors are frequently but not invariably present and, as previously described, are most often noted in the bones of the skull or jaw or zygoma, the metacarpals, metatarsals and ends of long bones. The presence of such tumors and bone cysts is particularly significant in establishing the diagnosis. The roentgenologic appearance of coarsely meshed trabeculation and diffuse osteoporosis is often sufficient to strongly suggest the diagnosis. The clubbing of the fingers sometimes seen in this disease is associated with decalcification of the bones of the hand and fingers and absorption of the terminal phalanges. Hyperparathyroidism is often first detected by the dentist, who may find an epulis of the jaw or an absence of the lamina dura of the teeth. The latter is of great significance, for when present it is indicative of a generalized osteoporosis.[64]

Marked polyuria and polydipsia are frequently observed in primary hyperparathyroidism. The polyuria appears to be greater than could be anticipated from the degree of hypercalciuria and hyperphosphaturia. The therapeutic and experimental administration of parathyroid hormone results in at least a temporary loss of water, inorganic base and chloride, and when the hormone is withdrawn these substances are retained. Following the successful removal of a parathyroid adenoma, temporary oliguria may occur.

The renal manifestations include nephrolithiasis and nephrocalcinosis, both of which have their origin in the alterations in the serum and urinary calcium. The nephrolithiasis is dependent on the precipitation of calcium phosphate and oxalate stones as a result of the marked hypercalcemia. Stone formation is favored by urinary obstruction, infection and an alkaline reaction in the urine. It has been reported that 3 to 5 per cent of all renal calculi are due to underlying hyperparathyroidism.[14, 8, 81] Repeated episodes of pyelonephritis and obstruction which so commonly occur in the sodes of pyelonephritis and obstruction which so commonly occur in the presence of urolithiasis may result in renal insufficiency. Nephrocalcinosis is due to both metastatic calcification resulting from the hypercalcemia and to the precipitation of calcium salts in the lumina of the renal tubules. Calcification in the interstitium of the kidney, particularly around the tubules, is favored by the local changes in the pH. The intratubular precipitation of calcium is similar in origin to that discussed for nephrolithiasis. The diagnosis of nephrocalcinosis is based on the x-ray detection of calcification within the renal shadow. The presence of calcium casts in the urine is not pathognomonic of nephrocalcinosis but suggests the presence of hyperparathyroidism. It should be emphasized that renal insufficiency may result from nephrocalcinosis even in the absence of x-ray demonstration of renal calcification. Early in the course of this disorder only the mgm per cent in 100 instances and exceeded 12 mgm per cent in 91 patients [76] In the series of 35 patients reported from the Massachusetts General Hospital, 9 had serum calcium levels below 12 mgm per cent [14] It must be remembered that in the presence of renal insufficiency such as occurs in long standing cases of hyperparathyroidism and particularly when the serum inorganic phosphorus is increased the serum calcium level may be normal or even decreased [6]

Although the serum inorganic phosphorus concentration is usually reduced this is not invariably the case and it may even be increased in the presence of renal insufficiency Of a series of 79 proven cases of primary hyperparathyroidism in only a little less than half was the serum inorganic phosphorus level below 2 5 mgm per cent [59]

The demonstration of an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium and a negative calcium balance is significant in establishing the diagnosis of hyperparathyroidism in suspicious cases Under normal circumstances 70 to 90 per cent of the daily calcium intake is accounted for in the stool and only 10 to 30 per cent is excreted in the urine In hyperparathyroidism this relationship is reversed and this fact may be utilized for the diagnosis The patient is placed on a low calcium diet containing approximately 100 mgm a day for 2 successive three-day periods On this regimen the daily urinary calcium excretion will not exceed 100 mgm in normal subjects The daily urinary excretion of 150 mgm or more is suggestive of hyperparathyroidism [70] Hypercalcuria may be absent in the presence of renal

tubules are damaged later glomerular dilatation and impaired filtration occur In such instances following successful operation the glomerular function may return to normal but tubular function remains impaired

The question of the relative incidence of nephrolithiasis and of skeletal manifestations is an important one It is generally recognized that the predominance of the manifestations is to some extent determined by the daily dietary intake of calcium In the presence of a high calcium diet nephrolithiasis will more likely occur while in patients whose daily dietary intake of calcium is low skeletal manifestations will be more common

In the series studied at the Massachusetts General Hospital 52 of the first 62 cases observed had nephrolithiasis or nephrocalcinosis[14] In the same series only 35 had bone disease In the series of 322 cases collected by Norris,[67] skeletal lesions alone were encountered in 60 per cent renal changes alone in 5 per cent, and associated skeletal and renal manifestations in 31 per cent Involvement of neither system was found in 1 5 per cent It should be remembered that hyperparathyroidism must be present for a considerable period of time generally years before roentgen evidences of skeletal change are detectable On the other hand renal calculi form rather quickly As a consequence it might be expected that with earlier detection of the disease the relative incidence of renal manifestations will increase A possible explanation of the high incidence of renal complications encountered in this country is probably related to the high calcium content of the American diet[59] In Europe where milk is not an important adult food and the calcium intake in general low skeletal changes are more frequently encountered

Hypercalcemia results in decreased excitability of muscle in contrast to the hyperexcitability characteristic of hypoparathyroidism The clinical evidence of this is the marked hypotonia and decreased electrical reactions of skeletal muscle phenomena not uncommonly seen in these patients[73, 74] The lack of tone resulting from this muscular effect of hypercalcemia affects the gastrointestinal musculature as well As a result anorexia constipation nausea and vomiting are not infrequent The electrocardiographic tracing shows a shortening of the Q-T interval

The hypercalcemia may produce a peculiar band keratitis as well as deposits of calcium in the deep conjunctivæ of the palpebral fissure[7] while the marked osteitis fibrosa may result in anemia and leukopenia

Norris[67] has estimated that the average duration of the disease before the diagnosis is established is approximately 5 to 7 years although this obviously varies with the character of the manifestations and the index of suspicion of the physician See Table 28

The Diagnosis of Primary Hyperparathyroidism —The diagnosis is based essentially on the presence of the characteristic clinical, skeletal and renal abnormalities and the presence of the typical biochemical changes The latter include an increase in the urinary excretion of phosphorus and calcium a decrease in the serum level of inorganic phosphorus an elevation in the serum calcium level and an increase in the serum alkaline phosphatase The serum calcium level is generally elevated above 11 0 mgm per cent and usually exceeds 12 mgm per cent Of the 114 cases collected by Gutman and his associates the serum calcium level was greater than 11 0

syndrome. Bone cysts and giant cell tumors are not found in osteoporosis and only rarely is the lamina dura absent. Immobilization osteoporosis, particularly in children, is clinically somewhat different from the osteoporosis of other etiologies. In immobilized patients the excessive liberation of calcium from bone results in an increase in the serum calcium level while the serum inorganic phosphorus remains normal or may even be slightly elevated. As in other instances of osteoporosis the serum alkaline phosphatase shows no change. Hypercalcuria is marked. When these patients are permitted activity, however, recalcification promptly occurs and the biochemical abnormalities vanish. In senile osteoporosis Spencer and her associates[11] found that following the intravenous infusion of 50 cc of 10 per cent calcium gluconate over a four hour period the calcium retention over the subsequent twenty four hour period was considerably less than that observed either in normal individuals or in patients with hyperparathyroidism.

Albright and Reifenstein[14] have classified the causes of osteoporosis as follows:

I. Defects in Osteoblasts
   A. Loss of Stress and Strain
      1. Atrophy of Disuse
   B. Lack of Estrogen
      1. Postmenopausal State
      2. Ovarian Agenesis
   C. Congenital Osteoblastic Defect
      1. Osteogenesis Imperfecta

II. Defect in Matrix
   A. Loss of Androgen
      1. Eunuchoidism
      2. Senile Osteoporosis
   B. Loss of Protein
      1. Malnutrition
      2. Hypovitaminosis C
      3. Cushing's Syndrome
      4. Alarm Reaction

III. Effect Unknown
   A. Acromegaly
   B. Idiopathic Osteoporosis

In osteomalacia and rickets there is generalized decalcification and absence of the lamina dura, but tumors and cysts are rarely found. The deformities encountered in osteomalacia and rickets are due to bowing of the weakened bones rather than to true fractures. Pseudofractures do, however, occur in that form of osteomalacia known as Milkman's Syndrome, which is due to avitaminosis D. In rickets and in osteomalacia the concentration of the serum inorganic phosphorus is reduced while the alkaline phosphatase is elevated. These laboratory findings are similar to those observed in hyperparathyroidism. In the former disease, however, insufficiency or if hyperparathyroidism is complicated by coexistent avitaminosis D.[59] A rough clinical guide for the presence of hypercalciuria is afforded by the use of the Sulkowitch reagent. A heavy fasting urinary precipitate is suggestive of hypercalciuria and hence hypercalcemia. In hyperparathyroidism the intravenous calcium load test results in very little change in the urinary excretion of phosphorus. This is in contrast to the marked phosphate diuresis observed in hypoparathyroidism under the circumstances of the test and the reduction in the urinary excretion of this ion in normal individuals.[107]

Where skeletal manifestations are prominent and there is active deposition of osteoid and bone, the serum alkaline phosphatase is usually elevated above 12.0 King-Armstrong units and above 5.0 Bodansky units in adults.[77,78] However, in the absence of skeletal changes the serum alkaline phosphatase level may be normal. This determination is therefore best employed as an index of new bone formation rather than a diagnostic criterion of hyperparathyroidism, since it may not be increased in this disease and is increased in a variety of other bone diseases in which active new bone formation takes place. The finding of a normal serum alkaline phosphatase value in the presence of roentgen evidence of bony changes is a strong point against the diagnosis of hyperparathyroidism.

Differential Diagnosis. – Hyperparathyroidism must be differentiated from: 1. skeletal lesions which mimic it, 2. other causes of hypercalcemia, and 3. renal lesions associated with calculi, nephrocalcinosis, and renal insufficiency.

The confusing skeletal lesions include osteoporosis from any cause, osteomalacia and rickets, osteogenesis imperfecta, polyostotic fibrous dysplasia, Paget's disease, solitary bone cyst, multiple myeloma and metastatic malignancy. Other bone diseases less likely to be confused with hyperparathyroidism include lymphoma, Gaucher's disease, xanthomatosis, chronic radium poisoning, benign metastasizing hemangioma and renal osteitis fibrosa generalisata. The chief causes of hypercalcemia which must be distinguished from hyperparathyroidism are hypervitaminosis D, Boeck's sarcoidosis, and hypercalcemia resulting from the excessive ingestion of milk and alkali.

The important renal syndromes which may be confused with hyperparathyroidism are those producing nephrocalcinosis, such as "lower nephron nephrosis," resulting in renal acidosis, the secondary hyperparathyroidism of renal insufficiency, and the syndrome due to immobilization.

Osteoporosis not due to hyperparathyroidism is distinguished by several features. Except for the osteoporosis resulting from immobilization, the serum calcium and phosphorus levels are usually within the normal range, and since no new bone is formed the serum alkaline phosphatase is not increased. Although early in the course of the osteoporosis the urinary excretion of phosphorus and calcium may be excessive, in the later stages the amounts excreted are considerably reduced. This is in contrast to what is generally observed in hyperparathyroidism, where, in spite of marked demineralization of the skeleton, excessive urinary loss of these elements continues. The skull is rarely involved in osteoporosis in contrast to hyperparathyroidism. A possible exception to this is the osteoporosis of Cushing's azotemia have been reported In multiple myeloma the serum alkaline phosphatase is rarely if ever elevated and in the presence of bone disease is a strong point against the diagnosis of hyperparathyroidism The presence of Bence-Jones protein in the urine an increase in the serum globulin content and the identification of myeloma cells on sternal marrow aspiration serve to establish the diagnosis of multiple myeloma

Metastatic malignancy is readily differentiated from primary hyperparathyroidism In the former the lesions are sharply demarcated within otherwise normal bone Occasionally diffuse decalcification occurs The concentration of serum calcium may be elevated especially after treatment with androgens and hypercalciuria and nephrolithiasis may result The concentration of the serum phosphorus however is usually normal occasionally increased and but rarely decreased The serum alkaline phosphatase may be increased in the presence of osteoblastic types of metastases The more likely sources of the primary lesions are the breast prostate kidney bronchi and thyroid gland

Hypervitaminosis D may result in metastatic calcification and the clinical manifestations associated with hypercalcemia including polyuria polydipsia and impaired renal function The distinction from hyperparathyroidism is based on the history of prolonged ingestion of large amounts of vitamin D

In Boeck's sarcoidosis hypercalcemia[85] hypercalciuria nephrolithiasis a high serum alkaline phosphatase and bone lesions have been reported[69] The serum inorganic phosphorus however is not reduced and hyperproteinemia and hyperglobulinemia are almost constant findings Generalized lymphadenopathy is frequently present and perhaps more commonly a bilateral hilar adenopathy The presence of pulmonary lesions adds additional support for this diagnosis Further aid in the differentiation from hyperparathyroidism is provided by the facts that the bone lesions in sarcoidosis are usually confined to the hands and feet and generalized demineralization is not observed Finally the diagnosis of Boeck s sarcoidosis may be established by a positive Nickerson Kveim test and the characteristic histologic appearance of biopsied tissue

The excessive and prolonged intake of milk and alkali have been reported to produce a syndrome characterized by 1 hypercalcemia without hypercalciuria 2 a normal or elevated serum phosphorus level 3 impaired renal function with retention of non protein nitrogen and occasionally with nephrocalcinosis 4 conjunctival calcium deposits and band keratitis and 5 the clinical improvement which follows the decrease in the serum calcium level resulting from a decreased calcium intake[14 95]

Nephrocalcinosis resulting from hyperparathyroidism must be differentiated from other causes of renal calcification such as lower nephron nephrosis due to heavy metal poisoning particularly mercury and hyperchloremic nephrocalcinosis hypervitaminosis D and more rarely renal tuberculosis and chronic diffuse glomerulonephritis[14 86] Hyperchloremic nephrocalcinosis presumably represents a congenital defect in which there is impairment in the ability of the renal tubules to reabsorb bicarbonate As a consequence of this defect there is a continuous urinary drain of fixed

both the serum calcium level and the urinary excretion of calcium are depressed in contrast to that in hyperparathyroidism

Osteogenesis imperfecta sometimes loosely referred to as brittle bones is easily differentiated from hyperparathyroidism It is an hereditary disorder, associated with blue sclera and multiple fractures beginning in very early infancy The fractures, surprisingly, occur through the thickest rather than the thinnest portions of bone When the disease is detected later in life, x ray studies reveal a thin but not decalcified skull and an intact lamina dura of the teeth The serum alkaline phosphatase may be elevated but the serum calcium and phosphorus levels, as well as the urinary excretion of these ions are within the normal range

Polyostotic Fibrous Dysplasia is characterized by 1 a disseminated but not generalized osteitis fibrosa usually of segmental distribution 2 precocious puberty especially in females and 3 cutaneous pigmentation It is differentiated easily from hyperparathyroidism by the facts that in the former disease (a) the uninvolved areas of bone are completely normal (b) the lesions are hyperostotic as well as hypoostotic, and (c) the serum concentrations of calcium and inorganic phosphorus are normal although the serum alkaline phosphatase may be elevated There is no increase in the urinary excretion of calcium

Solitary bone cysts are particularly apt to occur at the ends of long bones and often lead to pathologic fracture Although they are histologically indistinguishable from those seen in hyperparathyroidism and in polyostotic fibrous dysplasia they are not accompanied by any other evidences of disease

Paget s disease may be a localized or disseminated process and has as its sites of predilection the lumbar spine pelvis femurs clavicles tibias and skull In this disease the architecture of the new bone is abnormal and the cortex is thickened Marked thickening of the periostium and diffuse swelling of those bones which are involved is common Bone cysts and giant cell tumors are rarely if ever seen and the involved bones are non tender This is in contrast to the thin cortex normal architecture the localized swelling of cysts and giant cell tumors and the bony tenderness observed in von Recklinghausen s disease Hypercalciuria and nephrolithiasis may occur in Paget s disease but these are relatively uncommon The serum concentrations of calcium and inorganic phosphorus are normal but the serum alkaline phosphatase may be inordinately elevated

Multiple myeloma is characterized by the presence on x ray examination of multiple sharply demarcated punched-out lesions These are especially significant if localized to the skull but may also be seen in the pelvis ribs spine and long bones Not infrequently it may be difficult to differentiate this disease from hyperparathyroidism since diffuse decalcification of the skeleton frequently occurs In approximately 10 per cent of the patients with multiple myeloma the serum calcium level may be elevated and in such instances the urinary excretion of this ion is increased and nephrolithiasis may occur Myeloma kidney may follow the deposition of protein in the renal tubules Chronic renal insufficiency and secondary hyperparathyroidism may result Indeed two instances of parathyroid hyperplasia in patients with multiple myeloma and hypercalciuria and is located in the usual sites the exploratory procedure is incomplete unless the mediastinum is carefully searched

Where primary hyperparathyroidism is due to diffuse hyperplasia of the parathyroid glands rather than to a discrete tumor the procedure of choice is the removal of three parathyroid bodies and the subtotal resection of the fourth At least 200 mgm of viable gland tissue with an adequate and uncompromised blood supply are left behind

After operation the serum calcium level drops promptly and may reach normal levels within twenty four to thirty six hours The greater the initial serum calcium concentration the greater is the likelihood that symptoms of tetany will occur postoperatively Within thirty six to forty-eight hour after operation the serum calcium level often falls below the normal range and the signs of low calcium tetany become evident Failure of the serum calcium level to fall is indicative of the presence of another tumor if one has been removed or in the case of diffuse hyperplasia of inadequate resection With the decrease in serum calcium concentration the urinary excretion of this ion is diminished but at a somewhat slower rate This is clinically evidenced by the fact that patients with overt tetany may continue to excrete calcium in the urine for two to three days after operation By the fourth postoperative day however calcium is usually no longer detectable in the urine

Postoperative tetany generally falls into three categories The first is transient in character and is dependent on the temporary functional inactivity of the remaining parathyroid tissue This form of tetany lasts for approximately a week The second form encountered is that associated with chronic hypoparathyroidism due to excessive removal of parathyroid tissue The treatment is dependent on the severity of the disorder and is outlined under the previous discussion of hypoparathyroidism Finally a refractory form of tetany may be observed in patients with hyperparathyroidism and severe skeletal changes In this group calcium and phosphorus are constantly being withdrawn from the serum for recalcification of the markedly depleted bone As a consequence the tetany may be severe and the low serum calcium is accompanied by a low serum phosphorus In such patients there is a rough parallel between the initial height of the serum alkaline phosphatase and the severity of the subsequent postoperative tetany The serum alkaline phosphatase rises during this period and may stay elevated until recalcification is completed often a matter of many months or longer

The treatment of acute postoperative tetany is essentially similar to that described elsewhere *in this chapter for the treatment of hypopara*thyroidism This consists particularly of the repeated intravenous use of calcium salts and in addition injections of parathormone Where the tetany is more persistent and prolonged dihydrotachysterol (AT 10) or vitamin D is substituted for parathormone since refractoriness to this hormone develops Tetany associated with postoperative recalcification of the skeleton is apt to be both persistent and refractory despite the usual therapeutic measures In such instances calcium must be vigorously administered through every available route in an attempt to provide adequate amounts of this ion both for skeletal repairs and for other physiologic base acidosis and an associated hyperchloremia The skeletal changes of rickets are often demonstrable in this syndrome [16]

Idiopathic hypercalcinuria has been described in association with a previous or present history of a staphylococcal albus pyelonephritis This syndrome in which calcium phosphate or calcium oxalate kidney stones frequently occur is characterized by a considerable increase in the urinary excretion of calcium a normal serum calcium level and some reduction in the serum phosphorus [113] Hypercalciuria may also be encountered in the Fanconi syndrome This syndrome consists essentially of vitamin D resistant rickets lowered serum phosphorus normal serum chloride glycosuria aminoaciduria and only rarely hyperphosphaturia The urine will often show a considerable amount of albumin and it may be either neutral or alkaline in reaction with a high ammonia content Chronic acidosis is frequently present The hypophosphatemia and rickets are probably due to impairment in the tubular reabsorption of phosphorus Patients with Fanconi syndrome commonly succumb to chronic renal failure or hepatic cirrhosis and on post mortem examination extensive cystine deposition in the internal organs is frequently encountered [105]

Treatment of Primary Hyperparathyroidism —The treatment of primary hyperparathyroidism consists of the surgical removal of the underlying parathyroid adenoma or resection of sufficient parathyroid tissue in those instances due to diffuse hyperplasia

Dietary therapy is of little value in the treatment of this disease A high calcium diet will decrease the negative calcium balance and thereby spare the skeleton but will also serve to increase the urinary excretion of calcium and thus favor the development of renal complications Since these renal manifestations are serious features of the illness a low calcium diet is preferable Finally a high calcium diet will increase the hypercalcemia and the symptoms dependent on the elevated serum calcium level A high phosphorus diet will raise the level of the serum inorganic phosphorus and depress the serum calcium concentration However the increase in urinary excretion of phosphorus will favor precipitation of calcium phosphate A low calcium and low phosphorus diet is therefore desirable while the patient awaits operation

Some favorable results have been said to follow the use of x ray therapy to the parathyroid bodies [87, 88] The evidence however is dubious and most observers doubt the efficacy of this form of treatment This therapy should be avoided and surgery resorted to without any undue waste of time

Before operation an attempt should be made by suitable x ray studies to locate the site of a possible parathyroid tumor Search should be particularly directed to the esophagus and mediastinum employing esophagrams and tomographic studies In approximately 10 per cent of the cases such tumors may be located preoperatively [91] Indeed with careful x ray studies suggestive evidence of such tumors were demonstrated in 20 of 34 cases by Wyman and Robbins [114] In these studies the actual tumors were usually not identified but suggestive indentation of the trachea or esophagus or both were found chiefly at the level of the 7th cervical to the 2nd dorsal vertebra Surgical exploration is carried out bearing in mind that most tumors arise from the inferior parathyroids However if no tumor

bones is much greater than in true rickets These changes are best noted in the knees wrists and ankles In addition there is a moth-eaten appearance associated with decalcification and stippling noted in the skull Whether the skeletal changes in this syndrome result from renal acidosis alone or are due actually to an increase in secretion of parathyroid hormone is a disputable point The probable significance of the latter is suggested by the fact that the administration of parathormone to nephrectomized animals results in a degree of skeletal change considerably greater than that observed in untreated nephrectomized controls [14] It is interesting to note that nephrectomized parathyroidectomized animals fail to develop skeletal changes [27]

The clinical features of the disease are renal insufficiency with fixation of the specific gravity an increase in the blood non protein and urea nitrogen levels a decrease in the CO_2 content of the blood an elevation of the inorganic phosphorus of the serum and a normal or slightly reduced serum calcium level The serum alkaline phosphatase is usually elevated Calcium may be deposited about the joints in the skin and arteries and in the latter may produce Monckeberg s sclerosis

The differentiation from primary hyperparathyroidism may at times be difficult since renal disease associated with this latter syndrome is often extensive enough to produce renal insufficiency in which case the serum inorganic phosphorus may rise and the serum calcium fall

The treatment of secondary hyperparathyroidism is directed essentially towards control of the acidosis the underlying renal disease if possible and the symptoms referable to the skeletal changes The regimen consists of a high calcium low phosphorus diet with added vitamin D Alkaline salts such as sodium citrate given orally in a dosage of 8 grams a day will serve to correct the acidosis and to decrease the negative calcium balance Similarly the oral administration of aluminum hydroxide will serve to precipitate phosphate in the intestinal tract as aluminum phosphate and thus permit some increase in the serum calcium level On this regimen the skeletal changes may be considerably improved needs. Vitamin D is given to aid the absorption of calcium. The daily injection of 100 units of parathyroid hormone in 2 or 3 divided doses is later followed by the oral administration of dihydrotachysterol.

Secondary Hyperparathyroidism.—Diffuse hyperplasia of the parathyroid glands may result from calcium deprivation, rickets and osteomalacia, biliary fistula, and chronic jaundice,[69] pregnancy and lactation, multiple myeloma, and finally chronic diffuse glomerulonephritis or chronic pyelonephritis.[2,9] When this type of enlargement of the parathyroid glands is associated with skeletal changes similar to those seen in primary hyperparathyroidism, the clinical syndrome is referred to as "secondary hyperparathyroidism." The parathyroid glands observed under such circumstances are histologically different from those seen in primary hyperparathyroidism.[3] In the former the glands are enlarged and are made up of all three cellular elements. In most instances, however, the chief cells are predominant, although in some cases the water-clear cells are more numerous. There is an absence of mitoses and a decrease in or absence of intercellular fat tissue. In addition, the glycogen content of the cells is higher than is found either in adenoma or in primary hyperplasia of the parathyroids.[5] The usual size of the water-clear cells in contrast to the large water-clear cells characteristic of primary hyperplasia renders the histological differentiation relatively simple.

The recognition of secondary hyperparathyroidism is of importance since in this condition no cure can be envisaged while in primary hyperparathyroidism surgical intervention may result in considerable improvement and often in cure. On the other hand, instances of primary hyperparathyroidism resulting in renal disease and renal insufficiency followed by secondary hyperparathyroidism have been reported.[78,90]

The clinical syndrome of secondary hyperparathyroidism, in contrast to simple secondary parathyroid hyperplasia, is almost invariably associated with chronic renal insufficiency with acidosis. Under these circumstances the retention of organic and inorganic acids by the insufficient kidney results in phosphate retention and acidosis. Parathyroid hyperplasia then occurs as a result of the fall in serum calcium brought about by the rise in serum inorganic phosphorus. Associated with the parathyroid hyperplasia are skeletal changes. This entity is often referred to as "renal hyperparathyroidism" or "renal rickets" or "renal osteodystrophy." When this syndrome occurs in the adult, it is characterized by a generalized osteitis fibrosa which is identical with that observed in patients with primary hyperparathyroidism; however, bone cysts and giant cell tumors are generally not seen. In children, in addition, epiphyseal changes are noted where no such changes are seen in primary hyperparathyroidism. These epiphyseal changes, which on roentgenologic study resemble true rickets, are histologically quite different.

In renal osteodystrophy in the child the roentgenograms may reveal large and deeply cupped metaphyses with a wooly appearance. The distal ends of the diaphyses show irregular metaphyseal margins and well defined epiphyses peripherally. Epiphyseal slipping frequently occurs because of the generalized decalcification and subperiosteal erosion of the metaphysis. In general the porous appearance and transparency of the

LABORATORY TESTS OF ENDOCRINE FUNCTION

Chloride in Serum[1]

Reagents

1 Mercuric nitrate solution
   Dissolve 2 9 to 3 0 grams of mercuric nitrate (c p Baker s analyzed) in 200 ml distilled water
   Add 20 ml 2N nitric acid
   Dilute to 1000 ml with distilled water
2 Indicator—Diphenylcarbazone (Eastman Kodak #4459)
   Dissolve 100 mg diphenylcarbazone in 100 ml ethyl alcohol and store in a dark bottle in the refrigerator
   Prepare fresh each month
3 Standard sodium chloride solution
   Dry sodium chloride (c p) in oven overnight at 120 C
   Dissolve 584 5 mg of sodium chloride in distilled water and dilute to 1000 ml
   This solution contains 10 milliequivalents of Cl per liter
   To standardize mercuric nitrate solution titrate 2 ml of the standard sodium chloride solution

Procedure

Place 0 2 ml serum in a 25 ml Erlenmeyer flask
Add 1 8 ml distilled water
4 drops of indicator
Add mercuric nitrate from a microburette calibrated in 0 01 ml interval (1 ml should equal about 100 drops)
The color of the mixture is a salmon red which changes to a deep violet when the end point has been reached
The removal of proteins intensifies the color change at the end point However deproteinization is not essential

Potassium in Urine

Urine potassium may be determined by the same method used for serum

THE USE OF THE FLAME PHOTOMETER FOR THE DETERMINATION OF SERUM AND URINARY SODIUM AND POTASSIUM

For the rapid determination of sodium and potassium a flame photometer may be employed. Stock standards containing known concentrations of sodium chloride and potassium chloride are prepared and from these solutions a curve is drawn. A solution of lithium chloride is also prepared for use as an internal standard, i.e. the light of the element to be determined is directly compared to the light emitted by the lithium.

Stock standard

All chemicals used should be of the highest chemical purity

1 Dry sodium chloride and potassium chloride in an oven at 110 C for several hours before weighing

Dissolve 1.4614 grams of sodium chloride and 1.8638 grams of potassium chloride in distilled water and dilute to 500 ml

This solution contains 25 mM of sodium and potassium respectively and is used for dilutions of less concentrated standard

2 Dissolve 10.624 grams of lithium chloride in distilled water and dilute to 1000 ml. This solution contains 250 mM of lithium chloride

Dilute the stock standard for working standard containing 1.0, 0.8, 0.6, 0.5, 0.4, 0.3, 0.2 and 0.1 mM of sodium and potassium and 10 mM of lithium chloride respectively

A solution containing 10 mM of lithium chloride is also made to be used for adjusting the zero point of the machine

For the determination of diffusible magnesium serum may be ultrafiltered through a #600 cellophane membrane according to the method described by Lavietes[9]

The magnesium content is determined as described above except that it is unnecessary to precipitate the proteins

In normal individuals the percentage of the total magnesium which is non diffusible or bound does not exceed 25%

Individuals with hyperthyroidism show a very marked increase in the percentage of bound magnesium, the latter varying between 25 and 62% of the total magnesium In myxedema the percentage of bound magnesium varies from 0 0 to 10%

Sulkowitch Test for Urinary Calcium[11]

Reagent

2 5 grams of oxalic acid
2 5 grams of ammonium oxalate
5 0 ml of glacial acetic acid
Dilute to 150 ml with distilled water

Procedure

Collect a 24 hour sample of urine and note volume
To a 5 ml aliquot add 5 ml of the reagent
Let stand 2 to 3 minutes

When calcium is present in the urine, a fine white precipitate is formed, indicating a normal blood calcium level

The absence of a precipitate indicates the absence of urinary calcium and a blood calcium level of less than 7 5 mg %

The presence of a heavy precipitate indicates hypercalcemia

This test should not be performed after the ingestion of large amounts of fluid or after the ingestion of milk

Calcium Load Test[5]

Method

The patient is placed on a fixed diet for 2 successive days the total urine being collected for each day from 9 30 A M to 9 30 A M On the second day, approximately 1 hour after breakfast an intravenous infusion is given over a period of 4 hours During this time 1 liter of normal saline containing 15 mg of calcium per kilogram of body weight in the form of a salt (gluconate-glucoheptonate) is administered at a steady rate The patient is allowed to eat lunch at the usual time during the infusion Drinking water is allowed ad lib

Results

In normal subjects there is a considerable reduction in the urinary excretion of phosphorus during the second (or test) day In subjects with hyperparathyroidism there is little alteration in the urinary excretion of phosphorus whereas in patients with hypoparathyroidism there is a marked increase in urinary phosphorus noted on the test day

Serum Precipitable Iodine[1, 13, 51]

Reagents Required

All solutions should be made up in double-distilled water If the amount of iodide in the water is still too high to give a satisfactory blank it may be necessary to carry out these distillations with such reagents as alkali and permanganate

All reagents used should be of highest purity obtainable However the iodine content in each instance must be judged from the blank values rather than from estimates shown on the labels Often it is necessary to turn to a new source of supply or a different lot number in case of contamination

Zinc Sulfate 100 grams of $ZnSO_4 \cdot 7H_2O$ per liter of solution

Sodium Hydroxide 0 5 N is 20 grams of NaOH per liter of solution The zinc sulfate and sodium hydroxide reagents should be so related that when 10 0 ml of the former are diluted with 50–70 ml of water and titrated with the latter 10 8–11 2 ml of the 0 5 N NaOH are required to produce a faint permanent pink color with phenolphthalein

Hydrochloric Acid 2 N 200 ml C P concentrated HCl per liter of solution

Sulfuric Acid 7 N 196 ml C P concentrated H_2SO_4 per liter of solution

Iodide Standards Either NaI or KI of highest purity desiccator-dried may be used If NaI is chosen 118 1 mg are dissolved in water and made to 1 l if KI 130 8 mg These concentrated stock solutions contain 100 0μgm I/ml

A more dilute stock is obtained by diluting 2 ml of the above solution to 1 l To prepare the standard of 0 04 μgm I/ml solution used in each determination 10 ml of this dilute stock are futher diluted to 50 ml

All of these solutions have been found to keep indefinitely at refrigerator temperatures but it is preferable to make up the most dilute standard fresh every week or two

Ceric Ammonium Sulfate 0 02 N 12 65 grams of the salt are dissolved in 500 ml of water plus 230 ml of 7 N H_2SO_4 When the solution is clear it is made to 1 l with water

Sodium Arsenite 0 1 N Dissolve 4 95 grams of As_2O_3 in 25 ml of 4% (1N) NaOH warming to hasten solution This should be diluted with about 300 ml of water and dilute sulfuric acid added until the solution is slightly acid to litmus paper (if the 7 N is uses about 4 ml will be required) The solution is then made to 1 liter If sodium arsenite itself is used 6 50 grams of $NaAsO_2$ should be dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 1 0 liter No acid or alkali is required with this salt

The steps involved can most conveniently be described under four headings (1) precipitation and washing of plasma proteins (2) drying and incineration of sample (3) dissolving iodide from the ash (4) colorimetric determination of iodide present

(1) Precipitation and washing of plasma proteins The blood sample about 10 ml is centrifuged and the plasma or serum drawn off Duplicate aliquots of 1 ml each are pipetted into 15 × 125 mm Pyrex test tubes diluted with 7 ml of distilled water and 1 0 ml of 10% zinc sulfate solution added The contents of each tube are mixed with a glass stirring rod about 2 mm in diameter 1 0 ml of 0 5 N sodium hydroxide is added and the solutions thoroughly mixed to insure even distribution of the alkali and complete precipitation of the proteins Any material adhering to the rod can be removed by rubbing it with a rotary movement against the inside wall of the tube

The tube and contents are centrifuged for 10 minutes to pack the precipitate and the supernatant fluid is poured off Ten ml of distilled water are added and the protein resuspended by means of the same stirring rod originally used Stirring should be only sufficiently vigorous to distribute the zinc proteinate uniformly throughout the solution if over zealously carried out the precipitate may be so finely divided that it cannot easily be centrifuged down Centrifugation is again carried out and the supernatant discarded This washing process is repeated two more times making a total of three washings (the original precipitation is not included as a washing)

(2) Drying and incineration After the last supernatant solution has been poured off 0 8 ml of 4 0 N sodium carbonate is added and thoroughly stirred into the precipitate with the same stirring rod used in the washings Removal of material clinging to the rod can be accomplished by rubbing as described previously followed by 0 2 ml of the 4 0 N Na_2CO_3 added dropwise down the rod This last portion of alkali can easily be mixed with the sludge already present without use of the stirring rod The tube is then placed in an oven set at 85–95 C to drive off water This usually requires 12–18 hours and is usually carried out overnight

After thorough drying of the alkali and zinc proteinate ashing is carried out by placing the tube in a muffle furnace for two and one-half hours at 600 ± 25 C At the end of that time the tube is removed and allowed to cool to room temperature

(3) Dissolving iodide from the ash Two ml of 2 N hydrochloric acid are added with due caution to avoid excessive effervescence A glass rod is used to mix any unreacted ash with the acid and 2 0 ml of 7 N sulfuric acid and 3 0 ml of water are added The contents of the tube are stirred until the reaction appears to be finished, transferred to a clean tube and briefly centrifuged to pack the insoluble material

(4) Determination of iodide For each tube a pair of colorimeter tubes is taken To one of the pair is added 1 0 ml of distilled water containing 0 04 μgm of iodine as sodium or potassium iodide and to the other is added 1 0 ml of water A 3 0 ml aliquot of the supernatant in the sample tube is pipetted into each colorimeter tube and 0 5 ml of the sodium arsenite solution is added to each tube Mixing should be carried out by some technique which avoids both loss of solution and contamination

The colorimeter tubes are then placed in a well stirred constant temperature water bath maintained at 39 ± 0 1 C for 10 minutes to come to temperature The ceric ammonium sulfate solution should also be warmed in the bath Since the actual determination of iodide is accomplished by measuring iodide catalysis of the rate of decolorization of yellow ceric ammonium sulfate by arsenious acid the times at which colorimeter readings are made must be definitely set up One ml of the ceric solution must be added to each tube with adequate time allowance for reading the color change in the previous tube This is accomplished in this laboratory by leaving a 30-second interval between tubes and by setting up a maximum of only 12 tubes in a single series Colorimeter readings are then made at six and 12 minutes after adding the ceric sulfate solution to each tube If 30 seconds is not adequate for making the reading more time must be allowed and fewer determinations done in any one series Since the measurement depends entirely upon the decrease in amount of color the pipetting of the 1 0 ml of ceric solution must be highly accurate even though done rapidly Mixing must again be rapid and thorough

The Klett-Summerson readings (using blue filter No 42) are plotted on semi log paper against the time in minutes Ordinary graph paper is suitable for instruments giving readings in terms of per cent light transmission The colorimeter setting at zero time is obtained for any given batch of reagents by quickly reading a reagent blank immediately after addition of the ceric sulfate The lines describing the two reaction rates are drawn using the points for 0 6 and 12 minutes and then the horizontal line indicating times required to reach equal amounts of decolorization The amount of iodide in the colorimeter tube without added iodide is calculated from the following equation obtained from similar triangles

t_1 = time in minutes at intercept of the rate of decolorization in tube containing no extra iodide with the designated horizontal

t_2 = time in minutes at intercept of the rate of decolorization in tube containing added iodide with the designated horizontal

The reagents used contain variable amounts of iodide and the total must be determined by blank analyses starting with the zinc sulfate and sodium hydroxide solutions and carried through the entire procedure including the washing with 10 ml of distilled water addition of 1 ml of sodium carbonate drying ashing treatment with hydrochloric and sulfuric acid and the final colorimetric assay on 3 ml aliquots just as with an unknown sample The blank value calculated by the same formula shown previously has been 0 015 0 017 μgm I/tube in this laboratory

Since it is customary to express the values in terms of μgm 100 ml plasma the complete calculation would follow

Plasma PBI μgm I/100 ml

$$= 100 \times \text{(I in final aliquot} - \text{blank I)}$$

where the factor of 7/3 has been introduced to correct for the 3 0 ml aliquot taken for colorimetric evaluation from the 7 0 ml of acid supernatant from the ashed sample

If so much iodide is present in the sample that decolorization is nearly complete in the second tube with 0 04 μgm of added I the determination may be repeated using less than the 1 0 ml of plasma usually called for Computation of the result must be adjusted as necessary to cover this change

A value of 3 5 to 8 γ% is considered normal

A value above 8 γ% is found in hyperthyroidism

A value of less than 3 5 γ% is found in hypothyroidism

Read in a darkened room in a photoelectric colorimeter within 3 to 20 minutes using first a green filter #520 and then a blue filter #420 To one of the blanks add a volume of the crude extract equal to the volume used in the test sample and read in the colorimeter immediately Subtract this reading from the reading of the unknown, to correct for the color of the extract

The 17 ketosteroid content of the test substance is determined in terms of androsterone by reference to a calibration curve which has previously been constructed from measurements of known amounts of androsterone

If the reading obtained by the green filter is 1 5 times or more greater than that obtained by the blue filter the Girard separation is unnecessary

Girard Separation

Pipette an aliquot portion of the crude extract into a 250 ml Erlenmeyer flask and evaporate to dryness on a steam bath

Biologic Assay of the Urinary Adrenal Corticoids [1]

Reagents

1 Male white mice weighing 20 to 25 grams
2 5 and 10% glucose
3 Alcohol 10%
4 Potassium hydroxide 30%
5 Alcohol 95%
6 Hydrochloric or sulfuric acid
7 Ethylene dichloride
8 Chloroform
9 Sodium hydroxide 0 1 normal
10 Nitrogen
11 11-dehydro 17 hydroxycorticosterone (crystalline Compound E of Kendall)

Procedure

Preparation of urinary extracts
For urines containing a normal or low titer of glycogenic activity a complete 48 hour specimen is necessary for assay
For urines containing a high titer a 24 hour specimen is sufficient
The urine is adjusted to pH 1 0 with hydrochloric or sulfuric acid and extracted 3 or 4 times with ethylene dichloride Chloroform may also be used If any emulsions are formed they may be broken by centrifugation or by allowing the mixture to stand for an hour
The clear ethylene dichloride extract is evaporated almost to dryness under reduced pressure the temperature of the water bath not exceeding 50 C
The residue is taken up in 30 ml of chloroform and the chloroform is extracted 3 times with 5 ml of cold 0 1 normal sodium hydroxide and 3 times with water
These washings are reextracted with chloroform

The combined chloroform is evaporated down to a volume of approximately 1 to 2 ml and is transferred to a test tube with small amounts of chloroform

The test tube is placed in a water bath at 50 C and the remainder of the chloroform is evaporated under a stream of nitrogen

The dry residue is stored in the cold until ready for assay

Preparation of extract for assay

6 to 8 mice are used for each assay For normal male urine the equivalent of six hours of urine is administered to each mouse whereas for normal female urine or urines expected to be low in glycogen activity the equivalent of eight hours of urine is given to each animal

The following will illustrate the manner in which the residue is prepared for assay so that the final extract will contain 10% alcohol plus the required amount of glucose which is approximately 70 mgm per mouse The addition of this amount of glucose aids in sharpening the sensitivity of the test For example the residue obtained from a 48 hour urine specimen is to be assayed on eight mice Each mouse receives seven injections of 0 2 ml so that the final extract is made up to 7 × 0 2 × 8 = 11 2 ml and should contain 70 × 8 = 560 mg of glucose A 10% glucose solution is accurately prepared and 5 6 ml of this solution is measured into a 15 ml graduated tube

The urine residue is dissolved in 1 12 ml of alcohol and this solution is run slowly drop by drop from a pipette into the 10% glucose solution the tube being shaken continuously during the addition of this material The original tubes are rinsed out with water which is added to the extract and the final volume is made up to 11 2 ml with water The extracts may be kept for 24 to 48 hours at ice box temperature

Male white mice weighing 20 to 25 grams are used As the response to adrenal cortical extracts may vary with different strains of mice it is important to keep to the same strain

Two days before adrenalectomy the mice are removed from their stock fare and placed on the McCollum lactation diet which contains 26% protein and 52% carbohydrate

The animals are anesthetized with nembutal or ether and are bilaterally adrenalectomized by the usual lumbar route

Following adrenalectomy they are placed in a constant temperature room or box at 76 C and are maintained on the McCollum diet 0 9% NaCl containing 5% glucose is given as drinking water on the first postoperative day and 0 9% NaCl is substituted throughout the remainder of the test The giving of glucose immediately following adrenalectomy almost completely eliminates the mortality due to operative shock

On the third postoperative day food is removed at 5 P M and the mice are fasted until the following morning at which time the drinking water is also removed

On the fourth postoperative day beginning at 9 15 A M a total of 7 injections are given at 9 15 A M 10 A M 10 45 A M 11 30 A M 12.30 P M 1.30 P M and 2 30 P M The material to be tested is taken into solution in 5% glucose and 10% alcohol Two-tenths ml are given subcutaneously for each injection containing 70 mg of glucose

At 3.30 P M the mice are weighed and anesthetized with sodium amytal (0.2 ml of a 1 8% solution) The livers are quickly removed and plunged into 4 ml of hot 30% KOH contained in a 15 ml graduated centrifuge tube

The tubes are heated in a boiling water bath and frequently shaken until all the tissue is in solution

Procedure

Take a 200 ml aliquot and bring it to pH 1 0 by the addition of 20 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid

Transfer to a separatory funnel

Add 100 ml chloroform and shake hard for 5 minutes

Let stand until there is a complete separation of the urine and chloroform and draw off the chloroform layer into a 500 ml Erlenmeyer flask

Add 3 more 100 ml lots of chloroform shaking 5 minutes each time

Allow the pooled chloroform extracts to stand until any urine that has been dissolved in it rises to the top Siphon off the layer of urine

Add sodium sulfate to the pooled chloroform extracts Mix cover and allow to stand until the emulsion has been broken

Filter through a Whatman #5 filter paper

Chill the clear extract and wash

Transfer washed chloroform extract to a distilling flask and evaporate under vacuum at a temperature not exceeding 50 When the extract has distilled down to about 10 ml transfer it quantitatively to a 125 ml standard taper Erlenmeyer flask and take it to complete dryness under vacuum

This dry residue is stable at room temperature

Assay

On the night before the assay is to be done dissolve the dry residue in 3 ml glacial acetic acid

Two aliquots of the glacial acetic acid extract are taken for assay one sample is treated with the periodic acid reagent to form formaldehyde This is called the oxidized sample In the second sample the reaction is prevented by the addition of the stannous chloride reagent prior to the periodic acid reagent This is known as the unoxidized sample A blank of all the reagents is also run simultaneously and is treated in the same manner as the unoxidized sample

Oxidized Sample	Unoxidized Sample	Reagent Blank
In a 50 ml boiling flask 0 5 ml acetic acid extract 8 5 ml distilled water 0 5 ml periodic acid reagent Let it stand at room temperature for exactly 30 minutes Then arrest oxidation by the addition of 0 5 ml stannous chloride reagent	In a 50 ml boiling flask 0 5 ml acetic acid extract 8 5 ml distilled water 0 5 ml stannous chloride Mix thoroughly 0 5 ml periodic acid reagent	In a 50 ml boiling flask 0 5 ml glacial acetic acid 8 5 ml distilled water 0 5 ml stannous chloride Mix thoroughly 0 5 ml periodic acid reagent

Distillation

The outlet of the still is placed under the meniscus of 1 0 ml distilled water in a 10 ml volumetric flask

The reagent blank oxidized and unoxidized samples are then boiled over a microflame until approximately 8 ml of distillate are collected These distillates are then diluted to the 10 ml volume with distilled water

The glycogen is precipitated by the addition of 1 2 volumes of 95% alcohol The tubes are heated until the mixture just begins to boil cooled in an ice bath and centrifuged

The supernatant liquid is poured off and the tubes are allowed to drain

The sides of the tubes are washed down with 0 5 ml alcohol and again allowed to drain Final trace of alcohol are expelled by heating the tubes for a few minutes in a hot water bath

The glycogen is hydrolyzed and the glucose is determined

The glycogen is expressed in terms of mg of liver glucose per 100 grams of mouse body weight

Standard

The reference standard is 11-dehydro 17 hydroxycorticosterone (crystalline Compound E of Kendall)

The biologic activity equivalent that of one microgram of 11-dehydro-17 hydroxycorticosterone in terms of amount of glycogen deposited, is defined as one glycogen unit

Normal Values

Adult females—25 to 55 glycogenic units per 24 hours
Adult males —40 to 85 " " " "
In infants normal adult levels are attained after the age of two and one-half years

Determination of Chloroform soluble Plus Glucuronide 17 hydroxycorticosteroids in Human Urine

Hydrolysis of Glucuronides —0 5 or 1 0 ml of urine adjusted to approximately pH 6 5 is mixed with 4 volumes of glucuronidase solution (250 sigma units per ml) The volume is adjusted to 5 ml with phosphate buffer pH 6 5 and the mixture is placed in a water bath at 37 C for at least 2 hours An alternative procedure is to add an equal volume of more dilute glucoronidase solution (25 sigma units per ml) and to incubate at 37 C for 18 hours or more

Determination of Steroid —The sample and aqueous standard adjusted to 5 ml with distilled water or buffer are shaken for 15 second with 25 ml of chloroform Thereafter the procedures is identical with that described for the determination of free steroid except that two 10 ml aliquots of the chloroform extract are used instead of two 20 ml aliquots

Normal range Average value is 6 6 mg ± 3 7 mg in 24 hour urine

Determination of Chloroform soluble 17 hydroxycorticosteroids in Plasma

To each 10 ml sample of plasma are added 5 gamma of hydrocortisone in aqueous solution As standard known quantities of hydrocortisone in 1 ml of water are added to 10-ml portions of plasma which have been washed twice with 3 volumes of chloroform The samples and standards are shaken with 25 or 50 ml of chloroform for 15 seconds After the extraction the procedure is the same as that described for the analysis of urine

The addition of hydrocortisone to the samples is not essential particularly if they contain more than 10 gamma per cent of hydrocortisone or if smaller cuvettes are available

Normal range The average steroid concentration in normal human plasma varies from 6 to 25 gamma per cent expressed as hydrocortisone

flow per minute After 2 control 15-minute periods provided the urine flow exceeds 5 ml per minute 2 5 per cent sodium chloride is given intravenously at the rate of 0 25 ml per kilo per minute for 45 minutes If no decrease in urine flow ensues during the infusion or in two 15 minute periods thereafter 0 1 unit of pitressin is then injected intravenously and the effect observed In this way if no inhibition of water diuresis by the hypertonic saline is noted the responsiveness to pitressin is demonstrated in order to prove that posterior pituitary hormone has not been secreted In normal individuals and in patients with hysterical polydipsia there occurs a decrease in the urinary volume during and following the administration of the hypertonic saline In patients with diabetes insipidus no such inhibition of urine flow occurs with the saline but does take place when the pitressin is administered

Water Tolerance Test [4]

The day before the test the patient is maintained on a regular diet from which extra salt is omitted After the evening meal at 6 P M no further food or drink is permitted except that indicated as part of the test At 10 30 P M the patient is asked to void and the urine is discarded All urine voided from this point until 7.30 the following morning is collected, measured and saved for chemical analysis At 8.30 A.M the patient again voids and the urine is discarded He is then given 20 ml of water per kilogram of body weight over a 45 minute period He again voids at 9 30 10 30 11 30 A M and at 12.30 P M Each specimen is collected and measured At 11 30 A M blood is withdrawn under oil for chemical analysis If the volume of any single specimen voided during the morning is greater than the total volume of urine voided during the night such a response indicates the absence of Addison s disease If on the other hand the volume of the largest hourly morning specimen is less than that of the night urine Addison s disease may or may not be present and the second half of the procedure is then performed as follows

The plasma collected above is analyzed for urea and chloride and similar determinations are performed on the nocturnal urine specimen

The following formula is then used to compute the result

$$A = \frac{\text{Urea in urine (mg \%)}}{\text{Urea in plasma (mg \%)}} \times \frac{\text{Chlorides in plasma (mg \%)}}{\text{Chlorides in urine (mg \%)}} \times \frac{\text{Volume of day urine (largest hourly specimen ml)}}{\text{Volume of night urine (total ml)}}$$

If the value of A in this equation is greater than 30 the patient probably does not have Addison s disease

If the value of A' is less than 25 the patient probably has Addison s disease provided that nephritis has been excluded

Water Loading Test[17]

The patient is fasted overnight and the following morning at 8 00 A M he void and the urine is discarded Fifteen hundred ml of tap water are administered orally over a 15- to 30-minute period and the urine is collected over a 5-hour period from the beginning of the test and the total volume measured Under the circumstances of the test normal subjects excrete 1000 ml or more of urine while patients with hypopituitarism and adrenal insufficiency and patients with Addison's disease excrete less than 800 ml Failure of adequate diuresis may be encountered in hepatic and renal disease myxedema and dehydration The significance of the test may be sharpened by noting the effect of cortisone on the diuresis In patients with adrenal insufficiency the oral administration of 50 mgs of cortisone 2 hours

saline is administered by intravenous drip over an 8 hour period on 2 successive days Blood is drawn for eosinophil counts immediately before and 8 to 10 hours after the beginning of the first infusion A 24 hour urine specimen is again collected beginning on the morning of the second ACTH infusion and including the period of this infusion The urine is analyzed for steroids

Results In individuals without impairment of adrenal cortical function there occurs an 80 per cent or more fall in the blood eosinophil count following the first ACTH infusion In patients with Addison s disease the reduction in eosinophiles under the circumstances of this test is 30 per cent or less The increase in the urinary excretion of the neutral 17 ketosteroids following the second day s infusion of ACTH in subjects without adrenal cortical disease is usually in excess of 4 mg with a correspondingly significant increase in the 17 hydroxycorticoid In patients with Addison's disease only a negligible rise in the urinary excretion of both groups of steroids occurs

In those instances in which the intravenous infusion of ACTH is not feasible the test may be performed by the intramuscular administration of 25 U S P units every 6 hours for 72 hours with a urine collection over the last 24 hours

The following technics are used for direct eosinophil counts

The special diluting fluid used consists of

1% eosin	5 ml
Acetone	5 ml
Distilled water to 100 ml

The diluent is filtered before use Oxalated blood is drawn into a white count pipette up to the 1 mark and the special diluting fluid is then used in the usual fashion The pipette is shaken and the counting chamber is filled immediately The eosinophils which stand out as red dots are counted after 3 minutes

The average of 4 chambers is computed

Alternate Diluting Fluid

Stock Solutions

A 0 1% methylene blue in propylene glycol
B 0 1% phloxine in propylene glycol

Working Solutions

Mix {Dilute 2cc Solution A with 2cc distilled water
{Dilute 2cc Solution B with 2cc distilled water

Allow pipette containing diluted blood to stand at least 15 minute before counting

The advantages of this method are that the eosinophil count need not be carried out at once and that a simultaneous total white blood cell count can be made

Interpretation

Patients with Addison s disease show little or no drop in the eosinophil count while in normal subjects there occurs a 70% or more reduction in eosinophil A 50% reduction is considered the lower limit of normal

Hypertonic Saline Test for Diabetes Insipidus[16]

Method

All antidiuretic therapy is stopped in order to permit a recurrence of symptoms Fluid is withheld for 8 hours prior to the onset of the test Food however is permitted The patient is hydrated by the oral administration of 20 ml of water per kilo of body weight over a period of one hour Thirty minutes later a catheter is inserted and urine is collected in 15 minute periods and recorded as ml of urine

Subtract the total sodium and chloride ions of sample A from sample B and divide this figure by 171 (meq in 10 grams of salt injected) for the per cent of excreted ions e g

Sample A (6–9)

meq Na/vol	meq Cl/vol
13 1	14 8

Sample B (9–12)

meq Na/vol	meq Cl vol
21 8	25 4
171)8 7 = 5 1%	171)10 6 = 6 2%

Calculate samples A and B of the second day s experiment in the same manner

For interpretation of the results compare the percentages of the first experiment with those of the second

Normal individuals show a considerable increase in the percentage of salt retained after the injection of desoxycorticosterone acetate while patients with Cushing s syndrome show a sodium and chloride diuresis

Retrorectal (Presacral) Gas Insufflation[49, 50]

Method

After suitable preparation of the peri anal region the administration of a cleansing enema or suitable cathartic the patient is placed in the knee-chest position in bed or on a table The peri anal skin and sacrococcygeal area are painted with an antiseptic solution and draped with sterile towel The index finger of one hand is gently inserted into the rectum and the position of the coccyx determined Immediately lateral to the inferior most coccygeal segment a skin wheal is raised with procaine and local anesthesia is then carried deeply in front of the coccyx Palpation with the rectal finger guides the positioning of the infiltrating needle at all times When anesthesia has been accomplished (usually not more than 5 ml will be required) the infiltrating needle is withdrawn For the injection of the gas an 18 or 20 gauge 3 inch standard short bevel spinal needle fitted with an obturator is used This is introduced along the anesthetized tract until the tip is felt through the rectal wall To conform to the inclination of the rectum and sacrum the hub of the needle is depressed and the tip is advanced under constant digital guidance until it comes to lie in the mid line opposite the lower segments of the sacrum It will seldom be necessary to advance the needle more than 2 inches from the skin to accomplish this The obturator is removed and the conventional tests are made to ascertain that the needle tip does not lie within a blood vessel lumen It is unnecessary to secure the needle in any way as it will not be moved if reasonable care is employed

A standard pneumothorax gas measuring device filled with oxygen is used as the gas source This is led to one limb of a three-way stopcock (Popper and Sons Inc N Y) The other limbs are connected to the needle and to a standard 50 ml lock syringe Hose end lock connections and pressure tubing are used throughout to prevent gas leaks and separation of the connection A short length of pressure tubing is placed between the injection syringe and the needle to permit some degree of mobility during the injection Oxygen is injected in 50-ml increments Considerable pressure is required for the first 100–200 ml but thereafter practically no resistance is felt In adults approximately 1250–1750 ml are administered over a 5-minute period Almost all patients experience mild transitory abdominal cramps following the introduction of several hundred cubic centimeters of gas The patients are closely watched for any evidence of gas embolization

Following completion of the injection the needle is withdrawn The patient is placed in a sitting position for 5 to 10 minutes to allow distribution of the gas and before drinking the water load will result in a considerable increase in the urinary output over the 5-hour period

Salt Deprivation Tests

Harrop, Weinstein Soffer and Trescher[25]

The patient is given a salt free diet, that is one containing less than 0 7 gram of sodium daily Control samples of blood are analyzed for sodium chlorides potassium urea nitrogen and hematocrit A 24 hour control urine specimen is obtained and the sodium content determined The patient is kept on this diet for 48 to 96 hours and the above data is repeated daily On such a diet the patient with Addison s disease behaves in a characteristic fashion There occurs an increase in the excretion of urinary sodium in excess of the intake a progressive and definite fall in serum sodium and chlorides an increase in the blood urea nitrogen and serum potassium and an increase in the hematocrit This definite sequence of events is observed to occur only in Addison s disease Normal individuals and patients with other illnesses can be kept for prolonged periods of time on a salt free diet without manifesting any of the typical changes seen in patients with destructive lesions of the adrenal cortex

Actually it is not necessary to do the multitude of determinations outlined above as a provocative test The demonstration of an increase in the excretion of urinary sodium above the intake or a definite fall in the level of the serum sodium renders the diagnosis of Addison s disease conclusive

The test however is not without hazard since the patient with Addison s disease may be precipitated into a state of crisis upon the prolonged withdrawal of salt The test therefore should only be performed in the hospital The patient must be carefully observed and an adequate amount of adrenal steroid and intravenous salt must be immediately available for use if indicated

Cutler Power and Wilder Modification[26 27]

The patient is given a diet with a standard amount of sodium chloride and potassium In addition potassium citrate and water are administered in proportion to the body weight The test is terminated after a 52 hour period and the urine voided during the last 4 hour period is analyzed for its concentration of chlorides Under these circumstances patients with adrenal cortical insufficiency excrete urine with a high concentration of chlorides

This test differs from the original salt deprivation test only in that the concentration of chlorides rather than that of sodium is determined in the urine The patient is of course subjected to the same hazards

Salt Tolerance Test[28]

Procedure

Patients are permitted no fluid after 7 P M of the night previous to the test

At 6 A M of the morning of the test the patient voids and the urine is discarded The patient is then given 500 ml of water to drink at one time

All urine from 6 A M to 9 A M is then collected as one sample (Call this sample A)

At 9 A M 200 ml of 5% saline is injected intravenously and all urines from 9 A M to 12 M are collected as a second sample (Call this sample B)

Two days later the procedure is repeated with the addition that on the evening previous to the test the patient is injected intramuscularly with 10 mg of desoxycorticosterone acetate

The volume of each urine sample is carefully noted and both sodium and chlorides are determined in terms of milliequivalents per volume

For each hundred ml of urine used add 5 ml of the kaolin suspension and shake thoroughly Allow the kaolin to settle out (One hour is usually sufficient although the mixture may be stored in the refrigerator overnight)

Decant the supernatant liquid and collect the sediment in a large centrifuge bottle Centrifuge and discard the supernatant liquid

Add water to the kaolin and suspend it by vigorous shaking Centrifuge and discard the supernatant fluid Repeat this procedure once or twice until the kaolin has been washed free of urine

Elute the hormone from the kaolin by adding a volume of normal ammonium hydroxide equal to that of the kaolin suspension originally added to the urine Stir thoroughly until the suspension is homogeneous and allow to stand 20 to 30 minutes

Centrifuge and save the supernatant liquid Wash the kaolin once again with ammonium hydroxide Centrifuge and add the supernatant fluid to the first eluate Add glacial acetic acid to the combined eluates to bring the pH to 5 5 If a precipitate forms centrifuge and save the supernatant fluid

Bring the clarified supernatant fluid to pH 5 5 by the addition of acetic acid Slowly and with constant stirring add four volumes of ethanol for each volume of ammonium hydroxide to the eluate in order to precipitate the hormone Place in refrigerator until thoroughly chilled Centrifuge and dry the precipitate in a gentle stream of air or in a vacuum desiccator This precipitate is stable at room temperature

With a heavy stirring rod grind dry precipitate to a fine powder and add 15 ml distilled water for normal or high level and 10 ml distilled water for lower levels Mix well

Centrifuge and transfer supernatant fluid containing the gonadotropins to a small vial A small precipitate may remain insoluble in the water but since it contains no gonadotropins it should be discarded This extract should be stored in the refrigerator

Immature female mice weighing between 6 and 10 grams are used for the assay Each mouse receives 5 injections subcutaneously over a period of 3 days 2 on each of the first 2 days (at 9 a m and 5 p m) and 1 on the third The mice are then killed with chloroform 72 hours after the first injection The uterus is removed stripped of attached connective tissue pressed between layers of filter paper to remove fluid and weighed immediately on an analytical or fine torsion balance

In order to make a rough titration of the urinary extract it is wise to divide the mice into 3 groups one group of 3 mice receiving a total of 2 0 cc of extract (i e 5 injections of 0 4 ml per injection) another to receive a total of 1 5 ml and a third to receive a total of 0 5 ml

Untreated controls are run simultaneously with each test case

If the uteri of at least 2 mice of the 3 in 1 group weigh 10 mg or over the test is considered positive at that level

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{Total vol of urinary extract}}{\text{Total vol of urinary extract injected}} \times \frac{\text{24 hour urine vol}}{\text{Aliquot of urine used}} = \text{Mouse uterine units 24 hrs}$$

Normal Values 5 to 50 mouse uterine units per 24 hours

2 Sodium chloride

a scout film is taken to check the effectiveness of the insufflation Some degree of mediastinal emphysema usually develops but is of no clinical import

Subsequent visualization of the adrenals is carried out by concomitant intravenous pyelography and tomography

Perirenal Insufflation[29 30 31]

Method

The patient is placed on the side in the typical position for exposure of the kidney, with 2 or 3 small sandbags under the loin so as to increase the space between the twelfth rib and the iliac crest The patient is rotated somewhat forward so as to allow the peritoneal contents to fall away as much as possible from the site of injection The twelfth rib and the outer edge of the erector spinal muscles are outlined with tincture of mercurochrome An acute angle is thus formed by the junction of these two lines The skin is then prepared with tincture of iodine as for any operative procedure The mercurochrome lines will stand out prominently under the iodine coating A small amount of procaine hydrochloride is injected at the angle An ordinary spinal tap needle is introduced in a direction pointing slightly upward toward the twelfth rib and somewhat forward and away from the erector spinal muscles The needle is introduced until Gerota s fascia has been pierced A definite sensation of perforation of this membrane is usually experienced Aspiration at this level is made so as to be sure that the needle does not lie in a vessel The needle is then attached to the oxygen delivery system which consists of a two bottle calibrated pneumothorax outfit and two glass attachments for washing and filtering the oxygen Oxygen is delivered doubly filtered through cotton and washed by 1 to 500 mercury bichloride solution under 6 to 8 inches of gravity pressure If the proper plane has been entered the oxygen will bubble freely under this small amount of head pressure From 250 to 900 ml of oxygen is employed for visualization depending on the size of the patient and the size of the perirenal space The average amount usually employed is approximately 500 ml

The needle is removed after the introduction of the oxygen and the puncture site is coated with collodion The patient is then asked to sit up and perform rowing exercises for about 10 minutes This measure places the oxygen about the kidney and under the diaphragm When flexion exercises are not feasible manual massage over the kidney may be employed with similar results X ray films are then taken in the antero posterior and the oblique positions The plate taken in the oblique position has usually given the better visualization Roentgenograms taken in the lateral position are of the least benefit since the spine interferes in this plane

Urinary Gonadotropins[3 53]

Collect and store in a cool place a 24 hour sample of urine Start test within at most 6 hours after completion of sample

Note volume and take an aliquot for testing

To determine aliquot use

Entire sample for	5 mouse uterine units (m u u)
½	"	10
¼	"	50

If very high titers are to be anticipated an even smaller aliquot may be used

Prepare a 20% suspension of Kaolin (N F) powder that has previously been washed first with a solution of normal hydrochloric acid and then with distilled water This solution is stable Shake thoroughly before using

Acidify the aliquot of the urine to be used with glacial acetic acid to pH 4 5 and pass it through a coarse filter paper or centrifuge to remove particulate matter

Normal Value

In normal women during the child bearing period the urinary excretion of estrogen varies daily reaching peak excretion at the midmenstrual interval and again just before the onset of the menses. The total 24 hour urinary excretion varies between 15 and 50 micrograms. Menopausal women excrete about the same amounts as do normal women between peaks of excretion. The daily 24 hour urine value for menopausal women will generally vary from 6 to 7 micrograms although some excrete as much as 20 to 30 micrograms and others less than 5. The daily urinary excretion in adult males is 20 to 26 micrograms while children of both sexes excrete but small amounts rarely in excess of 6 micrograms.

The Insulin Tolerance Test (Hypoglycemia Responsiveness)[39]

The test is performed after a 12 hour fast and either capillary or venous blood for sugar determinations may be used The standard test consists of the intravenous injection of 0 1 unit per kilogram of body weight of regular insulin Where severe hypopituitarism or Addison's disease is suspected the insulin dosage should be reduced to one-third the standard dose (0 033 units per kg of body weight) If the latter fails to produce a fall in the blood sugar to approximately 45 per cent of the fasting level the test should be repeated with the standard insulin dosage A control sample of blood is obtained and again 20 30 45 60 90 and 120 minutes after the insulin injection for blood sugar determination The insulin tolerance test is inapplicable when the fasting blood sugar level is above the normal range The test is also not indicated when the fasting blood sugar is below the normal range and within hypoglycemic levels since this in itself would indicate hypoglycemia unresponsiveness

The maximum fall in the blood sugar level occurs within the first 20 to 30 minutes in normal individuals and in patients with Addison's disease hypopituitarism and anorexia nervosa In primary myxedema the reduction is definitely lower and the blood sugar reaches the lowest level in approximately 45 minutes The return of the blood sugar to control levels occurs within 2 hours in normal individuals and in most patients with anorexia nervosa In hypopituitarism Addison's disease and in some patients with anorexia nervosa, the hypoglycemia unresponsiveness is characterized by an abnormally slow return of the blood sugar to the control level In primary myxedema there is a similar delay but this is perhaps the result of the late development of the hypoglycemia rather than an evidence of a delayed response to the hypoglycemia

The fall in the blood sugar level following the injection of insulin is usually associated with some clinical hypoglycemic manifestations such as a sense of anxiety hunger, dizziness tachycardia and sweating Clouding of consciousness evidenced by confusion in understanding or answering questions and coma call for prompt interruption of the test by the administration of adrenalin intramuscularly or glucose intravenously or the oral use of sweetened drinks

Glucose Insulin Tolerance Test[39,54]

In this test the amount of glucose given is that given in the glucose tolerance test The amount of insulin is that given in the insulin tolerance test

Both the glucose and insulin are administered simultaneously and blood samples are collected at 0 20, 30 45 60 90 and 120 minutes

In the Engel and Scott procedure 0 1 unit kg body weight of regular insulin is given intravenously to the fasting subject Thirty minutes later or earlier if hypoglycemia supervenes 0 8 gm of glucose per kilogram of body weight is given by mouth Blood samples are taken at 0 30 60 90 120 and 180 minutes

Hexosamine in Serum[40]

Reagents

1 Physiologic saline
   9 0 grams sodium chloride dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 1000 ml
2 Hydrochloric acid 2 normal
   164 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid diluted to 1000 ml with distilled water
3 Sodium hydroxide 0 5 normal
   20 grams sodium hydroxide dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 1000 ml
4 Acetyl acetone reagent
   Redistil acetyl acetone in an all glass still Dissolve 1 ml acetyl acetone in 50 ml 0 5 normal sodium carbonate
   Stored in the refrigerator this solution will be stable for 3 to 4 days

Oral Glucose Tolerance Test[36]

Determine the patient's weight

Prepare a weighed amount of glucose equivalent to 1.75 grams of glucose for every kilogram of the patient's weight

Dissolve the glucose in the ratio of 4 grams per 10 ml of water, adding the juice of 1 lemon for flavor

The patient is fasted from 7 P.M. of the night before the test until the test is completed

Obtain a fasting blood sugar and a specimen of urine at the same time

Exactly ½ hour after the sugar drink has been taken, another blood sugar and specimen of urine are collected

Repeat this procedure at the end of 1, 2 and 3 hours

In a normal result the highest level is not more than 30 to 60 mg above the fasting level and the fasting level is reached in 2 hours. There is no glycosuria. Normal fasting levels vary between 80 and 120 mg %. In diabetes the level attained is higher and there is a failure to return to the normal level by the end of the second to third hour. There may be glycosuria. In renal glycosuria, the curve is normal but sugar appears in the urine. Increased sugar tolerance (a flat curve or only a slight rise, less than 30 mg) occurs in hypophyseal dysfunction, Addison's disease, hypothyroidism and muscular dystrophy. Disease of the small intestine may result in a flat curve because of poor absorption (ileitis, sprue)

Intravenous Glucose Tolerance Test[37]

The test is performed on a fasting subject and a control sample of blood is obtained for sugar analysis

50 ml of a 50% solution of glucose in distilled water is injected over a 2 minute period

Samples of blood are obtained at half hourly intervals for a period of 2 hours

If the blood sugar level at the end of 2 hours exceeds 120 mg % the patient probably has diabetes while a blood sugar value of less than 100 mg % excludes diabetes. Results between 100 and 120 mg % are difficult to evaluate

Exton Rose Glucose Tolerance Test[38]

This glucose tolerance test is carried out after the patient has fasted overnight. However, he should have taken at least 100 grams of carbohydrate daily for 3 days prior to the test

Technic

1. Dissolve 100 grams of glucose in 650 ml of water flavored with lemon juice
2. Collect a control blood and urine for sugar determination
3. Have patient drink one half the total dose of glucose water within a minute
4. 30 minutes after the ingestion of this portion collect blood and urine
5. Directly after collection of blood give the remaining portion of glucose water
6. 30 minutes after ingestion of second dose collect blood and urine

Results

In normal patients a rise not exceeding 75 mg of sugar over the control level is present in the 30 minute specimen. The blood sugar level of the hour sample should not exceed the 30 minute specimen by more than 5 mg. Normally the blood sugar at the end of 1 hour is less than that at the end of 30 minutes. All urine specimens should be free of sugar as tested with Benedict's qualitative reagent

In diabetes, there is a rise of not less than 10 mg per cent of the blood sugar in the 60 minute sample following the second dose of glucose, and the blood sugar value usually exceeds 160 mg per cent

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{Reading of unknown}}{\text{Reading of standard}} \times \text{mg of standard} \times \frac{100}{0.02} = \text{mg glucosamine/100 ml serum}$$

Normal Values 90 to 120 mg /100 ml

The Male Frog Test for Early Pregnancy[41]

Male frogs Rana pipiens, are used for the test The first morning sample of urine is collected and 5 ml injected subcutaneously into the dorsal or lateral lymph sacs of the frog Each frog is placed in a separate clean dry glass jar with a perforated lid and is set aside at room temperature for 2 to 4 hours At the end of this time any urine excreted is examined microscopically for spermatozoa If none are present the urine is drained from the jar care being taken to leave the frog undisturbed The frog is then seized in the hand while still in the jar This pressure usually induces another urination and this specimen is then examined for spermatozoa

When spermatozoa are present the test is positive

The test animals may be used for another test after 4 or 5 days

Aschheim Zondek Test for Pregnancy[42]

Immature mice 3 to 4 weeks old weighing 6 to 8 grams are used for the assay The first morning specimen of urine is collected and from 1 2 to 2 4 ml are injected subcutaneously in 6 equal injections over a period of 48 hours Ninety-six hours after the first injection the mice are sacrificed and the ovaries examined for corpora hemorrhagica

The test is considered positive if there is a single hemorrhagic follicle or corpus luteum

Friedman Test for Pregnancy[43]

Two adult female rabbits weighing not less than 500 grams are used They are kept isolated from the male for at least 4 weeks prior to the test The first morning sample of urine is collected and on each of two successive days 10 ml are injected into the marginal vein of the ear Forty-eight hours after the first injection the rabbits are killed or simply anesthetized and the ovaries examined

The presence of enlarged hemorrhagic follicles constitutes a positive test

The rabbits may be used several times, provided an interval of 1 month is allowed between tests

Examination of Vaginal Smears[44]

Aspirate vaginal secretion by means of a glass pipette to which is attached a rubber bulb of 1-ounce capacity Expel secretion onto a clean dry glass slide which is placed immediately in a solution of equal parts of ether and 95 per cent alcohol for fixation After two minutes (or longer if desired) remove the slide and place in Shorr Single Differential Stain for two minutes Consecutively dip the slide 10 times in 80 per cent alcohol in 95 per cent alcohol in absolute alcohol and finally in xylol For a permanent preparation the slide is then mounted in damar

Examine thinner portions of the smear under low or high power objective Cornified epithelial cells (indicative of a maximum estrogenic effect) are colored a brilliant orange-red Non cornified cells appear in various shades and intensity of bluish-green

There is considerable fluctuation in the cytologic composition in normal women Variations occur in different individuals and in different stages of the menstrual cycle of the same person Hence it is usually necessary to study a series of slides in order to evaluate ovarian function However estrogen deficiency is readily recognized in a single smear by the total or relative absence of cornified cells and by the presence of blue stained small round or oval (deep) cells with large nuclei

Semen Analyses[45]

After 3 days of sexual abstinence semen (obtained by coitus interruptus or masturbation) is ejaculated in its entirety directly into a clean dry wide-mouthed glass container

Keep at room temperature and examine within 2 hours

Volume of ejaculate should be noted (normal average 3 ml)

Sperm count is performed after shaking the specimen thoroughly The semen is drawn up into a white blood cell pipette to the 0 5 mark (When the sperm count is low, semen is drawn up to the number 1 mark) The remainder of the pipette is filled to the number 11 mark with a diluent consisting of 1 per cent phenol in a saturated solution of sodium bicarbonate The same technic is employed as in ordinary blood counts The total number of sperm contained in five blocks of 16 squares of a hemacytometer counting chamber is obtained The addition of 6 ciphers to this figure gives the number of sperm per cubic centimeter (The result is divided by 2 if the semen is drawn up to the number 1 mark)

When the number of sperm is very low the count is performed without dilution of the semen Add one or two drops of dilute hydrochloric acid to the ejaculate After shaking aspirate the semen directly into the pipette Flood the counting chamber and obtain the number of sperm in the red blood cell field The addition of 4 ciphers to the number found in the entire field gives the sperm count per cubic centimeter

Normal average count 120 000 000 per cubic centimeter

Motility is judged by simple observation of a high power field There is normally little decline in motility for the first 3 to 5 hours At the end of 24 hours a few sperm are still motile in normal ejaculates

Normal average	50–75 per cent motile at	2 hours
	30–40 "	6
	1–10 "	24

Abnormal morphology is studied in the dried and stained smear of the semen The technic is similar to that employed for a differential blood count Shake the specimen and place a drop on a slide With a second slide draw the fluid as a thin layer over the length of the first slide Dry smear in air and fix in moderate heat Stain by the Gram method and examine with the oil immersion objective

The normal sperm head has a uniformly oval contour Any deviation in size or shape of the head constitutes a morphological abnormality Abnormal forms are classified as tapering round duplicate giant pinhead and amorphous cells Count 100 sperm cells and determine the proportion of abnormal heads

Normal average of abnormal forms not in excess of 25 per cent
